The Articles which have no initials attached to them are written by the Editor.
The present work has been conducted on the same principles, and is designed mainly for the use of the same persons, as the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities." It has been long felt by most persons engaged in the study of Antiquity, that something better is required than we yet possess in the English language for illustrating the Biography, Literature, and Mythology, of the Greek and Roman writers, and for enabling a diligent student to read them in the most profitable manner. The writings of modern continental philologists, as well as the works of some of our own scholars, have cleared up many of the difficulties connected with these subjects, and enabled us to attain to more correct knowledge and more comprehensive views than were formerly possessed. The articles in this Dictionary have been founded on a careful examination of the original sources; the best modern authorities have been diligently consulted; and no labour has been spared in order to bring up the subject to the present state of philological learning upon the continent as well as at home.

A work, like the present, embracing the whole circle of ancient history and literature for upwards of two thousand years, would be the labour of at least one man's life, and could not in any case be written satisfactorily by a single individual, as no one man possesses the requisite knowledge of all the subjects of which it treats. The lives, for instance, of the ancient mathematicians, jurists, and physicians, require in the person who writes them a competent knowledge of mathematics, law, and medicine; and the same remark applies, to a greater or less extent, to the history of philosophy, the arts, and numerous other subjects. The Editor of the present work has been fortunate in obtaining the assistance of scholars, who had made certain departments of antiquity their particular study, and he desires to take this opportunity of returning his best thanks to them for their valuable aid, by which he has been able to produce a work which could not have been accomplished by any single person. The initials of each writer's name are given at the end of the articles he has written, and a list of the names of the contributors is prefixed to the work.

The biographical articles in this work include the names of all persons of any importance which occur in the Greek and Roman writers, from the earliest times down to the extinction of the Western Empire in the year 476 of our era, and to the extinction of the Eastern Empire by the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in the year 1453. The lives of historical personages occurring in the history of the Byzantine empire are treated with comparative brevity, but accompanied by sufficient references to ancient writers to enable the reader to obtain further information if he wishes. It has not been thought advisable to omit the lives of such persons altogether, as has usually been done in classical dictionaries; partly because there is no other period short of the one chosen at which a stop can conveniently be made; and still more because the civil history of the Byzantine empire is more or less connected with the history of literature and science, and, down to the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, there was an interrupted series of Greek writers, the omission of whose lives and of an account of their works would be a serious deficiency in any work which aspired to give a complete view of Greek literature.

The relative length of the articles containing the lives of historical persons cannot be fixed, in a work like the present, simply by the importance of a man’s life. It would be impossible to give within any reasonable compass a full and elaborate account of the lives of the great actors in Greek and Roman history; nor is it necessary: for the lives of such persons are conspicuous parts of history and, as such, are given at length in historical works. On the contrary, a Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography is peculiarly useful for the lives of those persons who do not occupy so prominent a position in history, since a knowledge of their actions and character is oftentimes of great importance to a proper understanding of the ancient writers, and information respecting such persons cannot be obtained in any other quarter. Accordingly, such articles have had a space assigned to them in the work which might have been deemed disproportionately if it were not for this consideration. Woodcuts of ancient coins are given, wherever they could be referred to any individual or family. The drawings have been made from originals in the British Museum, except in a few cases, where the authority for the drawing is stated in the article.

More space, relatively, has been given to the Greek and Roman Writers than to any other articles, partly because we have no complete history of Greek and Roman Literature in the English language, and partly because the writings of modern German scholars contain on this subject more than on any other a store of valuable matter which has not yet found its way into English books, and has, hitherto, only partially and in a few instances, exercised any influence on our course of classical instruction. In these articles a full account of the Works, as well as of the Lives, of the Writers is given, and, likewise, a list of the best editions of the works, together with references to the principal modern works upon each subject.

The lives of all Christian Writers, though usually omitted in similar publications, have likewise been inserted in the present Work, since they constitute an important part of the history of Greek and Roman literature, and an account of their biography and writings can be attained at present only by consulting a considerable number of voluminous works. These articles are written rather from a literary than a theological point of view; and accordingly the discussion of strictly theological topics, such as the subjects might easily have given rise to, has been carefully avoided.

Care has been taken to separate the mythological articles from those of an historical nature, as a reference to any part of the book will show. As it is necessary to discriminate between the Greek and Italian Mythology, an account of the Greek divinities is given under their Greek names, and of the Italian divinities under their Latin names, a practice which is universally adopted by the continental writers, which has received the sanction of some of our own scholars, and is moreover of such importance in guarding against endless confusions and mistakes as to require no apology for its introduction into this work. In the treatment of the articles themselves, the mystical school of interpreters has been avoided, and those principles followed which have been developed by Voss, Buttman, Welcker, K. O. Müller, Lobeck, and others. Less space, relatively, has been given to these articles than to any other portion of the work, as it has not been considered necessary to repeat all the fanciful speculations which abound in the later Greek writers and in modern books upon this subject.

The lives of Painters, Sculptors, and Architects, have been treated at considerable length, and an account is given of all their works still extant, or of which there is any record in ancient writers. These articles, it is hoped, will be useful to the artist as well as to the scholar.

Some difficulty has been experienced respecting the admission or rejection of certain names, but the following is the general principle which has been adopted. The names of all persons are inserted, who are mentioned in more than one passage of an ancient writer: but where a name occurs in only a single passage, and nothing more is known of the person than that passage contains, that name is in general omitted. On the other hand, the names of such persons are inserted when they are intimately connected with some great historical event, or there are other persons of the same name with whom they might be confounded.

When there are several persons of the same name, the articles have been arranged either in chronological or some alphabetical order. The latter plan has been usually adopted, where there are many persons of one name, as in the case of Alexander, Antiochus, and others, in which cases a chronological arrangement would stand in the way of ready reference to any particular individual whom the reader might be in search of. In the case of Roman names, the chronological order has, for obvious reasons, been always adopted, and they have been given under the cognomems, and not under the gentile names. There is, however, a separate article devoted to each gens, in which is inserted a list of all the cognomens of that gens.

In a work written by several persons it is almost impossible to obtain exact uniformity of reference to the ancient Writers, but this has been done as far as was possible. Wherever an author is referred to by page, the particular edition used by the writer is generally stated; but of the writers enumerated below, the following

Names of Places and Nations are not included in the Work, as they will form the subject of the forthcoming "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography."

LIST OF COINS ENGRAVED IN THE FIRST VOLUME.

In the following list AV indicates that the coin is of gold, \( \text{AR} \) of silver, \( \text{AE} \) of copper, 1\( \text{AE} \) first bronze Roman, 2\( \text{AE} \) second bronze Roman, 3\( \text{AE} \) third bronze Roman. The weight of all gold and silver coins is given, with the exception of the aurei and denarii, which are for the most part of nearly the same weight respectively. When a coin has been reduced or enlarged in the drawing, the diameter of the original coin is given in the last column; the numbers in which refer to the subjoined scale: those which have no numbers affixed to them are of the same size in the drawing as the originals.

ABARIS.

ABARIS ('Abaris'), a surname of Apollo derived from the town of Abaris in Phocis, where the god had a rich temple. (Hesych. s. v. 'Abaris, Herod. viii. 38; Paus. x. 33. §1, &c.) [L. S.]

ABAMON MAGISTER. [Porphyryus.] ABANTYADES ('Abaridae') signifies in general a descendant of Abaris, but is used especially to designate Penseus, the great-grandson of Abaris (Ov. Met. iv. 673, v. 238, 238, and Acrisius, a son of Abaris. (Ov. Met. iv. 607.) A female descendant of Abaris, as Demea and Atalanta, was called Abantia. [L. S.]

ABA'NTIAS. [ABANTYADES.]

ABA'NTIDAS ('Abaridas'), the son of Penseus, became tyrant of Siclon after murdering Cleinius, the father of Aratus, c. 264. Aratus, who was then only seven years old, narrowly escaped death. Abantis was fond of literature, and was accustomed to attend the philosophical discussions of Demus and Aristotle, the dialectic in the agora of Siclon: on one of these occasions he was murdered by his enemies. He was succeeded in the tyranny by his father, who was put to death by Nicoles. (Plin. Hist. Nat. iv. 16, &c.) [L. S.]

ABABAR'AREA ('Abararea'), a Naiad, who bore two sons, Aephus and Pederus, to Daclosion, the eldest but illegitimate son of the Trojan King Laomedon. (Hom. Ill. vi. 22, &c.) Other writers do not mention this nymph, but Hesychius (s. a.) mentions 'Abarariste or 'Abaraleiaste as the name of a class of nymphs. [L. S.]

ABARIS ('Abaris'), son of Sentes, was a Hyperborean priest of Apollo (Herod. iv. 36), and came from the country about the Caucasus (Ov. Met. v. 36) to Greece, while his own country was visited by a plague. He was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and by this as well as by his Sythian dress and simplicity and honesty he created great sensation in Greece, and was held in high esteem. (Strab. vii. p. 201.) He travelled about in Greece, carrying with him an arrow as the symbol of Apollo, and gave oracles. Toland, in his History of the Druids, considers him to have been a Druid of the Hebridies, because the arrow formed a part of the costume of a Druid. His history, which is entirely mythical, is related in various ways, and worked up with extraordinary particulars: he is said to have taken no earthly food (Herod. iv. 36), and to have ridden on his arrow, the gift of Apollo, through the air. (Lobeck, Apologia Phalaris, p. 314.) He cured diseases by incantations (Plat. Charmid. p. 158, &c.), delivered the world from a plague (Suidas, s. v. 'Abaras), and built at Sparta a temple of Kybele (Ov. Met. iv. 607.) A female descendant of Abaris, as Demea and Atalanta, was called Abantia. [L. S.]

ABABAR'AREA ('Abararea'), a Naiad, who bore two sons, Aephus and Pederus, to Daclosion, the eldest but illegitimate son of the Trojan King Laomedon. (Hom. Ill. vi. 22, &c.) Other writers do not mention this nymph, but Hesychius (s. a.) mentions 'Abarariste or 'Abaraleiaste as the name of a class of nymphs. [L. S.]

ABAS ('Abaris'). 1. A son of Metaneira, was changed by Demeter into a lizard, because he mocked the goddess when she had come on her wanderings into the house of her mother, and drank eagerly to quench her thirst. (Nicanor. Thetisae), N. Com. v. 14; Ov. Met. v. 450.) Other traditions relate the same story of a boy, Ascalaphus, and call his mother Thaneira. (Antonin. Lib. 23.)

2. The twelfth King of Argos. He was the son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, and grandson of Danaus. He married Ocaleia, who bore him twin sons, Acrisius and Phanes. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 170.) When he informed his father of the death of Danaus, he was rewarded with the shield of his grandfather, which was sacred to Hera. He is described as a successful conqueror and as the founder of the town of Abaris in Phocis (Paus. x. 35. § 1), and of the Pelasgic Argos in Thessaly. (Strab. iv. p. 431.) The fame of his warlike spirit was so great, that even after his death, when people ABELLIO. revoluted, whom he had subdued, they were put to flight by the simple act of showing them his shield. (Virg. Aen. iii. 286; Serv. ad loc.) It was from this Abas that the kings of Argos were called by the patronymic Abantes. [ABANTIADIS.] [L. S.]

ABAS (Ἀβᾶς). 1. A Greek sophist and rhetorician about whose life nothing is known. Suidas (s. e. 'Ἀβᾶς; compare Eudocia, p. 51) ascribes to him λογικά διάρκεια and a work on rhetoric (τέχνη στοιχεῖο). What Photios (Cod. 160. p. 150, b. ed. Bekker) quotes from him, belongs probably to the former work. (Compare Wala, Plut. Per. Graec. vii. 1. p. 203.)

2. A writer of a work called Τρωίς, from which Servius (ad Aen. ix. 264) has preserved a fragment. [L. S.]

ABASCANTUS ('Abasqantos), a physician of Lugdunum ( Lyons), who probably lived in the second century after Christ. He is several times mentioned by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. secund. Locos, ix. 4. vol. xiii. p. 278), who has also preserved an antidote invented by him against the bite of serpents. (De Anul. ii. 12. vol. xiv. p. 177.) The name is to be met with in numerous Latin inscriptions in Gruter's collection, five of which refer to a Proconsul of Augustus, who is supposed by Kühn (Abdahes, ad Helch. Med. Vet. a. J. A. Pallecio in "Bibl. Gr. Etchh." to be the same person that is mentioned by Galen. This however is quite uncertain, as also whether Παναελλαμβονος 'Abasqanontos in Galen (De Compos. Medicam. secund. Locos. viii. 3. vol. xiii. p. 71.) refers to the subject of this article. [W. A. G.]

ABDOLO'NIMUS or ABDALO'NIMUS, a gardener, but of royal descent, was made king of Sion by Alexander the Great. (Curt. iv. 1; Just. xi. 10.) He is called Balleymus by Diodorus. (xviii. 46.)

ABDE'RUS ('Ade'ros), a son of Hermes, or according to others of Thromion the Locrian. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 6; Strab. vii. p. 531.) He was a favourite of Hercules, and was born to pieces by the mares of Diomedes, which Hercules had given him to pursue the Bistones. Hercules is said to have built the town of Abdem to honour him. According to Hyginus, (Fab. 30.), Abderus was a servant of Diomedes, the king of the Thracian Bistones, and was killed by Hercules together with his master and his four men-devouring horses. (Compare Philostom. Heroeic. 3. § 1; 19. § 2.) [L. S.]

ABDIAS ('Abdias), the pretended author of an Apocryphal book, entitled The History of the Apostolical contest. This work claims to have been written in Hebrew, to have been translated into Greek by Euphranor, and thence into Latin by Julius Africanus. It was however originally written in Latin, about A. D. 910. It is printed in Fabricius, Codex Apocryphi Norv. Test. p. 402. Vov. Hamb. 1763. Abdas was called too the first Bishop of Babylon. [A. J. C.]

ABELLIO, is the name of a divinity found in inscriptions which were discovered at Cumandia in Frieso. (Gruter. Lacer. p. 37. 4; J. Scaliger, Locios Annozianos, i. 9.) Buttmann (Mythologos, i. p. 167, &c.) considers Abellio to be the same name as Apollo, and in Crete and elsewhere was called 'Ade'los, and by the Italians and some Dorians Apollo (Test. s. e. Apollinum; Rustath. ad II. ii. 99), and that the deity is the same as the Gallic Apollo mentioned by Caesar (Bell. Gall. vi. 17), and also the same as Bells or Belenus mentioned by Tertullian (Apolog. 25) and Herodian (viii. 3; comp. Capitol. Maximinia, 22). As the root of the word he recognizes the Spartan Βλας, i.e. the sun (Hexych. s. v.), which appears in the Syriac and Chaldæan Behus or Baal. [L. S.]

ABER'CIUS, ST. (Ἀβερκίος), the supposed successor of St. Papias in the see of Hierapolis, flourished 150. There are ascribed to him, 1. An Epistle to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, of which Baroinus speaks as extant, but he does not produce it; and, 2. A Book of Decepc Rīas (roprietas) addressed to his Curios; this too is lost. See Ιουλ. Eusebi. Orient. Script. Vitae, ap. P. Halloix. Danc. 1636. [A. J. C.]

A'B'GARUS, A'CBARUS, or A'GUARUS (Ἀγαρος, Ἀγαρός, Ἀγαρός), a name common to many rulers of Edessa, the capital of the state of Oroschein in Mesopotamia. It seems to have been a title and not a proper name. (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii. 12.) For the history of these kings see Bayer, "Historia Oroschein et Edessanae seu nummatis illustratur," Petrop. 1754. Of these the most important are:

1. The ally of the Romans under Pompey, who treacherously drew Cassius into an unfavorable position before his defeat. He is called Augustus by Dion Cassius (cl. 29), Acharn the phylarch of the Arabians in the Parthian history ascribed to Appian (p. 34. Schw.), and Ariamnes by Plutarch. (Brass. 21.)

2. The contemporary of Christ. See the following article.

3. The chief, who resisted Mithradates, whom Claudio visited to place on the Parthian throne: he is called a king of the Arabians by Tacitus (Ann. xii. 12. 14), but was probably an Oroscheinian.

4. The contemporary of Trajan, who sent presents to that emperor when he invaded the east, and subsequently waited upon him and became his ally. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 18. 21.)

5. The contemporary of Carnakka, who acted cruelly towards his nation, and was deposed by Carnakka. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 12.)

A'B'GARUS, Toparch of Edessa, supposed by Eusebius to have been the author of a letter written to our Saviour, which he found in a church at Edessa and translated from the Syriac. The letter is believed to be spurious. It is given by Eusebius. (Hist. Eccl. i. 13.) [A. J. C.]

A'B'ILA (Ἀβίλα), the nurse of Hyllus, a son of Hercules. She built a temple of Hercules at Ira in M cesarea, for which the Hermit Cephalonia afterwards honored her in various other ways, and also by changing the name of the town of Ira into Abia. (Paus. iv. 30. § 1.) [L. S.]

ABELOX, A'BELUX or A'BILYX (Ἀβέλοξ), a noble Spumadi, originally a friend of Carthage, betrayed the Spanish hostages at Seguntum, who were in the power of the Cuthulhines, to the Roman generals, the two Scipios, after deceiving Bostor, the Carthaginian commander. (Livy. xxii. 22.; Polyb. iii. 98, &c.)

A'BISARES or A'BISASSARES (Ἀβίσαρης), called Eumbras (Ἐυμηρας) by Diodorus (xviii. 90), an Indian king beyond the river Hydaspes, whose territory lay in the mountains, sent embassies to Alexander the Great both before and after the conquest of Porus, although inclined to espouse the side of the latter. Alexander not only allowed him to retain his kingdom, but increased it, and on his death appointed his son as successor. (Arrian, Anab. v. 8. 20. 29; Curt. viii. 12. 13. 14. and ix. 1. x. G.)

ABISTAMENES was appointed governor of Cappadocia by Alexander the Great. (Curt. iii. 4.) He was called Tachis by Arrian. (Anab. ii. 4.) Gronovius conjectures that instead of ABISTAMENES CAPPADOCIAE praefectus, we ought to read ABISTA magnus Cappadociae, &c.

ABITIA'NUS (Ἀβίτιανοος), the author of a Greek treatise De Urinis inserted in the second volume of Ideler's Physici et Medici Graeci Minores, Berol. 1804, with the title Per Oōrōn Piraqeratia 'Aριστη των Σωφριτων παρα μεν Ἰταλίων Ἀλλ' Ἰταλίων τοι Σωφρίτου παρα δε Ἰταλίων Ἀβιτιανού. He is the same person as the celebrated Arabic physician Athisena, whose real name was Abd 'Alla Ilma Stud. a. n. 370 or 375-428 (A. d. 800 or 805-1027), and from whose great work Rebab al-Kūtib jî l-Fobb, Idler Commiss Medicae, this treatise is probably translated.

[W. A. G.]

ABLA'B VlUS (Ἀβλαβιός). 1. A physician on whose death there is an epitaph by Theosebia in the Greek Anthology (vii. 559), in which he is considered as inferior only to Hippocrates and Galen. With respect to his date, it is only known that he must have lived after Galen, that is, some time later than the second century after Christ.

[W. A. G.]

2. The illustrious (Ἀλλοδιοτόμος), the author of an epitaph in the Greek Anthology (ix. 765) "on the quolt of Aesopcleides." Nothing more is known of him, unless he be the same person as Aplabias, the Novatian bishop of Nicaea, who was a disciple of the rhetorician Trimos, and himself eminent in the same profession, and who lived under Honorius and Theodosius, in the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries after Christ. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 12.)

ABLA'VIIUS. 1. Prefect of the city, the minister and favourite of Constantine the Great, was murdered after the death of the latter. (Zosimus, ii. 40.) He was consul A. D. 331. There is an epitaph extant attributed to him, in which the reign of Nero and Constantine are compared. (Anth. Lat. n. 261, ed. Meyer.)

2. A Roman historian, whose age is unknown, wrote a history of the Goths, which is sometimes quoted by Jornandes as his authority. (De Rob. Gotic. iv. 14, 22.)

ABRADA'TAS (Ἀβράδατος), a king of Susa and an ally of the Assyrians against Cyrus. His wife Pantheia was taken on the conquest of the Assyrian camp, while he was absent on a mission to the Bactrians. In consequence of the honorable treatment which his wife received from Cyrus, he joined the latter with his forces. He fell in battle, while fighting against the Egyptians. Inconsolable at her loss, Pantheia put an end to her own life, and her example was followed by her three eunuchs. Cyrus had a high mound raised in their honour: on a pillar on the top were inscribed the names of Abradatius and Pantheia in the Syriac characters; and three columns below bore the inscription συμπτωτέος, in honour of the eunuchs. (Xen. Con. ii. 5, vi. 1, 33, 34, 4, 2, 8, 10, &c. Lucian. H. r. 20.)

ABRO'COMAS (Ἀβροκόμαοος), one of the satraps of Artaxerxes Mecnon, was sent with an army of 300,000 men to oppose Cyrus on his march into upper Asia. On the arrival of Cyrus at Tarus, Abrocomas was said to be on the Ephræmites; and at Issus four hundred heavy-armed Greeks, who had deserted Abrocomas, joined Cyrus. Abrocomas did not defend the Syrian passes, as was expected, but marched to join the king. He burnt some boats to prevent Cyrus from crossing the Ephræmites, but did not arrive in time for the battle of Cunaxa. (Xen. Anab. i. 8. § 20, 4. § 3, 5, 18, 7. § 12; Harpocrat. and Suidas, s. v.)

ABROC'OMES (Ἀβροκόμηοος) and his brother Hyperanthes (Ὑπερανθήοος), the sons of Darius by Phratagune, the daughter of Aranes, were slain at Thermopylae while fighting over the body of Leonidas. (Herod. vii. 224.)

2. The son of Collins, of the deme of Bate in Attica, wrote on the festivals and mysteries of the Greeks. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βάτο.) He also wrote a work περὶ παρακομοῖοος, which is referred to by Stephanus Byz. (s. v. Ἀγαθά, Ἀγαθόο, &c.) and other writers.

3. A grammarian, a Phrygian or Rhodian, a pupil of Tryphon, and originally a slave, taught at Rome under the first Caesars. (Suidas, s. v. Ἀβρώο.)

4. A rich person at Argos, from whom the proverb Ἀβρωροὶ βίος, which was applied to extravagant persons, is said to have been derived. (Suidas, s. v.)

ABRONIUS SILO, a Latin Poeti, who lived in the latter part of the Augustan age, was a pupil of Porcius Latro. His son was also a poet, but degraded himself by writing plays for pantomimes. (Suet. Suet. ii. p. 21, Bipp.)

ABRONYCHUS (Ἀβρονυχοοος), the son of Lysicles, an Athenian, was stationed at Thermopylae with a vessel to communicate between Leonidas and the fleet at Artemision. He was subsequently sent as ambassador to Sparta with Themistocles and Aristides respecting the fortifications of Athens after the Persian war. (Herod. viii. 21; Thuc. i. 91.)

ABROTA (Ἀβρότηοο), the daughter of Onchus, the Bocotian, and the wife of Nisus, king of Megarids. On her death Nisus commanded all the Megarian women to wear a garment of the same kind as Abrota had worn, which was called aphrodron (ἄφροδρομα), and was still in use in the time of Plutarch. (Quaes. Graec. p. 205.)

ABRONTON (Ἀβρότονοος), a Thracian harlot, who according to some accounts was the mother of Themistocles. There is an epitaph preserved recording this fact. (Plut. Them. i. Athen. xiii. p. 576, c. 7; Adian. F. H. xii. 43.) Plutarch also refers to her in his Emporikos (p. 753, d.), and Lucian speaks of a harlot of the same name (Dial. Meretr. 1).

ABRO'POLIS, an ally of the Romans, who attacked the dominions of Perseus, and laid them waste as far as Amphipolis, but was afterwards driven out of his kingdom by Perseus. (Livy. xiii. 12. 30. 41.)

Xenophon (Gigantes.)

ABSIMARUS. [Thrius Thormaros.]

ABSYRUTS or APSYRUTS (Ἀβσυρωοος), a son of Aeetes, king of Colchis, and brother of Medea. His mother is stated differently: Hygi.
ACACALLIS. (Antonin. Lib. 30.) Other sons of her and Apollo are Amphithemis and Garamas. (Apollon. iv. 1490, &c.) Apollodorus (iii. 1, § 2) calls this daughter of Minos Aellois (Ἀελλόη), but does not mention Miletus as her son. Acacia was in Crete a common name for a narcisus. (Athen. xv. p. 691; Hesych. s. v. Ακάκια.)

ACACIUS (Ἀκακιος), a rhetorician, of Caesarea in Palestine, lived under the emperor Julian, and was a friend of Libanius. (Suidas, s. v. Ακακιος, Ακακίος: Eunapius, Acacii Vit.) Many of the letters of Libanius are addressed to him. [B. J.]

2. A Syrian by birth, lived in a monastery near Antioch, and, for his active defence of the Church against Arianism, was made Bishop of Berrhoea, A. D. 378, by St. Eusebius of Samosata. While a priest, he (with Paul, another priest) wrote to St. Epiphanius a letter, in consequence of which the latter composed his Panarion (A. D. 374-6). This letter is prefixed to the work. In A. D. 377-8, he was sent to Rome to confute Apollinaris beyond Europe by St. Damasus. He was present at the Oecumenical Council of Constantinople A. D. 381, and on the death of St. Meletius took part in Flavian’s ordination to the See of Antioch, by whom he was afterwards sent to the Pope in order to heal the schism between the churches of the West and Antioch. Afterwards, he took part in the persecution against St. Chrysostom (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 18), and again compromised himself by obtaining as successor to Flavian, Porphyrius, a man unworthy of the episcopate. He defended the heretic Nestorius against St. Cyril, though not himself present at the Council of Ephesus. At a great age, he laboured to reconcile St. Cyril and the Eastern Bishops at a Synod held at Berrhoea, A. D. 432. He died A. D. 437, at the age of 116 years. Three of his letters remain in the original Greek, one to St. Cyril, (extant in the Collection of Councils by Manai, vol. iv. p. 1056) and two to Alexander, Bishop of Hierapolis. (Ib., ib. pp. 819, 830, c. 41. 55. § 129, 145.)

3. The One-eyed (ὁ Μονόφατος), the pupil and successor in the See of Caesarea of Eusebius A. D. 340, whose life he wrote. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii. 4.) He was able, learned, and unscrupulous. At first a Semi-Arian like his master, he founded afterwards the Hemoan party and was condemned by the Semi-Arians at Seleucia, A. D. 359. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii. 39, 40; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. iv. 22, 23.) He subsequently became the associate of Athanasius, the author of the Apanoaeon, they despatched him at the command of Constantius, and, under the Catholic Jovian, subscribed the Homoeousian or Creed of Nicea. He died A. D. 366. He wrote seventeen Books on Ecclesiastics and six of Miscellanies. (St. Jerome, Vir. Ill. 58.) St. Epiphanius has preserved a fragment of his work against Marcellus (v. Haer. 72), and nothing else of his is extant, though Sozomen speaks of many valuable works written by him. (Hist. Eccl. iii. 2.)

4. Bishop of Constantiople, succeeded Gennadius A. D. 471, after being at the head of the Orphan Asylum of that city. He distinguished himself by defending the Council of Chalcedon against the emperor Basiliscus, who favoured the Monophysite heresy. Through his exertions Zeno, from whom Basiliscus had usurped the empire, was restored (A. D. 477), but the Monophysites meanwhile had gained so much respect that it was deemed advisable to issue a formula, conciliatory from its indecency, called the Henoticon, A. D. 482. Acacius was led into other concessions, which drew upon him, on the accusation of John Talaia, against whom he supported the claims of Peter Mongus to the See of Alexandria, the anathema of Pope Felix II. A. D. 494. Peter Mongus had gained Acacius’s support by professing assent to the councils of Chalcedon, though at heart a Monophysite. Acacius refused to give up Peter Mongus, but retained his see till his death, A. D. 485. There remain two letters of his, one to Pope Simplicius, in Latin (see Conciliorum Nova Collectio à Monaci, vol. vii. p. 582), the other to Peter Florus, Archbishop of Antioch, in the original Greek. (Ibid. p. 1121.)

5. Reader at (A. D. 590), then the Bishop of Miletus (A. D. 431). He wrote A. D. 431, against Nesterius. His zeal led him to use expressions, apparently savouring of the contrary heresy, which, for a time, prejudiced the emperor Theodosius II. against St. Cyril. He was present at the Oecumenical Council of Ephesus A. D. 431, and constantly maintained his authority. There remain of his productions a Hymn (in Greek) delivered at the Council, (see Conciliorum Nova Collectio à Monaci, vol. v. p. 181,) and a letter written after it to St. Cyril, which we have in a Latin translation. (Ibid. pp. 86o, 993.) [A. J. C.]

ACCEUS (Ἀκέεσ, Acacius), a surname of Hermes (Callim. Hymn. in Deam. 143), for which Homer (Il. xvi. 185; Od. xxiv. 10) uses the form Ἁκήη ιος (Acacius). Some writers derive it from the Arcadian town of Acceus, in which he is believed to have been brought up by king Acacus; others from κόκος, and assign to it the meaning: the god who cannot be hurt, or who does not hurt. The same attribute is also given to Prometheus (Hes. Theog. 614), whence it may be inferred that its meaning is that of benefactor or deliverer from evil. (Compare Sphyn. ad Callim. l. c. 382; Steph. Byz. s. v. "Aκηεσ," [L. S.]

ACACETES. [Acacius.] A'CACUS (Ἀκακος), a son of Lycom and king of Acceus in Arcadia, of which he was believed to be the founder. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1; Steph. Byz. s. v. "Aκακος," [L. S.]

ACADEMICUS (Ἀκαδημικος), an Attic hero, who, when Castor and Polydeuces invaded Attica to liberate their sister Helen, betrayed to them that she was kept concealed at Aphidna. For this reason the Tyndarids always showed him much gratitude, and whenever the Lacedaemians invaded Attica, they always spared the land belonging to Academia which lay on the Cephissus, six stadia from Athens. (Plut. These. 32; Dign. Laert. ii. § 85.) His piece of land was subsequently adorned with plane and olive plantations (Plut. Cæs. 13), and was called Academia from its original owner. [L. S.]

ACALLE. [Acacallis.] A'CAMAS (Ἀκαμας). I. A son of Theseus and Phaedra, and brother of Demophon. (Diod. iv. 62.) Previous to the expedition of the Greeks against Troy, he and Diomedes were sent to demand the surrender of Helen (this message Homer ascribes to Menelaus and Odysseus, Il. xii. 139, &c.), but during his stay at Troy he won the affection of Laodice, daughter of Priam (Parthen. Nike. Erotes 16), and begot by her a son, Mantine, who was brought up by Aether, the grandmother of Acamas. (Schol. ad Luc. Porphy. 499, &c.) Virgil (Aen. i. 289) mentions him among the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse at the taking of Troy. On his return home he was detained in Thrace by his love for Phyllis; but after leaving Thrace and arriving in the island of Cyprus, he was found dead, under his armor, with his sword. (Schol. ad Luc. Porphy. l. c.) The promontory of Acamas in Cyprus, the town of Acamantium in Phrygia, and the Attic tribe Acamantia, derived their names from him. (Steph. Byz. s. v. "Ἀκαματως," Paus. i. 5. § 2.) He was painted in the Lesche at Delphi by Polygnotus, and there was also a statue of him at Delphi. (Paus. xii. 26. § 1, x. 10. § 1.)

2. A son of Antenor and Theano, was one of the bravest Trojans. (Hom. ii. 823, xii. 100.) He avenged the death of his brother, who had been killed by Ajax, by slaying Promachus the Boeotian. (Ili. xiv. 476.) He himself was slain by Meriones. (Ili. xvi. 842.)

3. A son of Enareus, was one of the leaders of the Thracians in the Trojan war (Hom. ii. 449, 450), and was slain by the Trojan Ajax. (Ilii. vii. 264.) [L. S.]

ACANTHUS (Ἀκανθος), the Lacedaemonian, was victor in the δίαδος and the δόκιμος in the Olympic games in Ol. 15, (a. e. 720), and according to some accounts was the first who ran naked in these games. (Paus. vi. § 3; Dionys. vii. 72; African. apud Euseb. p. 143.) Other accounts ascribe this to Orsippos the Megarion. (Onarvus.) Thucydides says that the Lacedaemonians were the first who contended naked in gymnastic games. (i. 6.)

ACARNAN (Ἀκαρνας), one of the Epigonae, was a son of Alcmeon and Callicho, and brother of Amphothemis. Their father was murdered by Phgeus, when they were yet young, and Callicho prayed to Zeus to make her sons grow up so that they might be able to avenge the death of their father. The prayer was granted, and Acarnan with his brother slew Phgeus, his wife, and his two sons. The inhabitants of Psophis, where the sons had been slain, pursued the murderers as far as Tegae, where however they were received and rescued. At the request of Acheans they carried the necklace and peplos of Harmonia to Delphi, and from thence they went to Ephesus, where Acarnan founded the city called after him Aecamania. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 5—7; Ov. Met. ex. 413, &c.; Thucy. ii. 103; Strab. x. p. 462.) [L. S.]

ACASTUS (Ἀκαστος), a son of Pelias, king of Iolcus, and of Aecanibia, or as others call her, Philomache. He was one of the Argonauts (Apollod. i. 9. § 10; Apollon. Rhod. i. 254, &c.), and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. (Ov. Met. viii. 305, &c.) After the return of the Argonauts his sisters were seduced by Medea to cut their father in pieces and boil them; and Acastus, when he heard this, buried his father, drove Jason and Medea, and according to Pausanias (vii. 11) his sisters also, from Iolcus, and instituted funeral games in honour of his father. (Hygin. Fab. 24 and 273; Apollod. i. 9. § 27, &c.; Paus. iii. 18. § 9, vi. 20. § 9, v. 17. § 4; Ov. Met. ex. 409, &c.) During these games it happened that Astydameia, the wife of Acastus, who is also called Hippolyte, fell in love with Pelues, whom Acastus had purified from the mur-ACERBAS.

L. ACCIUS or ATTIIUS, an early Roman tragic poet and the son of a freedman, was born according to Jerome n. c. 170, and was fifty years younger than Pacuvius. He lived to a great age; Cicero, when a young man, frequently conversed with him. (Brut. 28.) His tragedies were chiefly imitated from the Greeks, especially from Aeschylus, but he also wrote some on Roman subjects (Praetextata); one of which, entitled Brutus, was probably in honour of his patron D. Brutus. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 21, pro Arch. 11.) We possess only fragments of his tragedies, of which the most important have been preserved by Cicero, but sufficient remains to justify the terms of admiration in which he is spoken of by the ancient writers. He is particularly praised for the strength and vigour of his language and the sublimity of his thoughts. (Cic. pro Piso. 24, pro Sest. 66, &c.; Hor. Ep. i. 1. 58; Quintil. x. 1. § 87; Gell. xiii. 2.) Besides these tragedies, he also wrote Asinarius in verse, containing the history of Rome, like those of Ennius; and three prose works, "Libri Didascalici," which seems to have been a history of poetry, "Libri Pragmatici" and "Parerga": of the latter no fragments are preserved. The fragments of his tragedies have been collected by Stephanus in "Frgm. vet. Poet. Lat." Paris, 1664; Mäitaitiere, "Opera et Frgm. vet. Poet. Lat." Lond. 1713; and Bothe, "Poet. Scenici Latinr," vol. v. Lips. 1834: and the fragments of the Didascalia by Madvig, "De L. Attii Didascalis Comment." Hafniae, 1831.

T. ACCIUS, a native of Pisaurum in Umbria and a Roman knight, was the ancestor of A. Chenius, whom Cicero defended n. c. 66. He was a pupil of Hermogenes, and is praised by Cicero for accuracy and fluency. (Brut. 28, pro Cluent. 28, 31.)

ACCO, a chief of the Sonnians in Gaul, who induced his countrymen to revolt against Caesar, n. c. 53. On the conclusion of the war Acco was put to death by Caesar. (Bell. Gall. vi. 4, 44.)

ACCOLEIA GENOS is known to us only by coins and inscriptions. On a denarius we have the name P. Acoleius Liriscolus, and in two inscriptions a P. Acoeleus Euhemerus, and a L. Acoeleus Abacantus.

ACERBATUS (Ἄκερματος ὁ γραμματικός), a Greek grammarian, and the author of an epigram on Hector in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 138.) Nothing is known of his life. (P. S.)

ACERBAS, a Tyrian priest of Hercules, who married Ilissa, the daughter of king Mutog, and sister of Pygmalion. He was possessed of considerable wealth, which, knowing the avarice of Pygmalion, who had succeeded his father, he concealed in the earth. But Pygmalion, who heard of these hidden treasures, had Acerbas murdered, in hopes that through his sister he might obtain possession of them. But the prudence of Elistia saved the treasures, and she emigrated from Phoenicia. (Justin. viii. 4.) In this account Acerbas is the same person as Sichnem and Elistia the same as Dido in Virgil. (Aen. i. 345, 546, &c.) The names in Justin are undoubtedly more correct than in Virgil; for Servius (ad Aen. i. 349) remarks, that Virgil here, as in other cases, changed a fo-river-god Crimissus and of a Trojan woman of the name of Egesta or Segesta (Ving. Aen. i. 133, 550, v. 39, 711, &c.), who according to Servius was slain by the anger of Poseidon at Poseidonia in Sicily, that she might not be devoured by the monsters, which infested the territory of Troy, and which had been sent into the land, because the Trojans had refused to reward Poseidon and Apollo for having built the walls of their city. When Egesta arrived in Sicily, the river-god Crimissus in the form of a bear or a dog begot by her a son Acetes, who was afterwards regarded as the hero who had founded the town of Segesta. (Comp. Schol. od Lyceph. 951, 963.) The tradition of Acetides in Dionysius (i. 52), who calls him Aegisthus (Αἰγισθὸς), is different, for according to him the grandson of Aegisthus was reared with Leucomedon, who slew him and gave his daughters to some merchants to convey them to a distant land. A noble Trojan hero however embarked with them, and married one of them in Sicily, where she subsequently gave birth to a son, Aegisthus. During the war against Troy Aegisthus obtained permission from Priam to return and take part in the contest, and afterwards returned to Sicily, where Aeneas on his arrival was hospitably received by him and Elymus, and built for them the towns of Aegesta and Elymum. The account of Dionysius seems to be nothing but a rationalistic interpretation of the genuine legend. As to the inconsistencies in Virgil's account of Acetides, see Heyne, Ec. v. 1, on Aen. v. [L. S.]

ACETODORUS (Ακετώδορος), a Greek historical writer, who is cited by Plutarch (Them. 18), and whose work contained, as it appears, an account of the battle of Salamis among other things. The time at which he lived is unknown. Stephanus (s. v. Μεγάλη πόλις) speaks of an Acestodorus of Megalopolis, who wrote a work on cities (περὶ πόλεων), but whether this is the same as the above-mentioned writer is not clear.

ACETOR (Ακήτωρ). A surname of Apollo which signifies him as the god of the healing art, or in general as the averter of evil, like ἀκηνιώς. (Etup. Androm. 901.) [L. S.]

ACETOR (Ακήτωρ), surnamed Sacus (Σάκος), on account of his foreign origin, was a tragic poet at Athens, and a contemporary of Aristophanes. He seems to have been either of Thracian or Mysian origin. (Aristoph. Aes. 31; Schol. ad loc. ; VLOCKS, 1216; Schol. ad loc. ; Plut. and Suid. s. v. Ζώκας: Welcker, Die Griech. Trag. p. 1032.) [R. W.]

ACETOR (Ακήτωρ), a sculptor mentioned by Pausanias (vi. 17, § 3) as having executed the statue of Alexineas, a native of Helem in Acrenia, who had gained a victory in the pentathlon at the Olympic games. He was born at Cnosus, or at any rate exercised his profession there for some time. (Paus. x. 15. § 4.) He had a son named Amphion, who was also a sculptor, and had studied under Poliches of Coremy (Paus. vi. 3. § 2); so that Acetor must have been a contemporary of the latter, who flourished about 01. 82. (A. D. 452.) [C. P. M.]

ACETORIDES (Ακητορίδης), a Corinthian, was made supreme commander by the Syracusans in B. C. 317, and banished Agathocles from the city. (Diod. xix. 5.)

ACETORIDES wrote four books of mythical stories relating to every city (τῶν κατὰ πόλιν μυθικῶν). In these he gave many real historical ACAEUS. accounts, as well as those which were merely mythical, he enticed them μυστικά to avoid calunnies and to indicate the pleasant nature of the work. It was compiled from Conon, Apollodoros, Protagoras and others. (Phot. Bld. cod. 189; Tzetz. Chit. vii. 144.)

ACAEA (Ἀκαία), a surname of Demeter by which she was worshipped at Athens by the Gymnosophists who had emigrated thither from Boeotia. (Herod. v. 61; Plat. Is. a. ostr. p. 378, n.)

2. A surname of Minerva worshipped at Lycia in Apulia where the dominia and the arms of Diomedes were preserved in her temple. (Aristot. Met. Anim. ii. 10. 1626; L. S.)

ACAEUS (Ἀκαίος), according to Menander, all traditions a son of Xuthus and Creusa, and consequently a brother of Ion and grandson of Hellen. The Achaeans regarded him as the author of their race, and derived from him their own name as well as that of Achaia, which was formerly called Aegialus. When his uncle Aeolus in Thessaly, whence he himself had come to Peloponnesus, died, he went thither and made himself master of Phthiotis, which now also received from him the name of Achaia. (Paus. vii. 1 § 2; Strab. viii. p. 383; Apollod. i. 7. § 8) Servius (ad Aen. i. 242) alone calls Acheus a son of Jupiter and Pithia, which is probably miswritten for Pithia. [L. S.]

ACAEUS (Ἀκαίος), son of Andromacus, whose sister Laodice married Seleucus Callinicus, the father of Antiochus the Great. Acheaus himself married Laodice, the daughter of Mithridates, king of Pontus. (Polyb. iv. 51. § 4, viii. 22. § 11.) He accompanied Seleucus Caneamus, the son of Callinicus, in his expedition across mount Taurus against Attalus, and after the assassination of Seleucus regained his kingdom; and though he might easily have assumed the royal power, he remained faithful to the family of Seleucus. Antiochus the Great, the successor of Seleucus, appointed him to the command of all Asia on the side of mount Taurus, b. c. 222. Acheaus recovered for the Syrian empire all the districts which Attalus had gained; but having been falsely accused by Hermeas, the minister of Antiochus, of intending to revolt, he did so in self-defence, assumed the title of king, and ruled over the whole of Asia on this side of the Taurus. As long as Antiochus was engaged in the war with Ptolemy, he could not march against Acheaus; but after a peace had been concluded with Ptolemy, he crossed the Taurus, united his forces with Attalus, deprived Acheaus in one campaign of all his dominions and took Sardis with the exception of the citadel. Acheaus after sustaining a siege of two years in the citadel at last fell into the hands of Antiochus b. c. 214, through the treachery of Bolus, who had been employed by Sosibius, the minister of Ptolemy, to deliver him from his danger, but betrayed him to Antiochus, who ordered him to be put to death immediately. (Polyb. iv. 2. § 6, iv. 48, v. 40. § 7, 42, 57, vi. 15—18, vii. 17—23.)

ACAEUS (Ἀκαίος) of Eretria in Euboea, a tragic poet, was born b. c. 484, the year in which Aeschylus gained his first victory, and four years before the birth of Euripides. In b. c. 477, he contended with Sophocles and Euripides, and though he subsequently brought out many dramas, according as some as many as thirty or forty, he nevertheless only gained the prize once. The fragments of Acheaus contain much strange mythological and his expressions were often forced and obscure. (Athen. x. p. 431, e.) Still in the satirical drama he must have possessed considerable merit, for in this department some ancient critics thought him inferior only to Aeschylus. (Diog. Laert. ii. 153.) The titles of seven of his satirical dramas and of ten of his tragedies are still known. The extant fragments of his pieces have been collected, and edited by Urichus, Bonn, 1834. (Suidas, s. v.) This Acheaus should not be confounded with a later tragic writer of the same name, who was a native of Smyrnae. According to Suidas and Phavorinus he wrote, according to Lucian fourteen plays. (Urichus, bonn.) [B. W.]

ACHAEEMENIDES (Ἀχαῖεμενίδης). 1. The ancestor of the Persian kings, who founded the family of the Achaemenidae (Ἀχαμανεῖδαι), which was the noblest family of the Persaridae, the noblest of the Persian tribes. Achaemenes is said to have been brought up by an eagle. According to a genealogy given by Xerxes, the following was the order of the descent: Achaemenes, Teseips, Cymbyses, Cyrus, Teseips, Ariaramnes, Arsames, Hystaspes, Darius, Xerxes. (Herod. i. 125, vii. 11; Aelian, Hist. Anim. xii. 21.) The original seat of this family was Achaemenia in Persia. (Steph. s. v. Ἀχαμανεῖδης.) The Roman poets use the adjective Achaemenicus in the sense of Persian. (Ov. Corn. iii. 1. 14, xiii. 8; Ov. Ars. Am. i. 226, Met. iv. 212.)

2. The son of Darius I. was appointed by his brother Xerxes governor of Egypt, b. c. 484. He commanded the Egyptian fleet in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, and strongly opposed the prudent advice of Demaratus. When Egypt revolted under Inaros the Libyan in b. c. 460, Achaemenes was sent to subdue it, but was defeated and killed in battle by Inaros. (Herod. iii. 12, vii. 7, 97, 236; Dio. iii. 74.)

ACHAEEMENIDES or ACHIEEMENIDES, a son of Adamastus of Ithaca, and a companion of Ulysses who led him behind in Sicily, when he fled from the Cyclops. Here he was found by Aeneas who took him with him. (Virg. Aen. iii. 612, &c.; Ov. Ex. Pont. ii. 2. 25.)

ACHICAICUS (Ἀχικάιος), a philosopher, who wrote a work on Ethics. His time is unknown. (Diog. Laert. vi. 99; Theodor. Graece, auct. iv. viii. p. 919, ed. Schulze; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 496, d.)

ACHELOUS. 1. A surname of the Sirens, the daughters of Acheolus and a muse. (Ov. Met. v. 552, xiv. 87; Apollod. i. 7. § 10.)

2. A general name for water-nymphs, as in COLUMELLA (x. 263), where the companions of the Pegasis are called Acheolides. [L. S.]

ACHELOUS (Ἀχελός), the god of the river Acheus which was the greatest, and according to tradition, the most ancient among the rivers of Greece. He with 3000 brother rivers is described as a son of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 940), or of Oceanus and Gaia, or lastly of Helios and Gaia (Natal. Com. vii. 2.) The origin of the river Acheus is thus described by Servius (ad Virg. Georg. iii. 9; Aen. viii. 300): When Acheolus on one occasion had lost his daughters, the Sirens, and in his grief invoked his mother Gaia, she received him to her bosom, and on the spot where she received him, she caused the river bearing his name to gush forth. Other accounts about the origin of the river and its name are given by Stephanus of Byzantium, Strabo (x. p. 450), and Plutarch. (De Ism. 22.) Acherus the god was a competitor with Hercules in the suit for Deianira, and fought with him for the bride. Acherus was conquered in the contest, but as he possessed the power of assuming various forms, he metamorphosed himself first into a serpent and then into a bull. But in this form too he was conquered by Hercules, and deprived of one of his horns, which however he recovered by giving up the horn of Amalthea. (Ov. Met. ii. 8, &c.; Apollod. i. 8 § 1, ii. 7 § 5.) Sophocles (Trophinin, 9, &c.) makes Deianeira relate these occurrences in a somewhat different manner. According to Ovid (Met. ix. 67), the Naiads changed the horn which Hercules took from Acherus into the horn of plenty. When Theseus returned home from the Calydonian chase he was invited and hospitably received by Acherus, who related to him in what manner he had created the islands called Echaidna. (Ov. Met. viii. 547, &c.) The numerous wives and concubines of Acherus are mentioned in separate articles. Strabo (x. p. 450) proposes a very ingenious interpretation of the legends about Acherus, all of which according to him arose from the nature of the river itself. It resembled a bull’s voice in the noise of the water; its windings and its reaches gave rise to the story about his forming himself into a serpent and about his horns; the formation of islands at the mouth of the river requires no explanation. His conquest by Hercules lastly refers to the embankments by which Hercules confined the river to its bed and thus gained large tracts of land for cultivation, which are expressed by the horn of plenty. (Compare Voss, Mythol. Briefe, 182.) Others derive the legends about Acherus from Egypt, and describe him as a second Niles. But however this may be, he was from the earliest times considered to be a great divinity throughout Greece (Hom. Iliad. vii. 194), and was invoked in various places, such as Pelion (Paus. xii. 18), &c. (Ephemer. op. Metam. i. 18), and the Dodonian Zeus usually added to each oracle he gave, the command to offer sacrifices to Acherus. (Ephemer. l.c.) This wide extent of the worship of Acherus also accounts for his being regarded as the representative of sweet water in general, that is, as the source of all nourishment. (Verg. Georg. i. 9, with the note of Voss.) The contest of Acherus with Hercules was represented on the throne of Amykle (Paus. iii. 18 § 9), and in the treasury of the Megarian at Olympia there was a statue of him made by Duntas of cedar-wood and gold. (Paus. vi. 19 § 9.) On several coins of Arcamnia the god is represented as a bull with the head of an old man. (Comp. Philol. Imag. n. 4.) [L. S.] ACHÈMÈNIDES. [AÇHĒMÈNIDÈS.] ACHÉRON (‘Asthês). In ancient geography there occur several rivers of this name, all of which were not far from one time, believed to be connected with the lower world. The river first looked upon in this light was the Acheron in Thessaly, in Epirus, a country which appeared to the earliest Greeks as the end of the world in the west, and the locality of the river led them to the belief that it was the entrance into the lower world. When subsequently Epirus and the countries beyond the sea became better known, the Acheron or the entrance to the lower world was transferred to other more distant parts, and at last the Acheron was placed in the lower world itself. Thus we find in the Homeric poems (Od. x. 513; comp. Paus. i. 17. § 5) the Acheron described as a river of Hades, into which the Pyrrhelegeton and Cocytus are said to flow. Virgil (Aen. vi. 207, with the note of Servius) describes it as the principal river of Tartarus, from which the Styx and Cocytus sprang. According to later traditions, Acheron had been a son of Heles and Gaea or Demeter, and was changed into the river bearing his name in the lower world, because he had refreshed the Titans with drink during their contest with Zeus. They further state that Ascalaphus was a son of Acheron and Orpheus or Gorgyra. (Natal. Com. iii. 1.) In late writers the name Acheron is used in a general sense to designate the whole of the lower world. (Verg. Aen. vii. 312; Cic. post redit. in Senat. 10; C. Nepos, Dion. 10.) The Etruscans too were acquainted with the worship of Acherus (Acherones) from very early times, as we must infer from their Acheruncelli libri, which among various other things treated on the devotion of the souls, and on the sacrifices (Acheruncellae sécrae) by which this was to be effected. (Müller, Etrusker, ii. 27, &c.) The description of the Acherun and the lower world in general in Plato’s Phaedo (p. 112) is very peculiar, and not very easy to understand. [L. S.] ACHERUSIA (Ἀχερούσια Ἁμύν, or Αχερούσια) a name given by the ancients to several lakes or swamps, which, like the various rivers of the name of Acherus, were at some time believed to be connected with the lower world, until at last the Acherusiana came to be considered to be the lower world itself. The lake to which this belief seems to have been first attached was the Acherusia in Thessaly, through which the river Acheron flowed. (Thuc. i. 46; Strab. vii. p. 324.) Other lakes or swamps of the same name, and believed to be in connexion with the lower world, were near Hermione in Argolis (Paus. iii. 7 § 7), near Heraclea in Bithynia (Xen. Anab. vi. 2 § 21; Dion. xiv. 211), between Gomias and cape Misenum in Italy, (Paus. vii. H. N. iii. 5; Strab. x. p. 243), and lastly in Egypt, near Memphis. (Diod. i. 96.) [L. S.] ACHILLAS (Ἀχιλλᾶς), one of the guardians of the Egyptian king Ptolemy Dionysus, and commander of the troops, when Pompey fled to Egypt, b. c. 48. He is called by Caesar a man of extraordinary daring, and it was he and L. Septimius who killed Pompey. (Caes. B. C. iii. 104; Liv. Epit. 104; Dion Cass. xiii. 4.) He subsequently joined the eunuch Pothinus in resisting Caesar, and having had the command of the whole army entrusted to him by Pothinus, he marched against Alexandria with 20,000 foot and 2000 horse. Caesar, who was at Alexandria, had not sufficient forces to oppose him, and sent ambassadors to treat with him, but these Achilles murdered to remove all hopes of reconciliation. He then marched into Alexandria and obtained possession of the greatest part of the city. Meanwhile, however, Arsinés, the younger sister of Ptolemy, escaped from Caesar and joined Achilles; but dissensions breaking out between them, she had Achilles put to death by Ganymedes a eunuch, b. c, 47, to whom she then entrusted the command of the forces. (Caes. B. C. iii. 108—112; D. Alex. 4; Dion Cass. xiii. 36—40; Justin x. 519—523.) ACHILLES (Ἀχιλλῆς). In the legends about Achilles.

Achilles, as about all the heroes of the Trojan war, the Homeric traditions should be carefully kept apart from the various additions and embellishments with which the gaps of the ancient story have been filled up by later poets and mythographers, not indeed by fabrication of their own, but by adopting those by others, and especially by details, by which oral tradition in the course of centuries had variously altered and developed the original kernel of the story, or those accounts which were peculiar only to certain localities.

Homeric story. Achilles was the son of Peleus, king of the Myrmidones in Phthiotes, in Thessaly, and of the Nereid Thetis. (Hom. II. xx. 206, &c.) From his father’s name he is often called Πηλείδης, Πηλείδης, or Πηλέως; (Hom. II. xviii. 316; i. 1; i. 197; Virg. Aen. ii. 263), and from that of his grandfather Aeacus, he derived his name Αεακίδης (Ακάκιδης, II. ii. 660; Virg. Aen. i. 99). He was educated from his tender childhood by Phoenix, who taught him eloquence and the arts of war, and accompanied him to the Trojan war, and to whom the hero always showed great attachment. (ix. 485, &c.; 493, &c.) In the bearing art he was instructed by Cheiron, the centaur. (xi. 832.) His mother Thetis foretold him that his fate was either to gain glory and die early, or to live a long but inglorious life. (ix. 410, &c.) The hero chose the latter, and took part in the Trojan war, from which he knew that he was not to return. In fifty ships, or according to later traditions, in sixty (Hygin. Fab. 97), he led his hosts of Myrmidones, Hellenes, and Achaeans against Troy. (i. 681, &c.; xvi. 168.) Here the swift-footed Achilles was the great bulwark of the Greeks, and the worthy favourite of Athena and Hem. (i. 195, 268.) Previous to his dispute with Agamemnon, he ravaged the country around Troy, and destroyed twelve towns on the coast and eleven in the interior of the country. (ix. 326, &c.) When Agamemnon was obliged to give up Chryseis to her father, he determined to take away Briseis from Achilles, who surrendered her on the persuasion of Athena, but at the same time refused to take any further part in the war, and shut himself up in his tent. Zeus, on the entreaty of Thetis, promised that victory should be on the side of the Trojans, until the Achaeans should have honoured her son. (i. 26, to the end.) The affairs of the Greeks declined in consequence, and they were at last pressed so hard, that Agamemnon advised them to take to flight. (ix. 17, &c.) But other chiefs opposed this counsel, and an embassy was sent to Achilles, offering him rich presents and the restoration of Briseis (ix. 119, &c.; but in vain. At last, however, he was persuaded by Patroclus, his dearest friend, to allow him to make use of his men, his horses, and his armour. (xvi. 49, &c.) Patroclus was slain, and when this news reached Achilles, he was seized with unspeakable grief. Thetis consoled him, and promised new arms, which were to be made by Hephaestus, and Iris appeared to rouse him from his lamentations, and exhorted him to rescue the body of Patroclus. (xvii. 166, &c.) Achilles now rose, and his thundering voice alone put the Trojans to flight. When his new armour was brought to him, he reconciled himself to Agamemnon, and hurried to the field of battle, disdaining to take any drink or food until the death of his friend should be avenged. (xix. 155, &c.) He wound-
ACHILLES. (Ἀχιλλεύς), a son of Lyson of Athens, who was believed to have first introduced his native city the mode of sending presents to strangers, a fashion which is still followed by the Athenians. (Plut. Liber deorum, 33.) Several other and more credible accounts, however, ascribe this institution with more probability to other persons. [L. S.]

ACHILLES TATIUS (Ἀχιλλέας Τάτιος), or as Suidas and Endoea call him Achilles Statius, an Alexandrine rhetorician, who was formerly believed to have lived in the second or third century of our era. But as it is a well-known fact, which is also acknowledged by Photius, that he imitated Heliodorus of Eмеса, he must have lived after this writer, and therefore belong either to the latter half of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century of our era. Suidas states that he was originally a Fagian, and that subsequently he was converted to Christianity. The truth of this assertion, as far as Achilles Tatius, the author of the romance, is concerned, is not supported by the work of Achilles, which bears no marks of Christian thoughts, while it would not be difficult to prove from it that he was a heathen. This romance is a history of the adventures of two lovers, Cleitonphon and Leucippe. It bears the title Τά κατά Λευκόπφον καὶ Λευκώσφονα, and consists of eight books. Notwithstanding all its defects, it is one of the best love-stories of the Greeks. Cleitonphon is represented in it relating to a friend the whole course of the events from beginning to end, a plan which renders the story rather tedious, and makes the narrator appear affected and insipid. Achilles, like his predecessor Heliodorus, disdained having recourse to what is extraneous and improbable in itself, and his treatment of adventures and of physical as well as moral difficulties, which the lovers have to overcome, before they are happily united, is too great and renders the story improbable, though their arrangement and succession are skilfully managed by the author. Numerous parts of the work however are written without taste and judgment, and do not appear connected with the story by any internal necessity. Besides these, the work has a great many digressions, which, although interesting in themselves and containing curious information, interrupt and impede the progress of the narrative. The work is full of imitations of other writers from the time of Plato to that of Achilles himself, and while he thus trusts to his books and his learning, he does not always possess the amount of human nature and the affairs of real life. The laws of decency and morality are not always paid due regard to, a defect which is even noticed by Photius. The style of the work, on which the author seems to have bestowed his principal care, is thoroughly rhetorical: there is a perpetual striving after elegance and beauty, after images, puns, and antitheses. These things, however, were just what the age of Achilles required, and that his novel was much read, is attested by the number of MSS. still extant.

A part of it was first printed in a Latin translation by Annibali della Croce (Cruceus), Leyden, 1544; a complete translation appeared at Basel in 1554. The first edition of the Greek original appeared at Heidelberg, 1601, 8vo, printed together with similar works of Longus and Parthenius. An edition, with a voluminous though rather careless commentary, was published by Sal-

dence to have been certainly a Christian. (c. 2. 150, &c.) It exists only in Greek, or rather (if the above conjecture as to its author be correct) it has only been published in that language. It consists of three hundred and four chapters, and professes to be derived from what has been written on the same subject by the Indians, Persians, and Egyptians. It was translated out of Greek into Latin about the year 1160, by Leo Tuscus, of which work two specimens are to be found in Casp. Barthii Adversarior. (xxxvi. 14, ed. Franc. 1624, foll.) It was first published at Frankfort, 1577, 8vo, in a Latin translation, made by Leun-clavius, from a very imperfect Greek manuscript, with the title of Apomassita Apolokatastas, sive de Significiis ac Eventis theologiam, or Ideorum, Parsiarn, Aegyptiorumque Disciplina." The word Apomassitas is a corruption of the name of the famous Athenian, or Abi Ma'asher, and Leun-clavius afterwards acknowledged his mistake in attributing the work to him. It was published in Greek and Latin by Rigaltius, and appended to his edition of the Oenorocritica of Artemidorus, Lutet. Paris. 1603, 4to., and some Greek various readings are inserted by Jac. de Rhoer in his Oinian Davencleris, p. 338, &c. Davenet. 1672, 8vo. It has also been translated into Italian, French, and German.

ACHOLIEUS held the office of Magister Admimissionum in the reign of Valerian. (c. 255-- 260) One of his works was entitled Acta, and contained an account of the history of Aurelian. It was in nine books at least. (Vopisc. Aurel. 12.) He also wrote the life of Alexander Severus.

(Lamprid. Alex. Sec. 14. 48. 68.)

ACHOLEAE. [HARPYIAR.

ACICCHORUS (A'kikho'ros) was one of the leaders of the Gauls, who invaded Thrace and Macedonia in c. 280. He and Brennus commanded the division that marched into Paeonia. In the following year, c. 279, he accompanied Brennus in his invasion of Greece. (Paus. xix. 4. § 5, 22. § 5, 23. § 1, &c.) Some writers suppose that Brennus and Aechorius are the same persons, the former being only a title and the latter the real name. (Schmitz, 4 De fontibus veterum antorum in emnandia expeditionibus, p. 287, ed. Leiden, 1834.)

ACI GALIA, a surname of Venus (Virg. Aen. i. 720), which according to Servius was derived from the well Acidalus near Orchemenes, in which Venus used to bathe with the Graces; others connect the name with the Greek άκηδη, i.e. cares or troubles.

[LS.]

ACIDINUS, a family-name of the Manil gens. Cicero speaks of the Acidini as among the first men of a former age. (De leg. agr. ii. 24.)

1. L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS, praetor urbanus in n. c. 210, was sent by the senate into Sicily to bring back the consul Valerius to Rome to hold the elections. (Liv. xxvi. 23, xxvii. 4.) In n. c. 207 he was with the troops stationed at Narthia to oppose Hannibal, and was the first to send to Rome intelligence of the defeat of the latter. (Liv. xxvii. 50.) In n. c. 206 he and L. Cornelius Lentulus had the province of Spain entrusted to them with proconsular power. In the following year he conquered the Anestani and Ibergetes, who had rebelled against the Romans in consequence of the absence of Scipio. He did not return to Rome till n. c. 199, but was prevented by the tribute P. Porcius Laeca from entering the city in an ovation, which the senate had granted him. (Liv. xxviii. 38, xxix. 1-3, 13, xxxii. 7.)

2. L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS FULVIANUS, originally belonged to the Fulvia gens, but was adopted into the Manlia gens, probably by the above-mentioned Acidinus. (Vell. Pat. ii. 8.) He was praetor b.c. 188, and had the province of Hispania Citerior allotted to him, where he remained till b.c. 186. In the latter year he defeated the Celtiberi, and had it not been for the arrival of his successor would have reduced the whole people to subjection. He applied for a triumph in consequence, but obtained only an ovation. (Liv. xxxixii. 35, xxxix. 21, 29.) In b.c. 163 he was one of the ambassadors sent into Cilicia Transsagittana, and was also appointed one of the triumphs for founding the Latin colony of Aquileia, which was however not founded till b.c. 181. (Liv. xxxix. 54, 55, xl. 34.) He was consul b.c. 179, (Liv. xl. 43,) with his own brother, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, which is the only instance of two brothers holding the consulship at the same time. (Fast. Capitol.; Vell. Pat. ii. 8.) At the election of Acidinus, M. Scipio declared him to be vivum bonum, egregiosum nomine. (Cic. de Or. ii. 64.)

3. L. MANLIUS (ACIDINUS), who was quaestor in b.c. 168 (Liv. xiv. 13), is probably one of the two Manlii Acidini, who are mentioned two years before as illustrious youths, and of whom one was the son of M. Manlius, the other of L. Manlius. (Liv. xlix. 49.) The latter is probably the same as the quaestor, and the son of No. 2, who was going to pursue his studies at Athens at the same time as young Cicero, b.c. 45. (Cic. de Ad. Att. xxii. 32.) He is perhaps the same Acidinus who sent intelligence to Cicero respecting the death of Marcellus. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 12.)

ACILIA GENs. The family-names of this gens are AVIDOLA, BALBUS, and GLABRIO, of which the last two were undoubtedly plebeian, as members of these families were frequently tribunes of the plebs.

ACILIANUS, MINUCIUS, a friend of Pliny the younger, was born at Brixia (Brescia), and was the son of Minucius Macrinus, who was enrolled by Vespasian among those of praetorian rank. Acidinus was successively quaestor, tribune, and praetor, and at his death Pliny left part of his property. (Plin. Ep. i. 14, ii. 16.)

ACINDYNUs, GREGORYUS (Γρηγόριος, Ακινδύνος), a Greek Monk. A. D. 1341, distinguished in the controversy with the Hesychast or Quietist Monks of Mount Athos. He supported and succeeded Bardam in his opposition to their notion that the light which appeared on the Mount of the Transfiguration was uncaveled. The emperor, John Cantacuzenus, took part (A. D. 1347) with Palamas, the leader of the Quietists, and obtained the condemnation of Acindynus by several councils at Constantinople, at one especially in A. D. 1351. Remains of Acindynus are De Essentia et Operatione Dei adversus superstitionem Gregori Parmum, 4to, in "Variorum Ponticorum et Petri Grammatikou Euchychianum Epistol." p. 77, Gregorii, 4to. Ingolstadt, 1616. and Carmina Iambilia de Hierosolymo Parmum, "Gracianae Orthodoxae Scriptores," by Leo Allatius, p. 755, vol. i. 4to. Rom. 1652. [A. J. C.]

ACIS (Aces), according to Ovid (Met. xiii. 750, &c.) a son of Faunus and Syrinx. He was beloved by the nymph Galatea, and Polyphemus the Cyclop, jealous of him, crushed him under a huge rock. His blood gushing forth from under the rock was changed by the nymph into the river Aces or Acisius at the foot of mount Aetna. This story does not occur any where else, and is perhaps no more than a happy fiction suggested by the manner in which the little river springs forth from under a rock. [L.S.]

ACMENES (Ακμήνη), a surname of certain nymphs worshipped at Ellis, where a sacred enclos was retained by them, together with those of other gods. (Paus. v. 18, § 4.) [L.S.]

ACOetes (Acoētis), one of the three Cyclopes (Ov. Fast. vi. 268), who were the same as Pyramus and Evris (Aen. viii. 426), and as Argus in most other accounts of the Cyclopes. [L.S.]

ACORDES (Ακόρδης), according to Ovid (Met. iii. 582, &c.) the son of a poor fisherman in Macenia, who served as pilot in a ship. After landing at the island of Naxos, some of the sailors brought with them on board a beautiful sleeping boy, whom they had found in the island and whom they wished to take with them; but Acorde, who recognised in the boy the god Bacchus, dissuaded them from it, but in vain. When the ship had reached the open sea, the boy awoke, and desired to be carried back to Naxos. The sailors promised to do so, but did not keep their word. Hereupon the god showed himself to them in his own majesty: vines began to twine round the vessel, tigers appeared, and the sailors, seized with madness, jumped into the sea and perished. Acorde alone was saved and conveyed back to Naxos, where he was initiated in the Bacchic mysteries and became a priest of the god. Hyginus (Fab. 134), whose story on the whole agrees with that of Ovid, and all the other writers who mention this adventure of Bacchus, call the crew of the ship Thryarchian pirates, and derive the name of the Tyrrhenian sea from them. (Comp. Ion. Hymn. in Bacch.; Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Seneca, Oed. 443.)

ACOMATICUS. [Nicetas.]

ACONTES or ACONTIUS (Ακοντις or Ακοντός), a son of Lycon, from whom the town of Acontium in Arcadia derived its name. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1; Steph. Byz. s. e. Ακοντός.) [L.S.]

ACONTIUS, Ακοντίος, a beautiful youth of the island of Cos. On one occasion he came to Delos to celebrate the annual festival of Diana, and fell in love with Cydippe, the daughter of a noble Athenian. When he saw her sitting in the temple attending to the sacrifice she was offering, he threw before her an apple upon which he had written the words "I swear by the sanctuary of Diana to marry Acontius." The nurse took up the apple and handed it to Cydippe, who read aloud what was written upon it, and then threw the apple away. But the goddess had heard her vow, as Acontius had wished. After the festival was over, he went home, distracted by his love, but he waited for the result of what had happened and took no further steps. After some time, when Cydippe's father was about to give her in marriage to another man, she was taken ill just before the marriage solemnities. When this illness continued for a time it was repeated three times. Acontius, informed of the occurrence, hastened to Athens, and the Delphic oracle, which was consulted by the maiden's father, declared that Diana by the repeated illness meant to punish Cydippe for her perjury. The maiden then explained the whole affair to her mother, and the father was at last induced to give his daughter to Acacius. This story is related by Ovid (Heroid. 20, 21; comp. Fast. iii. 10, 78) and Aristotle (Hist. Anim. 10, 6), who is said to be in several fragments of ancient poets, especially of Callimachus, who wrote a poem with the title Cydippe. The same story with some modifications is related by Antoninus Liberalis (Metam. 1) of an Athenian Hermocrates and Cytesila. (Comp. Cleric. and Buttmann, Mytholog. ii. p. 115.)

A'CORIS (Ἀκορίς), king of Egypt, entered in to alliance with Evagora, king of Cyprus, against their common enemy Artaxerxes, king of Persia, about B.C. 355, and assisted Evagora with ships and money. On the conclusion of the war with Evagora, B.C. 376, the Persians directed their forces against Egypt. Acoris collected a large army to oppose them, and engaged many Greek mercenaries, of whom he appointed Chabria general. Chabrias, however, was recalled by the Athenians, and he made the complaint of Pharnobazus, who was appointed by Artaxerxes to conduct the war. When the Persian army entered Egypt, which was not till B.c. 573, Acoris was already dead. (Diod. xvi. 2—4, 8, 9, 29, 41, 42; Theopom. op. Phot. cod. 176.) Synceillus (p. 76, a. p. 357, it.) assigns thirteen years to his reign.

ACRAEA (Ἀκραία). 1. A daughter of the river-god Asterion near Myconoe, who together with her sisters Euboea and Prosymna acted as nurses to Hera. A hill Acraea opposite the temple of Hem near Myconoe derived its name from her. (Paus. ii. 17. § 2.)

2. Acrar and Acrane are also attributes given to various goddesses and gods whose temples were situated upon hills, such as Zeus, Hera, Aphrodite, Pallas, Artemis, and others. (Paus. i. 1. § 3, 24. § 1; Apollon. i. 9. § 28; Vitruv. i. 7; Stephan, ad Callim. Hymn in Jov. 82.)

ACRAEIUS (Ἀκραίος), a son of Apollo, to whom the foundation of the Boeotian town of Acraephia was ascribed. Apollo, who was worshiped in that place, derived from it the surname of Acraephius or Acrasheus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Akr'aphia; Paus. ix. 23. § 3, 40. § 2.)

ACRAGAS (Ἀκραγας), a son of Zeus and the Oceanid Asterope, to whom the foundation of the town of Acras (Agrigentum) in Sicily was ascribed. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Akr'aphies.) (HSc. [L. Sc.]

ACRAGAS, an engraver, or chaser in silver, spoken of by Pliny. (xxxii. 12. § 55.) It is not known either when or where he was born. Pliny says that Acragas, Boethus and Myrs were considered but little inferior to Mentor, an artist of great note in the same profession; and that works of all three were in existence in his day, preserved in different temples in the island of Rhodes. These of Acragas, who was especially famed for his representations of hunting scenes on cups, were in the temple of Bacchus at Rhodes, and consisted of cups with figures of Bacche and Centaurs graved on them. If the language of Pliny justifies us in inferring that the three artists whom he classes together lived at the same time, that would fix the age of Acragas in the latter part of the fifth century B.C., as Myrs was a contemporary of Phidas. [C. P. M.]

ACROPHORUS (Ἀκροφόρος), a surname of Dionysus, by which he was designated as the giver of unmixed wine, and worshipped at Phigaleia in Arcadia. (Paus. vii. 39. § 4.)

ACROTYPOTES (Ἀκροτύποτε), the drinker of unmixed wine, was a hero worshipped in Myrheia in Attica. (Paus. ap. Athin. ii. p. 39.) According to Pausanias (1. 2. § 4), who called simply Acrotus, he was one of the divine companions of Dionysus, who was worshipped in Attica. Pausanias saw his image at Athens in the house of Polytion, where it was fixed in the wall. (L. Sc.)

ACRATUS, a freedman of Nero, who was sent by Nero ad. 64, into Asia and Achaia to plunder the temples and take away the statues of the gods. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 45, xvi. 23; comp. Dion Chrys. Ihed. p. 614, ed. Reiske.)

ACRON, a Locrian, was a Pythagorean philosopher. (Cic. de Fin. v. 29.) He is mentioned by Valerius Maximus (viii. 7, ext. 3, from this passage of Cicero) under the name of Arion, which is a false reading, instead of Acrion.

ACRISONIADES, a patronymic of Perseus, grandson of Acrisius. (Ov. Met. v. 70.)

ACRISIUS (Ἀκρίσιος), a son of Abas, king of Argos and of Ocalea. He was grandson of Lycurgus and great-grandson of Danaus. His twin-brother was Proetus, with whom he is said to have quarrelled even in the womb of his mother. When Abas died and Acrisius had grown up, he expelled Proetus from his inheritance; but, supported by his father-in-law Iobates, the Lycian, Proetus returned, and Acrisius was compelled to share his kingdom with his brother by giving up to him Tiryns, while he retained Argos for himself. An oracle had declared that Danaë the daughter of Acrisius, would give birth to a son, who would kill his grandfather. For this reason he kept Danaë shut up in a subterraneous apartment, or in a brwon tower. But here she became mother of Perseus, notwithstanding the precautions of her father, according to some accounts by his uncle Proetus, and according to others by Zeus, who visited her in the form of a shower of gold. Acrisius ordered mother and child to be exposed on the wide sea in a chest; but the chest floated towards the island of Seriphis, where both were rescued by Dytrys, the brother of King Polydectes. (Apollod. ii. 2, § 1, § 4; Paus. ii. 16. § 2, 25. § 6; iv. 13. § 6; Hygin. Fab. 63.) As to the manner in which the oracle was subsequently fulfilled in the case of Acrisius, see Parsus. According to the Scholiast on Euripides (Orest. 1087), Acrisias was the father of the Delphic amphictyony. Strabo (ix. p. 420) believes that this amphictyony existed before the time of Acrisius, and that he was only the first who regulated the affins of the amphictyony, fixed the towns which were to take part in the council, gave to each its vote, and settled the jurisdiction of the amphictyony. (Comp. Libanius, Orat. vol. iii. 472, ed. Reiske.)

ACRON, a king of the Coenimenes, whom Romulus himself slew in battle. He dedicated the arms of Acrion to Jupiter Feretrius as Spolia Opima. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 883.) Livy mentions the circumstance without giving the name of the king. (Phlt. Rom. 16; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 860; Liv. i. 10.)

is not known; but, as he is mentioned as being contemporary with Empedocles, who died about the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, he must have lived in the fifth century before Christ. From Sicily he went to Athens, and there opened a philosophical school (σωφρονέω). It is said that he was in that city during the great plague (b. c. 430) and that large fires for the purpose of purification that were kindled in the streets by his direction, which proved of great service to several of the sick. (Plut. De Is. et Osir. 80; Orbitas. Synops. vi. 24, p. 97; Atthis, tetrab. ii. srm. i. 94, p. 223; Paul Aegin. ii. 35, p. 406.) It should however be borne in mind that there is no mention of this in Thucydides (ii. 40, &c.), and, if it is true that Empedocles or Simonides (who died b. c. 467) wrote the epitaph on Aceron, it may be doubted whether he was in Athens at the time of the plague. Upon his return to Agrigentum he was anxious to erect a family tomb, and applied to the senate for a spot of ground for that purpose on account of his eminent family. Empedocles however resisted this application as being contrary to the principle of equality, and proposed to inscribe on his tomb the following sarcastic epitaph (τοσαπαμηκε), which is quite impossible to translate so as to preserve the sarcasm of the original: Ακρον ἱερον Ακρον ἀκραγαντίου πατρὸς ἄκρου Κρύπτει κρυμμένος ἄκρον πατρίδος αὐτοτάτης. The second line was sometimes read thus: Αὐτοτάτης κυρίφης τόμος ἄκρου κατέχει. Some persons attributed the whole epigram to Simonides. (Suid. s. v. Ακρόν; Euhod. Ptolom. ap. Villiscus, Ancol. Gr. i. 49; Diog. Lœrt. viii. 65.) The sect of the Empirici, in order to boast of a greater antiquity than the Dogmatici (founded by Thessalus, the son, and Polybus, the son-in-law of Hippocrates, about b. c. 400), claimed Aceron as their founder (Pseudo-Gal. Introd. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683), though they did not really exist before the third century a. c. [PHILIUSIN; SKRAPH.] Pliny falls into this anachronism. (II. N. xxi. 4.) None of Aceron's works are now extant, though he wrote several in the Doric dialect on Medical and Physical subjects, of which the titles are preserved by Suidas and Eudocia. [W. A. G.]

ACRON, HELENIUS, a Roman grammian, probably of the fifth century a. d., but whose precise date is not known. He wrote notes on Homer, and also, according to some critics, the scholi on which we have on Pindar. The fragments which remain of the work on Homer, though much mutilated, are valuable, as containing the remarks of the elder commentators, Q. Terentius Scarpus and others. They were published first by A. Zacreti, Milan, 1474, and again in 1488, and have often been published since in different editions; perhaps the best is that by Geo. Fabricius, in his ed. of Homer, Basle, 1555, Leipzig, 1571. A writer of the same name, probably the same man, wrote a commentary on Terence, which is lost, but which is referred to by the grammian Charisius. [A. A. J.

ACROPOLITA, GEORGIOUS (Περσιγδρος Ἀκροπολιτής), the son of the great logotheta Constantinus Acropolita the elder, belonged to a noble Byzantine family which stood in relationship to the imperial family of the Ducas. (Acropolita, 97.) He was born at Constantinople in 1220 (16. 30), but accompanied his father in his sixteenth year to Nicaea, the residence of the Greek emperor John Vatatzes Ducas. There he continued and finished his studies under Theodorus Exapterigus and Nicophorus Blemmida. (16. 32.) The emperor employed him afterwards in diplomatic affairs, and Acropolita showed himself a very discreet and skilful negotiator. In 1255 he commanded the forces of the Nicopoleion of Michael, despot of Epirus, and the emperor Theodorus II, the son and successor of John. But he was made prisoner, and was only delivered in 1260 by the mediation of Michael Palaeologus. Previously to this he had been appointed great logothete, either by John or by Theodore, whom he had instructed in logic. Meanwhile, Michael Palaeologus was proclaimed emperor of Nicaea in 1260, and in 1261 he expelled the Latins from Constantinople, and became emperor of the whole East; and from this moment Georgius Acropolita becomes known in the history of the eastern empire as one of the greatest diplomats. After having discharged the function of ambassador at the court of Constantine, king of the Latins, and the Venetians, he retired for some years from public affairs, and made the instruction of youth his sole occupation. But he was soon employed in a very important negotiation. Michael, afraid of a new Latin invasion, proposed to pope Clements IV. to reunitie the Greek and the Latin Churches; and negotiations ensued which were carried on during the reign of five popes, Clements IV. Gregory X. John XXI. Nicolaus III. and Martin IV. and the happy result of which was almost entirely owing to the skill of Acropolita. As early as 1273 Acropolita was sent to pope Gregory X. and in 1274, at the Council of Lyons, he confirmed by an oath in the emperor's name that that confession of faith which had been previously sent to Constantinople by the pope had been adopted by the Greeks. The reunion of the two churches was afterwards broken off, but not through the fault of Acropolita. In 1282 Acropolita was once more sent to Bulgaria, and shortly after his return he died, in the month of December of the same year, in his 62nd year.

Acropolita is the author of several works: the most important of which is a history of the Byzantine empire, under the title Χρονικά ὡς ἐν συστήσει τῶν ἐκ δαίμονος, that is, from the taking of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, down to the year 1261, when Michael Palaeologus delivered the city from the foreign yokes. The MS. of this work was found in the library of Georgius Comnenus at Constantinople, and afterwards brought to Europe. (Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. vol. vii. p. 766.) The first edition of this work, with a Latin translation and notes, was published by Theodorus Douza, Lugd. Batav. 1614, &c.; but a more critical one by Leo Allatius, who used a Vatican MS. and divided the text into chapters. It has the title Περίγραφος τοῦ Ἀκροπολίτου τοῦ μεγάλου λογοθέτου χριστιανὸς συγγράφων, Georgii Acropolitae, magni Logotheti, Historia, &c. Paris, 1651. fol. This edition is reprinted in the "Corpus Byzantinorum Scriptorum," Venice, 1729, vol. xii. This chronicle contains one of the most remarkable periods of Byzantine history, but it is so short that it seems to be only an abridgment of another work of the same author, which is lost. Acropolita perhaps composed it with the view of giving it as a supplement to the younger men whose scientific education he superintended, after his return from his first embassy to Bulgaria.
The history of Michael Paleologus by Pachymeres may be considered as a continuation of the work of Acropolita. Besides this work, Acropolita wrote several orations, which he delivered in his capacity as great theologian as well as bishop of the cathedral of the city; but these orations have not been published. Fabricius (vol. vii. p. 471) speaks of a MS. which has the title Περὶ τῶν ἀδίκων κρίσεων καὶ περὶ τῶν βασιλεύσαντος μέχρι χλώεντος Κωνσταντινουπόλεως. Georgius, or Gorgorius Cypritis, who has written a short encomium of Acropolita, calls him the Plato and the Aristotle of his time. This "encomium" is printed with a Latin translation at the head of the edition of Acropolita by Th. Donza; it contains useful information concerning Acropolita, although it is full of adulation. Further information is contained in Acropolita's history, especially in the latter part of it, and in Pachymeres, iv. 26, vi. 26, 34, seq. [W. P.]

ACROREITES (Ἀκρορέιτης), a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Sicyon, and which is synonymous with Erisiphus, under which name he was worshipped at Metapontum in southern Italy. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀκρορέιτης) [L. S.]

ACROTATUS (Ἀκρότατος). 1. The son of Cleomenes II. king of Sparta, incurred the displeasure of a large party at Sparta by opposing the decree, which was to release from infamy all who had fled from the battle, in which Antigater defeated Agis, n. c. 381. He was thus glad to accept the offer of the Agrigentines, when they sent to Sparta for assistance in n. c. 314 against Agathocles of Syracuse. He first sailed to Italy, and obtained assistance from Taranto; but on his arrival at Agrigentum he was called to halt by a hallucination that the inhabitants rose against him, and compelled him to leave the city. He returned to Sparta, and died before the death of his father, which was in n. c. 309. He left a son, Areus, who succeeded Cleomenes. (Diod. xv. 70, 71; Paus. i. 13. § 3, iii. 6. § 1, 2; Plut. Agis, 3.)

2. The grandson of the preceding, and the son of Areus I. king of Sparta. He had unlawful intercourse with Chelidonia, the young wife of Cleonymus, who was the uncle of his father Areus; and it was this, together with the disappointment of not obtaining the throne, which led Cleonymus to invite Pyrrhus to Sparta, n. c. 272. Areus was then absent in Crete, and the safety of Sparta was mainly owing to the power of Acrotatus. He succeeded his father in n. c. 265, but was killed in the same year in battle against Aristodemus, the tyrant of Megalopolis. Pausanias, in speaking of his death, calls him the son of Cleonymus. But he has mistaken him for his grandfather, spoken of above. (Plut. Pyrrh. 26-28; Agis, 5; Paus.iii. 6. § 3, viii. 27, § 8, 30, § 3.) Areus and Acrotatus are accused by Phylarchus (ap. Athen. iv. p. 142, b.) of having corrupted the simplicity of Spartan manners.

ACTAEON (Ἀκταῖος). A son of Eriachthon, and according to Pausanias (i. 2. § 5), the earliest king of Attica. He left three daughters, Agraules, Herse, and Pandrosus, and was succeeded by Cecrops, who married Agraulus. According to Apollodorus (iii. 14. 1.) on the other hand, Cecrops was the first king of Attica. [L. S.]

ACTAEON (Ἀκταῖος), a son of Aristaeus and Autonoe, a daughter of Cadmus. He was trained in the art of hunting by the centaur Chiron, and was afterwards torn to pieces by his own 50 hounds on mount Citheron. The names of these hounds are given by Ovid (Met. iii. 206, &c.) and Hyginus. (P. Fab. 181; comp. Stat. Theb. ii. 203.)

ACTIAEUS (Ἀκτιαῖος), a king of Ethiopia, who conquered Egypt and governed it with justice. He founded the city of Rhinocorura on the confines of Egypt and Syria, and was succeeded by Mendes, an Egyptian. Diodorus says that Acti-sanes conquered Egypt in the reign of Amasis, for which event we ought perhaps to read Ammous. At all events, Amasis, the contemporary of Cyrus, cannot be meant. (Diod. i. 60; Strab. xvi. p. 759.)

ACTIUS. [Arctius.]

ACTOR. (Actsop.). 1. A son of Dexion and Diodama, the daughter of Xuthus. He was thus a brother of Asteopena, Aeneus, Phylacus, and Cephalus, and husband of Aegina, father of Me-metas, and grandfather of Patroclus. (Apollod. i. 24. 4; Pind. Ol. x. 75; Hom. Il. xi. 785, xii. 14.)

2. A son of Phorbas and Hyrmine, and husband of Melone. He was thus a brother of Auges, and father of Eurytus and Cteutus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 2; Paus. v. i. § 8, viii. 14. § 6.)

3. A companion of Amenus (Verg. Aen. ix. 500), who is probably the same who in another passage (xii. 94) is called an Auruncum, and of whose con-quered lance Turnus made a boast. This story seems to have given rise to the proverbial saying "Actoris spolium" (Juvi. ii. 160), for any poor spoil in general. [L. S.]

ACTIORIDES or ACTIORION (Actsopoeus or Actsopoeion). A group of actors or object names of actors, and consequently the descendants of an actor, such as Patroclus (Ov. Met. xiii. 373; Trist. i. 9. 29), Eritha (Ov. Met. v. 79; comp. viii. 398, 371), Eurytus, and Cleatus. (Hom. Il. ii. 621, xiii. 185, xi. 750, xxii. 638.) [L. S.]

M. ACTORIUS NASSO, seems to have written a life of Julius Caesar, or a history of his times, which is quoted by Suetonius. (Jul. 9, 52.) The time in which he lived is uncertain, but from the way in which he is referred to by Suetonius, he would almost seem to have been a contemporary of Caesar.

ACTUARIUS (Actsopoeus), the surname by which an ancient Greek physician, whose real name was Johannes, is commonly known. His father's name was Zacharias; he himself practised at Constantinople, and, as it appears, with some degree of credit, as he was honoured with the title of Actuarius, a dignity frequently conferred at that court upon physicians (Dict. of Ant. p. 611, x.) Very little is known of the events of his life, and his date is much uncertain, as some persons reckon him to have lived in the eleventh century, and others bring him down as low as the beginning of the fourteenth. He probably lived towards the end of the thirteenth century, as one of his works is dedicated to his tutor, Joseph Racendyes, who lived in the reign of Andronicus II. Palaeologus, A.D. 1261—1328. One of his school-fellows is supposed to have been Apococcus, whom he describes (though without naming him) as going upon an embassy to the north. (De Med. Med. Prof. in ii. ii. pp. 159, 169.)

One of his works is entitled, Περί Ενεργούν καὶ Παρθόν τού Ψυχικού Πολιτείας, καὶ τῆς κατ' αὐτὸ Διάγραψη — "De Actionibus et Affectibus Spiritus Animalis, ejusque Nutritione." This is a psychologi-cal and physiological work in two books, in which all his reasoning, says Freind, seems to be founded upon the principles laid down by Aristotle, Galen, and others, with relation to the same subject. The style of this tract is by no means impure, and has a great mixture of the old Attic in it, which is very rarely to be met with in the later Greek writers. A tolerably full abstrac-tum of it is given by Buxhues, Hist. Medic. Dial. 14. p. 336, &c. It was first published, Venet. 1547, 8vo. in a Latin translation by Jul. Alexandrinus de Neustain. The first edition of the original was published, Par. 1557, 8vo. edited, without notes or preface, by Jac. Gounyl. A second Greek edition appeared in 1774, 8vo. Lips., under the care of J. F. Fischer. Ideker has also inserted it in the first volume of his Physici et Medicis Graeci Minores, Berol. 8vo. 1844; and the first part of J. S. Bernard's Encylopaedia Medicorum-Criticum ed. Gmelin, 1795, 8vo. contains some Greek Scholia on the work.

Another of his extant works is entitled, Θεραπευτικὰ Μέθοδος, "De Methodo Medendi," in six books, which have hitherto appeared complete only in a Latin translation, though Dietz had, before his death, collected materials for a Greek edition of this and his other works. (See his preface to Galen De Dissert. Medic.) In these books, says Freind, though he chiefly follows Galen, and very often Aëtius and Paulus Aegineta without naming him, yet he makes use of whatever he finds to his purpose both in the old and modern writers, as well barbarians as Greeks; and indeed we find in several things that are not to be met with elsewhere. The work was written extempore, and designed for the use of Apococcus during his embassy to the north. (Pref. i. p. 139.) A Latin translation of this work by Corn. H. Mathiussis, was first published Venet. 1554, 4to. The first four books appear sometimes to have been considered to form a complete work, of which the first and second have been inserted by Ideker in the second volume of his Phys. et Med. Gr. Min. Berol. 1842, under the title Περὶ Διαγραψεως Παιδων, "De Morborum Dignitatis," and from which the Greek extracts in H. Stephanius's Dictionarium Medicum, Par. 1564, 8vo. are probably taken. The fifth and sixth books have also been taken for a separate work, and were published by themselves, Par. 1559, 8vo. and Basil. 1560, 8vo. in a Latin translation by J. Rutilius, with the title "De Medicamentorum Compositione." A separate Latin collection of writers De Fabulis, Venet. 1576, fol.

His other extant work is Περὶ Οὐδὲν, "De Ursinia," in seven books. He has treated of this subject very fully and distinctly, and, though he goes upon the plan which Theophrastus Protaspatharius had marked out, yet he has added a great deal of original matter. It is the most complete and systematic work on the subject that remains from antiquity, so much so that, till the chemical improvements of the last hundred years, he had left hardly anything new to be said by the moderns, many of whom, says Freind, transcribed it almost word for word. This work was first published in a Latin translation by Ambrose Leo, which appeared in 1519, Venet. 4to. and has been several times reprinted; the Greek original has been published in the first time in the second volume of Ideker's work quoted above. Two Latin editions of his collected works are said by Chonlant (Handbuch der Bücherlunde für die Aktere Medicin, Leipzig, 1841), to have been published in the same year, 1556, one at Paris, and the other at Lyons, both in 8vo. His three works are also inserted in the Medicina ACULEO occurs as a surname of C. Purus who was grandson of L. Scipio, and was condemned of peculium. (Liv. xxxviii. 55.) Aculeo, however, seems not to have been a regular family-name of the Puria gens, but only a surname given to this person, of which a similar example occurs in the following article.

C. ACULEO, a Roman knight, who married the sister of Helvia, the mother of Cicero. He was surprised by no one in his day in his knowledge of the Roman law, and possessed great acuteness of mind, but was not distinguished for other attainments. He was a friend of L. Licinius Crassus, and was defended by him upon one occasion. The son of Aculeo was C. Viscellius Varro; whence it would appear that Aculeo was only a surname given to the father from his acuteness, and that his full name was C. Viscellius Varro Aculeo. (Cic. de Or. i. 48, ii. 1, 65; Brut. 76.)

ACUMENUS ('Akovérous), a physician of Athens, who lived in the fifth century before Christ, and is mentioned as the friend and companion of Socrates. (Plat. Phaedr. Init.; Xen. Memor. iii. 13. § 2.) He was the father of Eryximachus, who was also a physician, and who is introduced as one of the speakers in Plato's Symposium. (Plat. Protag. p. 315, c.; Symp. p. 176, c.) He is also mentioned in the collection of letters first published by Leo Allatius, Paris, 1637, 4to. with the title Epist. Socrates et Socratianarum, and again by Orelius, Lips. 1815. 8vo. ep. 14. p. 31. [W. A. G.]

ACUSIUSUS ('Akoisiovos), of Argos, one of the most celebrated Greek historians (Oros. i. 5. 6. 4.), who probably lived in the latter half of the sixth century B.C. He is called the son of Cabraus or Scabrus, and is reckoned by some among the Seven Wise Men. Suidas (s. v.) says, that he wrote Genealogies from bronze tablets, which his father was said to have dug up in his own house. Three books of his Genealogies are quoted, which were for the most part only a translation of Hesiod into prose. (Clem. Strom. vi. p. 629, a.) Like most of the other logographers, he wrote in the Ionic dialect. Plato is the earliest writer by whom he is mentioned. (Symp. p. 178, b.) The works which bore the name of Acusius in a later age, were spurious. (s. v. 'Ekkratov Milipov, 'Istoforou, Xygrpoiro.) The fragments of Acusius which have been published by Stroz, Genae, 1707; 2nd ed. Lips. 1824; and in the "Museum Criticum," i. p. 216, xc. Camb. 1826.

M. ACUTUS, tribune of the plebs b.c. 401, was elected by the other tribunes (by co-optation) in violation of the Trebonian lex. (Liv. v. 10; Dist. of Ant. p. 856, a.)

ADA ('Ade), the daughter of Hecontommas, king of Caria, and sister of Mausolus, Artemisia, Idries, and Piexodar. She was married to her brother Idries, who succeeded Artemisia in b.c. 351 and died b.c. 344. On the death of her husband she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her brother Piexodar in b.c. 340; and on the death of the latter in b.c. 335 his son-in-law Orontobates secured the satrapy of Caria from the Persians. When Alexander entered Caria in b.c. 334, Ada, who was in possession of the fortress of Amind, surrendered this place to him and begged leave to adopt him as her son. After taking Halicarnassus, Alexander committed the government of Caria to her. (Arrian, Anat. i. 56; Hod. xvi. 42, 74; Strab. xiv. pp. 656, 657; Plut. Alex. 48.)

ADARUS, or ADDARUS ('Adaros or 'Addaros), a Greek epigrammatic poet, a native most probably of Macedonia. The epitaph Mausoleos is appended to his name before the third epigram in the Vat. MS. (Anth. Gr. vi. 220; and the subjects of the second, eighth, ninth, and tenth epigrams agree with this account of his origin. He lived in the time of Alexander the Great, to whose death he alludes. (Anth. Gr. vii. 240.) The fifth epigram (Anth. Gr. vii. 305) is inscribed 'Addaros Mryvatiou, and there was a Mytyleanum of this name, who wrote two prose works Peri 'Agyalouropoiv, and Peri Diamov. (Athen. xiii. p. 690, a, x. p. 471, f.) The time when he lived cannot be fixed with certainty. Reiske, though on insufficient grounds, believes these two to be the same person. (Anth. Gr. vii. 228, 256, viii. 51, 238, 240, 365, x. 20; Brunck, Anth. ii. p. 224; Jacob. xiii. p. 381.) [C. P. M.]

ADAMANTIA. [AMANTHEIA.]

ADAMANTIIUS ('Adamantivos), an ancient physician, bearing the title of Iatriotepistheta ('Iatriotepistheta logon sev 'Alj'). Socrates, Hist. Eccles. vii. 18, for the meaning of which see Dict. of Ant. p. 307. Little is known of his personal history, except that he was born a Jew, and that he was one of those who fled from Alexandria, at the time of the expulsion of the Jews from that city by the Patriarch St. Cyril, a.d. 415. He went to Constantinople, was persuaded to embrace Christianity, apparently by Atticus the Patriarch of that city, and afterwards went to Alexandria (Socrates, l. c.) He is the author of a Greek treatise on physiognomy, Phvsevgymenik, in two books, which is still extant, and which is borrowed in a great measure (as he himself confesses, i. Proem. p. 314, ed. Franz.) from Polemo's work on the same subject. It is dedicated to Constantius, who is supposed by Fabricius (Bibl. Gracca, vol. ii. p. 171, xiii. 34, ed. vet.) to be the person who married Placidia, the daughter of Theodosius the Great, and who reigned for seven months in conjunction with the Emperor Honorius. It was first published in Greek at Paris, 1540, 8vo., then in Greek and Latin at Basle, 1544, 8vo., and afterwards in Greek, together with Atticus, Polemo and some other writers, at Rome, 1545, 4to.; the last and best edition is that of J. Francius, who has inserted it in his collection of the Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, Gr. et Lat. Atchbn. 1780, 8vo. Another of his works, Peri 'Arkstw, De Ventis, is quoted by the Scholast to Hesiod, and an extract from it is given by Aetius (etnrb, i. aemn. 3, c. 163); it is said to be still in existence in manuscript in the Royal Library at Paris. Several of his medical prescriptions are preserved by Oribasius and Atticus. [W. A. G.]

ADEIMANTUS ('Adeimastos). 1. The son of Oeacys, the Corinthian commander in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes. Before the battle of Artemisium he threatened to sail away, but was bribed by Themistocles to remain. He opposed Themistocles with great insolence in the council which the commanders held before the battle of Salamis. According to the Athenians he took to flight at the very commencement of the battle, but this was denied by the Corinthians and the other Greeks. (Herod. viii. 56, 61, 94; Plut. Them. 11.)

2. The son of Leucipholes, an Athenian, was one of the commanders with Alcibiades in the expedition against Andros, B.C. 407. (Xen. Hell. i. 4. § 21.) He was again appointed one of the Athenian generals after the battle of Arginusae, B.C. 405, and continued in office till the battle of Aegospotami, B.C. 406, where he was one of the commanders, and was taken prisoner. He was the only one of the Athenian prisoners who was not put to death, but the court of Justice opposed the decree for cutting off the right hands of the Lacedaemonians who might be taken in the battle. He was accused by many of treachery in this battle, and was afterwards impeached by Conon. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 1. ii. § 30-32; Paus. iv. 17. § 2, x. 9. § 3.; Dem. de fals. leg. p. 401.; Lys. c. Alc. pp. 143, 211.)

An Aristophanes speaks of Adimantus in the "Frogs" (1513), which was acted in the year of the battle, as one whose death was wished for; and he also calls him, apparently out of jest, the son of Leneolophus, that is, "White Crest." In the "Prota-goras" of Plato, Adimantus is also spoken of as present on that occasion (p. 315, e.).

3. The son of Pericles of Athens. Pericles is frequently mentioned by the latter. (Apol. Soc. p. 34, a. de Reu. ii. p. 367, e. p. 518, d. e.)

ADGANDESTRUS, a chief of the Catti, offered to kill Arminius if the Romans would send him poison for the purpose; but Tiberius declined the offer. (Tac. Ann. ii. 88.)

ADHERBAL (Αρδεβάλ). 1. A Carthaginian commander in the first Punic War, who was placed over Drepana, and completely defeated the Roman consul P. Claudius in a sea-fight off Drepana, B.C. 249. (Polyb. i. 49-52; Diod. Ec. xxiv.)

2. A Carthaginian commander under Magos in the second Punic War, who was defeated in a sea-fight off Carteia, in Spain, by C. Laelius in B.C. 206. (Liv. xxviii. 30.)

3. The son of Michias, and grandson of Masinias, had the kingdom of Numidia left to him by his father in conjunction with his brother Hiempsal and Jugurtha, B.C. 113. After the murder of his brother by Jugurtha, Adherbal fled to Rome and was restored to his share of the kingdom by the Romans in B.C. 117. But Adherbal was again stripped of his dominions by Jugurtha and besieged in Cirta, where he was treacherously killed by Jugurtha in B.C. 112, although he had placed himself under the protection of the Romans. (Sall. Jug. 5, 13, 14, 24, 25, 26; Liv. Ep. 63; Diod. Ec. xxiv. p. 605. ed. Wess.)

ADIA'TORIX (Αδιατορίξ), son of a tetrarch in Galatia, belonged to Antony's party, and killed all the Romans in Hercolea shortly before the battle of Actium. After this battle he was led as prisoner in the triumph of Augustus, and put to death with his younger son. His elder son, Dyeteus, was subsequently made priest of the celebrated goddess in Comana. (Strab. xlii. pp. 543, 558, 559; Cic. ad Fam. ii. 12.)

ADMETE (Αδμητη), 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Themis (Hesiod. Theog. 349), whom Hygimnias in the preface to his fables calls Admeto and a daughter of Pontus and Thalassa.

2. A daughter of Eurytheus and Antimache or Admete. Heracles was obliged by her father to fetch for her the girdle of Are, which was worn by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9.) According to Tzetzes (ad Lyoc. 1297), she accompanied Heracles on this expedition. There was a tradition (Athen. xv. p. 447), according to which Admete was originally a priestess of Hera at Argos, but fled with the image of the goddess to Samos. Pirates were engaged by the Argives to fetch the image back, but the enterprise did not succeed, for the ship when laden with the image could not be made to move. The men then took the image back to the coast of Samos and sailed away. When the Samians found it, they tied it to a tree, but Admete purified it and restored it to the temple of Samos. In commemoration of this event the Samians celebrated an annual festival called Tenea. This story seems to be an invention of the Argives, by which they intended to prove that the worship of Hera in their place was older than in Samos. (L. S. X.)

ADMETUS (Αδμητος), a son of Phere, the founder and king of Phara in Thessaly, and of Periclymene or Clymene. (Apollod. i. 8. §§ 29, 9. § 14.) He took part in the Calydonian chase and the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 8. § 16; Hyg. Bib. 14. 175.) When he had succeeded his father as king of Pharae, he sued for the hand of Alcestis, the daughter of Pelias, who promised to him on condition that he should come to her in a chariot drawn by lions and bears. This task Admetus performed by the assistance of Apollo, who served him according to some accounts out of attachment to him (Schol. ad Eurip. Alcest. 2; Callim. h. in Apoll. 46, &c.), or, according to others because he was obliged to serve a mortal for one year for having slain the Cyclopes. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4.) On the day of his marriage with Alcestis, Admetus neglected to offer a sacrifice to Artemis, and when in the evening he entered the bridal chamber, he found there a number of snakes rolled up in a lump. Apollo, however, reconciled Artemis to him, and at the same time induced the Moirae to grant to Admetus deliverance from death, if at the hour of his death his father, mother, or wife would die for him. Alcestis did so, but Kora, or according to others Heracles, brought her back to the upper world. (Apollod. i. 9. § 15; comp. Alcestis.)

ADMETUS (Αδμητος), king of the Molosians in the time of Themistocles, who, when supreme at Athens, had opposed him, perhaps not without insult, in some suit to the people. When flying from the officers who were ordered to seize him as a party to the treason of Pausanias, and driven from Corcyra to Epirus, he found himself upon some emergency, with no hope of refuge but the house of Admetus. Admetus was absent; but Pithia his queen welcomed the stranger, and bade him, as the most solemn form of supplication among the Molosians, take her son, the young prince, and sit with him in his bands upon his hearth. Admetus on his return home assured him of protection; according to another account in Phurc, he himself, and not Pithia enjoined the form as affording him a pretext for refusal; he, at any rate, shut his ears to all that the Athenian and Lacedaemonian commissioners, who soon afterwards arrived, could say; and sent Themistocles safely to Pydna on his way to the Persian court. (Thucyd. i. 136, 137; Plut. Them. 24.) [A. H. C.]

ADMETUS (Αδμητος), a Greek epigrammatist, who lived in the early part of the second century after Christ. One line of his is preserved by Lucian. (Deomaen., 44;Brunck, Anm. iii. p. 21.)

2. Adonis is sometimes used by Latin poets for Adonis. (Plant. Menadis. i. 2. 35; Catull. xxix. 9.)

ADONIS (A'donis), according to Apollodorus (iii. 14. § 3) a son of Cynnus and Medeirane, according to Hesiod, (ap. Apollod. iii. 14. § 4) a son of Phoenix and Alpheasikos, and according to the cyclic poem Panyasis (ap. Apollod. l. c.) a son of Theias, king of Assyria, who begot by his own daughter Smyrma. (Myrrha.) The ancient story ran thus: Smyrna had neglected the worship of Aphrodite, and was punished by the goddess with an unnatural love for her father. With the assistance of her nurse she contrived to share her father's bed without being known to him. When he discovered the crime, he wished to kill her; but she fled, and, being nearily overtaken, prayed to the gods to make her invisible. They were moved to pity and changed her into a tree called σμύρνεια. After the lapse of nine months the tree burst, and Adonis was born. Aphrodite was so much charmed with the beauty of the infant, that she concealed it in a chest which she entrusted to Persephone; but when the latter discovered the treasure she had in her keeping, she refused to give it up. The case was brought before Zeus, who decided the dispute by declaring that during four months of every year Adonis should be left to himself, during four months he should belong to Persephone, and during the remaining four to Aphrodite. Adonis however preferring to live with Aphrodite, also spent with her the four months over which he had control. Afterwards Adonis died of a wound which he received from a boar during the chase. Thus far the story of Adonis was related by Panyasis. Later writers furnish various alterations and additions to it. According to Hyginus (Fab. 58, 164, 251, 271), Smyrna was punished with the love for her father, because her mother Czeleus had provoked the anger of Aphrodite by extolling the beauty of her daughter above that of the goddess. Smyrma after the discovery of her crime fled into a forest, where she was changed into a tree from which Adonis came forth, when her father split it with his sword. The dispute between Aphrodite and Persephone was according to some accounts settled by Calliope, whose Zeus appointed as mediator between them. (Hesiod, Theog. 345; Apollod. ii. 7.) Ovid (Met. x. 390, &c.) adds the following features: Myrrha's love of her father was excited by the furies; Lucina assisted her when she gave birth to Adonis, and the Naiads anointed him with the tears of his mother, i. e. with the fluid which trickled from the tree. Adonis grew up a most beautiful youth, and Venus loved him and shared with him the pleasures of the chase, though she always cautioned him against the wild beasts. At last he wounded a boar which killed him in its fury. According to some traditions Ares (Mars), or, according to others, Apollo assumed the form of a boar and thus killed Adonis. (Serv. ad Virg. Exaj. x. 16; Ptolem. Hephaen. i. p. 306; ed. Gale.) A third story related that Dionysus carried off Adonis. (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xii. 32.) When Aphrodite was informed of her beloved being wounded, she hastened to the spot and sprinkled nectar into his blood, from which immediately flowers sprang up. Various other modifications of the story may be read in Hyginus (Post. Astr. ii. 7) Theocritus (Idyll. xv.), Dion (Idyll. i.), and in the scholiast on Lyophron. (139, &c.) From the double marriage of Aphrodite with Ares and Adonis sprang Priapus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 9, 32.) Besides him Golgos and Beroe are likewise called children of Adonis and Aphrodite. (Schol. ad Theocrit. xvi. 100; Nonn. Dionys. xii. 155.) On his death Adonis was obliged to descend into the lower world, but he was allowed to spend six months out of every year with his beloved Aphrodite in the upper world. (Orph. hymn. 55, 16.)

The worship of Adonis, which in later times was spread over nearly all the countries round the Mediterranean, was, as the story itself sufficiently indicates, of Asiatic, or more especially of Phoenician origin. (Lucian, de dea Syria c. 6.) Thence it was transferred to Assyria, Egypt, Greece, and even to Italy, though of course with various modifications. In the Homeric poems no trace of it occurs, and the later Greek poets changed the original symbolic account of Adonis into a poetical story. The Asiatic religious Aphrodite was the fructifying principle of nature, and Adonis appears to have reference to the death of nature in winter and its revival in spring—hence he spends six months in the lower and six in the upper world. His death and his return to life were celebrated in annual festivals (A'donisia) at Byblos, Alexandria in Egypt, Athens, and other places. [L. S.]

ADARNAK (Adarka), a Sicilian divinity who was worshipped in all the island, but especially at Adram, a town near Mount Aetna. (Plut. Tirol. 12; Diodor. xiv. 37.) Hesychius (α. α. Παλαιός) represents the god as the father of the Pelasgians. According to Astian (Histor. Anim. xii. 20), about 1000 sacred dogs were kept near their temple. Some modern critics consider this divinity to be of eastern origin, and connect the name Adramis with the Persian Adar (fire), and regard him as the same as the Phoenician A'drama, and as a personification of the sun or fire in general. (Bochart, Geography Sacra, p. 520.)

ADRANTUS, ADRANTUS or ADRASTUS, a contemporary of Thetis, who wrote a commentary in five books upon the work of Theophrastus, entitled ὑπωμβολή, to which he added a sixth book upon the Miscellaneous Arts of Aristotle. ( Athen, xv. p. 675, c. with Schweighaze’s note.)

ADRASTEIA (A'drasteia). 1. A Cretan nymph, daughter of Melissos, to whom Rhea entrusted the infant Zeus to be reared in the Dictaean grotto. In this office Adrasteia was assisted by her sister Ida and the Curetis (Apolo'd. i. § 6; Callimach. Hymn. in Iov. 47), whom the scholiast on Callimachus calls her brother. Apollonius Rhodius (iii. 132, &c.) relates that she gave to the infant Zeus a beautiful globe (αφθοφόρα) to play with, and on some Cretan coins Zeus is represented sitting upon a globe. (Spanh. ad Callim. i. 9.)

2. A surname of Nemesis, which is derived by some writers from Adrastus, who is said to have built the first sanctuary of Nemesis on the river Asopus (Strab. xiii. p. 589), and by others from ADRIANUS. [ADRIANUS.] ADRIANUS (Ἀδριανός), a Greek orator born at Tyre in Phoenicia, who flourished under the emperors M. Antoninus and Commodus. He was the pupil of the celebrated Herodes Atticus, and obtained the chair of philosophy at Athens during the lifetime of his master. His advancement does not seem to have impaired their mutual regard; Herodes declared that the unfinished speeches of his scholar were "the fragments of a colossus," and Adrianus showed his gratitude by a funeral oration which he pronounced over the ashes of his master. Among a people who ridded another in their zeal to do him honour, Adrianus did not show much of the discretion of a philosopher. His first lecture commenced with the modest encomium on himself πάντα εἰς Φωνήκη γρήγορα, while in the magnificence of his dress and equipment he affected the style of the hierophant of philosophy. A story may be seen in Philostorgius of his trial and acquittal for the murder of abegging sophist who had insulted him: Adrianus had reported by-styling such insults διψαμάτα κόρεων, but his pupils were not content with weapons of ridicule. The visit of M. Antoninus to Athens made him acquainted with Adrianus, whom he invited to Rome and honoured with his friendship: the emperor even condescended to set the thesis of a declaration for him. After the death of Antoninus he became the private secretary of Commodus. His death took place at Rome in the eighth year of his age, not later than A.D. 192, if it be true that Commodus (who was assassinated at the end of this year) sent him a letter on his deathbed, which he is represented as kissing with devout earnestness in his last moments. (Philostor. Vit. Adrian. i. Suidas, s. a. 'Apaµas). Of the works attributed to him by Suidas three declarations only are extant. These have been edited by Leo Allatius in the Eororhychia Varia Graecorum Sophistaram ac Rhetoriorum, Rome, 1641, and by Walz in the first volume of the Rhetores Graeci, 1832. [B. J.]

ADRIA'NUS ('Apaµas), a Greek poet, who wrote an epic poem on the history of Alexander the Great, which was called 'Aegeµatipas. Of this poem the seventh book is mentioned (Steph. Byz. s. a. Zétraias), but we possess only a fragment consisting of one line. (Steph. Byz. s. a. Aecadam.) Suidas (s. a. 'Apaµas) mentions other poems of Adrianus one called 'Aegeµatipas, and there can be no doubt that this is the work of Adrianus, which he by mistake attributes to his Arrianus. (Meinecke, in the Abhandl. der Berlin. Akademie, 1832, p. 124.) [L. S.]

ADRIA'NUS ('Apaµas) flourished, according to Archibishop Usher, A.D. 433. There is extant of his, in Greek, Iasgong quaereurum literarum, recommended by Photius (No. 2) to beginners, edited by Dav. Heschel, 4to. Ang. Vindel. 1602, and among the Critices sacri ed. Lond. 1600. [A.J.C.]

ADUSIUS ('Aζος), according to the account of Xenophon in the Cyropaedia, was sent by Cyrus with an army into Caria, to put an end to the feuds which existed in the country. He afterwards assisted Hystaspes in subduing Phrygia, and was made satrap of Caria, as the inhabitants had requested. (viii. 4. § 1, &c., vili. 6. § 7.)

AEA. [GAEL.]

AEA, a huntress who was metamorphosed by the gods into the fabulous island bearing the same name, in order to rescue her from the pursuit of Phasis, the river-god. (Val. Max. i. 742, v. 426.) [L. S.]

AECASES (Aeleγες). 1. The father of Sylosion and Polyocrates. (Herod. iii. 39, 139, vi. 13.)

2. The son of Sylosion, and the grandson of the preceding, was tyrant of Samos, but was deprived of his tyranny by Aristogoras, when the Ionians revolted from the Persians, B.C. 490. He then fled to the Persians, and induced the Samians to abandon the other Ionians in the sea-fight against the Persians and Ionians. After this battle, in which the latter were defeated, he was restored to the tyranny of Samos by the Persians, B.C. 494. (Herod. iv. 138, vi. 13, 14, 25.)

AECIDES (Aeideγες), a patronymic from Aeaces, and given to various of his descendants, as Poleus (Or. Met. xii. 227, &c., xiii. 305; Hom. Ili. xvi. 15), Telamon (Or. Met. viii. 4; Apollon. i. 1330), Phoebus (Or. Met. vii. 668, 798), the sons of Aeaces; Achilles, the grandson of Aeaces (Hom. II. xi. 805; Virg. Aen. i. 99); and Pyrrhus, the great-grandson of Aeaces. (Virg. Aen. iii. 296.) [L. S.]

AEA CIDES (Aeleides), the son of Arysbus, king of Epirus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, who was slain in Italy. (Liv. viii. 24.) Aeaces married Pelitia, the daughter of Menon of Pharsalus, by whom he had the celebrated Pyrrhus and two daughters, Deidameia and Troilus. In B.C. 317 he assisted Polyxenophon in restoring Olympia and the young Alexander, who was then only five years old, to Macedonia. In the following year he marched to the assistance of Olympias, who was hard pressed by Cassander, but the Epirots disliked the service, rose against Aeaces, and drove him from the kingdom. Pyrrhus, who was then only two years old, was with difficulty saved from destruction by some faithful servants. But becoming tired of the Macedonian rule, the Epirots recalled Aeaces in B.C. 313; Cassander immediately sent an army against him under Philip, who conquered him the same year in two battles, in the first of which he was killed. (Paus. i. 11; Diod. xii. 36, 74, 76; Philo. Phil. i. 2.)

AEAUS (Aeaus), a son of Zeus and Aegina, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. He was born in the island of Oenus or Oceosp, whether Oenus had been covered by Zeus in order to secure her from the anger of her parents, and whence this island was afterwards called Aegina. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Hygin. Fab. 52; Paus. ii. 29. § 2; comp. Nonn. Dionys. vi. 212; Or. Met. vi. 113, viii. 472, &c.) According to some accounts Aeacus was a son of Zeus and Europa, Some traditions related that at the time when Aeacus was born, Aegina was not yet inhabited, and that Zeus changed the ants (ἀπομομικνομένις) of the island into men (Myrmidones) over whom Aeacus ruled, or that he made men grow up out of the earth. (Hes. Prov. 67, ed. Götting; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Paus. l. c.) Odys. Met. vii. 320, comp. Hygin. Fab. 52; Strab. viii. p. 375), on the other hand, supposes that the island was not uninhabited at the time of the birth of Aeacus, and states that, in the reign of Aegaeus, Hera, jealous of Aegina, ravaged the island bearing the name of the latter by sending a plague or a fearful dragon into it, by which nearly all its inhabitants were carried off, and that Zeus restored the population by changing the ants into men. These legends, as Müller justly remarks (Aegetinica), are nothing but a mythical account of the colonisation of Aegina, which seems to have been originally inhabited by Pelasgians, and afterwards received colonists from Phthiotis, the seat of the Myrmidones, and from Phlius on the Asopus. Aeacus while he reigned in Aegina was renowned in all Greece for his justice and piety, and was frequently called upon to settle disputes among men, but even among the gods themselves. (Pind. Ioll. viii. 48, &c.; Paus. i. 39. § 5.) He was such a favourite with the latter, that, when Greece was visited by a drought in consequence of a murder which had been committed (Diod. iv. 60, 61; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6), the oracle of Delphi declared that the calamity would not cease unless Aeacus prayed to the gods that it might; which he accordingly did, and it ceased in consequence. Aeacus himself showed his gratitude by erecting a temple to Zeus Panhellemnios on mount Panhel- llenion (Paus. ii. 30. § 4), and the Aeginetans afterwards built a sanctuary in their island called Aeacenum, which was a square place enclosed by walls of white marble. Aeacus was believed in later times to be buried under the altar in this sacred enclosure. (Paus. ii. 29. § 6.) A legend preserved in Pindar (Or. viii. 39, &c.) relates that Apollo and Poseidon took Aeacus as their assistant in building the walls of Troy. When the work was completed, three dragons rushed against the wall, and while the two of them which attacked those parts of the wall built by the gods fell down dead, the third forced its way into the city through the part built by Aeacus. Hereupon Apollo prophesied that Troy would fall through the hands of the Aechidae. Aeacus was also believed by the Aeginetians to have surrounded their island with high cliffs to protect it against pirates. (Paus. ii. 29. § 5.) Several other incidents connected with the story of Aeacus are mentioned by Ovid. (Met. vii. 506, &c., ix. 436, &c.) By Endis Aeacus had two sons, Telamon and Pelops, and by Phoenix a son, Phocus, whom he preferred to the other two, who contrived to kill Phocus during a storm, and then fled from their native island. [PHELUS; TELAMON.] After his death Aeacus became one of the three judges in Hades (Ov. Met. xiii. 25; Hor. Carm. ii. 13, 22), and according to Plato (Gorg. p. 532 ; compare Apol. p. 41; Isocr. Enor. 5) especially for the shades of Europeans. In works of art he was represented bearing a sceptre and the keys of Hades. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Pind. Isid. viii. 47, &c.) Aeacus had sanctuaries both at Athens and in Aegina (Paus. ii. 29. § 6; Hesych. s. v.; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. xiii. 155), and the Aeginetians regarded him as the tutelary deity of their island. (Pind. Nem. viii. 22.) [L. S.] ADEA (Aeida). I. A surname of Medea, derived from Aea, the country where her father Aetes ruled. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 113.)

2. A surname of Circe, the sister of Aethes. (Hom. Od. ix. 32; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 559; Virg. Aen. iii. 396.) Her son Telephus is likewise mentioned with this surname. (Aeaces, Propert. ii. 23. § 42.)

3. A surname of Calypso, who was believed to have inhabited a small island of the name of Aea in the straits between Italy and Sicily. (Pomp. Mela, ii. 7; Propert. iii. 10. 51.) [L. S.]

AEOANTIDES (Alaarrs). 1. The tyrant of Lampsacus, to whom Hippasus gave his daughter Archedice in marriage. (Thuc. vi. 59.)

2. A tragick poet of Alexandria, mentioned as one of the seven poets who formed the Tragic Patrol. He lived in the time of the second Ptolemy. (Schol. ad Mephecus. p. 22, 35, ed. Pau.)

AEBUTII GENIS, contained two families, the names of which are CARUS and ELVA. The former was plebian, the latter patrician; but the gens was originally patrician. Cornicis does not seem to have been a family-name, but only a surname given to Postumus Aebutius Elva, who was consul in n. c. 442. This gens was distinguished in the early ages, but from the time of the above-mentioned Aebutius Elva, no patrician member of it held any curule office till the praetorship of M. Aebutius Elva in n. c. 176.

It is doubtful to which of the family P. Aebutius belonged, who disclosed to the census the existence of the Buchaniaem at Rome, and was rewarded by the senate in consequence, n. c. 189. (Liv. xxxix. 9. 11. 19.)

AEDONIA (Aedonia), a female philosopher of the new Platonic school, lived in the fifth century after Christ at Alexandria. She was a relation of Socrates and the wife of Hermias, and was equally celebrated for her beauty and her virtues. After the death of her husband, she devoted herself to relieving the wants of the distressed and the education of her children. She accompanied the latter to Athens, where they went to study philosophy, and was received with great distinction by all the philosophers there, and especially by Proclus, to whom she had been betrothed by Socrates, when she was quite young. She lived to a considerable age, and her funeral oration was pronounced by Damaclus, who was then a young man, in hexameter verses. The names of her sons were Ammonius and Heliodorus. (Suidas, s. v.; Damaclus, ap. Porph. cod. 362, p. 341, b. c. 400.)

AEDONIS (Aidon). A Canopeian, called a Platonic or perhaps more correctly an Eclectic philosopher, who lived in the fourth century, the friend and most distinguished disciple of Iamblichus. After the death of his master the school of Syria was dispersed, and Aedonias fearing the real or fancied hostility of the Christian emperor Constantine to philosophy, took refuge in divination. An oracle in hexameter verse represented a pastoral life as his only retreat, but his disciples, perhaps calming his fears by a metaphoriel interpretation, compelled him to resume his instructions. He settled at Pergamus, where he numbered among his pupils the emperor Julian. After the accession of the latter to the imperial purple he invited Aedonias to continue his instructions, but the declining strength of the sage being unequal to the task, two of his most learned disciples, Chrysanthus and Euclides, took by his will the charge of supplying his place. (Eunap. Vitr. Aedonias.) [B. J.]

AEDON (Aidon). I. A daughter of Pandaleus of Rheus. According to Homer (Od. xix. 517, &c.) she was the wife of Zethus, king of Thebes, and the mother of Itylus. Envoys of Niobe, the wife of her brother Amphion, who had six sons and six daughters, she formed the plan of killing the eldest of Niobe's sons, but by mistake slew her own son Itylus. Zeus relieved her grief by changing her into a nightingale, whose melancholy tunes are represented by the poet as Aedon's lamentations about her child. (Compare Pherecydes, Phragm. p. 138, ed. Sturz; Apollod. iii. 5, § 5.) According to a later tradition preserved in Antoninus Liberalis (c. 11), Aedon was the wife of Polyeotechnus, an artist of Colophon, and boasted that she lived more happily with him than Hesia with Zeus. Here to revenge herself ordered Eris to induce Aedon to enter upon a contest with her husband. Polyeotechnus was then making a chair, and Aedon a piece of embroidery, and they agreed that whichever should finish the work first should receive from the other a female slave as the prize. When Aedon had conquered her husband, he went to her father, and pretending that his wife wished to see her sister Chelidonis, he took her with him. On his way home he ravished her, dressed her in slave's attire, enjoined her to observe the strictest silence, and gave her to his wife as the promised prize. After some time Chelidonis, believing herself unrecognized, lamented her own fate, but she was overheard by Aedon, and the two sisters conspired against Polyeotechnus and killed his son Iyas, whom they placed before him in a dish. Aedon fled with Chelidonis to her father, who, when Polytechnicus came in pursuit of his wife, had bound him, smeared with honey, and thus exposed him to the insects. Aeson now took pity upon the sufferings of her husband, and when her relations were on the point of killing her for this weakness, Zeus changed Polytechnicus into a pelican, the brother of Aetōs into a whooping heron into a sea-eagle, Chelidonis into a swallow, and Aétōs himself into a nightingale. This myth seems to have originated in more etymology, and is of the same class as that about Philomelus and Proene.

AETES or AEETA (Ἀέτης), a son of Helios and Persēs. (Apollod. i. 9; § 1; Hes. Theog. 957.) According to others his mother's name was Persē (Hygin. Fab. p. 14, ed. Stavoren), or Antiope. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 52.) He was a brother of Cirē, Pasiphēs, and Persēs. (Hygin. l. c.; Apollod. l. c.; Hom. Od. x. 156, &c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 18.) He was married to Idyia, a daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had two daughters, Medēia and Chalcippe, and one son, Abdyn (Hesiod. Theog. 599; Apollod. i. 9, 23.) He was King of Colchis at the time when Phrixus brought therewith the golden fleece. At one time he was expelled from his kingdom by his brother Persēs, but was restored by his daughter Medēia. (Apollod. i. 9, § 28.) Compare Abyrtus, Argonautae, Jason, and Medēia. [LS]

AETETAS, AETTIAS, and AETETE, are patronymic forms from Aeteēs, and are used by Roman poets to designate his daughter Medēia. (Ov. Met. vii. 9, 296, Heroid. vi. 103; Val. Flacc. viii. 233.)

AEGA (Ἀγα), according to Hyginus (Post. Astr. ii. 13) a daughter of Olenus, who was a descendant of Hephæstus. Aegā and her sister Helēe nursed the infant Zeus in Crete, and the former was afterwards changed by the god into the constellation called Capella. According to other traditions mentioned by Hyginus, Aegā was a daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, and was chosen to suckle the infant Zeus; but as she was found unable to do it, the service was performed by the goat Amalthéa. According to others, again, Aegā was a daughter of Helios and of such dazzling brightness, that the Titans in their attack upon Olympus became frightened and requested their mother Gaia to conceal her in the earth. She was accordingly confined in a cave in Crete, where she became the nurse of Zeus. In the fight with the Titans Zeus was commanded by an oracle to cover himself with her skin (uva). He obeyed the command and raised Aegā among the stars. Similar, though somewhat different accounts, were given by Enmerdus and others. (Transt. Cudat. 13; Antonin. Lib. 86; Lacant. Inst. i. 23, § 19.) It is clear that in some of these stories Aegā is regarded as a nymph, and in others as a goat, though the two ideas are not kept clearly distinct from each other. Her name is either connected with ãgw, which signifies a goat, or with ãgw, a gale of wind; and this circumstance has led some critics to consider the myth about her as made up of two distinct ones, one being of an astronomical nature and derived from the constellation Capella, the rise of which brings storms and tempests (Arat. Phaen. 150), and the other referring to the goat which was believed to have suckled the infant Zeus in Crete. (Compare Buttman in ldor's Ursprung und Besiedelung der Sternebenen, p. 303; Böttiger.

AEGAEON (Αἰγαῖος), a son of Uranus by Gea. Aegaeon and his brothers Gyges and Cottus are known under the name of the Uranids (Hes. Theog. 592, &c.), and are described as huge monsters with a hundred arms (ἀκραυγγοί) and fifty heads. (Apollod. i. 1, § 1; Hes. Theog. 140, &c.) Most writers mention the third Uranid under the name of Briareus instead of Aegaeon, which is explained in a passage of Homer (II. i. 403, &c.), who says that men called him Aegaeon, but the gods Briareus. On one occasion when the Olympian gods were about to put Zeus in chains, Thetis called in the assistance of Aegaeon, who compelled the gods to desist from their intention. (Hom. II. i. 398, &c.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 154, &c. 617, &c.), Aegaeon and his brothers were hated by Uranus from the time of their birth, in consequence of which they were concealed in the depth of the earth, where they remained until the Titans began their war against Zeus. On the advice of Gea Zeus delivered the Uranids from their prison, that they might assist him. He armed Aegaeon with a staff of brass and a hundred-headed giant composer the Titans by hurling at them three hundred rocks at once, and secured the victory to Zeus, who thrust the Titans into Tartarus and placed the Heonanthereis at its gates, or, according to others, in the depth of the ocean to guard them. (Hes. Theog. 617, &c. 815, &c.) According to a legend in Panannus (ii. 1, § 8, ii. 4, § 7), Briareus was chosen as arbitrator in the dispute between Poseidon and Helios, and adjudged the Isthmus to the former and the Aegaeorhitis to the latter. The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1165) represents Aegaeon as a son of Gea and Pontus and as living as a marine god in the Aegaean sea. Ovid (Met. ii. 10) and Philistimata (Vit. Apollon. iv. 6) likewise regard him as a marine god, while Virgil (Aen. x. 565) reckons him among the giants who formed Olympus, and Callimachus (Hygin. in Deld. 141, &c.) regarding him in the same list, places him under mount Aetna. The Scholiast on Theocritus (I. 465, i. 65) calls Briareus one of the Cyclops. The opinion which regards Aegaeon and his brothers as only personifications of the extraordinary powers of nature, such as are manifested in the violent commotions of the earth, as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and the like, seems to explain best the various accounts about them. [LS]

AEGAEUS (Αἰγαίος), a surname of Poseidon, derived from the town of Aegae in Euboea, near which he had a magnificent temple upon a hill. (Strab. ix. p. 405; Virg. Aen. iii. 74, where Servius erroneously derives the name from the Aegaeus sea.)

[LS]

AEGEBIDES (Αἰγαίβιδες), a patronymic from Aegaeus, and especially used to designate Thesaeus. (Hom. II. i. 265, Ov. Heroid. iv. 59, ii. 67, & compare AEGUS.)

[LS]

AEGERIA or EGERIA, one of the Camennia in Roman mythology, from whom, according to the legends of early Roman story, Numā received his instructions respecting the forms of worship which he introduced. (Liv. i. 19; Val. Max. i. 2, § 1.) The grove in which the king had his interviews with the goddess, and in which a well gushed forth from a dark recess, was dedicated by him to the Camennia. (Liv. i. 21.) The well legends, however, point out two distinct places sacred to Aegaeus, one near Aretia (Verg. Aen. vii. 761, &c.; Ovid. Fast. iii. 263, &c.; Strab. v. p. 239; Plut. Num. 4; Lactant. i. 22. § 1), and the other near the city of Rome at the Porta Capena, in the valley now called Capannela, where the sacred shield had fallen from heaven, and where Numia was likewise believed to have had interviews with his beloved (Plut. Num. 13; Juv. iii. 12). Ovid. (Met. xv. 431. &c.; compare Strab. l. c.) relates that, after the death of Numia, Aegaeus fled into the shady grove in the vale of Aretia, and there disturbed by her lamentations the worship of Diana which had been brought thither from Tauris by Orestes, or, according to others, by Hippolytus. Virgil (Aen. vii. 761) makes Hippolytus and Aegaeus the parents of Virbius, who was undoubtedly a native Italian hero. This is one of the most remarkable instances of the manner in which the worship of a Greek divinity or hero was engraven upon and combined with a purely Italian worship. Aegaeus was regarded as a prophetic divinity, and also as the giver of life, whose worship was invoked by pregnant women. (Pestus, s. v. Egeriae; compare Virgil, Aen. vii. 761, and enigmatic lines in Ovid. Met. iii. 93, et seq., Marburg, 1834; Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, ii. p. 203, &c., and 213, &c.) [L. S.]

AEIGESTUS. [Acestus.]

AEGEUS (Ἠγείς). 1. According to some accounts a son of Pandion II. king of Athens, and of Pylia, while others call him a son of Sceirius or Phenius, and state that he was only an adopted son of Pandion. (Paus. i. 5. § 3, &c.; Schol. ad Lycophr. 494; Apollod. iii. 15. § 5.) Pandion had been expelled from his kingdom by the Metionians, but Aegaeus in conjunction with his brothers, Pallas, Nysus, and Lycus restored him, and Aegaeus being the eldest of the brothers succeeded Pandion. Aegaeus first married Meta, a daughter of Hoples, and then Chalciope, the daughter of Rheoxenos, neither of whom bore him any children. (Paus. i. 14. § 6.) His father having died, he ascended the throne and, in order to conciliate her introduced her worship at Athens. (Paus. i. 14. § 6.) Afterwards he begot Theseus by Aetra at Troezen. (Plut. These. 3; Apollod. iii. 15. § 7; Hygin. Fab. 37.) When Theseus had grown up to manhood, and was informed of his descent, he went to Athens and defeated the fifty sons of his uncle Pallas, who claiming the kingly dignity of Athens, had made war upon Aegaeus and deposed him, and also wished to exclude Theseus from the succession. (Plut. These. 13.) Aegaeus was restored, but died soon after. His death is related in the following manner: When Theseus went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute it had to pay to Minos, he promised his father that on his return he would hoist white sails as a signal of his safety. On his approach to the coast of Attica he forgot his promise, and his father, who was watching on a rock on the seacoast, on perceiving the black sail, thought that his son had perished and threw himself into the sea, which according to some traditions received from this event the name of the Aegaean sea. (Plut. These. 22; Diod. iv. 61; Paus. i. 22. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 48; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 74.) Medea, who was believed to have spent some time at Athens on her return from Corinth to Colchis, is said to have become mother of a son, Medus, by Aegaeus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Hygin. Fab. 26.) Aegaeus was one of the eponymic heroes of Attica; and one of the Attic tribes (Aegaeis) derived its name from him. (Paus. i. 5. § 2.) His grave, called the heroum of Aegaeus, was believed to be at Athens (Paus. i. 22. § 5), and Phusialis mentions two statues of him, one at Athens and the other at Delphi, the latter of which had been made of the tithes of thebooty taken by the Athenians at Marathon. (Paus. i. 5. § 2, x. 10. § 1.)

2. The eponymic hero of the phyle called the Aegaeidae at Sparta, was a son of Oeypylus, and grandson of Theras, the founder of the colony in Them. (Herod. iv. 149.) All the Aegaeids were believed to be Cadmeans, who formed a settlement at Sparta previous to the Dorian conquest. There is only this difference in the accounts, that, according to some, Aegaeus was the leader of the Cadmean colonists at Sparta, while, according to Herodotus, they received their name of Aegaeids from the later Aegaeus, the son of Oeypylus. (Pind. Pyth. v. 101; Isth. vii. 10, &c., with the Schol.) There was at Sparta a heroum of Aegaeus. (Paus. iii. 5. § 2; compare Pind. Pyth. v. 101.)

AEGIALUS or AEGIALIAUS (Ἀεγιάλος or Ἀεγίάλης), a daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea, or of Aegialeus the son of Adrastus, whom she bears the surname of Aegiale. (Hom. Il. v. 412; Apollod. i. 8. § 6, 9. § 13.) She was married to Diomedes, who, on his return from Troy, found her living in adultery with Cometes. (Eustath. ad Il. v. p. 506.) The hero attributed this misfortune to the anger of Aphrodite, whom he had wounded in the war against Troy, but when Aegiale went so far as to threaten him, he fled to Italy. (Schol. ad Lycophr. 610; Ov. Met. xiv. 476, &c.) According to Dictys Cretensis (vi. 2), Aegiale, like Clytemnestra, had been seduced to her criminal conduct by a treacherous report, that Diomedes was returning with a Trojan woman who lived with him as his wife, and on his arrival at Aegiale expelled him. In Ovid (Ibis, 349) she is described as the type of a bad wife.

[A. S.]

AEGITALBUS (Ἀεγίτάλβος). 1. A son of Adrastus and Amphithea or Deamassus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13; Hygin. Fab. 71.) He was the only one among the Epigones that fell in the war against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 3; Paus. ix. 5. § 7; compare Adrastus.) He was worshipped as a hero at Peges in Megara, and it was believed that his body had been conveyed thither by Thes and been buried there. (Paus. i. 44. § 7.)

2. A son of Iacchus and the Oceanid Melia, from whom the part of Peloponnesus afterwards called Achaia derived its name of Aegialeia. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1.) According to a later tradition he was an autokrator, brother of Phoroneus and first king of Sicyon, to whom the foundation of the town of Aegialeia was ascribed. (Paus. ii. 5. § 5, vii. 1. § 1.)

AEIIDIUS, a Roman commander in Gaul under Niggerius. (A. n. 457—461.) After the death of the latter, he maintained an independent sovereignty in Gaul, and was elected by the Franks as their king, after they had banished Childeric. Four years afterwards, Childeric was restored; but Aedidius did not oppose his return, and he retained his influence in Gaul till his death. (Gregor. Tur. ii. 12.)
AEGIDI CHOS or AEKTOCHOS (Ἀχετός, or Ἀχυτός), a surname of Zeus, as the bearer of the Aegis with which he strikes terror into the impious and his enemies. (Hom. I. 1. 302, ii. 157, 375, &c.; Pind. Isth. iv. 99; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15.) Others derive the name from αἰχτός and δίκαιος, and take it as an allusion to Zeus being fed by a goat. (Speckh. Chon. Bedw. der alt. Lit. und Kunst, i. 87.) AEGI MUS, or AEGIMUS (Ἀγιόμους), one of the most ancient of the Greek physicians, who is said by Galen (De Differ. Puls. i. 2, iv. 2, 11. vol. viii. pp. 498, 716, 752) to have been the first person who wrote a treatise on the pulse. He was a native of Veia in Lucania, and is supposed to have lived before the time of Hippocrates, that is, in the fifth century before Christ. His work was entitled Πεπλαταία, De Pulitationibus, (a name which alone sufficiently indicates its antiquity,) and is not now in existence. Callimachus (ap. Athen. xiv. p. 643, c.) mentions an author named Aegimius, who wrote a work on the art of making cheesecakes (παλακωττοσκα ζυμαρίμμα), and Pliny mentions a person of the same name (H. N. xvi. 459), who is said to have lived two hundred years: but whether these are the same or different individuals is quite uncertain. [W. A. G.] AEGIMIUS (Ἀγιόμους), the mythical ancestor of the Dorie race, who is described as their king and lawgiver at the time when they were yet inhabiting the northern parts of Thessaly. (Pind. Pyth. i. 124, v. 96.) When involved in a war with the Lapithae, he called Hercules to his assistance, and promised him the third part of his territory, if he delivered him of his enemies. The Lapithae were conquered, but Hercules did not take for himself the territory promised to him by Aegimius, and left it in trust to the king who was to preserve it for the sons of Hercules. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 7; Diod. iv. 97.) Aegimius had two sons, Dymas and Pamphylias, who migrated to Peloponnesus, and were regarded as the ancestors of two branches of the Doric race (Dymans and Pamphylians), while the third branch derived its name from Hyllus (Hyleans), the son of Hercules, who had been adopted by Aegimius. (Apollod. ii. 8, § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 121.) Respecting the connexion between Aegimius and Hercules, see Müller, Dor. i. 35, &c.

There existed in antiquity an epic poem called "Aegimius," of which a few fragments are still extant, and which is sometimes ascribed to Hesiod and sometimes to Cercopes of Miletus. (Athen. xi. p. 503; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Aegimius.') The main subject of this poem appears to have been the war of Aegimius and Hercules against the Lapithae, (Calluck. Bibl. der alt. Lit. und Kunst, i. 87, &c.; Müller, Dor. i. 33, &c.; Wielcker, Der Epopee Cyclopes, p. 266, &c.) The fragments are collected in Dianger, Die Fragm. des epischen Poes. der Griech. bis zur Zeit Alexandr., p. 56, &c. [L. S.]

AEGI'NA. [ΑΕΓΙΝΗ.]

AEGINAEA (Αἰγίναια), a surname of Artemis, when she was worshipped at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 14, § 3.) It means either the hounds of chaos, or the wader of the jelliax (αιγινῆα). [L. S.]

AEGINETA, a modeller (σκύρος) mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40.) Scholars are now pretty well agreed, that Winekolden was mistaken in supposing that the word Aegineid in the passage of Pliny denoted merely the country of some artist, whose real name, for some reason or other, was not given. His brother Pasias, a painter of some distinction, was a pupil of Erigonus, who had been colour-grinder to the artist Neacles. We learn from Plutarch (Arat. 13.), that Neacles was a friend of Amatus of Sicyon, who was elected prætor of the Achaean league in 243 B.C. We are not to believe, therefore in assuming, that Aegineta and his brother flourished about Ol. cxx. b. c. 229. (K. O. Müller, Arch. der Künst, p. 151.)

AEGINETA PAULUS. [PAULUS AEGI- NE]TA. AEGI'CHOS. [ΑΕΓΙΟΧΟΣ.]

AEGIPAN (Αἰγιπάν), that is, Goat-Pan, was according to some statements a being distinct from Pan, while others regard him as identical with Pan. His story appears to be altogether of late origin. According to Hyginus (Pab. 155) he was the son of Zeus and a goat, or of Zeus and Aegn, the wife of Pan, and was transferred to the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 13, § 20.) Others again make Aegipan the father of Pan, and state that as well as his son he was represented as a goat and half fish. (Ermotost. Catell. 57.) When Zeus in his contest with the Titans was deprived of the sinews of his hands and feet, Hermes and Aegipan secretly restored them to him and fitted them in their proper places. (Apollod. i. 6, § 3; Hygin. Poet. Astr. i. c.) According to a Roman tradition mentioned by Plutarch (Parallels, 22), Aegipan had sprung from the incestuous intercourse of Valeria of Tuscum and her father Valerius, and was considered only a different name for Silvanus. (Comp. Pan, and Voss, Mythol. Briefe, i. p. 80, &c.)

AEGISTHUS (Αἰγίσθος), a son of Thyestes, who unwittingly begot him by his own daughter Pelopia. Immediately after his birth he was exposed by his mother, but was found and saved by shepherds and suckled by a goat, whence his name Aegisthus (from αἰγώ; Hygin. Phib. 87, 88; Aelian, V. H. xii. 49.) Subsequently he was searched after and found by Atreus, the brother of Thyestes, who had him educated as his own child, so that every body believed Aegisthus to be his son. In the night in which Pelopia had shared the bed of her father, she had taken from him his sword which she afterwards gave to Aegisthus. This sword became the means by which the incestuous intercourse between her and her father was discovered, whereupon she put an end to her own life. Atreus in his emity towards his brother sent Aegisthus to kill him; but the sword which Aegisthus carried was the cause of the recognition between Thyestes and his son, and the latter returned and slew his uncle Atreus, while he was offering a sacrifice on the sea-coast. Aegisthus and his father now took possession of their lawful inheritance from which they had been expelled by Atreus. (Hygin. L. c. and 252.) Homer appears to know nothing of all these tragic occurrences, and we learn from him only that, after the death of Thyestes, Aegisthus ruled as king at Mycenae and took no part in the Trojan expedition. (Od. iv. 518, &c.) While Agamemnon, the son of Atreus, was absent on his expedition against Troy, Aegisthus seduced Clytemnestra, the wife of Agamemnon, and was so wicked as to offer up thanks to the gods for the success with which his criminal exertions were crowned. (Hom. Od. iii. 263, &c.) In order not to be surprised by the return of Agamemnon, he sent out spies, and when Agamemnon came, Agamemnon invited him to a feast at which he had him treacherously murdered. (Hom. Od. iv. 524, &c.) Paus. ii. 16. 1. After this event, Agamemnon reigned seven years longer over Mycenae, until in the eighth Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, returned home and avenged the death of his father by putting the adulterer to death. (Hom. Od. i. 28, &c.; compare AGAMEMNON, CLYTEMNESTRA, ORSTEIS.)

[A. S.]

AEGLE (Ἀγγέλη). 1. The most beautiful of the Naides, daughter of Zeus and Neaera (Verg. Eclog. vi. 20), by whom Helios begot the Charites. (Paus. i. 55. § 1.)

2. A sister of Phaeton, and daughter of Helios and Clymene. (Hyg. Fab. 154, 156.) In her grief at the death of her brother she and her sisters were changed into poplars.

3. One of the Hesperides. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 494; comp. HESPERIDES.)

4. A nymph, daughter of Panopos, who was beloved by Theseus, and for whom he forsook Ariadne. (Plut. Thea. 20; Athen. xiii. p. 557.)

[A. S.]

ÆGLE (Ἀγγέλη), one of the daughters of Asclepius (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 40. § 31) by Lampetia, the daughter of the Sun, according to Hermippus (ap. Schol. in Aristoph. Plut. 701), or by Epione, according to Suidas. (s. v. Άγγέλη) She is said to have derived her name Aegle, "Brightness," or "Splendour," either from the beauty of the human body when in good health, or from the honour paid to the medical profession. (J. H. Melch. Comment. in Hippocr. "Iras," Leg. Bat. 1641, 4to. c. 6. § 7, p. 55.) [W. A. G.]

ÆGLEIS (Ἀγγέλεις), a daughter of Pandion, who had emigrated from Lacedaemon to Athens. During the siege of Athens by Minos, in the reign of Aegaeus, she together with her sisters Antheis, Lytaea, and Orthaea, were sacrificed on the tomb of Ganeus the Cyclops, for the purpose of averting a pestilence then raging at Athens. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 8.)

[A. S.]

ÆGES (Αγγης), a Samian athlete, who was dumb, recovered his voice when he made an effort on one occasion to express his indignation at an attempt to impose upon him in a public contest. (Gell. v. 9; Val. Max. i. 8, ext. 4.)

ÆGETTES (Ἀγητητας), that is, the radiant god, a surname of Apollo. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1750; Apoll. i. 9. § 26; Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

ÆGO'BOLUS (Ἀγγόβολος), the goat-killer, a surname of Dionysus, at Poinius in Boeotia. (Paus. i. 8. § 1.)

[A. S.]

ÆGO'CERUS (Ἀγγόκερος), a surname of Pan, descriptive of his figure with the horns of a goat, but is more commonly the name given to one of the signs of the Zodiac. (Lucan, i. 356; Lucret. v. 614; C. Caes. Germ. in Astr. 213.)

ÆGO'PHAGUS (Ἀγγόφαγος), the goat-eater, a surname of Hera, under which she was worshipped by the Lacedaemonians. (Paus. iii. 15. § 7; Hesych. and Etym. M. s. v.)

ÆGUS and ROSCELLUS, two chiefs of the Allobroges, who had served Caesar with great force during the Gallic war, and were treated by him with great distinction. They accompanied him in his campaigns against Pompey, but having been reproved by Caesar on account of depriving the cavalry of its pay and appropriating the booty to themselves, they deserted to Pompey in Greece. (Caes. Bell. Civ. iii. 59, 60.) Aegus was afterwards killed in an engagement between the cavalry of Caesar and Pompey. (iii. 84.)

AEGYPTUS (Ἀγυπτός), a son of Belus and Anthis, the priest of Air, and twin-brother of Danaus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; Tzet. ad Leophr. 382, 1155.) Euripides represented Cepheus and Phineus likewise as brothers of Aegyptus. Belus assigned to Danaus the sovereignty of Libya, and to Aegyptus he gave Arabia. The latter also subdued the country of the Melampodes, which he called Aegypt after his own name. Aegyptus by his several wives had fifty sons, and it happened that his brother Danaus had just as many daughters. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Hyg. Fab. 170.) Danaus had reason to fear the sons of his brother, and fled with his daughters to Argos in Peloponnesus. Thither he was followed by the sons of Aegyptus, who demanded his daughters for their wives and promised faithful alliance. Danaus complied with their request, and distributed his daughters among them, but to each of them he gave a dagger, with which they were to kill their husbands in the bridal night. All the sons of Aegyptus were thus murdered with the exception of Lynceus, who was saved by Hypermnestra. The Danaids buried the heads of their murdered husbands in Lerna, and their bodies outside the town, and were afterwards purified of their crime by Athena and Hermes at the command of Zeus. Pausanias (ii. 24. § 3), who saw the monument under which the heads of the sons of Aegyptus were believed to be buried, says that it stood on the way to Larissa, the citadel of Argos, and that their bodies were buried at Lerna. In Hyg. Fab. 169 the account is given of the interest taken by Jupiter in the rescue of him, Aegyptus formed the plan of murdering Danaus and his daughters in order to gain possession of his dominions. When Danaus was informed of this he fled with his daughters to Argos. Aegyptus then sent out his sons in pursuit of the fugitives, and enjoined them not to return unless they had slain Danaus. The sons of Aegyptus laid siege to Argos, and when Danaus saw that further resistance was useless, he put an end to the hostilities by giving to each of the besiegers one of his daughters. The murder of the sons of Aegyptus then took place in the bridal night. There was a tradition at Patrae in Achaea, according to which Aegyptus himself came to Greece, and died at Aroé with grief for the fate of his sons. The temple of Serapis at Patrae contained a monument of Aegyptus. (Paus. vii. 21. § 6.)

[Æ.]

ÆIMNESTUS (Ἀειμνήστος), a Spartan, who killed Mardonius in the battle of Platæa, b. c. 479, and afterwards fell himself in the Messenian war. (Herod. ix. 64.) The Spartan who killed Mardonius, Plutarch (Arist. 19) calls Arimnestus (Ἀριμνήστος).

ÆLIA GENHS, plebeian, of which the family-names and surnames are CATUS, GALLUS, GRACILIS, LAMIA, LIGNUS, PAETUS, STAIENUS, STILUS, TIBERIO. On coins this gens is also written Ælia, but Ælia seems to be a distinct gens. The only family-names and surnames of the Aelia gens which are used are Bola, Lamia, Paetus, and Scius. Of Bola nothing is known. Scius is the name of the favorite of Tiberius, who was adopted by one of the Aelii. (Ælian.) The first member of this gens, who obtained the consulship, was P. Aelius Paetus, in b. c. 337.
Under the empire the Aelian name became still more celebrated. It was the name of the emperor Hadrian, and consequently of the Antonines, whom he adopted.

It is doubtful to which family P. Aelius belonged who was one of the first plebeian questores, v. c. 409. (Liv. iv. 54.)

AELIANUS was together with Ammianus the leader of an inscription of Gallic peasants, called Bagaudae, in the reign of Diocletian. It was put down by the Caesar Maximianus Hercules. (Epit. x. 13; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 39.)

AELIANUS, CASPERIUS, prefect of the Praetorian guards under Domitian and Nerva. He excelled an inscription of the guards, Augamania Nerva, in order to obtain the punishment of some obnoxious persons, but was killed by Tranjan with his accomplices. (Dion Cass. liv. xiii. 3, 5.)

AELIANUS, CLAUDIUS (Kladosios Aeliana), was born according to Suidas (s. v. Aeliana) at Prunesto in Italy, and lived at Rome. He calls himself a Roman (V. H. xii. 25), as possessing the rights of Roman citizenship. He was particularly fond of the Greeks and of Greek literature and oratory. (V. H. ix. 52, xii. 25.)

He studied under Pausanias the rhetorician, and initiated the eloquence of Nicostorus and the style of Dion Chrysostem; but especially admired Herodes Atticus more than any other. He held rhetoric at Rome in the time of Hadrian, and hence was called δοσοφαντής. So complete was the command he acquired over the Greek language that he could speak as well as a native Athenian, and hence was called δοσοφαντής or δοσοφαντής. (Philost. V. VII. Sogd. ii. 31.) That rhetoric, however, was not his forte may easily be believed from the style of his works; and he appears to have given up teaching for writing. Suidas calls him Αρχιεπός (Pontifex). He lived to above sixty years of age, and had no children. He did not marry, because he would not have any. There are two considerable works of his remaining: one a collection of miscellaneous history (Ποιεῖν ιστορία) in fourteen books, commonly called his "Varia Historia," and the other a work on the peculiarities of animals (Ῥεχέλαι θηρίων) in seven books, commonly called his "De Animalium Natura." The former work contains short narrations and anecdotes, historical, biographical, antiquarian, &c., selected from various authors, generally without their names being given, and on a great variety of subjects. Its chief value arises from its containing many passages from works of older authors which are now lost. It is to be regretted that in selecting from Thucydides, Herodotus, and other writers, he has sometimes given himself the trouble of altering their language. But he tells us he liked to have his own way and to follow his own taste, and so he would seem to have altered for the mere sake of putting something different. The latter work is of the same kind, scrappy and gossiping. It is partly collected from older writers, and partly the result of his own observations both in Italy and abroad. According to Philostorus (in V. XII.) he was scarcely ever out of Italy; but he tells us himself that he travelled as far as Aegypt; and that he saw at Alexandria an ox with five feet. (De Anim. xi. 40; comp. xi. 11.) This book would appear to have become a popular and standard work on zoology, since in the fourteenth century Manuel Philos, a Byzantine poet, founded upon it a poem on animals. At the end of the work is a concluding chapter (ἐπιλογία), where he states the general principles on which he has composed his work:—that he has spent great labour, care, and thought in writing it;—that he has preferred the pursuit of knowledge to the pursuit of wealth; and that, for his part, he found much more pleasure in observing the habits of the lion, the panther, and the fox, in listening to the song of the nightingale, and in studying the migrations of cranes, than in mere heaping up riches and being numbered among the great:—that throughout his work he has sought to adhere to the truth. Nothing can be imagined more deficient in arrangement than this work: he goes from one subject to another and makes no attempt at the least link of a connected treatise. (De Anim. xi. 16), from the liver of mice (ii. 56) to the uses of oxen (ii. 57). But this absence of arrangement, treating things ποικίλα ποικίλας, he says, is intentional; he adopted this plan to give variety to the work, and to avoid tedium to the reader. His style, which he commends to the indulgence of critics, though free from any great faults, has no particular merit. The similarity of plan in the two works, with other internal evidences, seems to show that he were both written by the same Aelian, and not, as Voss and Välekmeé conjecture, by two different persons.

In both works he seems desirous to inculcate moral and religious principles (see V. H. vii. 44; De Anim. vi. 2, vii. 10, 11, ix. 7, and Epiol); and he wrote some treatises expressly on philosophical and religious subjects, especially one on Providence (Πειρείας) in three books (Suidas, s. v. "Aeliasantos," and one on the Divine Manifestations (Πειρείας Θεών Ἐφεργον), directed against the Epicureans, whom he alludes to elsewhere. (De Anim. vii. 44.) There are also attributed to Aelian twenty letters on husbandry and such-like matters (Ἀργονεικα ἐπιστολα), which are by feigned characters, are written in a rhetorical unreal style, and are of no value. The first edition of all his works was by Conrad Gesner, 1556, fol., containing also the works of Herodides, Polen, Adamantius and Melampus. The "Varia Historia" was first edited by Camillus Persinus, Rome, 1545, 4to; the principal editions since are by Perizonius, Leyden, 1701, 8vo, by Gronovius, Leyden, 1731, 2 vols. 4to, and by Kühn, Leipzig, 1789, 2 vols. 8vo. The De Animalium Natura was edited by Gronovius, Lond. 1744, 2 vols. 4to, and by J. G. Schneider, Leipzig, 1784, 2 vols. 8vo. The last edition is that by Fr. Jacobs, Jena, 1832, 2 vols. 8vo. This contains the valuable materials which Schneider had collected and left for a new edition. The Letters were published apart from the other works by Aldus Manutius in his "Collectio Epistoliarum Graecarum," Venice, 1499, 4to.

The Varia Historia has been translated into Latin by C. Gesner, and into English by A. Fleming, Lond. 1575, and by Stanley, 1665; this last has been reprinted more than once. The De Animalium Natura has been translated into Latin by Peter Gillius (a Frenchman) and by Conrad Gesner. It does not appear to have been translated into English. There has also been attributed to Aelian a work called Κατηγορία τοῦ θηρίου, an attack on an effeminate man, probably meant for Elagabalus. (Suidas, s. v. "Aelias") [A. A.]
AELIANUS, LUCIUS, one of the thirty tyrants (A.D. 259-268) under the Roman empire. He assumed the purple in Gaul after the death of Postumus, and was killed by his own soldiers, because he would not allow them to plunder Moguntiacum. Trebellius Pollio and others call him Lollianus; Eckhel (Doct. Num. vii. p. 448) thinks, that his true name was Lactalius; but there seems less authority in favour of L. Aelianus. (Eratop. ix. 7; Trebell. Pol. Twg. Tyr. 4; Aurel. Vict. de Cæs. 33, Epit. 32.)

AELIANUS MECCITIUS, an ancient physician, who must have lived in the second century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Galen (De Theriaca ad Pamphil. init. vol. iv. p. 299) as the oldest of his tutors. His father is supposed to have also been a physician, as Aelianus is said by Galen (De Dissec. Muscul. c. 1. p. 2. ed. Dietz) to have made an epitome of his father's anatomical writings. Galen speaks of that part of his work which treated of the Dissection of the Muscles as being held in some repute in his time (ibid.), and he always mentions his tutor with respect. (Ibid. c. 7, 22, pp. 11, 57.) During the prevalence of an epidemic in Italy, Aelianus is said by Galen (De Theriaca ad Pamphil. ibid.) to have used the Theriac (Dist. of Ant. act. Ther. iva) with great success, both as a means of cure and also as a preservative against the disease. He must have been a person of some celebrity, as this same anecdote is mentioned by the Ambic Historiam Abi, u. Panay (Histor. Compend. Dynast. p. 77), with exactly the same circumstances except that he makes the epidemic to have broken out at Antioch instead of in Italy. None of his works (as far as the writer is aware) are now extant.

AELIANUS, PLAUTIUS, offered up the prayer as pontifex, when the first stone of the new Capitol was laid in A.D. 71. (Thea. Hist. iv. 53.) We learn from an inscription (Gruter, p. 453; Orelli, n. 750), that his full name was Q. Plautius Silvanus Aelianus, that he held many important military commands, and that he was twice consul. His first consulship was in A.D. 47; the date of his second is unknown.

AELIANUS TACTICUS (Ἀελιανὸς Ταξιτικός) was most probably a Greek, but not the same as Claudius Aelianus. He lived in Rome and wrote a work in fifty-three chapters on the Military Tactics of the Greeks (Πείγες Στρατηγικῆς Τάξεως Ἐλληνικῆς), which he dedicated to the emperor Hadrian. He also gives a brief account of the constitution of a Roman army at that time. The work contains both laws (Δοκιμαί), from a conversation he had with the emperor Nero at Frontina's house at Formiae. He promises a work on Naval Tactics also; but this, if it was written, is lost. The first edition of the Tactics (a very bad one) was published in 1592; the next, much better, was by Franciscus Robertellus, Venice, 1552, 4to., which contains a new Latin version by the editor, and is illustrated with many cuts. The best edition is that printed by Elzevir at Leyden, 1613. It is usually found bound up with Leo's Tactics. [Lzo.]

It was translated into Latin first by Theodorus of Thessalonica. This translation was published at Rome, 1407, together with Vegetius, Frontinus, and Modestus. It is printed also in Robertellus's edition, which therefore contains two Latin versions. It has been translated into English by Capt. John Bingham, Lond. 1616, fol., and by Lord Dillon, 1614, 4to. AELIUS PROMOTUS (Ἀελίου Προμώτος), an ancient physician of Alexandria, of whose personal history no particulars are known, and whose date is uncertain. He is supposed by Villeiison (Anecd. Gracc. vol. ii. p. 175, note 1) to have lived after the time of Pompey the Great, that is, in the first century before Christ; by others he is considered to be much more ancient; and by Choulant (Handbuch der Bayerischen für die Ältere Medicin, Ed. 2. Leipzig, 1846, 5vo.), on the other hand, he is placed as late as the second half of the first century after Christ. He is most probably the same person who is quoted by Galen (De Compo. Medic., second. Locius, iv. 7; vol. xiii. p. 739) simply by the name of Aelius. He wrote several Greek medical works, which are still to be found in manuscripts in different libraries in Europe, but of which none (as far as the writer is aware) have ever been published, though Kühn intended his works to have been included in his collection of Greek medical writers. Some extracts from one of his works entitled Διαμεισφρ. * Medicinalium Formularum Collectio, are inserted by C. G. Kühn in his Adiabam. el Nels. Med. Vol. a J. A. Fabricio in "ibid. Gr." Exlib., and by Bonn in his Tractatus de Scurod, Verona, 1781, 4to. Two of his other works are quoted or mentioned by Hieron. Mercurialis in his Varia Elucidat, l. 4, and his work De Venen et Morbis Venenosis, l. 16, ii. 2, and also by Schneider in his Prefaces to Nicander's Theriac, p. xli, and to Alecrpharama, p. xix. [W. AELO. [HARPYRIA.]

AELOPUS (Ἀελόπους), a surname of Iris, the messenger of the gods, by which she is described as swift-footed like a storm-wind. Homer uses the form Δελφός. [Hl. viii. 409.] [L. S.]

AELIUS. [THEODORUS.] AELIUS. [THEODORUS.]

AEMILIA. 1. A vestal virgin, who, when the sacred fire was extinguished on one occasion, prayed to the goddess for her assistance, and miraculously rekindled it by throwing a piece of her garment upon the extinct embers. (Dionys. l. 69; Vol. Max. l. 1. § 67.)

2. The third daughter of L. Aemilius Paulus, who, when the battle of Cannae, was the wife of Scipio Africanus I. and the mother of the celebrated Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi. She was of a mild disposition, and long survived her husband. Her property, which was large, was inherited by her grandson by adoption, Scipio Africans II., who gave it to his own mother Papiria, who had been divorced by his own father L. Aemilius.

* Διαμεισφρ. is a word used by the later Greek writers, and is explained by Du Cange (Gloss. Med. et Infin. Graec.) to mean εἰς, virtues. It is however frequently used in the sense given to it in the text. See Leo, Specul. Med. iv. l. 11. ap. Ermercin. Anecd. Med. Graec. pp. 153, 157.
AEMILIANUS.

(Polyb. xxxii. 12; Dio. Exc. xxxi.; Val. Max. vi. 7. 1; Plut. Aem. 2; Liv. xixii. 57.)

3. The third daughter of L. Aemilius Paullus Macedonianus was a little girl when her father was appointed consul a second time to conduct the war against Perseus. Upon returning home after his election he found her in tears, and upon inquiring the reason she told him that Perseus had died, which was the name of her dog; whereupon he exclaimed "I accept the omen," and regarded it as a pledge of his success in the war. (Cic. de Div. i. 46, ii. 40; Plut. Aem. 10.)

4. Aemilia Lepida. [LEPIDA.]

5. A vestal virgin, who was put to death b.c. 114 for having committed incest upon several occasions. She induced two of the other vestal virgins, Marcia and Licinia, to commit the same crime, but these two were acquitted by the pontifices, when Aemilia was condemned, but were subsequently condemned by the praetor L. Cassius. (Plut. Quest. Rom. p. 264; Liv. Epit. 63; Orosius, v. 15; Ascon. in Cle. Mit. p. 46, ed. Orell.; AEMILIA GENUS, originally written AEMILIA, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome. Its origin is referred to the time of Numa, and it is said to have been descended from Mucerius, who received the name of Aemilius on account of the persuasiveness of his language (σ' αἰμοπλυν λόγοι). This Mucerius is represented by some as the son of Pythagoras, and by others as the son of Numa, while a third account traces his origin to Ascanius, who had two sons, Julius and Aemules. (Plut. Aemil. 2, Num. 3, 21; Festus, s. v. Aemul.) Aemulus is also mentioned as one of the ancestors of the Aemilii. (Sili. Ital. viii. 297.) It seems pretty clear that the Aemilii were of Sabine origin; and Festus derives the name Mucerius from the Ocean, Mamers in that language being the same as Mars. The Sabines spoke Ocean. Since then the Aemilii were supposed to have come to Rome in the time of Numa, and Numa was said to have been intimate with Pythagoras, we can see the origin of the legend which makes the ancestor of the house the son of Pythagoras. The first member of the house who obtained the consulship was L. Aemilius Maceratus, in B.C. 484. The family-names of these gens are: BURBA, BUCA, LEPIDUS, MAMERCIUS or MAMERCIUS, PAPPUS, PAULUS, RIGILLUS, SCABRUS. Of these names Buca, Lepidus, Paulus, and Scabrus are the only ones that occur on coins.

AEMILIA'NUS. 1. The son of L. Aemilius Paullus Macedonicus, was adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and was thus called P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilius Africanus. [SCIP].

2. The governor of Pannonia and Moesia in the reign of Gallus. He is also called Aemilius; and on coins we find his praenomen both Marcus and Caius. On one coin he is called C. Julius Aemilius Gallus; but there is some doubt about the genuineness of the word Julius. (Eckhel, viii. p. 572.) He was born in Mauritania about A.D. 206. He defeated the barbarians who had invaded his province, and chased them as far as the Danube, A.D. 253. He distributed among his soldiers the booty he had gained, and was salute emperor by them. He then marched into Italy, but Gallus, who had advanced to meet him, was slain at Interamna to gether with his son Volusianus by his own soldiers. Aemilius was acknowledged by the senate, but was slain after a reign of three or four months by his soldiers near Spoleto, on the approach of Valerianus. According to other accounts he died a natural death. (Zosimus, i. 29, 39; Zonaras, xii. 21, 22; Zatrop. ix. 5; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 31, Epit. 31.)

AEneas.

3. Of the thirty tyrants (A.D. 259—268) was compelled by the troops in Egypt to assume the purple. He took the surname of Alexander or Alexandrinus. Gallienus sent Theodotus against him, by whom he was taken and sent prisoner to Gallienus. Aemilius was strangled in prison. (Trebell. Pol. Tri. Tyr. 22, Gallien. 4, 5.)

AEMILIA'NUS (who is also called Aemilius) lived in the fifth century after Christ, and is known as a physician, confessor, and martyr. In the reign of the Vandal King Hunneric (A.D. 477—484), during the Arian persecution in Africa, he was most cruelly put to death. The Roman church celebrates his memory on the sixth of December, the Greek church on the seventh. (Marcyp. Rom. ed. Baron.; Victor Vitensis, De Pers. Sac. Valad. v. 1, with Rainet's notes, Paris. 8vo. 1834; Boissius, Nomenclator Scriptorum Pro professos Medici.) [W. A. G.]

AEMILIA'NUS (Alamanoa), a native of the town of Nicosia, and an epigrammatic poet. Nothing further is known about him. Three of his epigrams have been preserved. (Anthol. Graec. vii. 623, i. 218, 756.)

[A. P. M.] AEMILII ASPER. [ASPER.] AEMILII MACER. [MACER.] AEMILII MAGNUS ARBOLIU. [ARBOLIU.] AEMILII PAGENSIUS. [PAGENSIUS.] AEMILII PAPINIA NUS. [PAPINIANUS.] AEMILII PARTHENIANUS. [PARTHENIANUS.] AEMILII PROBUS. [NEPOS, CORNE LIUS.] AEMILII SURA. [SURA.] AENEFADES (Alaides), a patronymic from Aeneas, and applied as a surname to those who were believed to be descended from him, such as Ascanius, Augustus, and the Romans in general. (Virg. Aen. ix. 653; Ov. Ex.Pont. i. 35; Met. xv. 682, 695.)

[A. L. S.] AENEAS (Alaides). Homeric Story. Aeneas was the son of Anchises and Aphrodite, and born on mount Ida. On his father's side he was a grandson of Tros, and thus nearly related to the royal house of Troy, as Priam himself was a grandson of Tros. (Horn. II. xx. 215, &c., ii. 629, v. 247, &c., Hes. Thes. 1067, &c.) He was educated from his infancy at Dardanus, in the house of Aethocles, the husband of his sister. (II.
At the beginning of the war of the Greeks against Troy he did not take any part in it, and the poet intimates that there existed an ill feeling between him and Priam, who did not pay sufficient honour to Aeneas. (I. xii. 460, &c., xx. 181.) This probably arose from a decree of destiny, according to which Aeneas and his descendants were to be boiled in the blood of Priam, who had drawn upon himself the hatred of Cronion. (I. xx. 307.) One day when Aeneas was tendng his flocks on mount Ida, he was attacked by Achilles, who took his cattle and put him to flight. But he was rescued by the gods. This event, however, and the adoration of Apollo, aroused his spirit, and he led his Dardanians against the Greeks. (I. xx. 39, &c., 190, &c., ii. 819, &c.) Henceforth he and Hector are the great bulwarks of the Trojans against the Greeks, and Aeneas appears beloved and honored by gods and men. (I. xi. 58, xvi. 619, v. 190, 457, vi. 77, &c.) He is among the Trojans what Achilles is among the Greeks. Both are sons of immortal mothers, both are at feud with the gods, and both are the protectors of divine omen. (I. iv. 265, &c.) Achilles himself, to whom Hector owns his inferiority, thinks Aeneas a worthy competitor. (I. xx. 175.) The place where Aeneas occupies among the Trojans is well expressed in Philostratus (Her. 13), who says that the Greeks called Hector the hand, and Aeneas the soul of the Trojans. Respecting the brave and noble manner in which he protects the body of his friend Pandarus, see I. v. 299. On one occasion he was engaged in a contest with Diomedes, who hurled a mighty stone at him and broke his hip. Aeneas fell to the ground, and Aphrodite hastened to his assistance (I. v. 303), and when she too was wounded, Apollo carried him from the field of battle to his temple, where he was cured by Leto and Artemis. (I. v. 346, &c.) In the attack of the Trojans upon the wall of the Greeks, Aeneas commanded the fourth host of the Trojans. (I. xii. 98.) He avenged the death of Alcethous by slaying Oenomaus and Aphaerus, and hastened to the assistance of Hector, who was thrown on the ground by Ajax. The last feat Homer mentions in his fight with Achilles. On this as on all other occasions, a god interposed and saved him, and this time it was by Poseidon, who although in general hostile towards the Trojans, yet rescued Aeneas, that the decrees of destiny might be fulfilled, and Aeneas and his offspring might one day rule over Troy. (I. xx. 178, &c., 305, &c.) Thus far only is the story of Aeneas to be gathered from the Homeric poems, and far from alluding to Aeneas having emigrated after the capture of Troy, he having founded a new kingdom in a foreign land, the poet distinctly intimates that he conceives Aeneas and his descendants as reigning at Troy after the extinction of the house of Priam. (Comp. Strab. xiii. p. 608.)

_Later Stories._ According to the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite (257, &c.), Aeneas was brought up by the nymphs of mount Ida, and was not taken to his father Anchises, until he had reached his fifth year, and then he was, according to the wish of the goddess, given out as the son of a nymph. Xenophon (De Venat. 1. § 15) says, that he was instructed by Cleon, the usual teacher of the heroes. According to the "Cypris," he even took part in carrying off Helen. His bravery in the war against the Greeks is mentioned in the later traditions as well as in the earlier ones. (Hygin. Fab. 118; Philostr. l. c.) According to some accounts Aeneas was not present when Troy was taken, as he had been sent by Priam on an expedition to Phrygia, while according to others he was requested by Aphrodite, just before the fall of the city, to leave it, and accordingly went to mount Ida, carrying his father and his attendants. (Dion. Hal. l. c. 48.) A third account makes him hold out at Troy to the last, and when all hopes disappeared, Aeneas with his Dardanians and the warriors of Ophrymon withdrew to the citadel of Pergamus, where the most costly treasures of the Trojans were kept. Here he repelled the enemy and received the fugitive Trojans, until he could hold out no longer. He then sent the people ahead to mount Ida, and followed them with his warriors, the images of the gods, his father, his wife, and his children, hoping that he would be able to maintain himself on the heights of mount Ida. But being threatened with an attack by the Greeks, he abandoned his post, the Trojans withdrawing in sequence of which he surrendered his position and was allowed to depart in safety with his friends and treasures. (Dionys. l. c. 46, &c.; Aelian, V. H. iii. 22; Hygin. Fab. 254.) Others again related that he was led by his hatred of Paris to betray him to the Greeks, and was allowed to depart free and safe in consequence. (Dionys. l. c.) Livy (i. 1) states, that Aeneas and Antenor were the only Trojans against whom the Greeks did not make use of their right of conquest, on account of an ancient connexion of hospitality existing between them, or because Aeneas had always advised his countrymen to restore Helen to Menelaus. (Comp. Strab. l. c.)

The further parts of the story of Aeneas, after leaving mount Ida with his friends and the images of the gods, especially that of Pallus (Palladius, Paus, ii. 25, § 8) presents as many variations as that relating to the taking of Troy. All accounts, however, agree in stating that he left the coasts of Asia and crossed over into Europe. According to some he went across the Hellespont to the peninsula of Pallone and died there; according to others he proceeded from Thrace to the Arcadian Orchomenos and settled there. (Strab. l. c.; Paus. viii. 12. § 8; Dionys. Hal. i. 49.) By far the greater number of later writers, however, anxious to put him in connexion with the history of Latium and to make him the ancestral hero of the Romans, state that he went to Italy, though some assert that the Aeneas who came to Italy was not the son of Anchises and Aphrodite, and others that after his arrival in Italy he made a war against the Trojans, leaving his son Ascanius behind him. (Livyophr. 1292, &c.; Dionys. l. i. 53; Liv. i. 1.) A description of the wanderings of Aeneas before he reached the coast of Latium, and of the various towns and temples he was believed to have founded during his wanderings, is given by Dionysius (i. 50, &c.), whose account is on the whole the same as that followed by Virgil in his Aeneid, although the latter makes various embellishments and additions, some of which, as his landing at Carthage and meeting with Dido, are irreconcilable with chronology. From Pallone (Thrace), where Aeneas stayed the winter after the taking of Troy, and founded the town of Aenea on the Thermaic gulf (Liv. xi. 4), he sailed with his companions to Delos, Cythera (where he founded a temple of
AENEAS.

Aphrodite, Boias in Laconia (where he built a Temple of Aphrodite), Lacedaemon, Athens, and to Dodona, where he met the Trojan Helenus. From Ephesus he sailed across the Iapygian sea to Italy, where he landed at the Iapygian promontory. Hence he crossed over to Sicily, where he met the Trojans, Elymus and Aegaeus (Acestes), and built the towns of Elymus and Aegaeus. From Sicily he sailed back to Italy, landed in the port of Palaerius, came to the island of Lascasia, and at last to the coast of Latium. Various signs pointed out this place as the end of his wanderings, and he and his Trojans accordingly settled in Latium. The place where they had landed was called Troy. Latins, king of the Abochigmes, when informed of the arrival of the strangers, prepared for war, but afterwards concluded an alliance with them, gave up to them a part of his dominions, and with their assistance conquered the Rutulians, with whom he was then at war. Their dominions were called after Latinus, the daughter of Latinus, whom he married. A new war then followed between Latinus and Turnus, in which both chiefs fell, whereupon Aeneas became sole ruler of the Abochigmes and Trojans, and both nations united into one. Soon after this, however, Aeneas fell in battle with the Rutulians, who were assisted by the Etruscans, king of the Etruscans. As his body was not found after the battle, it was believed that it had been carried up to heaven, or that he had perished in the river Numicus. The Latins erected a monument to him, with the inscription "To the father and native god." (JovJ. L. F. B., Liv. i. 2; Dionys. i. 64; Strab. v. 229, xxii. p. 595; Ov. Met. xii. 326, &c., xiv. 73, &c.; xvi. 438, &c.; Com. Norat. 46; Plut. Rom. 3.) Two other accounts somewhat different from those mentioned above are preserved in Servius (ad Aen. ix. 264, from the work of Abas on Troy), and in Tzetzes (ad Lykor. 1252). Dionysius places the landing of Aeneas in Italy and the building of Lavinium about the end of the second year after the taking of Troy, and the death of Aeneas in the seventh year. Virgil on the other hand represents Aeneas landing in Italy seven years after the fall of Troy, and comprises all the events in Italy from the landing to the death of Turnus within the space of twenty days. The story about the descent of the Romans from the Trojans through Aeneas was generally received and believed at Rome at an early period, and probably arose from the fact, that the inhabitants of Lacedaemon fled to the towns where Aeneas was said to have founded, lay in countries inhabited by people who were all of the same stock—Peloponnesians: hence also the worship of the Idaean Aphrodite in all places the foundation of which is ascribed to Aeneas. Aeneas himself, therefore, such as he appears in his wanderings and final settlement in Latium, is nothing else but the personified idea of one common origin. In this character he was worshipped in the various places which traced their origin to him. (Liv. xl. 4.) Aeneas was frequently represented in statues and paintings by ancient artists. (Paus. ii. 21. 3, 2 v. 22. 2, 2; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. 36.) On gems and coins he is usually represented as carrying his father on his shoulder, and leading his son Ascanius by the hand.

AENEAS (Avelae GAZAREUS, so called from his birth-place, flourished a. d. 487. He was at first a Phatonist and a Sophist, being a disciple of the philosopher Hierocles (as appears from his Theophrastus, Galland, p. 629) and a friend of Proclus (as we know from his Epistles). His date thus ascertained is confirmed by his stating, that he had heard speak some of the Cosmographers whose tongues Humaric had cut out, a. d. 484. (Ibid. p. 663, c.) When a Christian, he composed a dialogue, On the Immortality of the Soul and the Resurrection of the Body, called Theophrastus from one of the interlocutors. This appeared first in a Latin version by Ambrosius Cumululentensis, 8vo., Ven. 1513, and 4to. Basil. 1516. The original Greek, with the Latin version of Wolf, fol. AENEAS SILVIUS, son of Silvius, and grandson of Ascanius. He is the third in the list of the mythical kings of Alba in Latium, and the Silvii regarded him as the founder of their house. (Liv. i. 3.) Dionysius (i. 71) ascribes to him a reign of 31 years. (Comp. Virg. Aen. vi. 769.) Ovid (Met. xiv. 610, &c.) does not mention him among the Alban kings. [L. S.]

AENEAS (Avelaeus), surnamed TACTICUS (Tacticaus), a Greek writer, whose precise date is not known. Xenophon (Mem. vii. 3. 6) mentions an Aeneas of Spharana. We know at the time of Malon (302, &c.) distinguished himself by his bravery and skill as general of the Arcadian. Casabianca supposes this Aeneas to be the same, and the supposition is confirmed by a passage (Comment. Ptol.) 27 where he speaks familiarly of an Arcadian provincialism. But, however this may be, the general character of this work, the names he mentions, and the historical notices which occur, with other internal evidence, all point to about this period. He wrote a large work on the whole art of war, στρατιτικη βιβλια, ος τον στρατηγικων οπομοιωμα, (Polyb. x. 40; Suidas, s. u. Avelaeus), consisting of several parts. Of these only one is preserved, called τοια η θεομα και πολεμικων υπομοιωμα των χρη υπομονων ειναι, commonly called Commentarius Poliorcopitius. The object of the book. is to show how a siege should be resisted, the various kinds of instruments to be used, maneuvers to be practised, ways of sending letters without being detected, and without even the bearers knowing about it (c. 31, a very curious one), &c. It contains a good deal of information on many points in archaology, and is especially valuable as containing a large stock of words and technical terms connected with warfare, denoting instruments, &c., which are not to be found in any other work. From the same circumstance, many passages are difficult.

The book was first discovered by Simler in the Vatican Library. It was edited first by Isaac Casaubon with a Latin version and notes, and appended to his edition of Polybius. (Paris, 1609.) It was republished by Gronovius in his Polybius, vol. iii. Amsterdam, 1670, and by Ernesti, Leipzig, 1763. The last edition is that of J. C. Orelli, Leipzig, 1818, with Casaubon's version and notes and an original commentary, published as a supplement to Schweighauser's Polybius. Besides the Vatican MS. there are three at Paris, on which Casaubon founded his edition, and one in the Laurentian library at Florence. This last is, according to Orelli (Præf. p. 6), the oldest of all. The work contains many very corrupt and mutilated passages.

An epitome of the whole book, not of the fragment now remaining, was made by Chenas, a Thezalix, who was sent to Rome by Pyrrhus, 279, n. c. (Adlian, Test. 1.) This abridgment is referred to by Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 26). [A. A.]

AENÉIUS or AENÉIUS (Ἀενέας or Ἀενέας), a surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped in the island of Cephalonia, where he had a temple on mount Aenos. (Hist. ap. Schol. ad Apollon. Ried. ii. 297.) [L. S.]

AENESIDEMUS (Ἀενεσίδημος), the son of Pataicus, and one of the body-guards of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, was the son of Theron, the ruler of Agrigentum, in the time of the Persian war. (Herod. vii. 134, 163.) [Thor.] AENESIDEMUS (Ἀενεσίδημος), a celebrated sculptor, born at Agrigentum in Crete, according to Diogenes Laertius (ix. 116), but at Aegae, according to Photius (Cod. 212), probably lived a little later than Cicero. He was a pupil of Heliodorics and received from him the chair of philosophy, which had been handed down for above three hundred years from Pyrrhus, the founder of the sect. For a full account of the sceptical system see PYRRHON. As Aenesidemus differed on many points from the ordinary sceptic, it will be convenient before proceeding to his particular opinions, to give a short account of the system itself.

The sceptic began and ended in universal doubt. He was equally removed from the academic, who denied, as from the dogmatic philosopher who affirmed; indeed, he attempted to confound both in one, and refute them by the same arguments. (Sext. Emp. i. 1.) Truth, he said, was not to be desired for its own sake, but for the sake of a certain repose of mind (ἐραπατία) which followed on it, an end which the sceptic best attained in another way, by suspending his judgment (ἐρατίσῃς), and allowing himself literally to rest in doubt. (i. 4.) With this view he must travel over the whole range of moral, metaphysical, and physical science. His method is the comparison of opposites, and his sole aim to prove that nothing can be proved, or what he termed, the ἐνθαλέσθνη of things. In common life he may act upon φαινεμεν with the rest of men: nature, law, and custom are allowed to have their influence; only when impelled to any vehement effort we are to remember that, here too, there is much to be said on both sides, and are not to lose our peace of mind by grasping at a shadow.

The famous πεπρωσε of the sceptics were a number of heads of argument intended to overthrow truth in whatever form it might appear. [PYRRHON.] The opposite appearances of the moral and natural world (Sext. Emp. i. 14), the illusoriness of intellect and sense, and the illusions produced by errors of observation and perception, and by every change of position, were the first arguments by which they assailed the reality of things. We cannot explain what man is, we cannot explain what the senses are: still less do we know the way in which they are acted upon by the mind (ii. 4—7): beginning with οὐδὲν ὄρθις, we must end with οὐδὲν μᾶλλον. We are not certain whether material objects are anything but ideas in the mind: at any rate the different qualities which we perceive in them may be wholly dependent on the percipient being; or, supposing them to contain quality as well as substance, it may be one quality varying with the perceptive power of the different senses. (ii. 14.) Having thus confounded the world without and the world within, it was a natural transition for the sceptic to confound physical and metaphysical arguments. The reasonings of natural philosophy were overthrown by metaphysical subtleties, and metaphysics made to look absurd by illustrations only applicable to material things. The acknowledged imperfection of language was also pressed into the service; words, they said, were ever varying in their signification, so that the ideas of which they were the signs must be alike variable. The leading idea of the whole system was, that all truth involved either a vicious circle or a petitio principii, for, even in the simplest truths, something must be assumed to make the reasoning applicable. The truth of the senses was known to come from the intellect, but the intellect operated through the senses, so that our knowledge of the nature of either depends upon the other. There was, however, a deeper side to this philosophy. Everything we know, confessedly, runs up into something we do not know: of the true nature of cause and effect we are ignorant, and hence to the favourite method, ἄριστα τῶν ἐκ τερίων ῥωμαλλόντων, or arguing backward from cause to cause, to the very imperfection of human faculties prevents our giving an answer. We must know what we believe; and how can we be sure of secondary causes, if the first cause be wholly beyond us? To judge, however, from the sketch of Sextus Empiricus (Pyrrh. Hyp.), it was not this side of their system which the sceptics chiefly urged: for the most part, it must be confessed, that they contented themselves with dialectic subtleties, which were at once too absurd for refutation, and impossible to refute.

The causes of scepticism are more fully given under the article PYRRHON. One of the most remarkable of its features was its connexion with the later philosophy of the Ionian school. From the failure of their attempts to explain the phenomena of the visible world, the Ionian philosophers were insensibly led on to deny the order and harmony of creation: they saw nothing but a perpetual and ever-changing chaos, acted upon, or rather self-acting, by an inherent power of motion, of which the nature was only known by its effects. This was the doctrine of Hermeletus, that "the world was a fire ever kindling and going out, which made all things and was all things." It was this link of connexion between the sceptical and Pyrrhonian schools which Aenesidemus attempted to restore. The doctrine of Hermeletus, although it spoke of a subtle fire, really meant nothing more than a principle of change; and although it might seem absurd to a strict sceptic like Sextus Empiricus to affirm even a principle of change, it involved no real inconsistency with the sceptical system. We are left to conjecture as to the way in which Aenesidemus arrived at his conclusions: the following account of them seems probable. It will be seen, from what has been said, that the sceptical system had destroyed everything but sensation. But sensation is the effect of change, the principle of motion working internally. It was very natural then that the sceptic, proceeding from the only ἀρχή which remained to him, should suggest an explanation of the outward world, derived from that of which alone he was certain, his own internal sensations. The more suggestion of a probable cause might seem inconsistent with the distinction which the sceptics drew between their own absolute uncertainty and the probability spoken of by the Academicians: indeed, it was inconsistent with their metaphysical paradoxes to draw conclusions at all: if so, we must be content to allow that Aenesidemus (as Sextus Empiricus implies) got a little beyond the dark region of scepticism into the light of probability.

Other scattered opinions of Aenesidemus have been preserved to us, some of which seem to lead to the same conclusion. Time, he said, was τὸ ὥσπερ and τὸ πρῶτον ἐνέμα (Pyrr. Hyp. iii. 17), probably in allusion to the doctrine of the Stoics, that all really existing substances were ἔμετα: in other words, he meant to say that time was a really existing thing, and not merely a condition of thought. This was connected with the principle of change, which was inseparable from a notion of time: if the one had a real existence (and upon its existence the whole system depended), the other must likewise have a real existence. In another place, adapting his language to that of Hermeletus, he said that "time was air" (Sext. Emp. adv. Log. cap. iv. 233.), probably in order to illustrate it by the imperceptible nature of air, in the same way that the motion of the world was said to work by a subtle and invisible fire. All things, according to his doctrine, were but ἀφαίρεσις which were brought out and adapted to our perceptions by their mutual opposition: metaphorically they might be said to shine forth in the light of Hermeletus's fire. He did not, indeed, explain how this union of opposites made them sensible to the faculties of man: probably he would rather have supported his view by the impossibility of the mind conceiving of anything otherwise than in a state of motion, or as he would have expressed it, in a state of mutual opposition. But he seemed to illustrate two kinds, θεῖα and κόσμος (Sext. Emp. adv. Log. cap. ii. 8), the perceptions of individuals, and those common to mankind. Here again Aenesidemus seems to lose sight of the sceptical system, which (in speculation at least) admitted no degrees of truth, doubt, or probability. The same remark applies to his distinction of κίνησις into μετάφασις and μετάταξις, simple motion and change. He seems also to have opposed the perplexity which the sceptics endeavoured to bring about between matter and mind; for he asserted that thought was independent of the body, and "that the sentient power looked out through the crannies of the senses." (Adv. Log. i. 349.) Lastly, his vigorous mind was above the paltry confusion of physical and metaphysical distinctions; for he declared, after Hermeletus, "that a part was the same with the whole and yet different from it." The grand peculiarity of his system was the attempt to unite scepticism with the earlier philosophy, to raise a positive foundation for it by accounting from the nature of things for the never-ceasing changes both in the material and spiritual world.

Sextus Empiricus has preserved his argument against our knowledge of causes, as well as a table of eight methods by which all a priori reasonings may be corrected, as "arguments whatever may be by the διὰ τρόπον ι. Either the cause given is unseen, and not proven by things seen, as if a person were to explain the motions of the planets by the music of the spheres. II. Or if the cause be seen, it cannot be shown to exclude other hypotheses: we must not only prove the cause, but dispose of every other cause. III. A regular effect may be attributed to an irregular cause; as if one were to explain the motions of the heavenly bodies by a sudden impulse. IV. Men argue from things seen to things unseen, assuming that they are governed by the same laws. V. Causes only mean opinions of causes, which are inconsistent with phenomena, and with other opinions. VI. Equally probable causes are accepted or rejected as they agree with this or that preconceived notion. VII. These causes are at variance with phenomena as well as with abstract principles. VIII. Principles must be uncertain, because the facts from which they proceed are uncertain. (Pyrrh. Hyp. i. 17, ed. Fabr.)

It is to be regretted that nothing is known of the personal history of Aenesidemus. A list of his works and a sketch of their contents have been preserved by Philtus. (Cod. 212.) He was the author of three books of Πηλαδανοι Παράνομοι, and is mentioned as a recent teacher of philosophy by Aristocles. (Apost. Euch. Prolog. Evang. xiv. 10.) It is to Aenesidemus that Sextus Empiricus is indebted for a considerable part of his work.

AEOLUS (Aëolos). In the mythical history of Greece there are three personages of this name, who are spoken of by ancient writers as connected with one another, but this connexion is so confused, that it is impossible to make a clear view of them. (Müller, Orakom. i. 139, &c.) We shall follow Diodorus, who distinguishes between the three, although in other passages he confounds them.

1. A son of Hellen and the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Dorus and Xuthus. He is described as the ruler of Thessaly, and regarded as the founder of the Aëolian branch of the Greek nation. He married Emaret, the daughter of Deiphocus, by whom he had seven sons and five daughters, and according to some writers still more. (Apollod. i. 7, § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 190.) According to Müller's supposition, the most ancient and genuine story know only of four sons of them, viz. Sisyphus, Athamas, Cretheus, and Salmoneus, as the representatives of the four main branches of the Aëolian race. The great extent of country which this race occupied, and the desire of each part of it to trace its origin to some descendant of Aëolus, probably gave rise to the varying accounts about the number of his children. According to Hyginus (Fab. 238, 242) Aëolus had one son of the name of Macreus, who, after having committed incest with his sister Canace, put an end to his own life. According to Ovid (Herod. i. 11) Aëolus threw the fruit of this love to the dogs, and sent his daughter a sword by which she was to kill herself. (Comp. Plut. Paral. p. 315.)

2. Diodorus (iv. 67) says, that the second Aëolus was the grandson of the first Aëolus, being the son of Hippotes and Melanippe, and the grandson of Mimias the son of Aëolus. Arne, the daughter of this second Aëolus, afterwards became mother of a third Aëolus. (Comp. Paus. ix. 40. § 3.) In another passage (v. 7) Diodorus represents the third Aëolus as a son of Hippotes.

3. According to some accounts a son of Hippotes, or, according to others, of Poseidon and Arne, the daughter of the second Aëolus. His story, which probably refers to the emigration of a branch of the Aëoliens to the west, is thus related: Arne declared to her father that she was with child by Poseidon, but her father disbelieving her statement, gave her to a stranger of Metapontum in Italy, who took her to his own native town. Here she became mother of two sons, Baceus and Aëolus (iii.), who were adopted by the man of Metapontum in accordance with an oracle. When they had grown up to manhood, they took possession of the sovereignty of Metapontum by force. But when a dispute afterwards arose between their mother Arne and their foster-mother Autolyte, the two brothers slew the latter and fled with their mother from Metapontum. Aëolus went to some islands in the Tyrrhenian sea, which received from him the name of the Aëolian islands, and according to some accounts built the town of Lipara. (Diod. iv. 67, v. 7.) Here he reigned as a just and pious king, behaved kindly to the natives, and taught them the use of sails in navigation, and foretold them from signs which he observed in the fire the nature of the winds that were to rise. Hence, says Diodorus, Aëolus is described in mythology as the ruler over the winds, and it was this Aëolus to whom Odysseus came during his wanderings. A different account of the matter is given by Hyginus. (Fab. 106.)

In these accounts Aëolus, the father of the Aëolian race, is placed in relationship with Aëolus the ruler and god of the winds. The groundwork on which this connection was formed by later poets and mythographers, is found in Homer. (Od. x. 2, &c.) In Homer, however, Aëolus, the son of Hippotes, is neither the god nor the father of the winds, but merely the happy ruler of the Aëolian island, whom Cronion had made the ταύτης of the winds, which he might soothe or excite according to his pleasure. (Od. x. 21, &c.) This statement of Homer and the etymology of the name of Aëolus from dēloō were the cause, that in later times Aëolus was regarded as the god and king of the winds, which he kept enclosed in a mountain. It is therefore to him that Juno applies when she wishes to destroy the fleet of the Trojans. (Verg. Aen. x. 269.) The Aëolian ruler of Homer was in the time of Pausanias believed to be Lipara (Paus. x. 11, § 3), and this Strongyle was accordingly regarded in later times as the place in which the god of the winds dwelled. (Verg. Aen. viii. 416, i. 52; Strab. vi. p. 276.) Other accounts place the residence of Aëolus in Thrace (Apollon. Rhod. i. 954, iv. 765; Callim. Hymns. in Del. 26), or in the neighbourhood of Rhegium in Italy. (Tzetz. ad Lycophr. 732; comp. Diod. v. 8.) The following passages of later poets also show how universally Aëolus had gradually come to be regarded as a god: Or. Met. i. 264, xi. 746 xiv. 223; Val. Pline. i. 375; Quint. Sismon. iv. 475. Whether he was represented by the ancients in works of art is not certain, but we now possess no representation of him. [L. S.]

AEPYTUS (Aëpytos). 1. One of the mythical kings of Arcadia. He was the son of Elijatus (Pind. Ol. vi. 54), and originally ruled over Phaenasa on the Alpheus in Arcadia. When Cleitor, the son of Azan, died without leaving my issue, Aepytus succeeded him and became king of the Arcadians, a part of whose country was called after him Aepyta. (Paus. viii. 4, § 34, § 43.) He is said to have been killed during the chase on mount Sepia by the bite of a venomous snake. (Paus. viii. 4, § 4, § 2.) His tomb there was still shewn in the time of Pausanias, and he was anxious to see it, as it became it was mentioned in Homer. (II. ii. 15.)

2. The youngest son of Cressphontes the Helmid, king of Messenia, and of Merope, the daughter of the Arcadian king Cypsalus. Cressphontes and his other sons were murdered during an insurrection, and Aepyta alone, who was educated in the house of his grandfather Cypsalus, escaped the danger. The throne of Cressphontes was in the meantime occupied by the Heraclid Polyphontes, who also forced Merope to become his wife. (Apollod. ii. 8, § 5.) When Aepyta had grown to manhood, he was enabled by the aid of Helaes, his father-in-law, to return to his kingdom, punish the murderers of his father, and put Polyphontes to death. He left a son, Glaucus, and it was from him that subsequently the kings of Mes- senia were called Aepyrites instead of the more general name Heraclids. (Paus. iv. 3. § 3, &c., viii. 5. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 137, 184.)

3. A son of Hippothous, and king of Arcadia. He was a great-grandson of the Aepyrites mentioned first. He was reigning at the time when Orestes, in consequence of an oracle, left Mycenne and settled in Arcadia. There was at Mantinea a sanctuary, which down to the latest time no mortal was ever allowed to enter. Aepyrites disregarding the sacred custom crossed the threshold, but was immediately struck with blindness, and died soon after. He was succeeded by his son Cypselus. (Paus. viii. 5. § 3.)

AE'RIUS (Aērius), Heretic, the intimate friend of Eustathius of Sebaste in Armenia, A. D. 360, was living when St. Epiphanius wrote his Book against Heresies, A. D. 374-6. After living together an ascetic life, Eustathius was raised to the episcopate, and by him Aërius was ordained priest and set over the Hospital (πτεχοτερος) of Pontus. (St. Epiph. adv. Haer. 75. § 1.) But nothing could alloy the envy of Aërius at the elevation of his companion. Eusebuses and theses were in vain, and last he left Eustathius, and publicly accused him of covetousness. He assembled a troop of men and women, who with him professed the renunciation of all worldly goods (ἀποφείλεια). Denied entrance into the towns, they roamed about the fields, and lodged in the open air or in caves, exposed to the inclemency of the seasons. Aërius superadded to the irreligion of Aërius the following errors: 1. The denial of a difference of between a bishop and a priest. 2. The rejection of prayer and alms for the dead. 3. The refusal to observe Easter and stated fasts, on the ground of such observances being Jewish. St. Epiphanius refutes these errors. (I. c.) There were remains of his followers in the time of St. Augustine. (Adv. Haer. § 53, vol. viii. p. 15, which was written A. D. 420.) [A. J. C.]

AE'ROPE (Aēropo), a daughter of Catreus, king of Crete, and granddaughter of Minos. Her father, who had received an oracle that he should lose his life by one of his children, gave her and her sister, Clymene, to Nanphilus, who was to sell them in a foreign land. Another sister, Apemone, and her brother, Aethenes, who had heard of the oracle, had left Crete and gone to Rhodes. Aërope, afterwards married Pleisthenes, the son of Ateus, and became by him the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus. (Apollod. ill. 2. § 1, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. 459; Dictis Ost. l. 1.) After the death of Pleisthenes, Aërope married Ateus, and had two sons, who were educated by Ateus, were generally believed to be his sons. Aërope, however, became faithless to Ateus, being seduced by Thyestes. (Eurip. Orest. 5, &c.; Hellen. 397; Hygin. Fab. 87; Schol. ad Hom. ill. 11. 249; Serv. ad Aen. xii. 262.) [L. S.]

AEROPUS (Aēropo). 1. The brother of Perdiccas, who was the first king of Macedonia of the family of Temens. (Herod. viii. 137.)

2. i. King of Macedonia, the son of Philip L., the great-grandson of Perdiccas, the first king, and the father of Alcetas. (Herod. viii. 139.)

3. King of Macedonia, guardian of Orestes, the son of Aërope, reigned nearly six years from B. C. 399. The first four years of this time he reigned jointly with Orestes, and the remainder alone. He was succeeded by his son Prusias. (Diod. xiv. 37, 84; Dexeippia, ap. Synecdech. p. 263, a.; comp. Polyb. ii. 1. § 17.)

AÆSACUS (Aēscus), a son of Piam and Aries, the daughter of Merope, from whom Aescus learned the art of interpreting dreams. When Hecuba during her pregnancy with Paris dreamed that she was giving birth to a burning piece of wood which spread combustion through the whole city, Aescus explained this to mean that she would give birth to a son who would be the ruin of the city, and accordingly recommended the exposure of the child after its birth. (Paris.) Aescus himself was married to Merope, the daughter of the river-god Cebren, who died early, and while he was lamenting her death he was changed into a bird. (Apollod. ill. 12. § 5.) Ovid (Met. x. 750) relates his story differently. According to him, Aescus was the son of Alexinhoe, the daughter of the river Grantes. He lived far from his father's court in the solitude of mountain-forests. Hesperia, however, the daughter of Cebren, kindled love in his heart, and on one occasion while he was preparing his bed was stung by a serpent and died. Aescus in his grief threw himself into the sea and was changed by Thetis into an aquatic bird. [L. S.]

AÆSARA (Aēsara), of Lucania, a female Pythagorean philosopher, said to be a daughter of Pythagoras, wrote a work "about Human Nature," of which a fragment is preserved by Stobaeus. (Ed. i. p. 847, ed. Heer.) Some editors attribute this fragment to Areus, one of the successors of Pythagoras, but Bentley prefers reading Aesara. She is also mentioned in the life of Pythagoras (op. Phot. Cod. 249, p. 458, b. ed. Bekker), where Bentley reads Aesara instead of Aesara. (Disserdation upon Plato's, p. 277.)

AÆSCINES (Aēscines), the orator, was born in Attica in the demus of Cotscidna, in n. c. 389, as is clear from his speech against Timarchus (p. 79), which was delivered in b. c. 345, and in which he himself says that he was then in his forty-fifth year. He was the son of Tones and Glaucothe, and if we listen to the account of Demosthenes, his political antagonist, his father was not a free citizen of Athens, but had been a slave in the house of Elius, a schoolmaster. After the return of the Athenian exiles under Timarchus, Tones himself kept a small school, and Aeschines in his youth assisted his father and performed such services as were unworthy of a free Athenian youth. Demosthenes further states, that Aeschines, in order to conceal the low condition of his father, changed his name Tones into Atromus, and that he afterwards usurped the rights of an Athenian citizen. (Dem. De Cora, pp. 313, 320, 270.) The mother of Aeschines is described as originally a dancer and a prostitute, who even after her marriage with Tones continued to carry on unlawful practices in her house, and made money by initiating low and superstitutional persons into a sort of private mysteries. She is said to have been generally known at Athens under the nickname Bippusa. According to Aeschines himself, on the other hand, his father Atromus was descended from an honourable family, and was in no wise connected with the noble priestly family of the Eteonauli. He was originally an athlete, but lost his property during the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was afterwards driven from his country under the tyranny of the Thirty. He then served in the Athenian armies in Asia and spent the remainder of his life at Athens, at first in reduced circumstances. (Aesch. De fatis. Leg. pp. 36, 47.) His mother, too, was a free Athenian citizen, and the daughter of Glaucon of Acharne. Which of these accounts is true, cannot be decided, but there seems to be no doubt that Demosthenes is guilty of exaggeration in his account of the parents of Aeschines and his early youth.

Aeschines had two brothers, one of whom, Philochares, was older than himself, and the other, Aphobetus, was the youngest of the three. Philochares was at one time one of the ten Athenian generals, an office which was conferred upon him for three successive years; Aphobetus followed the calling of a scribe, but had once been sent on an embassy to the king of Persia and was afterwards connected with the administration of the public revenue of Athens. (Aesch. De fatis. Leg. p. 48.) All these things seem to contain strong evidence that the family of Aeschines, although poor, must have been of some respectability. Respecting his early youth nothing can be said with certainty, except that he assisted his father in his school, and that afterwards, being of a strong and athletic constitution, he was employed in the gymnasium for money, to contend with other young men in their exercises. (Dem. De Coron. p. 313; Plut. Viti. x. 19 Orasch. p. 840.) It is a favourite custom of late writers to place great orators, philosophers, poets, &c., in the relation of teacher and scholar to one another; and accordingly Aeschines is represented as a disciple of many great orators and statesmen. If these statements, which are even contradicted by the ancients themselves, were true, Aeschines would not have omitted to mention it in the many opportunities he had. The distinguished orator and statesman Aristophon engaged Aeschines as a scribe, and in the same capacity he afterwards served Eubulus, a man of great influence with the democratical party, with whom he formed an intimate friendship, and to whose political principles he remained faithful to the end of his life. That he served two years as πρεσβυτερος, from his eighteenth to his twentieth year, as all young men at Athens did, Aeschines (De fatis. Leg. p. 50) expressly states, and this period of his military training must probably be placed before the time that he acted as a scribe to Aristophon; for we find that, after leaving the service of Eubulus, he tried his fortune as an actor, for which he was provided by nature with a strong and sonorous voice. He acted the parts of τραγούδιον, but was unsuccessful, and on one occasion, when he was performing in the character of Oenomaus, was hissed off the stage. (Dem. De Coron. p. 286.) After this he left the stage and engaged in military services, in which, according to his own account (De fatis. Leg. p. 50), he gained great distinction. (Comp. Dem. De fatis. Leg. p. 378.) After several less important engagements in other parts of Greece, he distinguished himself in B.C. 363 in the battle of Mantinon; and afterwards in B.C. 358, he also took part in the expedition of the Athenians against Euboea, and fought in the battle of Tanagra, and on this occasion he gained such laurels, that he was praised by the generals on the spot, and, after the victory was gained, was sent to carry the news of it to Athens. Tenedes, who was sent with him, bore witness to his courage and bravery, and the Athenians honoured him with a crown. (Aesch. De fatis. Leg. p. 51.)

Two years before this campaign, the last in which he took part, he had come forward at Athens as a public speaker (Aesch. Epit. 12), and the military fame which he had now acquired established his reputation. His former occupation as a scribe to Aristophon and Eubulus had made him acquainted with the laws and constitution of Athens, while his acting on the stage had been a useful preparation for public speaking. During the first period of his public career, he was, like all other Athenians, zealously engaged in directing the attention of his fellow-citizens to the growing power of Philip, and exhorted them to check it in its growth. After the fall of Olynthus in B.C. 348, Eubulus prevailed on the Athenians to send an embassy to Peloponnesus with the object of uniting the Greeks against the common enemy, and Aeschines was sent to Aegospotami. Here Aeschines spoke at Megalopolis against Hieronymus, an emissary of Philip, but without success; and from this moment Aeschines, as well as all his fellow-citizens, gave up the hope of effecting anything by the united forces of Greece. (Dem. De fatis. Leg. pp. 344, 438; Aesch. De fatis. Leg. p. 58.) When therefore Philip, in B.C. 347, gave the Athenians to understand that he was inclined to make peace with them, Philocrates urged the necessity of sending an embassy to Philip to treat on the subject. Ten men, and among them Aeschines and Demosthenes, were accordingly sent to Philip, and, after several trials, Aeschines and Demosthenes, when it was his turn to speak, reminded the king of the rights which Athens had to his friendship and alliance. The king promised to send forthwith ambassadors to Athens to negotiate the terms of peace. After the return of the Athenian ambassadors they were each rewarded with a wreath of olive, on the proposal of Demosthenes, for the manner in which they had discharged their duties. Aeschines from this moment forward was inflexible in his opinion, that nothing but peace with Philip could avert utter ruin from his country. That this was perfectly in accordance with what Philip wished is clear; but there is no reason for supposing, that Aeschines had been bribe into this opinion, or that he urged the necessity of peace with a view to ruin his country. (Aesch. in Cleop. p. 62.) Antipater and two other Macedonian ambassadors arrived at Athens soon after the return of the Athenian ones, and after various debates Demosthenes urged the people to conclude the peace, and speedily to send other ambassadors to Philip to receive his oath to it. The only difference between Aeschines and Demosthenes was, that the former would have concluded the peace even without providing for the Athenian allies, which was happily prevented by Demosthenes. Five Athenian ambassadors, and among them Aeschines but not Demosthenes (De Coron. p. 285) in this case made for Macedonia, and the more speedily, as Philip was making war upon Cersobleptes, a Thracian prince and ally of Athens. They went to Pella to wait for the arrival of Philip from Thrace, and were kept there for a considerable time, for Philip did not come until he had completely subdued Cersobleptes. At last, however, he swore to the peace, from which the

Phocion was expressly excluded. Philip honoured the Athenian ambassadors with rich presents, promised to restore all Athenian prisoners without ransom, and wrote a polite letter to the people of Athens apologising for having detained their ambassadors so long. (Dem. De falso Leg. pp. 394, 405.) Hyperides and Timarchus, the former of whom was a friend of Demosthenes, brought forward an accusation against the ambassadors, charging them with high treason against the republic, because they were bribed by the king. Timarchus accused Aeschines, and Hyperides Philocrates. But Aeschines evaded the danger by bringing forward a counter-accusation against Timarchus (n. c. 345), and by showing that the moral conduct of his accuser was such that he had no right to speak before the people. The speech in which Aeschines attacked Timarchus is still extant, and its effect was, that Timarchus was obliged to drop his accusation, and Aeschines gained a brilliant triumph. The operations of Philip after this peace, and his march towards Thermopylae, made the Athenians very uneasy, and Aeschines, though he assured the people that the king had no hostile intentions towards Athens and only intended to chastise Tiberias, was again requested to go as ambassador to Philip and insure his abiding by the terms of his peace. But he deferred going on the pretext that he was ill. (Dem. De fals. Leg. p. 357.) On his return he pretended that the king had secretly confided to him that he would undertake nothing against either Phocis or Athens. Demosthenes saw through the king's plans as well as the treachery of Aeschines, and how just his apprehensions were became evident soon after the return of Aeschines, when Philip announced to the Athenians that he had taken possession of Phocis. The people of Athens, however, were silenced and huddled into security by the repeated assurances of the king and the venal orators who advocated his cause at Athens. In b. c. 346, Aeschines was sent as ραταγορας to the assembly of the amphictyonies at Pylea which was convoked by Philip, and at which he received greater honours than he could ever have expected. At this time Aeschines and Demosthenes were at the head of the two parties, into which not only the people of Athens were divided, and their political enmity created and nourished personal hatred. This enmity came to a head in the year b. c. 343, when Demosthenes charged Aeschines with having been bribed and having betrayed the interests of his country during the second embassy to Philip. This charge of Demosthenes (πετραρχεοθελας) was not spoken, but published as a memorial, and Aeschines answered it in a similar memorial on the embassy (πετραρχεοθελας), which was likewise published (Dem. De fals. Leg. p. 357), and in the composition of which he is said to have been assailed by his friend Eubulus. The result of those mutual attacks is unknown, but there is no doubt that it gave rise to a new and the popularity of Aeschines. At the time he wrote his memorial we gain a glimpse into his private life. Some years before that occurrence he had married a daughter of Philodemus, a man of high respectability in his tribe of Paemnia, and in 343 he was father of three little children. (Aesch. De fals. Leg. p. 52.)

It was probably in b. c. 342, that Antipho, who had been exiled and lived in Macedon, secretly returned to the Peiraeus, with the intention of setting fire to the Athenian ships of war. Demosthenes discovered him, and had him ejected. Aeschines denounced the conduct of Demosthenes as a violation of the democratic constitution. Antipho was sentenced to death; and although no disclosure of any kind could be extorted from him, still it seems to have been believed in many quarters that Aeschines had been his accomplice. Hence the honourable office of απόλυτοι to the sanctuary in Delos, which had just been given him, was taken from him and bestowed upon Hyperides. (Demosth. De Coron. p. 271.) In b. c. 340 Aeschines was again present at Delphi as Athenian παραγόρας, and caused the second sacred war against Amphissa in Locris for having taken into cultivation some sacred land. Philip entrusted with the supreme command by the amphictyonies, marched into Locris with an army of 30,000 men, ravaged the country, and established himself in it. When in 338 he advanced southward as far as Elatea, all Greece was in consternation. Demosthenes alone persevered, and roused his countrymen to a last and desperate struggle. The battle of Chaeroneia in this same year decided the fate of Greece. The misfortune of that day gave a handle to the enemies of Demosthenes for attacking him; but notwithstanding the bribes which Aeschines received from Antipater for this purpose, the pure and untainted patriotism of Demosthenes was so generally recognized, that he received the honourable charge of delivering the funeral oration over those who had fallen at Chaeroneia. Ctesiphon proposed that Demosthenes should be rewarded for the services he had done to his country, with a golden crown in the theatre at the great Dionysia. Aeschines availed himself of the illegal form in which this reward was proposed to be given, to bring a charge against Ctesiphon on that ground. But he did not prosecute the matter till eight years later, that is, in b. c. 330, when after the death of Philip, and the victories of Alexander, political affairs had assumed a different aspect in Greece. After having commenced the prosecution of Ctesiphon, he is said to have gone for some time to Macedon. What induced him to commence the prosecution of Ctesiphon, and to take it up again eight years afterwards, are questions which can only be answered by conjectures. The speech in which he accused Ctesiphon in b. c. 330, and which is still extant, is so skilfully managed, that if he had succeeded he would have totally destroyed all the political influence and authority of Demosthenes. The latter answered Aeschines in his celebrated oration on the crown (πετραρχεοθελος). Even before Demosthenes had finished his speech, Aeschines acknowledged himself conquered, and withdrew from the court and his country. When the matter was put to the votes, not even a fifth of them was in favour of Aeschines.

Aeschines went to Asia Minor. The statement of Plutarch, that Demosthenes provided him with the means of accomplishing his journey, is surely a fable. He spent several years in Ionia and Caria, occupying himself with teaching rhetoric, and anxiously waiting for the return of Alexander to Europe. When in b. c. 324 the report of the death of Alexander reached him, he left Asia and went to Rhodes, where he established a school of eloquence, which subsequently became very celebrated, and occupies a middle position between the grave maladroitness of the Attic orators, and the exasperating luxuriaries of the so-called Asiatic school of oratory. On one occasion he read to his audience in Rhodes his speech against Ctesiphon, and when some of his hearers expressed their astonishment at his having been defeated notwithstanding his brilliant oration, he replied, "You would cease to be astonished, if you had heard Demosthenes."

(Cic. De Orat. iii. 56; Plin. H. N. vii. 30; Plin. Epist. ii. 8; Quintil. xi. 3. § 6.) From Rhodes he went to Samos, where he died in B. C. 314.

The conduct of Aeschines has been censured by the writers of all ages; and for this many reasons may be mentioned. In the first place, and above all, it was his misfortune to be constantly placed in juxtaposition or opposition to the spotless glory of Demosthenes, and this must have made him appear more guilty in the eyes of those who saw through his actions, while in later times the contrast between the greatest orators of the time was frequently made the theme of rhetorical declamation, in which one of the two was praised or blamed at the cost of the other, and less with regard to truth than to effect. Respecting the last period of his life we scarcely possess any other source of information than the accounts of late sophists and declamations. Another point to be considered in forming a just estimate of the character of Aeschines is, that he had no advantages of education, and that he owed his greatness to none but his own occupations during the early part of his life which were as necessarily engendered in him the low desire of gain and wealth; and had he overcome these passions, he would have been equal to Demosthenes. There is, however, not the slightest ground for believing, that Aeschines recommended peace with Macedonia at first from any other motive than the desire of promoting the good of his country. Demosthenes himself acted in the same spirit at that time, for the crafthens of Philip deceived both of them. But while Demosthenes altered his policy on discovering the secret intentions of the king, Aeschines continued to advocate the principles of peace. But there is nothing to justify the belief that Aeschines intended to ruin his country, and it is much more probable that the crimes of which he was accused were matters that he firmly believed he was doing right, and was thus unconsciously led on to become a traitor to his country. But no ancient writer except Demosthenes charges him with having received bribes from the Macedonians for the purpose of betraying his country. He appears to have been carried away by the favour of the king and the people, who delighted in hearing from him what they themselves wished, and, perhaps also, by the opposition of Demosthenes himself.

Aeschines spoke on various occasions, but he published only three of his orations, namely, against Timarchus, on the Embassy, and against Ctesiphon. As an orator, he was inferior to none but Demosthenes. He was endowed by nature with extraordinary oratorical powers, of which his orations afford abundant proofs. The facility and felicity of his diction, the boldness and the vigour of his descriptions, carry away the reader now, as they must have carried away his audience. The ancient, as Photius (Cod. 61) remarks, designated these three orations as the Graces, and the nine letters which were extant in the time of Photius, as the Muses. Besides the three orations, we now possess twelve letters which are ascribed to Aeschines, which however are in all probability not more genuine than the so-called epistles of Phalaris, and are undoubtedly the work of late sophists.

The principal sources of information concerning Aeschines are: 1. The orations of Demosthenes on the Embassy, and on the Crown, and the orations of Aeschines on the Embassy and against Ctesiphon. These four orations were translated into Latin by Cicero; but the translation is lost, and we now possess only an essay which Cicero wrote as an introduction to them: "De opificio genere Oratorum." 2. The life in Plutarch's "Vitae deorum Ordorum." 3. The life of Aeschines by Philostratus. 4. The life of Aeschines by Eutychides. 5. Apollonius' Exegesis. The last two works are printed in Reiske's edition, p. 10, foll. The best modern essay on Aeschines is that by Passow in Esch and Hübner's "Encyclopaedie," i. p. 73, &c. There is also a work by F. Stechow, "De Aeschinis Oratoris Vita," Berlin, 1841, 4to., which is an attempt to clear the character of Aeschines from all the reproaches that have been attached to it; but the essay is written in exceedingly bad Latin, and the attempt is a most complete failure.

The first edition of the orations of Aeschines is that of Aldus Manutius in his "Collectio Rhetoricon Graecorum," Venice, 1518, fol. An edition with a Latin translation, which also contains the letters ascribed to Aeschines, is that of H. W. Basel, 1672, fol. The next important edition is that by Taylor, which contains the notes of Wolf, Taylor, and Markland, and appeared at Cambridge in 1748-56 in his collection of the Attic orators. In Reiske's edition of the Attic orators Aeschines occupies the third volume, Lips. 1771, 8vo. The best editions are those of L. Bekker, vol. iii. of his "Orationes Attic." Oxford, 1822, 8vo., for which thirteen new MSS. were collated, and of F. H. Bremel, Zurich, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo. The oration against Demosthenes has been translated into English by Portal and Leland. [L. S.] AESCHINES (Ἀέσχινες), an Athenian philosopher and rhetorician, son of a sausage-seller, or, according to other accounts, of Lysias (Diog. Laërt. ii. 64), and a disciple, although by some of his contemporaries held an unworthy one, of Socrates. From the account of Laërtius, he appears to have been the familiar friend of his great master, who said that "the sausage-seller's son only knew how to honour him." The same writer has preserved a tradition that it was Aeschines, and not Crito, who offered to assist Socrates in his escape from prison.

The greater part of his life was spent in abject poverty, which gave rise to the advice of Socrates to him, "to borrow money of himself, by diminishing his daily wants." After the death of his master, according to the charge of Lysias (pref. Athen. xiii. p. 611, s. L), he kept a perfumer's shop with borrowed money, and presently becoming bankrupt, was obliged to leave Athens. Whether from necessity or inclination, he followed the fashion of the day, and retired to the Syracusean court, where the friendship of Aristippus might console him for the contempt of Plato. He remained there until the expulsion of the younger Dionysius, and on his return, finding it useless to attempt a rivalry with his great contemporaries, he gave private lectures. One of the charges which his opponents

He is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) and Tzetzes (Chil. viii. 406). As he was also a writer of iambics and choliambics, many scholars have supposed him to be identical with the Samian Aeschylus, and to have been called a Mitylenean in consequence of having resided for some time in that city. He was one of Galen's tutors, who says that he belonged to the sect of the Empirici, and that he had a great knowledge of Pharmacy and Materia Medica. Aeschylus was the inventor of a celebrated superstitions remedy for the bite of a mad dog, which is mentioned with approbation by Galen and Orarius (Sympops. iii. p. 55), and of which the most important ingredient was powdered crawfish. These he directs to be caught at a time when the sun and moon were in a particular relative position, and to be baked alive. (Gal. De Simplic. Medic. Fabull. xi. 34, vol. xii. p. 358 ; C. C. Kuhn, Addit. ad Elench. Med. Vet. a J. A. Fabricii in "Bibl. Gr.," exhib.)

AESCHYLIDES (Αἰσχυλίδης), wrote a work on agriculture, entitled Γεωργιακα, which was at least in three books. (Athen. xiv. p. 630, d ; Aelian, de Anim. xv. 32.)

AESCHYLUS (Αἰσχύλης) was born at Eleusis in Attica in n. c. 525, so that he was thirty-five years of age at the time of the battle of Marathon, and contemporary with Simonides and Pindar. His father Euphorion was probably connected with the worship of Demeter, from which Aeschylus may naturally be supposed to have received his first religious impressions. He was himself, according to some authorities, initiated in the mystery ceremonies, with reference to which, and to his birthplace Eleusis, Aristophanes (Ran. 884) makes him pray to the Eleusinian goddess, Pausanias (i. 21. § 2) relates an anecdote of him, which, if true, shows that he was struck in very early youth with the exhibitions of the drama. According to this story, "When he was a boy he was set to watch grapes in the country, and there fell asleep. In his slumber Dionysus appeared to him, and ordered him to apply himself to tragedy. At daybreak he made the attempt, and succeeded very easily." Such a dream as this could hardly have resulted from anything but the impression produced by tragic exhibitions upon his warm imagination. At the age of 25 (n. c. 499), he made his first appearance as a competitor for the prize of tragedy, against Choerilus and Pratinas, without however being successful. Sixteen years afterward (n. c. 484), Aeschylus gained his first victory. The titles of the pieces which he then brought out are not known, but his competitors were most probably Pratinas and Phrynichus or Choerilus. Eight years afterwards he gained the prize with the trilogy of which the Persae, the earliest of his extant dramas, was one piece. The whole number of victories attributed to Aeschylus amounted to thirteen, most of which were gained by him in the interval of his first tragic victory, between b.c. 484, the year of his first tragic victory, and the close of the Persian war, 480. Aeschylus, the poet, was commemorated in the December, b.c. 470. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Rhet. 1633.)

The year b.c. 468 was the date of a remarkable event in the poet's life. In that year he was defeated in a tragic contest by his younger rival Sophocles, and if we may believe Plutarch (Cimon. 3), his mortification at this indignity, as he conceived it, was so great, that he quitted Athens in disgust the very same year, and went to the court of Hiero (Paus. i. 2. § 3), King of Syracuse, where he found Simonides the lyric poet, who as well as himself was by that prince most hospitably received. Of the fact of his having visited Sicily at this time alluded to, there can be no doubt; but whether the motion alleged by Plutarch for his doing so was the only one, or a real one, is a question of considerable difficulty, though of little practical moment. It may be, as has been plausibly maintained by some authors, that Aeschylus, whose family and personal honours were connected with the glories of Marathon, and the heroes of the Persian war, did not sympathise with the spirit of aggravatedism by which the counsels of his country were then actuated, nor approve of its policy in the struggle for the supremacy over Greece. The contemporaries of his earlier years, Miltiades, Aristides, and Themistocles, whose achievements in the service of their country were identified with those of himself and his family, had been succeeded by Cimon: and the aristocratical principles which Aeschylus supported were gradually being supplanted and overborne by the advance of democracy. From all this Aeschylus might have felt that he was outliving his principles, and have felt it the more keenly, from Cimon, the hero of the day, having been one of the judges who awarded the tragic prize to Sophocles in preference to himself. (Plut. Cimon. 1.) On this supposition, Athens could not have been an agreeable residence to a person like Aeschylus, and therefore he might have been disposed to leave it; but still it is more than probable that his defeat by Sophocles materially influenced his determinations, and was at any rate the proximate cause of his removing to Sicily. It has been further conjectured that the charge of ἄρσεν ἄρσεν or impiety which was brought against Aeschylus for an alleged publication of the mysteries of Ceres (Aristot. Eth. h. 1.), but possibly from political motives, was in some measure connected with his retirement from his native country. If this were really the case, it follows, that the play or plays which gave the supposed offence to the Athenians, must have been published before b.c. 468, and therefore that the trilogy of the Orestes could have had no connexion with it. Shortly before the arrival of Aeschylus at the court of Hiero, that prince had built the town of Acata, at the bottom of the mountain of that name, and on the site of the ancient Catana: in connexion with this event, Aeschylus is said to have composed his play of the Women of Acata (b.c. 471, or 472), in which he predicted and prayed for the prosperity of the new city. For the renown of Hiero, he also reproduces the play of the Persae, with the trilogy of which he had been victorious in the dramatic contests at Athens. (b.c. 472.) Now we know that the trilogy of the Seven against Thebes was represented soon after the "Persians:" it follows therefore that the former trilogy must have been represented not later than b.c. 470. (Welcker, Trag. p. 520; Schol. ad Aristoph. Rhet. 1633.)

Cratinus. In b.c. 468, was living in the time. (Plut. Arist. 3.) Besides "The Women of Acata," Aeschylus also composed other pieces in Sicily, in which are said to have occurred Sicilian words and expressions not intelligible to the Athenians. (Athen. ix. p. 402, b.) From the number of such words and expressions, which have been noticed in the later extant plays of Aeschylus, it has been inferred that he spent a considerable time in Sicily, on this his first visit. We must not however omit to mention, that, according to some accounts, Aeschylus also visited Sicily about b.c. 468, previous to what we have considered his first visit. (Bode, id. ii. p. 215.) The occasion of this retirement is said to have been the victory gained over him by Simonides, to whom the Athenians adjudged the prize for the best elegy on those who fell at Marathon. This tradition, however, is not supported by strong independent testimony, and accordingly its truth has been much questioned. Suidas indeed states that Aeschylus had visited Sicily even before this, when he was only twenty-five years of age (b.c. 499), immediately after his first contest with Pratinas, on which occasion the crowd of spectators was so great as to cause the fall of the wooden planks (εἶνα) or temporary scaffolding, on which they were accommodated with seats.

In b.c. 467, his friend and patron king Hiero died; and in b.c. 458, it appears that Aeschylus was again at Athens from the fact that the trilogy of the Orestes was produced in that year. The conjecture of Böckh, that this might have been a second representation in the absence of the poet, is not supported by any probable reasons, for we have no indication that the Orestes ever had been acted before. (Hermann, Opusc. ii. p. 137.) In the same or the following year (b.c. 467), Aeschylus again visited Sicily for the last time, and the reason assigned for this his second or as others conceive his fourth visit to this island, is both probable and sufficient. The fact is, that in his play of the Eenemides, the third and last of the three plays which made up the Orestean trilogy, Aeschylus proved himself a decided supporter of the ancient dignities and power of that "watchful guardian" of Athens, the aristocratical court of the Areopagus, in opposition to Pericles and his democratical conditors. With this trilogy Aeschylus was indeed successful as a poet, but not as a politician: it did not produce the effects he had wished and intended, and he found that he had striven in vain against the opinions and views of a generation to which he did not belong. Accordingly it has been conjectured that either from disappointment or fear of the consequences, or perhaps from both these causes, he again quitted Athens, and retired once more to Sicily. But another reason, which if founded on truth, perhaps operated in conjunction with the former, has been assigned for his last sojourn in Sicily. This rests on a statement made more or less distinctly by various authors, to the effect that Aeschylus was accused of impiety before the court of the Areopagus, and that he would have been condemned but for the interposition of his brother Ameinias, who had distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis. (Aelian, V. H. v. 19.) According to some authors
This accusation was preferred against him, for having in some of his plays either divulged or profanely spoken of the mysteries of Cereus. According to others, the charge originated from his having introduced on the stage the dread goddesses, the Eumenides, which he had done in such a way as not only to do violence to popular prejudice, but also to excite the greatest alarm among the spectators. Now, the Eumenides contains nothing which can be considered as a publication of the mysteries of Cereus, and therefore we are inclined to think that his political enemies availed themselves of the unpopularity he had incurred by his "Chains of Foes," to get up against him a charge of impiety which was supported not only by what was objectionable in the Eumenides, but also in other plays not now extant. At any rate, from the number of authorities all confirming this conclusion, there can be no doubt that towards the end of his life Aeschylus incurred the serious displeasure of a strong party at Athens, and that after the exhibition of the Orestean trilogy he retired to Gela in Sicily, where he died B. C. 456, in the 69th year of his age, and three years after the representation of the Eumenides. On the manner of his death the ancient writers are unanimous. (Suidas, s. v. Χελωνομαχος.) An eagle, say they, mistaking the poet's tomb for a nest, let a tercine fall full upon it to break the shell, and so fulfilled an oracle, according to which Aeschylus was fated to die by a blow from heaven. The inhabitants of Gela showed their regard for his character, by public solemnities in his honour, by erecting a noble monument to him, and inscribing it with an epitaph written by himself. (Paus. i. 14, § 4; Athen. xiv. 627, d. Vit. Anon.) In it Gela is mentioned as the place of his burial, and the field of Marathon as the place of his most glorious achievements; but no mention is made of his poetry, the only subject of commemoration in the later epigrams written in his honour. At Athens also his name and memory were held in especial reverence, and the prophecy in which he (Athen. viii. 347, e. 3) is said to have predicted his own posthumous fame, when he was first defeated by Sophocles, was perfectly fulfilled. His pieces were frequently reproduced on the stage; and by a special decree of the people, a chorus was provided at the expense of the state for any one who might wish to exhibit his tragedies a second time. (Aristoph. Achar. 102; Aeschy. vita.) Hence Aristophanes (Iun. 892) makes Aeschylus say of himself, that his poetry did not die with him; and even after his death, he may be said to have gained many victories over his successors in Attic tragedy. (Herrmann, Opra. ii. p. 158.) The plays thus exhibited for the first time may either have been those which Aeschylus had not produced himself, or such as had been represented in Sicily, and not at Athens, during his lifetime. The individuals who exhibited his dramatic remains on the Attic stage were his sons Euphorion and Bion: the former of whom, in B. C. 451, victorious with a tetralogy over Sophocles and Euripides (Argum, Eurip. Med.), and in addition to this is said to have gained four victories with dramatic pieces of his father's never before represented. (Blomfield, ad Argum. Aegam. p. 20.) Philocles also, the son of a sister of Aeschylus, was victorious over the King Oedipus of Sophocles, probably with a tragedy of his uncle's. (Argum, Soph. Oed. Tyr.) From and by means of these persons arose what was called the Tragic School of Aeschylus, which continued for the space of 125 years.

We have hitherto spoken of Aeschylus as a poet only; but it must not be forgotten that he was also highly renowned as a warrior. His first achievements as a soldier were in the battle of Marathon, in which his brother Cynaegirus and himself so highly distinguished themselves, that their exploits were commemorated with a descriptive painting in the theatre of Athens, which was thought to be much earlier than the statue there erected in honour of Aeschylus. (Paus. i. 21, § 2.) The epitaph which he himself placed on his tomb proves that he considered his share in that battle as the most glorious achievement of his life, though he was also engaged at Artemisium, Salamis, and Plataea. (Paus. i. 14, § 4.) All his family, indeed, were distinguished for bravery. His younger brother Ameinias (Herod. viii. 84; Diod. xi. 25) was noted as having commenced the attack on the Persian ships at Salamis, and at Marathon no one was so perseveringly brave as Cynaegirus. (Herod. vi. 114.) Hence we may not unreasonably suppose, that the gratitude of the Athenians for such services contributed somewhat to a due appreciation of the poet's merits, and to the tragic victory which he gained soon after the battle of Marathon (n. c. 484) and before that of Salamis. Nor can we wonder at the peculiar vividness and spirit with which he portrays the "pomp and circumstance" of war, as in the Persae, and the "Seven against Thebes," describing its incidents and actions as one who had really been an actor in scenes such as he paints.

The style of Aeschylus is bold, energetic, and sublime, full of gorgeous imagery, and magnificent expressions such as became the elevated characters of his drama, and the ideas he wished to express. (Aristoph. Ran. 934.) This sublimity of diction was however sometimes carried to an extreme, which made his language turgid and inflated, so that as Quintilian (x. 1) says of him, "he is grandiloquent to a fault." In the turn of his expressions, the poetical predominates over the syntactical. He was peculiarly fond of metaphorical phrases and strange compounds, and obsolete language, so that he was much more epic in his language than either Sophocles or Euripides, and excelled in displaying strong feelings and impulses, and describing the awful and the terrible, rather than in exhibiting the workings of the human mind under the influence of complicated and various motives. But notwithstanding the general elevation of his style, the subordinate characters in his plays, as the watchman in the Agamemnon, and the nurse of Orestes in the Choephoroe, are made to use language fitting their station, and less removed from that of common life.

The characters of Aeschylus, like his diction, are sublime and majestic—they were gods and heroes of colossal magnitude, whose imposing aspect could be endured by the heroes of Marathon and Salamis, but was too awful for the contemplation of the next generation, who complained that Aeschylus' language was not human. (Aristoph. Ran. 1056.) Hence the general impressions produced by the poetry of Aeschylus were rather of a religious than of a moral nature; his personages being both in action and suffering, superhuman, and therefore not always fitted to teach practical lessons. It produces indeed a sort of religious awe, and dread of the irresistible power of the gods, to which man is represented as being entirely subject; but on the other hand heightens effect, apprises of the shapeless and irresistible destiny, or the victim of a struggle between superior beings.

Still Aeschylus sometimes discloses a providential order of compensation and retribution, while he always teaches the duty of resignation and submission to the will of the gods, and the futility and fatal consequences of all opposition to it. See Quarterly Review, No. 112, p. 315.

With respect to the construction of his plays, it has been often remarked, that they have little or no plot, and are therefore wanting in dramatic interest: this deficiency however may strike us more than it otherwise would in consequence of most of his extant plays being only parts, or acts of a more complicated drama. Still we cannot help being impressed with the belief, that he was more capable of sketching a vast outline, than of filling up its parts, however bold and vigorous are the sketches by which he portrays and groups his characters. His object, indeed, according to Aristophanes, in such plays as the Persae, and the Seven against Thebes, which are more epic than dramatic, was rather to animate his countrymen to deeds of glory and warlike achievement, and to inspire them with generous and elevated sentiments, by a vivid exhibition of noble deeds and characters, than to charm or stagger by the incidents of an elaborate plot. (Rutut. 1000.) The religious views and tenets of Aeschylus, so far as they appear in his writings, were Homeric. Like Homer, he represents Zeus as the supreme Ruler of the universe, while the gods, are the superintendents and centre of all things. To him all the other divinities are subject, and from him all their powers and authority are derived. Even Fate itself is sometimes identical with his will, and the result of his decrees. He only of all the beings in heaven and earth is free to act as he pleases. (Prom. 40.)

In Philosophical sentiments, there was a tradition that Aeschylus was a Pythagorean (Cic. Tus. Disp. ii. 10); but of this his writings do not furnish any conclusive proof, though there certainly was some similarity between him and Pythagoras in the purity and elevation of their sentiments.

The most correct and lively description of the character and dramatic merits of Aeschylus, and of the estimation in which he was held, by his contemporaries and immediate successors, is given by Aristophanes in his "Frogs." He is there depicted as proud and impetuous, and his style and genius such as we have described it. Aristophanes was evidently a very great admirer of him, and sympathised in no common degree with his political and moral sentiments. He considered Aeschylus as without a rival and utterly unapproachable as a tragic poet; and represents even Sophocles himself as readily yielding to and submitting his superior claims to the tragic throne. But few if any of the ancient critics seem to have altogether concurred with Aristophanes in his estimation of Aeschylus, though they give him credit for his excellences. Thus Dionysius (De Poet. Enarr. 6) praises the originality of his ideas and of his expressions, and the beauty of his imagery, and the propriety and dignity of his characters. Longinus (15) speaks of his elevated conceptions and imagery, but condemns some of his expressions as harsh and overstrained; and Quintilian (x. 1) expresses himself much in the same effect. The expression attributed to Seneca, that "Aeschylus died without knowing it" (Athen. x. p. 288. f.), in other words, that he was an unconscious genius, working without any knowledge of or regard to the artistic laws of his profession, is worthy of note. So also is the observation of Schlegel (Lecture iv.), that "Generally considered, the tragedies of Aeschylus are an example amongst many, that in art, as in nature, gigantic productions precede those of regulated symmetry, which then dwindle away into delicacy and insignificance; and that poetry in her first manifestation always approaches nearest to the awfulness of religion, whatever shape the latter may assume among the various races of men." Aeschylus himself used to say of his dramas, that they were fragments of the great banquet of Homer's table. (Athen. viii. p. 847, e.) The alterations made by Aeschylus in the composition and dramatic representation of Tragedy were so great, that he was considered by the Athenians as the father of it, just as Homer was of Epic poetry and Herodotus of History. (Philos. Vit. Apoll. vi. 11.) As the ancients themselves remarked, it was a greater advance from the elementary productions of Theopis, Chorcius, and Phrynichus, to the stately tragedy of Aeschylus, than from the latter to the perfect and refined forms of Sophocles. It was the advance from infancy if not to maturity, at least to a youthful and vigorous manhood. Even the improvements and alterations introduced by his successors were the natural results and suggestions of those of Aeschylus. The first and principal alteration in which he made was the introduction of a second actor (§ 16), and the consequent formation of the dialogue properly so called, and the limitation of the choral parts. So great was the effect of this change that Aristotle denotes it by saying, that he made the dialogue, the principal part of the play (τον γραμματωδοις 16, instead of the choral part, which was now become subsidiary and secondary. This innovation was of course adopted by his contemporaries, just as Aeschylus himself (e. g. in the Cepheus 605—716) followed the example of Sophocles, in subsequently introducing a third actor. The characters in his plays were sometimes represented by Aeschylus himself. (Athen. i. p. 39.) In the early part of his career he was supported by an actor named Cledamus, and afterwards by Myrcinus of Chalchis. (Vita apud Robert. p. 161.) The dialogue between the two principal characters in the plays of Aeschylus was generally kept up in a strictly symmetrical form, each thought or sentiment of the two speakers being expressed in one or two unbroken lines: e. g. as the dialogue between Kratos and Hephaestus at the beginning of the Prometheus. In the same way, in the Seven against Thebes, Eetocles always expresses himself in three lines between the reflections of the chorus. This arrangement, differing as it does from the forms of ordinary conversation, gives to the dialogue of Aeschylus an elevated and stately character, which bespeaks the conversation of gods and heroes. But the improvements of Aeschylus were not limited to the composition of tragedy: he added the resources of art in its exhibition. Thus, he is said to have availed himself of the skill of Aga-thancus, who painted for him the first scenes which had ever been drawn according to the principles of linear perspective. (Vitr. Pol. lib. viii.) He also adorned his scenes with more suitable and magnificent dresses, with significant and various masks, and with the thick-soled cesthurnus, to raise their stature to the height of heroes. He moreover bestowed so much attention on the choral dances, that he is said to have invented various figures himself, and to have instructed the choristers in them without the aid of the regular ballet-masters. (Athen. i. p. 21.) So great was Aeschylus's skill as a teacher in this respect, that Telesedes, one of his choristers, was able to express by dance alone the various incidents of the play of the Seven against Thebes. (Athen. l.c.) The removal of all deeds of bloodshed and murder from the public view, in conformity with the rule of Horace (A. P. 183), is also said to have been a practice introduced by Aeschylus. (Philo. Vit. Apol. vi. 11.) With him also arose the usage of representing at the same time a trilogy of plays connected in subject, so that each formed one act, as it were, of a great whole, which might be compared with some of Shakespeare's historical plays. Even before the time of Aeschylus, it had been customary to contend for the prize of tragedy with three plays exhibited at the same time, but it was reserved for him to shew how each of these tragedies might be complete in itself, and independent of the rest, and nevertheless form a part of a harmonious and connected whole. The only example still extant of such a trilogy is the Oresteia, as it was called. A systical play commonly followed each tragical trilogy, and it is recorded that Aeschylus was no less a master of the ludicrous than of the serious drama. (Paus. ii. 13, § 5.)

Aeschylus is said to have written seventy tragedies. Of these only seven are extant, namely, the "Persians," the "Seven against Thebes," the "Suppliant," the "Prometheus," the "Agamemnon," the "Choephoros," and "Eumenides;" the last three forming, as already remarked, the trilogy of the "Oresteia." The Persians was acted in B.C. 472, and the "Seven against Thebes" a year afterwards. The Oresteia was represented in B.C. 459; the "Suppliant" and the "Prometheus" were brought out some time between the "Seven against Thebes" and the "Oresteia." It has been supposed from some allusions in the "Suppliant," that this play was acted in B.C. 461, when Athens was allied with Argos.

The first edition of Aeschylus was printed at Venice, 1518, 8vo.; but parts of the Agamemnon and the Choephoroe are not printed in this edition, and those which are given, are made up into one play. Of the subsequent editions the best was by Stanley, Lond. 1663, fo. with the Scholia and a commentary, reedited by Butler. The best recent editions are by Wellauer, Lips. 1823, W. Dindorf, Lips. 1827, and Scholzfeld, Camb. 1839. There are numerous editions of various plays, of which those most worthy of mention are by Blomefield, Muller, Klaussen, and Pelle. The principal English translations are by Porter, Hartford, and Tod. Free trans. by T. Couchman, Asclepius Vom Vater, Hamburg, 1814; Welecker, Die Aeschyli Tragödie Promethiuss, Darmstadt, 1824, Nachtrag zur Tragödie, Frankf. 1826, and Die Griech. Tragödien, Bonn, 1840; Klaussen, Theologicae Aeschyli Tragicis, Berol. 1829. [R. W.] Aeschylus (Ἀισχύλος), of Alexandria, an epic poet, who must have lived previous to the end of the second century of our era, and whom Athenaeus calls a well-informed man. One of his poems bore the title "Amphitryon," and another "Messeneim." A fragment of the former is preserved in Athenaeus. (xiii. p. 599.) According to Zenobius (v. 83), he had also written a work on proverbs. (Peth. Paroimior. p. 51.) [L. S.] Aeschylus of Cnidus, a contemporary of Cicero, and one of the most celebrated rhetoricians in Asia Minor. (Cic. Brut. 91, 95.) Aeschylus (Ἀισχύλος), of Rhodes, was appointed by Alexander the Great one of the inspectors of the governors of that country after its conquest in B.C. 302. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 6; comp. Curt. iv. 6.) He is not spoken of again till B.C. 319, when he is mentioned as conveying in four ships six hundred talents of silver from Cilicia to Macedonia, which were detained at Ephesus by Antigonus, in order to pay his foreign mercenaries. (Diod. xviii. 63.) Aesculapius (Ἀσκληπιός), the god of the medical art. In the Homeric poems Aesculapius does not appear to be considered as a divinity, but merely as a human being, which is indicated by the adjective ἄσκληπιος, which is never given to a god. No allusion is made to his descent, and he is merely mentioned as the ἀρχιπροσφωνος, and the father of Machon and Podalirius. (Hes. Th. 781, iv. 194, xi. 510.) From the fact that Homer (Od. iv. 293) calls all those who practise the healing arts descendants of Paeon, and that Podalirius and Machan are called the sons of Aesculapius, it has been inferred, that Aesculapius and Paeon are the same being, and consequently a divinity. But wherever Homer mentions the healing god, it is always Paeon, and never Aesculapius; and as in the poet's opinion all physicians were descended from Paeon, he probably considered Aesculapius in the same light. This supposition is corroborated by the fact, that in later times Paeon was identified with Apollo, and that Aesculapius is universally described as a descendant of Apollo. The two sons of Aesculapius in the Iliad, were the physicians in the Greek army, and are described as ruling over Tricca, Rhione, and Oceania. (Ili. ii. 729.) According to Proxenus, and Halm (Hist. v. 330), Lapidies was a son of Apollo and Stilbe, and Aesculapius was a descendant of Lapithes. This tradition seems to be based on the same groundwork as the more common one, that Aesculapius was a son of Apollo and Coronis, the daughter of Phlegyas, who is a descendant of Lapithes. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 3; Pind. Pyth. iii. 14, with the Schol.) The common story then goes on as follows. When Coronis was with child by Apollo, she became enamoured with Ischys, an Arcadian, and Apollo informed of this by a raven, which he had set to watch her, or, according to Pindar, by his own prophetic powers, sent his sister Artemis to kill Coronis. Artemis accordingly destroyed Coronis in her own house at Lacon, in Thessaly, on the shore of Lake Baebia. (Comp. Hom. Hymn. 27, 3.) According to Ovid (Met. ii. 605, &c.) and Hyginus (Poet. Astr. i. 40), it was Apollo himself who killed Coronis and Ischys. When the body of Coronis was to be burnt, Apollo, or, according to others (Paus. ii. 26, § 5), Hermes, saved the child (Aesculapius) from the flames, and carried it to Chiron, who instructed the boy in the art of healing and in hunting. (Pind. Pyth. iii. 1, &c.; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. l. c.) According to other traditions Aesculapius was born at Tricena in Thessaly (Strab. xiv. § 647), and others again related that Coronis gave birth to him during an expedition of her father Phlegyas into Peloponnesus, in the territory of Epidaurus, and that she exposed him on mount Titholeon, which was before called Myrtion. Here he was fed by a goat and watched by a dog, until at last he was found by Arethusa, a shepherd, who saw the boy surrounded by a lustre like that of lightning. (See a different account in Paus. viii. 28. § 6.) From this dazzling splendour, or from his having been rescued from the flames, he was called by the Dorians Ἀδησάλης. The truth of the tradition that Aesculapius was born in the territory of Epidaurus, and was not the son of Areinoch, daughter of Leucippus and born in Messenia, was attested by an oracle which was consulted to decide the question. (Paus. ii. 26. § 6, iv. 3. § 2; Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 22, where three different Aesculapiuses are made out of the different local traditions about him.) After Aesculapius had grown up, reports spread over all countries, that he not only cured all the sick, but called the dead to life again. About the manner in which he acquired this latter power, there were two traditions in ancient times. According to the one (Apollod. l. c.), he had received from Athena the blood which had flowed from the veins of Gorgo, and the blood which had flowed from the veins of the right side of her body possessed the power of restoring the dead to life. According to the other tradition, Aesculapius on one occasion was shut up in the house of Glaucus, whom he was to cure, and while he was standing absorbed in thought, there came a serpent which twined round the staff, and which he killed. Another serpent then came carrying in its mouth a herb with which it recalled to life the one that had been killed, and Aesculapius henceforth made use of the same herb with the same effect upon men. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14.) Several persons, whom Aesculapius was believed to have restored to life, are mentioned by the Scholiast on Pindar (Pyth. iii. 96) and by Apollodorus. (l. c.) When he was exercising this art upon Glaucus, Zeus killed Aesculapius with a flash of lightning, as he feared lest men might gradually contrive to escape death altogether (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4), or, according to others, because Pluto had complained of Aesculapius diminishing the number of the dead too much. (Diod. iv. 71; comp. Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 102.) But, on the request of Apollo, Zeus placed Aesculapius among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14.) Aesculapius is also said to have taken part in the expedition of the Argonauts and in the Calydonian hunt. He was married to Epione, and besides the two sons spoken of by Homer, we also find mention of the following children of his: Janicmus, Alexonor, Aratus, Hygieia, Angle, Iaso, and Pannæcia (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 14; Paus. ii. 10. § 3, i. 54. § 2), most of whom are only personifications of the powers ascribed to their father. These are the legends about one of the most interesting and important divinities of antiquity. Various hypotheses have been brought forward to explain the origin of his worship in Greece; and, while some consider Aesculapius to have been originally a real personage, whom tradition had connected with various marvellous stories, others have explained all the legends about him as mere personifications of certain ideas. The serpent, the perpetual symbol of Aesculapius, has given rise to the opinion, that the worship was derived from Egypt, and that Aesculapius was identical with the serpent Nunph worshipped in Egypt, or with the Phoenician Esmun. (Eutrep. Eutrep. 1. 10; comp. Paus. vii. 28. § 6.) But it does not seem necessary to have recourse to foreign countries in order to explain the worship of this god. His story is undoubtedly a combination of real events with the results of thoughts or ideas, which, as in so many instances in Greek mythology, are, like the former, considered as facts. The kernel, out of which the whole myth has grown, is perhaps the account we read in Homer; but gradually the sphere in which Aesculapius acted was so extended, that he became the representative or the personification of the healing powers of nature, which are naturally enough described as the son (the effects) of Helios—Apollo, or the Sun. Aesculapius was worshiped all over Greece, and many towns, as we have seen, claimed the honour of his birth. His temples were usually built in healthy places, on hills outside the town, and near wells which were believed to have healing powers. These temples were not only places of worship, but were frequented by great numbers of sick persons, and may therefore be compared to modern hospitals. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. p. 286, n.) The principal seat of his worship in Greece was Epidaurus, where he had a temple surrounded with an extensive grove, within which no one was allowed to die, and no woman to give birth to a child. His sanctuary contained a magnificent statue of ivory and gold, the work of Thrasymedes, in which he was represented as a handsome and manly figure, resembling that of Zeus. (Paus. ii. 26 and 27.) He was seated upon a throne, holding in one hand a staff, and with the other resting upon the head of a dragon (serpent), and by his side lay a dog. (Paus. ii. 27. § 2.) Serpents were everywhere connected with the worship of Aesculapius, probably because they were a symbol of prudence and renovation, and were believed to have the power of discovering herbs of wondrous powers, as is indicated in the story about Aesculapius and the serpents in the house of Glaucus. Serpents were further believed to be guardians of wells with salutary powers. For these reasons a peculiar kind of tame serpents, in which Epidaurus abounded, were not only kept in his temple (Paus. ii. 28. § 1), but were preserved as a form of a serpent. (Paus. iii. 28. § 4; Val. Max. i. 8. § 2; Liv. Epit. 11; compare the account of Alexander Pseudoanimis in Lucian.) Besides the temple of Epidaurus, whence the worship of the god was transplanted to various other parts of the ancient world, we may mention those of Tricena (Strab. ix. p. 437), Celaenae (xiii. p. 603), between Dyme and Patrai (viii. p. 386), near Cyllene (viii. p. 337), in the island of Cos (xii. p. 657; Paus. iii. 23. § 4), at Gerania (Strab. viii. p. 360), near Cnus in Arcadia (Steph. Byz. s. v.), at Sicyon (Paus. H. 10. § 2), at Athens (i. 21. § 7), near Patrai (vii. 21. § 6), at Titane in the territory of Sicyon (vii. 23. § 6), at Theopais (viii. 25. § 3), in Messene (iv. 31. § 8), at Philus (ii. 12.
AESEOPUS.

The sick, who visited the temples of Asclepius, had usually worn one or more threads in his sanctuary (antevit, incaule). (Paus. ii. 27 § 2), during which they observed certain rules prescribed by the priests. The god then usually revealed the remedies for the disease in a dream. (Aristoph. Plat. 662, &c.; Cia. Do Div. i. 59; Philostr. Vita Apollon. i. 7; Jambli. De Mysteri. iii. 2.) It was in allusion to this inculcato that many temples of Asclepius contained statues representing Sleep and Dream. (Paus. ii. 10 § 2.)

The statues which the god cured of their disease offered a sacrifice to him, generally a cock (Plat. Phaed. p. 118) or a goat (Paus. x. 82 § 8; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. ii. 350), and hung up in his temple a tablet recording the name of the sick, the disease, and the manner in which the cure had been effected. The temples of Epidaurus, Tricca, and Cos, were full of such votive tablets, and several of them are still extant. (Paus. ii. 37 § 3; Strab. viii. p. 374; comp. Dict. of Ant. p. 673.)

The various remarks given to the god partly describe him as the healing or saving god, and are partly derived from the places in which he was worshipped. Some of his statues are described by Pausanias. (ii. 10 § 3, x. 32 § 8.) Besides the attributes mentioned in the description of his statue at Epidaurus, he is sometimes represented holding in one hand a phial, and in the other a staff; sometimes also a boy is represented standing by his side, who is the genius of recovery, and is called (as elsewhere) Hemimerius, or Asceus. (Paus. ii. 11 § 7.)

We still possess a considerable number of marble statues and busts of Asclepius, as well as various representations on coins and gems. (Böttiger, Amathia, i. p. 232; ii. p. 361; Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. ii. p. 84; Müller, Handb. der Archäol. p. 597, &c. 710.)

There were in antiquity two works which went under the name of Asclepius, which, however, were no more genuine than the works ascribed to Orpheus. (Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. i. p. 55, &c.)

The descendants of Asclepius were called by the patronymic name Asclepiadei. (Aephr. Rhet. i. 16.)

The editors, who consider Asclepius as a real personage, must regard the Asclepiadei as his real descendants, and when he transmitted his medical knowledge, and whose principal seats were Cos and Cnidos. (Plat. de Ré Publ. iii. p. 405, &c.)

But the Asclepiadei also regarded an order or caste of priests, and for a long period the practice of medicine was intimately connected with religion. The knowledge of medicine was regarded as a sacred secret, which was transmitted from father to son in the families of the Asclepiadai, and we still possess the oath which every one was obliged to take when he was put in possession of the medical secrets. (Galen, Anat. ii. p. 128; Aristid. Orat. i. p. 80; comp. K. Sprengcl, Gesch. der Medicin, vol. 1.)

[AESERNY/NUS. [MARCELLUS.]

AESON (Aesōn), a son of Crethen, the founder of Iolcos, and of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. He was excluded by his step-brother Pelias from his share in the kingdom of Thessaly. He was father of Jason and Promachus, but the name of his wife is differently stated, as Polymede, Aleimede, Amphinome, Polypheus, Polymele, Arne, and Searpho. (Apollod. i. 9 § 11 and § 16; Hom. Od. xii. 238; Paus. ad loc.; Euphor. 762; Diod. iv. 59; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 45; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xii. 580.) Pelias endeavoured to secure the throne to himself by sending Jason away with the Argonauts, but when one day he was surprised and frightened by the news of the return of the Argonauts, he attempted to get rid of Jason by force, but the latter put an end to his own life. (Apollod. i. 9 § 27.) According to an account in Diodorus (iv. 50), Pelias compelled Jason to kill himself by drinking ox's blood, for he had received intelligence that Jason and his companions had perished in their expedition. According to Ovid (Met. vii. 163, 250, &c.), Jason survived the return of the Argonauts, and was made young again by Medea. Jason as the son of Aeson is mentioned as Aesonides. (Orph. Arg. 55.)

AESONIDES. [AESON.]

AESOPUS (Aesopos), a writer of Fables, a species of composition which has been defined "analogical narratives, intended to convey some moral lesson, in which irrational animals or objects are introduced as speaking." (Philolog. Museum, i. p. 260.) Of his works none are extant, and of his life scarcely anything is known. He appears to have lived about B.C. 570, for Herodotus (ii. 134) mentions a woman named Rhodopis as a fellow-slave of Aesop's, and says that she lived in the time of Amasis king of Egypt, who began to reign B.C. 569. Plutarch makes him contemporary with Solon (Sept. Sept. Comm. p. 159, c), and Laertius (i. 72) says, that he flourished about the 58th Olympiad. The only apparent authority against this date is that of Suidas (c. Aesopos); but the passage is plainly corrupt, and if we adopt the correction of Clinton, it gives about B.C. 620 for the date of his birth; his death is placed about B.C. 584, but may have occurred a little later. (See Clinton, Fast. Heliol. vol. i. pp. 218, 237, 239.)

Suidas tells us that Samos, Sardis, Messenaria in Thrace, and Coticeum in Phrygia dispute the honour of having given him birth. We are told that he was originally a slave, and the reason of his first writing fables is given by Plutarch. (Plut.)
to win his favour by repeating to him fables, and some Aesopus. In a letter to an unknown correspondent, discussing the nature of fables and anecdotes, the author questions the value of such stories in modern literature. The text discusses the origins of fables, their use as moral lessons, and their relationship to the ancient world. The author also examines the role of anecdotes in Aesop's works and considers the influence of such stories on modern readers. The text concludes with a reflection on the enduring appeal of Aesop's fables and their continued relevance in contemporary society.

AESCUPUS, a Greek historian, who wrote a life of Alexander the Great. The original is lost, but there is a Latin translation of it by Julius Valerius [VALERIUS], of which Franciscus Juretus had, he says (ad Symmachi. Ep. x. 54), a manuscript. It was first published, however, by A. Mai from a MS. in the Ambrosian library, Milan, 1817, ato, reprinted Frankfurt, 1818, 8vo. The title is “Itinerarium ad Constantinum Augustum, etc.: accedit Julli Valerii Res gestae Alexandri Macedoni, etc.” The time when Aesopus lived is uncertain, and even his existence has been doubted. (Barth. Adversus Graecorod, in the preface to his edition, contended that the work was written before 389, A.D., because the temple of Serapis at Alexandria, which was destroyed by order of Theodosius, is spoken of in the translation (Jul. Valer. i. 31) as still standing. But serious objections to this inference have been raised by Letronno (Journ. des Savans, 1818, p. 617), who refers it to the seventh or eighth century, which the weight of internal evidence would rather point to. The book is full of the most extravagant stories and glaring mistakes, and is a work of no credit. [A. A.]

AESCUPUS, CLAUDIUS or CLODIUS, the most celebrated tragic actor at Rome in the Ciceronian period, probably a freedman of the Cleopatra gens. Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 82) and other authors put him on a level with Roscius. (Fronto, p. 44, ed. Niebuhr.) Each was prominent in his own department; Roscius in comedy, being, with respect to action and delivery (pronuntiatio), more rapid (citator, Quintil. Inst. Or. xi. 3, § 111); Aesopus in tragedy, being more weighty (grevior, Quintil. l.c.). Aesopus took great pains to perfect himself in his art by various methods. He diligently studied the exhibition of character in real life; and when any important trial was going on, especially, for example, when Hortensius was to plead, he was constantly in attendance, that he might watch and be able to represent the more truthfully the feelings which were actually displayed on such occasions. (Val. Max. vi. 4. 2.) He never, it is said, put on the mask for the character he had to perform in, without first looking at it attentively from a distance for some time, that so in performing he might preserve his voice and action in perfect keeping with the appearance he would have. (Fronto, de Eloc. 5. 1, p. 37.) Perhaps this anecdote may confirm the opinion (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Personae), that masks had only lately been introduced in the regular drama at Rome, and were not always used even for leading characters; for, according to Cicero (de Div. i. 37), Aesopus excelled in power of face and fire of expression (tristium arduum nullum anima ustrum), which of course would not have been visible if he had performed only with a mask. From the whole passage in Cicero and from the anecdotes recorded of him, his acting would seem to have been characterised chiefly by strong emphasis and vehemence. On the whole, Cicero calls him stvatus artifex, and says he was fitted to act a leading part no less in real life than on the stage. (Pro Sest. 56.) It does not appear that he ever performed in comedy. Valerius Maximus (viii. 10. § 2) calls Aesopus and Roscius both Iuudici artis peritissimos viros, but this may merely denote the theatrical art in general, including tragedy as well as comedy. (Comp. ludicrici titul, Plin. H. N.xvi. 36.) Fronto calls him (p. 87) Tragmi Ao-success. From Cicero's remark, however, (de Off. i. 114,) it would seem that the character of Ajax was rather too tragic for him. (Comp. Tusc. Quaesit. ii. 17, iv. 25.)

Like Roscius, Aesopus enjoyed the intimacy of the great actor, who calls him nosier Aesopus (ad Fam. vii. 1), noeter familiaris (ad Quo. Frat. i. 2, 4); and they seem to have sought, from one another's society, improvement, each in his respective art. During his exile, Cicero received many valuable marks of Aesopus's friendship. On one occasion, in particular, having to perform the part of Telamon, banished from his country, in one of Aeacus's plays, the tragedian, by his manner and skilful emphasis, and an occasional change of a word, added to the evident reality of his feelings, and succeeded in leading the audience to apply the whole to the case of Cicero, and so did him more essential service than any direct defence of himself could have done. The whole house applauded. (Pro Sert. 56.) On another occasion, instead of "Brutus qui libertatem civium stabilivert," he substituted Tullius, and the audience gave utterance to their enthusiasm by encore the passage "a thousand times" (nillices revocatum est, Pro Sert. 56). The time of his death or his age cannot be fixed with certainty; but at the dedication of the theatre of Pompey (B.C. 55), he would seem to have been elderly, for he was understood previously to have retired from the stage, and we do not hear of his being particularly delicate: yet, from the passage, ill-health or age would appear to have been the reason of his retiring. On that occasion, however, in honour of the festival, he appeared again; but just as he was coming to one of the most emphatic parts, the beginning of an oath, Si scirens fullo, etc., his voice failed him, and he could not go through with the speech. He was evidently unable to proceed, so that any one would readily have excused him: a thing which, as the passage in Cicero implies (ad Fam. vii. 1), a Roman audience would not do for ordinary performers. Aesopus, though far from frugal (Plin. H. N. x. 72), realized, like Roscius, an immense fortune by his profession. He left about 200,000 sesterces to his son Claudius, who proved a foolish spendthrift. (Val. Max. i. 1. § 2.) It is said, for instance, that he dissolved in vinegar and drank a pearl worth about 8,000 sesterces, which he took from the ears of Cordilla Metella. (Herod. ii. 3, 392; Val. Max. i. 1. § 2; Macrob. Sat. ii. 10; Plin. H. N. i. 59.), a favourite seat of the extravagant monomachia in Rome. (Compare Succ. Calig. 37; Macrob. Sat. ii. 13.) The connexion of Cicero's son-in-law Dolabella with the same lady no doubt increased the distress which Cicero felt at the absolute proceedings of the son of his old friend. (Ad Att. xi. 13.)

AETHERS (Aēthēris), a surname of Dionysus, which signifies the Lord, or Ruler, and under which he was worshipped at Arōē in Achaia. The story about the introduction of his worship there is as follows: There was at Troy an ancient image of Dionysus, the work of Hephaestus, which Zeus had once given as a present to Dardanus. It was kept in a chest, and Cassandra and others, setting a chest behind when she quitted the city, because she knew that it would do injury to him who possessed it. When the Greeks divided the spoils of Troy among themselves, this chest fell to the share of the Thessalian Eurybylos, who on opening it suddenly fell into a state of madness. The seer of Delphi was consulted about his recovery, answered, "When thou shalt see men performing a strange sacrifice, there shalt thou dedicate the chest, and there shalt thou settle." When Eurybylos came to Achaia, it was just the season at which its inhabitants offered every year to Artemis Triclaria a human sacrifice, consisting of the fairest youth and the fairest maid of the place. This sacrifice was offered as an atonement for a crime which had once been committed in the temple of the goddess. But an oracle had declared to them, that they should be released from the necessity of making this sacrifice, if a foreign divinity should be brought to them by a foreign king. This oracle was not fulfilled. Eurybylos on seeing the victims led to the altar was cured of his madness and perceived that this was the place pointed out to him by the oracle; and the Aροιans also, on seeing the god in the chest, remembered the old prophecy, stopped the sacrifice, and instituted a festival of Dionysus Aesymnetes, for this was the name of the god in the chest. Nine men and nine women were appointed to attend to his worship. During one night of this festival a priest carried the chest outside the town, and all the children of the place, adored, as formerly the victims used to be, with garlands of corn ears, went down to the banks of the river Meilichius, which had before been called Aemolichius, hung up their garlands, purified themselves, and then put on other garlands of ivy, after which they returned to the sanctuary of Dionysus Aesymnetes. (Paus. vii. 19 and 20.) This tradition, though otherwise very obscure, evidently points to a time when human sacrifices were abolished at Aρoē by the introduction of a new worship. At Patrae in Achaia there was likewise a temple dedicated to Dionysus Aesymnetes. (Paus. vii. 21. § 12.) [L.S.]

AETH'IA-LIDES (Aēthiālides), a son of Hermes and Eupelemia, a daughter of Myrmidon. He was the herald of the Argonauts, and had received from his father the faculty of remembering everything, even in Hades. He was further allowed to reside alternately in the upper and in the lower world. As his soul could not forget anything even after death, it remembered that from the body of Aethia it had successively acquired the form of Euphorbus, Hermioneus, Pyrrhus, and at last into that of Pytingaros, in whom it still retained the recollection of its former migrations. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 54, 640, &c.; Orph. Argon. 131; Hygin. Fab. 14; Diog. Laert. viii. 1. § 4, &c.; Val. Max. i. 437.) [L. S.]

AETH'ER (Aēthēr), a personified idea of the mythical cosmogonies. According to that of Hyginus (Fab. Prec. p. 1, ed. Staven). he was, together with Night, Day, and Erebos, begotten by Chaos and Caligo (Darkness). According to that of Hesiod (Theog. 124), Aether was the son of Erebos and his sister Night, and a brother of Day. (Comp. Phor. De Nat. Deor. 16.) The children of Aether and Day were Land, Heaven, and Sea, and from his connexion with the Earth there sprang all the vices which destroy the human race, and also the Giants and Titans. (Hygin. Fab. Prec. p. 2, &c.) These accounts shew that, in the Greek cosmogonies, Aether was considered as one of the elementary substances out of which the Universe was formed. In the Orphic hymns 15
AETHIOPIA.

(4) Aethier appears as the soul of the world, from which all life emanates, an idea which was also adopted by some of the early philosophers of Greece. In later times Aether was regarded as the wide space of Heaven, the residence of the gods, and Zeus as the Lord of the Aether, or Aether itself personified. (Poen. op. Cit. de Nat. Doctr. ii. 36, 40; Lucr. v. 499; Virg. Aen. xii. 140, Georg. ii. 325.) [L. S.]

AETHIERIE. [HALLADES.]

AETHICUS, HISTER or ISTER, a Roman writer of the fourth century, a native of Istria according to his surname, or, according to Rabanus Maurus, of Seythyn, the author of a geographical work, called Aethici Cosmographia. We learn from the preface that a measurement of the whole Roman world was ordered by Julius Caesar to be made by the most able men, that this measurement was begun in the consulsiphip of Julius Caesar and M. Antonius, &c. n. c. 44; that three Greeks were appointed for the purpose, Zenodorus, Theodotus, and Polyclitus; that Zenodorus measured all the eastern part, which occupied him twenty-one years, five months, and nine days, on the third consulsiphip of Augustus and Crassus; that Theodotus measured the northern part, which occupied him twenty-nine years, eight months, and ten days, on the tenth consulsiphip of Augustus and Crassus; and that Polyclitus measured the southern part, which occupied him thirty-two years, one month, and ten days; that thus the whole (Roman) world was gone over by the measurers within thirty-two (-) years; and that a report of all it contained was laid before the senate. So it stands in the edd.; but the numbers are evidently much corrupted: the contradictoriness of Polyclitus's share taking more than 32 years, and the whole measurement being made in less than (intra) 32 years is obvious.

It is to be observed that, in this introductory statement, no mention is made of the western part (which in the work itself comes next to the eastern), except in the Vatican MS., where the eastern part is given to Nicodamus, and the western to Didymus.

A census of all the people in the Roman subjection was held under Augustus. (Snuda, s. v. Αἰθωποτοι.) By two late writers (Cassiodorus, Var. ii. 82, by an emendation of Huschke, p. 6, über den zur Zeit der Geburt Jesu Christi gehaltenen Census, Bruxell. 1840; and Isidorus, Orig. v. 36, § 4), this numbering of the people is spoken of as connected with the measurement of the land. This work in fact consists of two separate pieces. The first begins with a short introduction, the substance of which has been given, and then proceeds with an account of the measurement of the Roman world under four heads, Orientalia, Occidentalia, Septentrionalia, Meridiana pars. Some come together of lists of names, arranged under heads, Marit. Insul., Montes, Provinciae, Oppida, Fluminia, and Gentes. These are bare lists, excepting that the rivers have an account of their rise, course, and length annexed. This is the end of the first part, the Expositio. The second part is called Aethicus octo Descriptio, and consists of four divisions: (1.) Asianae Provinciae situs cum limitibus et populis suis; (2.) Europaeae situs, &c.; (3.) Africaneae situs, &c.; (4.) Oceanicae situs, &c.; and the Descriptio, occurs with slight variations in Orig. i. 2. In Aethicus what looks like the original commencement, Majores nostri, &c., is tacked on to the preceding part, the Expositio, by the words Haec quadripartita totius terrae continuitatem hic disserit sunt. From this it would appear that Aethicus borrowed it from Orosius.

The same name occurs in different lists; as, for example, Cyprus and Rhodes both in the north and in the east; Corsica both in the west and in the south; or a country is put as a town, as Abisib; Noricam is put among the islands. Mistakes of this kind would easily be made in copying lists, especially if in double columns. But from other reasons and from quotations given by Dicuil, a writer of the 9th century, from the Cosmographia, differing from the text as we have it, the whole appears to be very corrupt. The whole is a very meagre production, but presents a few valuable points. Many successful emendations have been made by Salmasius in his Excercitationes Philologicae, and there is a very valuable essay on the whole subject by Ritschl in the Rheinisches Museum (1842), i. 4.

The sources of the Cosmographia appear to have been the measurements above described, other official lists and documents, and also, in all probability, Agrippa's Commentarii, which are constantly referred to by Plios (Hist. Nat. iii. iv. v. vi.) as an authority, and his Chart of the World, which was founded on his Commentarii. (Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 2.)

Cassiodorus (de inst. divin. 25) describes a cosmographical work by Julius Honorus Cator in terms which suit exactly the work of Aethicus; and Salmasius regards Julius Honorus as the real author of this work, to which opinion Ritschl seems to lean, reading Ethnicus instead of Aethicus, and considering it as a more appellative. In some MSS. the appellatives Sophista and Philosophus are found.

One of the oldest MSS., if not the oldest, is the Vatican one. This is the only one which speaks of the west in the introduction. But it is carelessly written: consulisus (e. g.) is several times put for consulum. Suis is found as a contraction (?) for superius. The introduction is very different in this and in the other MSS.

The first edition of the Cosmographia was by Simler, Basle, 1573, together with the Itinerarium Antonini. There is an edition by Henry Stephens, 1577, with Simler's notes, which also contains Dionysius, Pompomius Mela, and Solinus. The last edition is by Gronovius, in his edition of Pompomius Mela, Leyden, 1722. [A. A.]

AETHILLA (Αθηλλα or Αθηλλα), a daughter of Laomedeon and sister of Priam, Astyoche, and Medesicaste. After the fall of Troy she became the prisoner of Protesilas, who took her, together with other captives, with him on his voyage home. He landed at Scione in Thrace in order to take in fresh water. While Protesilas had gone inland, Aethilla persuaded her fellow-prisoners to set fire to the ships. This was done and all remained on the spot and founded the town of Scione. (Tzetz. ad Lyceorph. 921, 1075; Comon, Narrat. 13; compare P. Mela, ii. 2. § 150; Steph. Byya. s. v. Αθηλλα.) [L. S.]

AETHIOPIS (Αἰθιοπίς), the Glowing or the Black.

1. A son of Zeus, under which he was worshiped in the island of Chios. (Lyceorphr. Circ. 551, with the note of Tzetzes.)

2. A son of Hephaestus, from whom Aethiopia
AETHUSA. was believed to have derived its name. (Plin. H. N. vi. 35; Nat. Com. ii. 6.) [L. S.]

AETHILUS (Ἀθήλιος), the first king of Elis. (Paus. vi. 1. § 2.) He was a son of Zeus and Protageneia, the daughter of Deucalion (Apollod. i. 7. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 155), and was married to Calyce, by whom he begot Erymion. According to some accounts Erymion was himself a son of Zeus and first king of Elis. (Apollod. i. 7. § 5.) Other traditions again made Aethilus a son of Aeolus, who was called by the name of Zeus. (Paus. vi. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

AETHILUS (Ἀθήλιος), the author of a work entitled "Samian Annals" ("Οἱ Σάμιοι Ἀνναὶ"); the fifth book of which is quoted by Athenaeus, although he expresses a doubt about the genuineness of the work. (xiv. p. 659, d. 653, e.) Aethilus is also referred to by Clemens Alexandrinus (Propr. p. 80, α), Eustathius (ad Od. viii. 120, p. 1573), and in the Etymologies of Maximus (s. v. νεάρτης), where the name is written Athilus.

AETHIRA (Ἀθηρά). 1. A daughter of King Pittheus of Troezen. Bellerophon sued for her hand, but was banished from Corinth before the nuptials took place. (Paus. ii. 31. § 12.) She was surprised on one occasion by Poseidon in the island of Sphaeron, which she had gone to, in consequence of a dream, for the purpose of offering a sacrifice on the tomb of Sphaerus. Aethira therefore dedicated in the island a temple to Athena Apatouria (the Deceitful), and called the island Hiera instead of Sphaeron, and also introduced among the maidens of Troezen the custom of dedicating their girdles to Athena Apatouria on the day of their marriage. (Paus. ii. 33. § 11.) At a later time she became the mother of Theseus by Aegeus. (Plut. Thea. 8; Hygin. Fab. 14.) In the night in which this took place, Poseidon also was believed to have been with her. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 7; Hygin. Fab. 37.) According to Plutarch (Thea. 6) her father spread this report merely that Theseus might be regarded as the son of Poseidon, and not much revered at Troezen. This opinion, however, is nothing else but an attempt to strip the genuine story of its marvels. After this event she appears living in Attica, from whence she was carried off to Lacedaemon by Castor and Polydeuces, and became a slave of Helen, with whom she was taken to Troy. (Plut. Thea. 84; Hom. Il. iii. 144.) At the taking of Troy she came to the camp of the Greeks, where she was recognised by her grandsons, and Demophon, one of them, asked Agamemnon to procure her liberation. Agamemnon accordingly sent a messenger to Helen to request her to give up Aethira. This was granted, and Aethira became free again. (Paus. xii. 35. § 8; Dict. Græg. v. 13.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 243) she afterwards put an end to her own life from grief at the death of her sons. The history of her bondage to Helen was represented on the celebrated chest of Cypselus (Paus. iv. 19. § 1; Dion Chrysost. Orat. 11), and in a painting by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.)

2. A daughter of Oceanus, by whom Atlas begot the twelve Hyades, and a son, Hyas. (Ov. Fast. i. 171; Hygin. Fab. 192.) [L. S.]

AETHUSIA (Ἀθησία), a daughter of Poseidon and Alcyone, who was beloved by Apollo, and bore to him Eleutherus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Paus. ix. 20. § 2.) [L. S.]

AETHYRIA (Ἀθηύρια), a surname of Athens, under which she was worshipped in Megara. (Paus. i. 5. § 3; 41. § 6; Lycophr. Cass. 359.) The word athysis signifies a diver, and figuratively a ship, so that the name must have reference to the goddess teaching the art of ship-building or navigation. (Tzetz. ad Lycolp. L. c.) [L. S.]

AETHION. [Cypselus.]

AETHION (Ἀθηόν), 1. A Greek sculptor of Ampipolis, mentioned by Callimachus (Anth. Gr. ix. 356) and Theocritus (Epigr. vii.), from whom we learn that at the request of Nicias, a famous physician of Mileitus, he executed a statue of Areclus in cedar wood. He flourished about the middle of the third century B.C. There was an engraver of the same name; but when he lived is not known. (K. O. Müller, Arch. der Kunst, p. 151.)

2. A celebrated painter, spoken of by Lucian (De Merc. Cond. 42, Herod. or Actio, 4, etc., Imag. 7), who gives a description of one of his pictures, representing the marriage of Alexander and Roxana. This painting excited such admiration when exhibited at the Olympic games, that Proxenidas, one of the judges, gave the artist his daughter in marriage. Action seems to have excelled particularly in the art of mixing and laying on his colours. It has commonly been supposed that he lived in the time of Alexander the Great; but the words of Lucian (Herod. 4) show clearly that he must have lived about the time of Hadrian and the Antonines. (K. O. Müller, Arch. der Kunst, p. 240; Kugler, Kunstgeschichte, p. 529.) [C. P. M.]

AETHUS, a Roman general, who with his rival Boniface, has justly been called by Procopius the last of the Romans. He was born at Dorostora in Moesia (Jornandes, de reb. Get. 84), and his father Gaudentinus, a Scythian in the employ of the empire, having been killed in a mutiny, he was early given as a hostage to Alaric, and under him learnt the arts of barbarian war. (Philostorgius, hist. 12.) After an intellectual support by the Emperor John with an army of 60,000 men (A.D. 424), he became the general of the Roman forces under Placidia, at that time guardian of her son, the emperor Valentinian III. In order to supplant in her favour his rival Boniface, by treacherous accusations of each to the other, Aethus occasioned his revolt and the loss of Africa (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 3, 4); the empress, however, discovered the fraud, and Aethus, after having met Boniface at Ravenna, and killed him in single combat [Bonifagus], was himself compelled to retire in disgrace to the Hunnish army which in 424 he had settled in Pannonia. (Procop. and Marcellinus, in anno 452.) Restored with their help to Italy, he became patrician and sole director of the armies of the western empire. (Jornandes, de reb. Get. 84.) In this capacity, through his long acquaintance with the barbarian settlers, and chiefly with the Huns and Attila himself, in whose court his son Carpilo was brought up, he checked the tide of barbarian invasion, and maintained the Roman power in peace for seventeen years (433-450) in Italy, Spain, Britain, and Gaul, in which last country especially he established his influence by means of his Hun and Alan allies and by his treaty with Theodic the Visigoth. (Siden. Apoll. Paneg. Viet. 300.) And when in 450 this peace was broken by the invasion of Attila, Aethus in concert with Theodoric arrested it first by the timely relief of Orleans and then by the victory of Chalons (Greg. Turon. ii. 7; Jornandes, de reb. Get. 36), and was only prevented from following up his successes in Italy by want of support both from Valentinein and his barbarian allies. (Idatius and Isidorus, in anno 450.) [AETIIA.] The greatness of his position as the sole stay of the empire, and as the sole link between Christendom and the pagan barbarians, may well have given rise to the belief, whether founded or not, that he designed the imperial throne for himself and a barbarian throne for his son Capillo (Sld. Anex. iii. 17; Pseudo-Gr. Hist. 284), and accordingly in 454, he was murdered by Valentinein himself in an access of jealousy and suspicion (Procop. Bell. Vandal. i. 4), and with him (to use the words of the contemporary Marcellinus, in anno 454), "socidet Hesperium Imperium, nec potuit relevari."

His physical and moral activity well fitted him for the life of a soldier (Gregor. Turon. ii. 8), and though destitute of any high principle, he belongs to the class of men like Augustus and Cromwell, whose early crimes are obscured by the usefulness and glory of later life, and in whom a great and trying position really calls out new and unknown excellences.

(Gratianus Frigeridius, in Gregor. Turon. ii. 8; Procop. Bell. Vandal. i. i. 4; Jornandes, de Reb. Get. 34, 35; Gibbon, Decline and Fall. c. 33, 35; Herbert's Attila, p. 322.) [A. P. S.]

AETIUS (Aetius), surmounted the Athédon, from his denial of the God of Revolution (St. Athanas. de Synod. § 6, p. 83, of the translation, Oxf. 1842; Soc. Hist. Ecc. ii. 35; Sozom. Hist. Ecc. iv. 29), was born in Coele Syria (Philostorg. Hist. Ecc. iii. 15; St. Basil, adv. Eunom. i. p. 10) at Antioch (Soc. ii. 35; * Suidas, s. a. *Aetius, and became the founder of the Anatomeon (Ophism) form of the Arian heresy. He was left fatherless and in poverty when a child, and became the slave of a vine-dresser's wife (St. Gregory Nazianz. e. Eunom. p. 292, c. 2; but see Not. Vales. at Pseudo Hist. 15), then a travelling tinker (S. Gr. Hist. 583), a goldsmith, (Phil. Vales. Conviction in a fraud or ambition led him to abandon this life, and he applied himself to medicine under a quack, and soon set up for himself at Antioch. (Soc. iii. 15.) From the schools of medicine being Arian, he acquired a leaning towards Arianism. He frequented the disputations meetings of the physicians (S. Gr. p. 293, n) and made such progress in Eristicism, that he became a paid advocate for such as wished their own theories exhibited most advantageously. On his mother's death he studied under Paulinus II., Arian Bishop of Antioch, A. D. 351; but his powers of persuasion having evanished some influential persons about Eulicius, the successor of Paulinus, he was obliged to quit Antioch for Azozarius, where he presumed the trade of a goldsmith, A. D. 331. (Phil. iii. 15.) Here a professor of grammar noticed him, employed him as a servant, and instructed him; but he was dismissed in disgrace on publicly disputing against his master's interpretation of the Scripture. The Arian Bishop of the city, named Athanasius, received him and read with him the Gospels. Afterwards he read the Epistles with Antonius, a priest of Tarsus till the promotion of the latter to the Episcopate, when he returned to Antioch and studied the Prophets with the priest Leontius. His obtrusive irreligion obliged him again to quit Antioch, and he took refuge in Cilicia (before A. D. 348), where he was defeated in argument by some of the greatest (Borzian) Nestorians. He returned to Alexandria, being led thither by the fame of the Manichee Aphthionius, against whom he recovered the fame for disputation which he had lately lost. He now resumed the study of medicine under Soponis and practised gratuitously, earning money by following his former trade by night (Phil. iii. 15) or living upon others. (Theodoret, Hist. Ecc. ii. 23.) His chief employment, however, was an irreverent application of logical figures and geometrical diagrams to the Nature of the Word of God. (S. Epiphan. adv. Hsscr. §§ 2, and comp. § 6, p. 920.) He returned to Antioch on the elevation of his former master Leontius to that see, A. D. 348, and was by him ordained Deacon (S. Ath. § 38, transl. p. 136), though he declined the ordinary duties of the Diaconate and accepted that of teaching. (A. D. 350.) (Phil. iii. 17.) The Catholic hyemnon, Diodorus and Flavian, protested against this ordination, and Leontius was obliged to depose him. (Thdt. ii. 19.) His dispute with Basil of Anaphe, A. D. 351 (fin.), is the first indication of the future schism in the Arian heresy. (Phil. iii. 15.) Basil incensed Gallus (who became Caesar, March. A. D. 351) against Aetius, and Leontius' intervention only saved the latter from death. Soon Theophilus Blumbery introduced him to Gallus (S. Gr. p. 294), who made him his friend, and often sent him to his brother Julian when in danger of apostasy. (Phil. iii. 17.) There is a letter from Gallus to Aetius, congratulating Julian on his accession to Christianity, as he had heard from Aetius. (Post. Epist. Jul. p. 158, ed. Bollard. Mozunt. 1828.) Aetius was implicated in the murder of Domitian and Montius (see Gibbon, c. 19), A. D. 354 (S. Gr. p. 294, b), but his insignificance saved him from the vengeance of Constantius. However, he quitted Antioch for Alexandria, where St. Athanasius was maintaining Christianity against Arianism, and in A. D. 355 acted as Deacon under George of Cappadocia, the violent interloper into the See of St. Athanasius. (St. Ep. 76. § 1; Thdt. ii. 24.) Here Eunomius became his pupil (Phil. iii. 20) and amanuensis. (Soc. iii. 35.) He is said by Philostorgius (iii. 19) to have refused ordination to the Episcopate, because Serras and Secundus, who made the offer, had mixed with the Catholics; in A. D. 358, when Eudoxius became bishop of Antioch (Thdt. ii. 23), he returned to that city, but popular feeling prevented Eudoxius from allowing him to act as Deacon. The Aetian (Eunomian, see Aetius) schism now begins to develop itself. The bold irreligion of Aetius leads a section of Arians (whom we may call here Anti-Aetians) to accuse him to Constantius (Soc. iii. 13); they allege also his connexion with Gallus, and press the emperor to summon a general Council for the settlement of the Theologic question. The Aetian interest with Eusebius (Soz. i. 16), the powerful Eunuch, divides the intended council, but notwithstanding, the Aetians are defeated at Seleucia, A. d. 353, and, dissolving the council, hasten to Constantinople, to secure his protection against their opponents. (S. Ath. transal. pp. 73, 77, 88, 163, 164.) The Anti-Aetians (who are in fact the more respectable Semi-Arians, see Aetius), follow, and charge their opponents with maintaining a Difference in Substance (Ecclesiastico) in the Trinity, producing a paper to that effect. The accusations among the Aetians, and Aetius is abandoned by his enemies (called Eusebians or Acanei, see Aetius), and banished (S. Bas. i. 4), after protesting against his companions, who, holding the same principle with himself (viz. that the Son was a creature, tvarwos), refused to acknowledge the necessary inference (viz. that He is of unlike substance to the Father, abouwos). (Thid. ii. 28; Soz. iv. 23; S. Greg. p. 301, r.; Phil. iv. 12.) His late friends would not let him remain at Mopsuestia, where he was kindly received by Aetius, the Bishop there; Acacius procures his banishment to Flabdia (Phil. v. 1), where he composed his 500 blasphemy verses against the symbols of his religion, viz. that Ingenerationes (diavronelia) is the essence (eolos) of Deity; which are refuted (those at least which St. Epiphanius had seen) in S. Ep. adv. Haer. 76. He there calls his opponents Chronites, i.e. Temporals, with an apparent allusion to their courtly obsequiousness. (Praefat. op. S. Ep.; comp. c. 4.)

On Constantius's death, Julian recalled the various exiled bishops, as well as Aetius, whom he invited to his court (Ep. Juliani, 31, p. 52, ed. Boisson), giving him, too, a farm in Lesbos. (Phil. iv. 2.) Euzoius, heretical Bishop of Antioch, took off the ecclesiastical condemnation from Aetius (Phil. viii. 5), and he was made Bishop of Constantinople. (S. Ep. 76. p. 992, c.) He spreads his heresies by fixing a bishop of his own religion at Constantinople (Phil. viii. 23) and by various edicts, till the death of Julian, A. D. 364. Valens, however, took part with Eudoxius, the Acacian Bishop of Constantinople, and Aetius retired to Lesbos, where he narrowly escaped death at the hands of the governor, placed there by Procopius in his revolt against Valens, A. D. 365, 366. (See Gibbon. ch. 19.) Again he took refuge in Constantinople, but was driven thence by his former friends. In vain he applied for protection to Eudoxius, now at Marchianople with Valens; and in A. D. 367 (Phil. ix. 7) he died, it seems, at Constantinople, unpitied by any but the equally irreligious Eunomius, who buried him. (Phil. ix. 6.) The doctrinal errors of Aetius are stated historically in the article on Aetius. From the Manichees he seems to have learned his licentious morals, which appeared in the most shocking Sodali-ism, and which he grounded on a Gnostic interpretation of St. John, xvii. 3. He denied, like most other heretics, the necessity of fasting and self-mortification. (S. Ep. adv. Haer. 76. § 4.) At some time or other he was a disciple of Eusebius of Sebaste. (S. Bas. Ep. st. 223 [79] and 244 [82].) Socrates (ii. 35) speaks of several letters from him to Constantine and others. His Treatise is to be found ap. S. Epiph. adv. Haer. 76, p. 924, ed. Petavi. Colon. 1652.

AETIUS (Aetius, Aetius), a Greek medical writer, whose name is commonly but incorrectly spelt Aetius. Historians are not agreed about his exact date. He is placed by some writers as early as the fourth century after Christ; but it is plain from his own work that he did not write till the very end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth, as he refers (tetrab. ii. serm. i. 24, p. 464) not only to St. Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, who died A.D. 444, but also to (tetrab. ii. serm. iii. 110, p. 357) to Petrus Archimedes, who was physician to Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and therefore must have lived still later; he is himself quoted by Alexander Trullanus (xii. 8, p. 346), who lived probably in the middle of the sixth century. He was a native of Amida, a city of Mesopotamia (Photius, cod. 291) and studied at Alexandria, which was the most famous medical school of the age. He was probably a Christian, which may account perhaps for his being confounded with another person of the same name, a famous Arian of Antioch, who lived in the time of the Emperor Julian. In some manuscripts he has the title of wiais fiaiwm, comes oseoiqwm, which means the chief officer in attendance on the emperor (see Du Cange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Latin.); this title, according to Photius (L.c.), he attained at Constantinople, where he was practising medicine. Aetius seems to be the first Greek medical writer among the Christians who gives any specimen of the spells and charms so much in vogue with the Egyptians, such as that of St. Blaise (tetrab. ii. serm. iv. 50, p. 404) in removing a bone which sticks in the throat, and another in relation to a Fistula. (tetrab. iv. serm. iii. 14, p. 762.) The division of his work Βίβλος ἱερά Ἐκκαλέςια, "Sixteen Books on Medicine," into four tetrabibli (tetrabiblos) was not made by himself, but (as Fabricius observed) was the invention of some modern translator, as his way of quoting his own work is according to the numerical series of the books. Although his work does not contain much original matter, it is nevertheless useful as a reliable medical remains of antiquity, as being a very judicious compilation from the writings of many authors whose works have been long since lost. The whole of it has never appeared in the original Greek; one half was published at Venice, 1534, fol. "in aed. Alão," with the title *Aetius Amideni Librorum Medicinalium tomus primus; primi silicet Libri Octo nunc primum in lucem editi, Graecae;" the second volume never appeared. Some chapters of the ninth book were published in Greek and Latin, by J. E. Hebenstreit, Lips. i. 4to. 1757, under the title "Tentamen Philologicum Medicum super Aetii Amideni Synopsis Medicorum Veterum," &c.; and again in the same year, "Aetii Amideni Anecdotos ... Specimen alterum." Another chapter of the same book was edited in Greek and Latin by J. Magnus a Tengström, Aboae, 1817, 4to., with the title "Commentationum in Aetii Amideni Medicorum Anecdota Specimen Primum," etc. Another extract, also from the ninth book, is inserted by Mustoxides and Schinas in their "Συλλογή Ελληνικών Ανεκδότων," Venet. 1816, 8vo. The twenty-fifth chapter of the ninth book was edited in Greek and Latin by J. C. Horn, Lips. 1654, 4to; and the chapter (tetrab. i. serm. ii. 164) "De Significationibus Stellarum," is inserted in Greek and Latin by Petavius, in his "Uranolo-AETOLUS.

6) According to Pausanias (v. i. § 2), his mother was called Asterodia, Chromia, or Hyperpera. He was married to Pronoe, by whom he had two sons, Pleuron and Calydon. His brothers were Paeon, Epeius, and others. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Νηθενος; Conon. Narrat. 14; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 28.) His father compelled him and his two brothers Paeon and Epeius to decide by a coin a duel at Olympia to which of them was to succeed him in his kingdom of Elia. Epeius gained the victory, and occupied the throne after his father, and on his demise he was succeeded by Aetolus. During the funeral games which were celebrated in honour of Azan, he ran with his chariot over Apis, the son of Jason or Salaminus, and killed him, whereupon he was expelled by the sons of Apis. (Apollod. L.c.; Paus. v. § 6; Strab. viii. p. 337.) After leaving Peloponnesus, he went to the country of the Curetes, between the Acheolus and the Corinthian gulf, where he slew Dorus, Laodocus, and Polyproetes, the sons of Helios and Phthia, and gave to the country the name of Aetolia. (Apollod. Paus. ii. cc.) This story is only a mythical account of the colonisation of Aetolia. (Strab. x. p. 466.)

2. See also Pl. Oxytus, and Lestria, and brother of Laiaus. He died a natural end, and his age, and his parents were enjoined by an oracle to bury him neither within nor without the town of Elis. They accordingly buried him under the gate at which the road to Olympia commenced. The gymnasium of Elis used to offer an annual sacrifice on his tomb as late as the time of Pausanias. (v. 4. § 2.)

AFTER, DOMTIUS, of Nemesus (Nismes) in Gaul, was praetor a. d. 25, and gained the favour of Tibero by accusing Claudia Pulchra, the consobrin of Agrippina, in a. d. 26. (Tac. Ann. iv. 52.) From this time he became one of the most celebrated orators in Rome, but excelled his chieftain by conducting accusers for the public. In the following year, a. d. 27, he is again mentioned by Tacitus as the accuser of Varus Quintius, the son of Claudius Pulcher. (Ann. iv. 66.) In consequence of the accusation of Claudia Pulchra, and of some offence which he had given to Caligula, he was accused by the emperor in the senate, but by concealing his own skill in speaking, and pretending to be overpowerd by the eloquence of Caligula, he not only escaped the danger, but was made consul suffectus in a. d. 39. ( Dion Cass. lxx. 19, 20.) In his old age Afer lost much of his reputation by continuing to speak in public, when his powers were extinguished. (Quintil. xii. 11, § 3; Tac. Ann. iv. 52.) He died in the reign of Nero, a. d. 60 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 19), in consequence of a surfeit, according to Hieronymus in the Chronicon of Eusebius.

Quintilian, when a young man, heard Domitius Afer (comp. Plin. Ep. i. 14), and frequently speaks of him as the most distinguished orator of his age. He says that Domitius Afer and Julius Africannus were the best orators he had heard, and that he prefers the former to the latter. (x. 1. 118.) Quintilian refers to a work of his “On Testimony” (v. 7. § 7), to one entitled “Dicta” (vi. 3. § 42), and to some of his orations, of which those on behalf of Domitilla, or Clorinda, and Volusena Catulus seem to have been the most celebrated. (viii. 3. § 16. ii. 2. § 20, 3. § 66. 4. § 31. i. 24. &c.) Respecting the will of Domitius Afer, see Plin. Ep. viii. 18.

AFRANIA, CAIA, or GAAIA, the wife of the

senator Licinius Baccio, a very litigious woman, who always pleaded her own causes before the praetor, and thus gave occasion to the publishing of the edict, which forbade women to postulate. She was perhaps the sister of L. Afranius, consul in B.C. 60. She died in B.C. 48. (Val. Max. viii. 3; Dic. tit. i. 1. § 5.)

AFRANIA GENS, plebeian, is first mentioned in the second century B.C. The only cognomen of this gens, which occurs under the republic, is STELLIO; those names which have no cognomina are given under AFRIANUS. Some persons of this name evidently did not belong to the Afrania Gens. On coins we find only S. Afranius and M. Afranius, of whom nothing is known. (Eckholt, v. p. 132, &c.)

AFRANIANUS. 1. L. AFRANIANUS, a Roman comic poet, who lived at the beginning of the first century B.C. His comedies described Roman scenes and manners (Consuetudines togatae), and the subjects were mostly taken from the life of the lower classes. (Consuetudines labarumiae.) They were frequently polluted with disgraceful amours, which, according to Quintilian, were only a representation of the conduct of Afranius. (x. 1. § 100.) He depicted, however, Roman life with such accuracy, that he is classed with Menander, from whom indeed he borrowed largely. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 57; Macrobi. Sat. vi. 1; Cic. de Fin. i. 6.) Heimitated the style of C. Titius, and his language is praised by Cicero. (Brut. 48.) His comedies are spoken of in the highest terms by the ancient writers, and under the empire they not only continued to be read, but were even acted, of which an example occurs in the time of Nero. (Vell. Pat. i. 17, ii. 19; Gell. xiii. 8; Suet. Ner. 11.) They seem to have been well known even at the latter end of the fourth century. (Auson. Epigr. 71.) Afranius must have written a great many comedies, as the names and fragments of between twenty and thirty are still preserved. These fragments have been published by Bothe, Post. Lat. Scenic. Fragmenta, and by Neukirch, De fabula togata Roman.

2. L. AFRANIANUS, appears to have been of obscure origin, as he is called by Cicero in contempt "the son of Judas," as a person of whom nobody had heard. (Cic. de Att. 16, 20.) He was first brought into notice by Pompey, and was always his warm friend and partisan. In B.C. 77 he was one of Pompey's legates in the war against Sertorius in Spain, and also served Pompey in the same capacity in the Mithridatic war. (Plut. Sert. 19, Pompe. 34, 36, 39; Dion Cass. xxvii. 5.) On Pompey's return to Rome, he was anxious to obtain the consulship for Afranius, that he might the more easily carry his own plans into effect; and, notwithstanding the opposition of a powerful party, he obtained the election of Afranius by influence and bribery. During his consulship, however, (n. c. 60), Afranius did not do much for Pompey (Dion Cass. xxvii. 49), but probably more from want of experience in political affairs than from any want of inclination. In B.C. 58 Afranius had the province of Cisalpine Gaul (comp. Cic. de Att. i. 19), and it may have been owing to some advantages he had gained over the Gauls, that he obtained the triumph, of which Cicero speaks in his oration Pro Balbo (p. 24.)

When Pompey obtained the provinces of the two Spain in his second consulship (n. c. 55), he sent Afranius and Petreius to govern Spain in his name, while he himself remained in Rome. (Vell. Pat. ii. 48.) On the breaking out of the civil war, B.C. 49, Afranius was still in Spain with three legions, and after uniting his forces with those of Petreius, he had to oppose Caesar in the same year, who had crossed over into Spain as soon as he had obtained possession of Italy. After a short campaign, in which Afranius and Petreius gained some advantages at first, they were reduced to such straits, that they were obliged to sue for the mercy of Caesar. This was granted, on condition that their troops should be disbanded, and that they should not serve against him again. (Cass. B. C. ii. 1; cf. also Afranius, B.C. ii. 42.) This and some other cases (Caes. B. C. i. 20-23; Plut. Pompe. 65, Cass. 36.) Afranius, however, did not keep his word; he immediately joined Pompey at Dyrrhacium, where he was accused by some of the aristocracy, though certainly without justice, of treachery in Spain. After the battle of Dyrrhacium, Afranius recommended an immediate return to Italy, especially as Pompey was master of the sea; but this advice was overruled, and the battle of Pharsalia followed, B.C. 48, in which Afranius had the charge of the camp. (Appian, B.C. ii. 65, 76; Plut. Pompe. 66; Dion Cass. xii. 52; Vell. Pat. ii. 52.) As Afranius was one of those who could not hope for pardon, he fled to Africa, and joined the Pompeian army under Catone and Scipio. (Dion Cass. xiii. ii.) After the defeat of the Pompeians at the battle of Thapsus, B.C. 46, at which he was present, he attempted to fly into Mauritania with Faunus Sulla and about 1500 horsemen, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius, and killed a few days afterwards, according to some accounts, in a sedition of the soldiers, and according to others, by the command of Caesar. (Hirt. Bell. Afr. 95; Suet. Cass. 75; Dion Cass. xiii. 12; Florus, iv. 2, § 90; Liv. Epit. 114; Aur. Vict. de Vitr. Ill. 78.)

Afranius seems to have had some talent for war, but little for civil affairs. Dion Cassius says "that he was a better dancer than a statesman" (XXVIII. 49), and Cicero speaks of him with the greatest contempt during his consulship (de Att. i. 16, 20), though at a later time, when Afranius was opposed to Caesar, he calls him animus sumus (Plut. xiii. 14.)

3. L. Afranius, son of the preceding, is noticed with Caesar in Spain through Sulpicius for his own and his father's preservation. He afterwards went as a hostage to Caesar. (Cas. B. C. i. 74, 84.)

4. Afranius Pottius. [POTTIUS.]

5. Afranius Burrus. [BURRUS.]

6. Afranius Quinctianus. [QUINCTIANUS.]

7. Afranius Dexter. [DEXTER.]

8. T. Afranius or T. Afranius, not a Roman, was one of the leaders of the Italian confederates in the Marsic war, B.C. 90. In conjunction with Judacilus and P. Ventidius he defeated the legate Pompeius Strabo, and pursued him into Firmum, before which, however, he was defeated in his turn, and was killed in the battle. (Appian, B.C. i. 40, 47; Florus, iii. 18.)

AFRANIA NUS. [SCIPIO.]

AFRICANUS (Αφρικανος), a writer on veterinary surgery, whose date is not certainly known, but who may very probably be the same person as Sex. Julius Afranius, whose work entitled Κεροτo contained information upon medical subjects. (AFRANICUS, SEX. JULIUS.) His remains were published in the Collection of writers on Veterinary AFRICANUS.

Medicine, first in a Latin translation by J. Ruelius, Tr. 1530, fol., and afterwards in Greek, Bas. 1557, 4to, edited by Grynaeus. [W. A. G.]

AFRICANUS, SEXT. CAECILIIUS, a classical Roman jurist, who lived under Augustus. He was a pupil of Salvinius Julianus, the celebrated reformer of the Edict under Hadrian. [JULIANUS, SALVINIUS.] He consulted Julianus on legal subjects (Dig. 25. tit. 3. s. 3. § 4), and there is a controverted passage in the Digest (Africaenus libro vicecino Epistolarum apud Julainum quer en), &c. Dig. 30. tit. i. s. 30), which has been explained in various ways; either that he published a legal correspondence which passed between him and Julianus, or that he commented upon the epistolary opinions given by Julianus in answer to the letters of clients, or that he wrote a commentary upon Julianus in the form of letters. On the other hand, Julianus "ex Sexto" is quoted by Calvis (li. 216), which shows that Julianus annotated Sextus, the formula "ex Sexto" being synonymous with "ad Sextum." (Neuber, die jur. Klassiker, who says that Sextus but Africaenus was the author of "Libri IX Questiunum," from which many pure extracts are made in the Digest, as may be seen in Hommel's "Pahlenische Pamphlet," where the extracts from each jurist are brought together, and those that are taken from Africaenus occupy 26 out of about 1800 pages.

From his remains, thus preserved in the Digest, it is evident that he was intimately acquainted with the opinions of Julianus, who is the person alluded to when, without any expressed nominative, he uses the words aut, existimatione, seu, potentia, usurp, requir, responsid, pleat, nostrat. This is proved by Calvis from a comparison of some Greek scholia on the Basilica with parallel extracts from Africaenus in the Digest. Paulinus and Ulpius have done Africaenus the honour of citing his authority. He was fond of antiquarian lore (Dig. 7. tit. s. 1. 1. pr. where the true reading is S. Caecilius, not S. Aecilius), and his "Libri IX Questiunum," from the conciseness of the style, the great subtility of the reasoning, and the knottiness of the points discussed, so puzzled the old glossators, that when they came to an extract from Africaenus, they were wont to explain Africaenus lex, id est dilectiss. (Heinrei. Hist. Rom. § eccvi. i.) Mascevus (de Secte Jur. 4. § 3) supposes that Africaenus belonged to the legal sect of the Sabini (Capito), and as our author was a steady follower of Salvis Julianus, who was a Sabinius (Gaius, li. 217, 218), this supposition may be regarded as established. In the time of Antonius Pius, the distinction of schools or sects had not yet worn. Among the writers of the lives of ancient lawyers (Pancrocellius, Jo. Bertrandus, Gratius, &c.) much dispute has arisen as to the time when Africaenus wrote, in conclusion of a corrupt or erroneous passage in Lampridius (Lamp. Alex. S2. 60), which would make him a friend of Severus Alexander and a disciple of Papinian. Calvis ingeniously and satisfactorily disposes of this anachronism by referring to the internal evidence of an extract from Africaenus (Dig. 30. tit. 1. s. 109), which assumes the validity of a legal maxim that was no longer in force when Papinian wrote.

For reasons which it would be tedious to detail, we hold, contrary to the opinion of Meinage (Amoen. Jur. c. 29), that our Sextus Caecilius Africaenus is identical with the jurist sometimes mentioned in the Digest by the name Cecelius or S. Ceclius, and also with that S. Ceclius whose dispute with Favorinus forms an amusing and interesting chapter in the Noces Attic. (Gell. xx. 109. Gellius perhaps draws to some extent upon his own invention, but, at all events, the lawyer's defence of the XII Tables against the attacks of the philosopher is 'ben trovato.' There is something humorously cruel in the concluding stroke of the conversation, in the pedantic way in which our jurist comments the decemviral law against debtors—partis secundo, &c.—by the example of Metius Fundatus, and the harsh sentiment of Virgil:

"At tu dictis, Albane, maneram."

The remains of Africaenus have been admirably expounded by Cujus (ad Africannum tractatus IX. in Cujus. Opp. vol. i.), and have also been annotated by Scipio Gentili. (Scip. Gentilis, Diss. I. X. ad Africaenum, 4to. Altdorf. 1692-7.)

J. T. G.

AFRICANUS, JULIUS, a celebrated orator in the reign of Nero, seems to have been the son of Julius Africanus, of the Gallic state of the Sontani, who was condemned by Tiberius, A. D. 32. (Tac. Ann. vi. 7.) Quintilian, who had heard Julius Africanus, speaks of him and Dominius Afer as the best orators of their time. The eloquence of Africanus was chiefly characterised by vehemence and energy. (Quintil. x. 1. § 118, xii. 10. § 11, comp. viii. § 15; Dial. de Orat. 15.) Pliny mentions a grandson of this Julius Africanus, who was also an advocate and was opposed to him on one occasion. (Ep. vii. 6.) He was consul successus in A. D. 108.

AFRICANUS, SEXT. J ULIUS, a Christian writer at the beginning of the third century, is called by Suidas a Lybian, (v. e. 'Apouneres), but passed the greater part of his life at Emmaus in Palestine, where, according to some, he was born. (Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 63.) When Emmaus was destroyed by fire, Africanus was sent to Elimbashas to solicit its restoration, in which mission he succeeded: the new town was called Nicopolis. (A. D. 221, Eusebius, Chron. sub anno; Syneclis, p. 359, b.) Africanus subsequently went to Alexandria to bear the philosopher Heraclas, who was afterwards bishop of Alexandria. The latter Syrian writers state, that he was subsequently made bishop. He was one of the most learned of the early Christian writers. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. ii. 35) classifies him with Origen and Clement; and it appears from his letter on the History of Susanna, that he was acquainted with Hebrew.

The chief work of Africanus was a Chronicon in five books (αναγνωρισθηκένα χρονολογικόν), from the creation of the world, which he placed in 5499 B.C. to A.D. 221, the fourth year of the reign of Elimbashas. This work is lost, but a considerable part of it is extracted by Eusebius in his "Chronicon," and many fragments of it are also preserved by Georgius Synecellus, Cedrenus, and in the Paschalische Chronicon. (See Ideler, Handbuch d. Chronol. vol. ii. p. 456, &c.) The fragments of this work are given by Galland (Bibl. Pat.), and Routh (Reliquiae Sauris).

Africanus wrote a letter to Origen impugning the authority of the book of Susanna, to which Origen replied, This letter is extant, and has been published, together with Origen's answer, by Wetstein, Bulse, 1674, 4to. It is also contained in De la Rue's edition of Origen. Africans us also wrote a letter to Aristides on the genealogies of Christ in Matthew and Luke (Phot. Bld. 34; Buseh. Hist. Ecl. vi. 29), of which some extracts are given by Eusebius. (I. 7.)

There is another work attributed to Africanus, entitled "Nestf," that is, embroidered girdles, so called from the celebrated "nestis" of Aphrodis. Some modern writers suppose this work to have been written by some one else, but it can scarcely be doubted that it was written by the same Africanus, since it is expressly mentioned among his other writings by Photius (I. c.), Suidas (I. c.), Synclenus (I. c.), and Eusebius. (vi. 28.)

The number of books of which it consisted, is stated variously. Suidas mentions twenty-four, Photius fourteen, and Synclenus nine. It treated of a vast variety of subjects—medicine, agriculture, natural history, the military art, &c., and seems to have been kind of common-place book; in which the author entered the results of his reading. Some of the books are said to exist still in manuscript. (Fabriecius Blo. Græc. vol. iv. pp. 240, &c.) Some extracts from them are published by Thevenot in the "Mathematici Veteres," Paris, 1693, &c., and also in the Geoponica of Cassius Bassus. (Needham, Prolegom. ad Geopon.) The part relating to the military art was translated into French by Guichard in the third volume of "Mémoires crit. et hist. sur plusieurs Points d'Antiquités militaires," Berl. 1774. Compare Duran de la Madre, "Poliéroteque des Anciens," Paris, 1819, 8vo.

AFRICANUS, T. SEXTIUS, a Roman of noble rank, was descended from Agrippina from marrying Silana. In J. an. 62, he took the census in the provinces of Cnami, together with Q. Volusius and Trebellius Maximus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, xiv. 46.) His name occurs in a fragment of the Greek Aryles. (Gruter, p. 118.) There was a T. Sextus Africanus consul with Trench in J. an. 112, who was probably a descendant of the one mentioned above.

AGACYLTS (Agaxyltus), the author of a work about Olympia (περὶ Όλυμπίας), which is referred to by Suidas and Photius. (s. v. Καλέλας.)

AGALLIAS. [AGALLUS.]

AGALLUS (Agallia) of Corecyra, a female grammarian, who wrote upon Homer. ( Athen. i. p. 14, d.) Some have supposed to have written two passages in Suidas (s. v. Αγαλλας and Όρχυς), that we ought to read Augallus in this passage of Athenaeus. The scholiast upon Homer and Eustathius (ad Il. xvii. 481) mention a grammarian of the name of Agallias, a pupil of Aristophanes, the same grammarian, also a Corecyran and a commentator upon Homer, who may be the same as Agallis or perhaps her father.

AGAMEDE (Agameb). 1. A daughter of Aegeus and wife of Muius, who, according to Homer (Od. i. 739), was acquainted with the healing powers of all the plants that grow upon the earth. Hyginus (Fab. 157) makes her the mother of Belus, Actor, and Dictys, by Poseidon.

2. A daughter of Macaria, from whom Agamene, a place in Lesbos, was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αγαμεθης.) (L. E.)

AGAMEDE/DES (Agamebh), a son of Symphilus and great-grandson of Arcas. (Paus. viii. 4. 5. 5.) He was father of Cereyon by Epicaste, who also brought him to a step-son, Trophonius, who was by some believed to be a son of Apollo. According to others, Agamedes was a son of Apollo and Epicaste, or of Zeus and Ioaste, and father of Trophonius. The most common story however is, that he was a son of Erginus, King of Oropomenus, and brother of Trophonius. These two brothers are said to have distinguished themselves as architects, especially in building temples and palaces. Among others, they built a temple of Apollo at Delphi, and a temple of Pyricus, king of Pyria in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 37. 3; Strab. iii. p. 491.) The scholar on Aristophanes (Noeb. 508) gives us a somewhat different account from Charax, and makes them build the temple for king Augelus. The story about this temple in Pausanias bears a great resemblance to that which Herodotus (ii. 121) relates of the temple of the Egyptian king Rhamphsinus. In the construction of the temple of Pyricus, Agamedes and Trophonius contrived to place one stone in such a manner, that it could be taken away outside, and thus formed an entrance to the treasury, without in any way piercing the temple. This temple of Pyricus and Trophonius now constantly robbed the treasury; and the king, seeing that locks and seals were unimpressed while his treasures were constantly decreasing, set traps to catch the thief. Agamedes was thus ensnared, and Trophonius cut off his head to avert the discovery. After this, Trophonius was immediately swallowed up by the earth. On this spot there was afterwards, in the grove of Lebadina, the so-called cave of Agamedes with a column by the side of it. Here also was the oracle of Trophonius, and those who consulted it first offered a ram to Agamedes and invoked him. (Paus. ix. 39. 4; compare Dict. Ant. p. 673.) A tradition mentioned by Cicero (Tusc. Quoal. i. 47; comp. Plut. Do consul. ad Apollon. 14), states that Agamedes and Trophonius, after having built the temple of Apollo at Delphi, came to Athens to go to great thebes, in reward for their labour which was best for men. The god promised to do so on a certain day, and when the day came, the two brothers died. The question is as to whether the story about the Egyptian temple is derived from Greece, or whether the Greek story was an importation from Egypt, has been answered by modern scholars in both ways; but Muller (Orichom. p. 94, &c.) has rendered it very probable that the tradition took its rise among the Minyans, was transferred from them to Augelus, and was known in Greece long before the reign of Pmsanthicus, during which the intercourse between the two countries was opened. (L. S.)

AGAMEMNON (Agamebwan). 1. A son of Pleisthenes and grandson of Atreus, king of Mycenae, in whose house Agamemnon and Menelaus were educated after the death of their father. (Apollod. iii. 5. 2; Schol. ad Euphr. Or. 5; Schol. ad Iliad. ii. 249.) Homer and several other writers call him a son of Atreus, grandson of Pelops, and great-grandson of Tantalus. (Horn. Il. xi. 131; Eurip. Helen. 396; Teetz. ad Iliophr. 147; Hygin. Fab. 97.) His mother was, according to most accounts, Aërope; but some call Eriphyle the wife of Pleisthenes and the mother of Agamemnon. Besides his brother Menelaus, he had a sister, who is called Amastia, Cythera, or Astychoea. (Schol. Euphr. Or. 5; Hygin. Fab. 17.) Aga-memon and Menelaus were brought up together with Aegisthus, the son of Thyestes, in the house of Atreus. When they had grown to manhood, Atreus sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to seek Thyestes. They found him at Delphi, and carried him to Atreus, who threw him into a dungeon. Aegisthus was afterwards forwarded to kill him, but, recognising his father in him, he abjured from the cruel vitiel, and having after expelled Agamemnon and Menelaus, he and his father occupied the kingdom of Mycenae. [AEGIS-THUS] The two brothers wandered about for a time, and at last came to Sparta, where Agamem-non married Clytemnestra, the daughter of Tyndaeus, by whom he became the father of Iphigenia (Iphigeneia), Chrysomelus, Laodice (Electra), and Orestes. (Hom. Il. i. 145, with the note of Eustath.; Lucr. i. 85.) The manner in which Agamemnon came to the kingdom of Mycenae, is differently related. From Homer (I. ii. 108; comp.
Paus. ii. 40. § 6), it appears as if he had peaceably succeeded Thyestes, while, according to others (Aeschy. Agam. 198), he forced Thyestes, and warred him home, since he had become king of Mycenae. He rendered Sicyon and its king subject to himself (Paus. ii. 6. § 4), and became the most powerful prince in Greece. A catalogue of his dominions is given in the Iliad. (ii. 563, &c.; comp. Strab. viii. p. 377; Thucyd. i. 9.) When Homer (I. ii. 108) attributes to Agamemnon the sovereignty over all Argos, the name Argos here signifies Peloponnesus, or the greater part of it, for the city of Argos was governed by Diomedes.
(I. ii. 559, &c.) Strabo (l.c.) has also shown that the name Argos is sometimes used by the tragic poets as synonymous with Mycenae.

When Helen, the wife of Menelaus, was carried off by Paris, the son of Priam, Agamemnon and Menelaus called upon all the Greek chiefs for assistance against Troy. (Odys. xxiv. 115.) The chiefs met at Argos in the palace of Diomedes, where Agamemnon was chosen their chief commander, either in consequence of his superior power (Eustath. ad II. ii. 108; Thucyd. i. 9), or because he had gained the favour of the assembled chiefs by giving them rich presents. (Dictys, Crot. i. 15, 16.) After two years of preparation, the Greek army and fleet assembled in the port of Aulis in Boeotia. Agamemnon had previously consulted the oracle about the issue of the enterprise, and the answer given was, that Troy should fall at the time when the most distinguished among the Greeks should quarrel. (Od. viii. 80.) A similar prophecy was derived from a marvellous occurrence which happened while the Greeks were assembled at Aulis. Once when a sacrifice was offered under the boughs of a tree, a dragon crawled forth from under it, and devoured a nest on the tree containing eight young birds and their mother. Calchas interpreted the sign to indicate that the Greeks would have to fight against Troy for nine years, but that in the tenth the city would fall. (I. ii.
303, &c.) An account of a different miracle poi-tending the same thing is given by Aeschylus.
(Agam. 110, &c.) Another interesting incident happened while the Greeks were assembled at Aulis. Agamemnon, it is said, killed a stag which was sacred to Artemis, and in addition provoked the anger of the goddess by irreverent words.
She in return visited the Greek army with a pestilence, and produced a perfect calm, so that the Greeks were unable to leave the port. When the seers declared that the anger of the goddess could not be soothed unless Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, were offered to her as an atoning sacrifice, Diomedes and Odysseus were sent to fetch her to the camp under the pretext that she was to be married to Achilles. She came; but at the moment of the marriage, she was carried off by Artemis herself (according to others by Achilles) to Taurus, and another victim was substituted in her place. (Hygiv. Fab. 98; Eurip. Iphig. Epid. 80, Iphig. Taur. 15; Sophoc. Elec. 565; Pind. Pyth. x. 35; Ov. Met. xii. 31; Dict. Cret. i. 19; Schol. ad Lycophr. 183; Antonin.

Lib. 27.) After this the calm ceased, and the army sailed to the coast of Troy. Agamemnon alone had one hundred ships, independent of sixty which he had let to the Arcadians. (I. ii. 576,

In the tenth year of the siege of Troy—for it is in this year that the Iliad opens—we find Aga-memnon involved in a quarrel with Achilles respecting the possession of Briseis, a Greek slave which was given up to Agamemnon. Achilles withdrew from the field of battle, and the Greeks were visited by successive disasters. [ACHILLES.]
Zeus sent a dream to Agamemnon to persuade him to lead the Greeks to battle against the Trojans.
(I. ii. 8, &c.) The king, in order to try the Greeks, commanded them to return home, with which they readily complied, until their courage was revived by Odysseus, who persuaded them to prepare for battle. (I. ii. 55, &c.) After a single combat between Paris and Menelaus, a battle followed, in which Agamemnon killed several of the Trojans. When Hector challenged the bravest of the Greeks, Agamemnon offered to fight with him, but in his stead Ajax was chosen by lot.
Soon after this another battle took place, in which the Greeks were worsted (I. viii.), and Aga-memnon in despondence advised the Greeks to take flight and return home. (I. ii. 10.) But he was opposed by the other heroes. An attempt to conciliate Achilles failed, and Agamemnon assembled the chiefs in the night to deliberate about the measures to be adopted. (I. ii. 1, &c.) Odysseus and Diomedes were then sent out as spies, and on the day following the contest with the Trojans was renewed. Agamemnon himself was again one of the bravest, and slew many enemies with his own hand. At last, however, he was wounded by Coon and obliged to withdraw to his tent. (I. ii. 220, &c.) Hector now advanced victoriously, and Aga-memnon again advised the Greeks to save them-seves by flight. (I. ii. 75, &c.) But Odysseus and Diomedes resisted him, and the latter prevailed upon him to return to the battle which was going on near the ships. Poseidon also appeared to Agamemnon in the figure of an aged man, and inspired him with new courage. (I. ii. 125, &c.)
The pressing danger of the Greeks at last induced Patroclus, the friend of Achilles, to take an energetic part in the battle, and he fell roused Achilles to new activity, and led to his reconciliation with Agamemnon. In the games at the funeral pyre of Patroclus, Agamemnon gained the first prize in throwing the spear. (I. xiii. 890, &c.)

Agamemnon, although the chief commander of the Greeks, is not the hero of the Iliad, and in chivalrous spirit, bravery, and character, altogether
AGAMEMNON. AGAPETUS.

AGAMEMNON is among the Greek heroes what Zeus is among the gods of Olympus. This idea appears to have guided the Greek artists, for in several representations of Agamemnon still extant there is a remarkable resemblance to the representations of Zeus. The emblem of his power and majesty in Homer is a sceptre, the work of Hephaestus, which Zeus had once given to Hermes, and Hermes to Polops, from whom it descended to Agamemnon. (II. iii. 108, &c.; comp. Paus. i. 34. § 6.) His armour is described in the Iliad. (xii. 19, &c.)

The remaining part of the story of Agamemnon is related in the Odyssey, and by several later writers. At the taking of Troy he received Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, as his price (Od. xii. 491; Dict. Cret. v. 15), by whom, according to a tradition in Pausanias (i. 16. § 35), he had two sons, Teledamus and Polops. On his return home he was twice driven out of his course by storms, but at last landed in Arcadia, in the dominion of Argus, who had seduced Clytemnestra during the absence of her husband. He invited Agamemnon on his arrival to a repast, and had him and his companions treacherously murdered during the feast (Od. iii. 263 [AEGEISTHUS], and Clytemnes-tra on the same occasion murdered Cassandra. (Od. xi. 400, &c. 422, xxiv. 96, &c.) Odysseus met the shade of Agamemnon in the lower world. (Od. xi. 397, xxiv. 200.) Menelaus erected a monument in honour of his brother on the island of Aegyptus. (Od. xiv. 584.) Pausanias. (ii. 16. § 5) states, that in his time a monument of Agamem- non was still extant at Mycenae. The tragic poets have variously modified the story of the murder of Agamemnon. Aeschylus (Agam. 1492, &c.) makes Clytemnestra alone murder Agamemnon: she threw a net over him while he was in the bath, and slew him with three strokes. Her motive is partly her jealousy of Cassandra, and partly her adulterous life with Aegisthus. According to Tzetzes (ad Lycoth. 1099), Aegisthus committed the murder with the assistance of Clytemnestra. Euripides (Or. 26) mentions a garment which Clytemnestra threw over him instead of a net, and both Sophocles (Elect. 530) and Euripides represent the sacrifice of Iphigenia as the cause for which she murdered him. After the death of Agamemnon and Cassandra, their two sons were murdered upon their tomb by Aegisthus. (Paus. ii. 16. § 5.) According to Pindar (Pyth. xii. 48) the murder of Agamemnon took place at Amyclae, in Laconia, and Pausanias (i. 16. § 5) states that the inhabitants of this place disputed with those of Mycenae the possession of the tomb of Cassandra. (Comp. Paus. iii. 19. § 5.) In later times statues of Agamemnon were erected in several parts of Greece, and he was worshipped as a hero at Amyclae and Olympia. (Paus. iii. 19. § 5, v. 25. § 5.) He was represented on the pedestal of the celebrated Pharnassian Nemesis (i. 31. § 5), and his fight with Coon on the east of Cyperna. (v. 49. § 2.) He is painted in the Apotheosis of Delphi, by Polygnotus. (v. 25. § 2; compare Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36. § 5; Quintil. ii. 13. § 18; Val. Max. viii. 11. § 6.) It should be remarked that several Latin poets mention a bastard son of Agamemnon, of the name of Halesus, to whom the foundation of the town of Faeseci or Alaescestes is ascribed. (Or. Fast. iv. 76; Amor. i. 13, 31; comp. Serv. ad Aen. vii. 635; Sil. Ital. viii. 476.)

2. A surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped at Sparta. (Lycophr. 335, with the Schol.; Estut. ad H. ii. 25.) Eustathius thinks that the god derived this name from the resemblance between him and Agamemnon; while others believe that it is a mere epithet signifying the Eternal, from διός and μετών. [L. S.]

AGAMEMNÔNIDES (Ἀγαμημνώνιδες), a patronymic form from Agamemnon, which is used to designate his son Orestes. (Hom. Od. i. 30; Juv. viii. 215.) [L. S.]

AGAÎNIÇÉ or AGAÎNIÇÔNÉ (Αγαίνικη or Αγανικώνη), daughter of Hegetor, a Thessalian, who by her knowledge of Astronomy could foretell when the moon would disappear, and imposed upon credulous women, by saying that she could draw down the moon. (Plut. de Off. Conjug. p. 145, de Defect. Orac. p. 417.) [L. S.]

AGANIPPE (Ἀγανίππη). 1. A nymph of the well of the same name at the foot of Mount Helicon, in Boeotia, which was considered sacred to the Muses, and believed to have the power of inspiring those who drank of it. The nymph is called a daughter of the river-god Peneius. (Paus. ix. 29. § 3; Vieg. Biol. x. 12.) The Muses are sometimes called Aganippides.

2. The wife of Arcesius, and according to some accounts the mother of Danae, although the latter is more commonly called a daughter of Eurydice. (Hygin. Fab. 68; Schol. ad Apollon. Arv. iv. 191.) [L. S.]

AGAINIPPOS, is used by Ovid (Fast. v. 7) as an epithet of Hippocrene; its meaning however is not quite clear. It is derived from Aganippe, the well or nympha, and as Aganippides is used to designate the Muses, Againippis Hippocrene may mean nothing but "Hippocrene, sacred to the Muses." [L. S.]

AGAPÉNOR (Ἀγαπήνωρ), a son of Ancaeus, and grandson of Lycurgus. He was king of the Arcadians, and received sixty ships from Agamemnon, in which he led his Arcadians to Troy. (Hom. Il. ii. 609, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 67.) He also occurs among the suitors of Helen. (Hygin. Fab. 81; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Cyprus, where he founded the town of Paphus, and in it the famous temple of Aphrodite. (Paus. viii. 5. § 2, &c.) He also occurs in the story of Harmonia (Apollod. iii. 7, § 5, &c.; [L. S.]

2. St., born at Rome, was Archbishop and raised to the Holy See a. d. 535. He was no sooner consecrated than he took off an anathema pronounced by Pope Boniface II, against his deceased rival Dioscorus on a false charge of Simony. He received an appeal from the Catholics of Constantinople when Anthimus, the Monophysite, was made their Bishop by Theodora. [ANTHI-AGARISTA.

The fear of an invasion of Italy by Justinian led the Goth Theodotus to obligate St. Agapetus to go himself to Constantinople, in hope that Justinian might be diverted from his purpose. (See Brenvianus S. Liberati, ap. Mansi, Concilia, vol. ix. p. 605.) As to this last object he could make no impression on the emperor, but he succeeded in persuading him to deposit Anthusmus, and when Memnon was chosen to succeed him, Agapetus left his own hands upon him. The Council and the Synodal (interpreted into Greek) sent by Agapetus relating to these affairs may be found ap. Mansi, vol. viii. pp. 609, 921. Complaints were sent him from various quarters against the Monophysite Acacius; but he died suddenly a.d. 536, April 22, and they were read in a Council and on Good May, by Memnon. (Mansi, ed. p. 874.) There are two letters from St. Agapetus to Justinian in reply to a letter from the emperor, in the latter of which he refuses to acknowledge the Orders of the Arians; and there are two others: 1. To the Bishops of Africa, on the same subject; 2. To Epaphra, Bishop of Carthage, in answer to a letter of congratulation on his elevation to the Pontificate. (Mansi, Concilia, viii. pp. 846—850.)

3. Deacon of the Church of St. Sophia, a.d. 527. There are two other Agapeti mentioned in a Council held by Memnon at this time at Constantinople, who were Archimandrites, orAbbots. Agapetus was tutor to Justinian, and, on the accession of the latter to the empire, addressed to him Advocate on the Duty of a Prince, in 72 Sections, the initial letters of which form the dedication (ἐκθέσεις κεφαλαίων παρατηρημάτων ὑπὲρ ἁγίασμαν). The repute in which this work was held appears from its common title, viz. the Royal Sections (ὑπὲρ βασιλείαν). It was published, with a Latin version, by Zach. Calilleg, 8vo, Ven. 1509, afterwards by J. Brunon, 8vo, Lips. 1668, Cristhel, 8vo, Lips. 1733, and in Gallandi’s Bibliotheca, vol. xi. p. 255, &c., Ven. 1766, after the edition of Banduris (Benedictine). It was translated into French by Louis XIII., 8vo, Par. 1612, and by Th. Paynell into English, 12mo, Lond. 1550. [A. J. C.]

AGAPETUS (Ἀγάπητος), an ancient Greek physician, whose remedy for the gout is mentioned with approbation by Alexander Trallianus (xi. p. 304) and Paulus Aeginita. (iii. 78, p. 107, vii. 11, p. 661.) He probably lived between the third and sixth centuries after Christ, or certainly not later, as Alexander Trallianus, by whom he is quoted, is supposed to have flourished about the beginning of the sixth century. [W. A. G.]

AGAPIUS (Ἀγαπίος), an ancient physician of Alexandria, who taught and practised medicine at Byzantium with great success and reputation, and acquired immense riches. Of his date it can only be determined, that he must have lived before the end of the fifth century after Christ, as Damascius (from whom Photius, Biblioth. cod. 242, and Suidas have taken their account of him) lived about that time. [A. G.]

AGARISTA (Ἀγαρίστα). 1. The daughter of Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, whom her father promised to give in marriage to the best of the Greeks. Suitors came to Sicyon from all parts of Greece, and among others Megacles, the son of Aeneas, from Athens. After they had been delayed at Sicyon for a whole year, during which time Cleisthenes made trial of them in various ways, he gave Agariste to Megacles. From this marriage came the Cleisthenes who divided the Athenians into ten tribes, and Hippocreneae. (Herod. vi. 126—130; comp. Athen. vi. p. 278, b. c., xii. 541, b. c.)

2. The daughter of the above-mentioned Hippocrates, and the grand-daughter of the above-mentioned Agariste, married Xanthippus and became the mother of Poricles. (Herod. vi. 130; Plut. Pericl. 3.)

AGASIAS (Ἀγασίας), a Stymphalian of Arcadia (Xen. Anab. iv. 1. § 27), is frequently mentioned by Xenophon as a brave and active officer in the army of the Ten Thousand. (Anab. iv. 7. § 11. v. 2. § 15, &c.) He was wounded while fighting against Asiatides. (Anab. viii. 8. § 19.)

AGASIAS (Ἀγασίας), son of Dothenis, a distinguished sculptor of Ephesus. One of the productions of his chisel, the statue known by the name of the Borghese gladiator, is still preserved in the gallery of the Louvre. This statue, as well as the Apollo Belvidere, was discovered among the ruins of a palace of the Roman emperors on the site of the ancient Antium (Capo d’Anzio). From the attitude of the figure it is clear, that the statue represents not a gladiator, but a warrior contending with a mounted combatant. Thiersch conjectures that it was intended to represent Achilles fighting with Penthesilea. The only record that we have of this artist is the inscription on the pedestal of the statue; nor are there any data for ascertaining the age in which he lived, except the style of art displayed in the work itself, which competent judges think cannot have been produced earlier than the fourth century, B.C.

It is not quite clear whether the Agasias, who is mentioned as the father of Heraclides, was the same as the author of the Borghese statue, or a different person.

There was another sculptor of the same name, also an Ephesian, the son of Menophilus. He is mentioned in a Greek inscription, from which it appears that he exercised his art in Delos while that island was under the Roman sway; probably somewhere about 100, B.C. (Thiersch, Ephesien d. bild. Kunst, p. 150; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, p. 155.) [C. P. M.]

AGASICLES, AGESICLES or HEGESICLES (Ἀγασίκλης, Ἀγαςίκλης, Ἡγεσίκλης), a king of Sparta, the thirteenth of the line of Procles. He was contemporary with the Agid Leon, and succeeded his father Archidamus I., probably about b.c. 590 or 600. During his reign the Lacedaemonians carried on an unsuccessful war against Tegea, but prospered in their other wars. (Herod. i. 65; Paus. iii. 7. § 6, 3. § 5.) [C. P. M.]

AGASTHENES (Ἀγασθένης), a son of Aegeus, whom he succeeded in the kingdom of Elis. He had a son, Polyxenus, who occurs among the suitors of Helen. (Hom. H. H. 624; Paus. v. 3. § 4; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) [L. S.]

AGATHANGELUS, the son of Callistus wrote the life of Gregory of Armenia in Greek, which is printed in the Acta Synodorum, vol. viii. p. 320. There are manuscripts of it in the public libraries both of Paris and Florence. The time at which Agathangalus lived is unknown. (Fabric. Bibl. Graeca, vol. x. p. 252, xi. p. 554.)

AGATHAGIPTUS (Ἀγαθαγιπτος), a Rhodian, AGATHARCHIDES. 51

who recommended his state to oppose the side of the Romans at the beginning of the war between Rome and Persia, b. c. 171. (Polyb. xxvii. 6, § 3, xxviii. 5, § 3.)

AGATHARCHIDES (Ἀγαθαρχίδης), or AGATHARCHUS (Ἀγαθαρχός), a Greek gramm-arian, born at Cnidus. He was brought up by a man of the name of Ciusmas; was, as Strabo (xvi. p. 779) informs us, attached to the Peripatetic school of philosophy, and wrote several historical and geographical works. In his youth he held the situation of secretary and reader to Hemidcles Lembus, who, according to Suidas lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philometer. This king died b. c. 146. He himself informs us (in his work on the Erythraean Sea), that he was subsequently guardian to one of the kings of Egypt during his minority. This was no doubt one of the two sons of Ptolemy Physcon. Diodor: made endeavours to show that it was the younger son, Alexander, and objects to Soter, that he resigned conjointly with his mother. This, however, was the case with Alexander likewise. Wesseling and Clinton think the elder brother to be the one meant, as Soter II. was more likely to have been a minor on his accession in b. c. 117, than Alexander in b. c. 107, ten years after their father’s death. Moreover Diodewell’s date would leave too short an interval between the publication of Aga-tharchides’s work on the Erythraean Sea (about
b. c. 115), and the work of Artemidorus.

An enumeration of the works of Agatharchides is given by Photius (Cod. 213). He wrote a work on Αἰτία, in 10 books, and one on Εὐρω-πα, in 24 books; a geographical work on the Erythraean Sea, in 3 books, of the first and fifth books of which Photius gives an abstract; an epitome of the last mentioned work; a treatise on the Trogodytæ, in 5 books; an epitome of the Ἀθηναία of Athenaeus; an epitome of the works of those who had written Πελέπιδες συνεργεῖοι θεουματικῶν ἀνέμων; an historical work, from the 12th and 20th books of which Athenaeus quotes
(xii. p. 527, b. vi. p. 251, f); and a treatise on the intercourse of friends. The first three of these only had been read by Photius. Agatharchides composed his work on the Erythraean Sea, as he tells us himself, in his old age (p. 14, ed.
Huds.), in the reign probably of Ptolemy Soter II.
It appears to have contained a great deal of valuable matter. In the first book was a discussion respecting the origin of the name. In the fifth he described the mode of life among the Scyths, in Arabia, and the Icthyophagi, or fish-eaters, the way in which elephants were caught by the elephant-eaters, and the mode of working the gold mines in the mountains of Egypt, near the Red Sea. His account of the Icthyophagi and of the mode of working the gold mines, has been copied by Diodorus. (iii. 12–18.) Amongst other extraordinary animals he mentions the camelopard, which was found in the country of the Trog-dytæ, and the rhinoceros.

Agatharchides wrote in the Attic dialect. His style, according to Photius, was dignified and perspicuous, and abounded in sententious passages, which inspired a favourable opinion of his judgment. In the composition of his speeches he was an immortal Thucydides, whom he equalled in dignity and excelling in clearness. His rhetorical talents also are highly praised by Photius. He was acquainted with the language of the Athenieans (de Radb. M. p. 49), and appears to have been the first who discovered the true cause of the earthquakes, and of the Nile. (Diod. i. 41.)

An Agatharchides, of Samos, is mentioned by Plutarch, as the author of a work on Persia, and one Πελέπις Αἰτίας. Fabricius, however, conjectures that the true reading is Agathysides, not Agatharchides. (Doddewell in Hudson’s Geogr. Script. Gr.
Minorae; Clinton, Fasti Hell. iii p. 535.) [C.P.M.]

There is a curious observation by Agatharchides preserved by Plutarch (Sympos. viii. 9, § 3), of the species of worm called Filaria Melostris, or Genus Worm, which is the earliest account of it that is to be met with. See Justus Weihe, De Filar. Medin. Comment. Berol. 1692, 8vo., and especially the very learned work by G. H.
Welschus, De Venea Melostrina, &c. August.
Vindel. 1674, 4to.

AGATHARCHUS (Ἀγαθαρχός), a Syrian man, who was placed by the Sycamuses over a fleet of twelve ships in b. c. 413, to visit their allies and harass the Athenians. He was afterwards, in the same year, one of the Sycamuses commanders in the decisive battle fought in the harbour of Symcuse. (Thuc. vii. 26, 70; Diod. xiii. 13.)

AGATHARCHUS (Ἀγαθαρχός), an Athenian artist, said by Vitruvius (Proc. ad lib. viii.) to have invented scene-painting, and to have painted a scene (σκηναμ fēce) for a tragedy which Aeschylus exhibited. As this appears to contradict Aristotle’s assertion (Poét. 4, § 10), that scene-painting was introduced by Sophocles, some scholars understand Vitruvius to mean merely, that Agatharchus constructed a stage. (Compare Hor. Ep. ad Pis. 275: et modulis invenit artem picturā.) But their view shows clearly that perspective painting must be meant, for Vitruvius goes on to say, that Democritus and Anaxagoras, carrying out the principles laid down in the treatise of Agatharchus, wrote on the same subject, shewing how, in drawing, the lines ought to be made to correspond, according to a natural proportion, to the figure which would be traced out on an imaginary intervening plane by a pencil of rays proceeding from the eye, as a fixed point, of sight, to the several points of the object viewed.

It was probably not till towards the end of Aeschylus’s career that scene-painting was introduced, and not till the time of Sophocles that it was generally made use of; which may account for what Aristotle says.

There was another Greek painter of the name of Agatharchus, who was a native of the island of Samos, and the son of Eudemos. He was a contemporary of Alcibiades and Zeneus. We have no definite accounts respecting his performances, but he does not appear to have been an artist of much merit: he prided himself chiefly on the ease and rapidity with which he finished his works. (Plut.
Periđ. 13.) Plutarch (Alcib. 16) and Andocides at a greater length (in Alcib. p. 31.15) tell an anecdote of Alcibiades having inveigled Agatharchus to his house and kept him there for more than three months in strict durance, compelling him to adorn it with his pencil. The speech of Andocides above referred to seems to have been delivered after the destruction of Melos (n. c. 416) and before the expedition to Sicily (n. c. 415); so that from the above and the age of Αγαθαρχός may be ac-mately fixed. Some scholars (as Bentley, Böttiger, and Meyer) have supposed him to be the same as with great success the profession of an advocate, though only for the sake of a livelihood, his favourite occupation being the study of ancient poetry (Hist. iii. 1); and he paid particular attention to history. His profession of a lawyer was the cause of his surname Σχολαστικός (Soudas, s. v. \'Agathias\), which word signified an advocate in the time of Agathias. Nebrae (Vita Agath., in ed. Bonn, p. xvi.) believes that he died during the reign of Tiberius Caesar, a short time before the death of this emperor and the accession of Mauritius in 562, at the age of only 44 or 45 years. Agathias, who was a Christian (Epigr. 3, 5, and especially 4), enjoyed during his life the esteem of several great and distinguished men of his time, such as Theodorus the deacon, Paulus Silentiarius, Eutychianus the younger, and Macedonius the exarch. He showed them his gratitude by dedicating to them several of his literary productions, and he paid particular homage to Paulus Silentiarius, the son of Cyrus Florus, who was descended from an old and illustrious family. (Hist. v. 9.)

Agathias is the author of the following works:

1. Histoires.gatheres, divided into nine books; the poems are written in hexameters. Nothing is extant of this collection, which the author calls a juvenile essay. (Agath. Proencerium, p. 6, ed. Bonn; p. 4, Par.; p. 6, Ven.)

2. Κύκλος, an anthology containing poems of early writers and of several of his contemporaries, chiefly of such as were his protectors, among whom were Paulus Silentiarius and Macedonius. This collection was divided into seven books, but nothing of it is extant except the introduction, which was written by Agathias himself. However, 106 epigrams, which were in circulation either before he collected his Κύκλος, or which he composed at a later period, have come down to us. The last seven and several others of these epigrams are generally attributed to other writers, such as Paulus Silentiarius, &c. The epigrams are contained in the Anthologia Graeca (iv. p. 3, ed. Jacobs), and in the editions of the historical work of Agathias. Joseph Scaliger, Janus Douza, and Bonaventura Vulcanius, have translated the greater part of them into Latin. The epigrams were written and published after the \textit{Daphnæa}.

3. Αγαθίου Σχολαστικοῦ Μεριμνών Ιστοριῶν Ε., \textit{Agathie Scholastichie Myriniana Historiarum Libri V.} This is his principal work. It contains the history from 553–558 A.D., a short period, but remarkable for the important events with which it is filled up. The first book contains the conquest of Italy by Narses over the Goths, and the first contests between the Greeks and the Franks; the second book contains the continuation of these contests, the description of the great earthquake of 554, and the beginning of the war between the Greeks and the Persians; the third and the fourth books contain the continuation of this war until the first peace in 556; the fifth book relates the second great earthquake of 557, the rebuilding of St. Sophia by Justinian, the plague, the exploits of Belisarius over the Huns and other barbarians in 558, and it finishes abruptly with the 26th chapter.

Agathias, after having related that he had abandoned his poetical occupation for more serious studies (Proencerium, ed. Bonn, pp. 6, 7; Par. p. 4; Ven. p. 6), tells us that several distinguished men had suggested to him the idea of writing the history of his time, and he adds, that he had undertaken the task especially on the advice of Euthychius. (16.) However, he calls Euthychius the ornament of the family of the Flori, a family to which Euthychius did not belong at all. It is therefore probable that, instead of Euthychius, we must read Paulus Silentiarius; Niebuhr is of this opinion. (16. not. 15.) Agathinus is not a great historian; he wants historical and geographical knowledge, principally with regard to Italy, though he knows the East better. He seldom penetrates into the real causes of those great events which form the subjects of his book: his history is the work of a man of business, who adorns his style with poetical reminiscences. But he is honest and impartial, and in all those things which he is able to understand he shews himself a man of good sense. His style is often bombastic; he praises himself; in his Greek the Ionic dialect prevails, but it is the Ionic of his time, degenerated from its classical purity into a sort of mixture of all the other Greek dialects. Notwithstanding these deficiencies the work of Agathinus is of high value, because it contains a great number of important facts concerning one of the most eventful periods of Roman history.

Edition: Agathinis Ioulianisthi episcopi Floridus, sive des Aevi Constantiniani Commentarius, Lugduni, 1594. The Parisian edition, which is contained in the "Corpus Script. Byzant." was published in 1669; it contains many errors and conjectural innovations, which have been reprinted and augmented by the editors of the Venetian edition. Another edition was published at Basel (in 1576?). A Latin translation by Christopher Person was separately published at Rome, 1516, fol., and afterwards at Augsburg, 1519, 4to.; at Basel, 1531, fol., and at Leyden, 1594, 8vo. The best edition is that of Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828, 8vo., which forms the third volume of the "Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae." It contains the Latin translation and the notes of Bonaventura Valenti. The Epigraphs form an appendix of this edition of Person, who has carefully corrected the errors, and removed the innovations of the Parisian edition.

AGATHINUS ('Αγαθινός), an eminent ancient Greek physician, the founder of a new medical sect, to which he gave the name of Ἐπισθητική (Dict. of Ant. s. v. ΕΠΙΣΘΗΤΙΚΗ). He was born at Sparta and must have lived in the first century after Christ, as he was the pupil of Athenaeus, and the tutor of Archigenes. (Galen. Deut., Med. c. 14, vol. xix. p. 333; Suidas, s. v. ΑΡΧΙΓΕΝΗΣ; Eudoc. Victor. ap. Villi. Euschat. Gr. vol. p. 86.) He is said to have been once seized with an attack of delirium, brought on by want of sleep, from which he was delivered by his pupil Archigenes, who ordered his head to be fomented, with a great quantity of warm oil. (Artium, tetr. i. serm. iii. 172, p. 156.) He is frequently quoted by Galen, who mentions him among the Pneumatici. (De Dignac. Pals. i. 8, vol. viii. p. 787.) None of his writings are now extant, but a few fragments are contained in Matthaei's Collection, entitled XXI. Veterum et Clarorum Medicorum Graecorum Variae Opera, Moscuae, 1808, 4to. See also Palladius, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Morb. Popul. lib. vi." ap. Dietz, Scholia in Hippocr. et Galen. vol. ii. p. 56. The particular opinions of his sect are not exactly known, but they were probably nearly the same as those of the Eclectici. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. ΕΚΛΕΚΤΙΚΟΙ.) (See J. C. Osterhausen, Histor. Sectae Pneumatic. Med. Auct. 1791, 8vo.; C. G. Kühn, Addit. ad Elench. Med. Vet. a J. A. Fabricio in "Biblith. Graecae," exhib.)

AGATHOCLE (Αγαθοκλῆς), a mistress of the profligate Ptolemy Philopator, King of Egypt, and sister of his no less profligate minister Agathocles. She and her brother, who both exercised the most unbridled influence over the king, were introduced to him by their ambitions and avaricious mother, Oenanthe. After Ptolemy had put to death his wife and sister Eurydice, Agathocles became his favourite. On the death of Ptolemy (c. 265), Agathoclea and her friends kept the event secret, that they might have an opportunity of plundering the royal treasury. They also formed a conspiracy for setting Agathocles on the throne. He managed for some time, in conjunction with Sossibus, to act as guardian to the young king Ptolemy Epiphanes. At last the Egyptians and the Macedonians of Alexandria, exasperated at his outrages, rose against him, and Cleopatra plucked himself at their head. They surrounded the palace in the night, and forced their way in. Agathocles and his sister implored in the most abject manner that their lives might be spared, but in vain. The former was killed by his friends, that he might not be exposed to a more cruel fate. Agathoclea with her sisters, and Oenanthe, who had taken refuge in a temple, were dragged forth, and in a state of nakedness exposed to the fury of the multitude, who literally tore them limb from limb. All their relations and those who had had any share in the murder of Eurydice were likewise put to death. (Pol. v. 63, xiv. 11, xv. 23—34; Justin, xxx. 1, 2; Athen. vi. p. 251, xiii. p. 576; Plut. Cleop. 30.) There was another Agathoclea, the daughter of a man named Aristomenes, who was born in Alexandria, and rose to great power in Egypt. (Pol. v. c. 16.)

AGATHOCLES (Αγαθόκλης), a Sicilian of such remarkable ability and energy, that he raised himself from the station of a potter to that of tyrant of Syracuse and king of Sicily. He flourished in the latter part of the fourth and the beginning of the third century, B.C., so that the period of his dominion is contemporary with that of the second and third Samnite wars, during which time his power must have been to Rome a cause of painful interest; yet so entire is the loss of all Roman history of that epoch, that he is not once mentioned in the 9th and 10th books of Livy, though we know that he had Sammites and Etruscans in his service, that assistance was asked from him by the Tarquins (Strab. vi. p. 280), and that he actually landed in Italy. (See Arnold's Rome, c. xxxv.) The events of his life are detailed by Diodorus and Justin. Of these the first has taken his account from Timaeus of Tauromenium, a historian whom Agathocles banished from Sicily, and whose love for censuring others was so great, that he was nicknamed Epitomeus (fault-finder). (Athen. vi. p. 272.) His natural propensity was not likely to be softened when he was describing the author of his exile; and Diodorus himself does not hesitate to accuse him of having calumniated Agathocles very grossly. (Fraym. lib. xxi.) Polybius too charges him with willfully perverting the truth (xl. 15), so that the account which he has left must be received with much suspicion. Marvellous stories are related of the early years of Agathocles. Born at Thurmoe, a town of Sicily subject to Carthage, he is said to have been brought up as an infant, by his father, Carcusus of Rhegium, in consequence of a succession of troublesome dreams, pertaining that he would be a source of much evil to Sicily. His mother, however, secretly preserved his life, and at seven years old he was restored to his father, who had long repented of his conduct to the child. By him he was taken to Syracuse and brought up as a potter. In his youth he led a life of extravagance and debauchery, but was remarkable for strength and personal beauty, qualities which recommended him to Damos, a noble Syracusan, under whose auspices he was made first a soldier, then a chilarch, and afterwards a military tribune. On the death of Damos, he married his rich widow, and so became one of the wealthiest citizens in Syracuse. His ambitious schemes then developed themselves, and he was driven into exile. After several changes of fortune, he collected an army which overawed both the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and was restored under an oath that he would not interfere with the democracy, which oath he kept by murdering 4000 and banishing 6000 citizens. He was immediately declared sovereign of Syracuse, under the title of Autocrat. But him, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, kept the field successfully against him, after the whole of Sicily, which was not under the dominion of Carthage, had submitted to him. In the battle of Himera, the army of Agathocles was defeated with great slaughter, and immediately after, Syracuse itself was closely besieged. At this juncture, he formed the bold design of inverting the ruin which threatened him, by carrying the war into Africa. To obtain money for this purpose, he offered to let those who dashed the missiles of a protracted siege depart from Syracuse, and then sent a body of armed men to plunder and murder those who accepted his offer. He kept his design a profound secret, eluded the Carthaginian fleet, which was blockading the harbour, and though closely pursued by them for six days and nights, landed his men in safety on the shores of Africa. Advancing them into the midst of his army, arrayed in a splendid robe, and with a crown on his head, he announced that he had vowed, as a thank-offering for his escape, to sacrifice his ships to Demeter and the Korai, goddesses of Sicily. Thereupon, he burnt them all, and so left his soldiers no hope of safety except in conquest.

His successes were most brilliant and rapid. Of the two Suffetes of Carthage, the one, Bomilcar, aimed at the tyranny, and opposed the invaders with little vigour; while the other, Hammo, fell in battle. He constantly defeated the troops of Carthage, and had almost encamped under its walls, when the detection and crucifixion of Bomilcar infused new life into the war. Agathocles too was summoned from Africa by the affairs of Sicily, where the Agrigentines had suddenly invited their fellow-countrymen to shake off his yoke, and left his army under his son Archagathus, who was unable to answer the enemy. Agathocles returned, but was defeated; and, fearing a new attack, the part of his troops, fled from his camp with Archagathus, who, however, lost his way and was taken. Agathocles escaped; but in revenge for this desertion, the soldiers murdered his sons, and then made peace with Carthage. New troubles awaited him in Sicily, where Democrats, a Syracusan exile, was at the head of a hope army against him. But he made a treaty with the Carthaginians, defeated the exiles, received Democrats into favour, and then had no difficulty in reducing the revolted cities of Sicily, of which island he had some time before assumed the title of king. He afterwards crossed the Ionian sea, and defended Corecyra against Cassander. (Diod. xxi. Fragm.) He plundered the Lipari isles, and also carried his arms into Italy, in order to attack the Bruttii.

But his designs were interrupted by severe illness accompanied by great anxiety of mind, in consequence of family distresses. His grandson Archagathus murdered his son Agathocles, for the sake of succeeding to the crown, and the old king feared that the rest of his family would share his fate. Accordingly, he resolved to send his wife, Tesseria and her two children to Egypt, her native country; they went at the thoughts of his dying thus unavenged for and alone, and he at seeing them depart as exiles from the dominion which he had won for them. They left him, and his death followed almost immediately. For this touching narrative, Timaeus and Diodorus after him substituted a monstrous and incredible story of his being poisoned by Maena, an associate of Archagathus. The poison, we are told, was concealed in the quf with which he cleaned his teeth, and reduced him to so frightful a condition, that he was placed on the funeral pile and burnt while yet living, being unable to give any signs that he was not dead.

There is no doubt that Agathocles was a man who did not hesitate to plunge into many excesses of cruelty and treachery to further his current purposes. He persuaded Ophellus, king of Cyrene, to enter into an alliance with him against Carthage, and then murdered him at a banquet, and seized the command of his army. He invited the principal Syracusans to a festival, plied them with wine, mixed freely with them, discovered their secret feelings, and killed 500 who seemed opposed to his views. So that while we reject the fictions of Timaeus, we can as little understand the statement of Polybius, that though he used bloody means to acquire his power, he afterwards became most mild and gentle. To his great abilities we have the testimony of Scipio Africanus, when he asked what men were in his opinion at once the boldest warriors and wisest statesmen, replied, Agathocles and Dionysius. (Polyb. xvi. 83.) He appears also to have possessed remarkable powers of wit and repartee, to have been a most agreeable companion, and to have lived in Syracuse a security generally unknown to the Greek tyrants, untainted in public by guards, and trusting entirely either to the popularity or terror of his name.

As to the chronology of his life, his landing in Africa was in the archonship of Hieronmonon at Athens, and accompanied by an eclipse of the sun, i.e. Aug. 15, n. c. 310. (Clinton, Fast. Hell.) He quit it at the end of B. c. 307, died n. c. 289, after a reign of 28 years, aged 72 according to Diodorus, though Lucian (Macrob. 10), gives his age 85. Wesseling and Clinton prefer the statement of Diodorus. The Italian mercenaries whom Agathocles left, were the Mamertini, who afterwards seized Messana, and commenced the first Punic war.

AGATHODEMEN (Ἀγαθοδαμὴν οἱ Ἀγαθὸς Ἴδες), the "Good God," a divinity in honour of whom the Greeks drank a cup of unmixed wine at the end of every repast. A temple dedicated to him was situated on the road from Megalopolis to Macarius in Areonia. Pausanias (viii. 36, § 3) conjectures that the name is a mere epithet of Zeus. (Comp. Lobech, Florilegium, p. 603.) [L. S.]

AGATHODEMEN (Ἀγαθοδαμὴς Εὐσεβιῶτης) (Agath. of Alexandria) delineated the whole inhabited world according to the eight books on Geography of Cl. Ptolemaeus.

The Vienna MS. of Ptolemy is one of the most beautiful extant. The maps attached to it, 27 in number, comprising 1 general map, 10 maps of Europe, 4 of Africa, and 12 of Asia, are a treasure. The mountains red or dark yellow, and the land white. The climates, parallels, and the hours of the longest day, are marked on the East margin of the maps, and the meridians on the North and South. We have no evidence as to when Agathodemon lived, as the only notice preserved respecting him is that quoted above. There was a grammatic of the same name, to whom some extant letters of Iulius of Pulsium are addressed. Some have thought him to be the Agathodemon in question. Heeren, however, considers the delmctor of the maps to have been a contemporary of Ptolemy, who (viii. 1, 2) mentions certain maps or tables (tıqáraçs), which agree in number and arrangement with those of Agathodemon in the MSS.

There are errors having in the course of time crept into the copies of the maps of Agathodemon, Niclaus Donis, a Benedictine monk, who flourished about A. D. 1470, restored and corrected them, substituting Latin for Greek names. His maps are appended to the Ebnerian MS. of Ptolemy. They are the same in number and nearly the same in order with those of Agathodemon. (Heeren, Commentario de Pontibus Geograph. Ptolemaei Tabularumque in amemarum; R. Chamboulay, Commentario critico-literario de Cl. Ptolemaei Geographia epyke codicibus, p. 7.) [G. P. M.]

A'GATHON (Ἀγαθὸν), the son of the Macedonian Philotas, and the brother of Parmenion and Asander, was given as a hostage to Antigonus in B. C. 328, by his brother Alexander the Great, which was taken back again by Asander in a few days. (Diod. xix. 75.) Agathon had a son, named Asander, who is mentioned in a Greek inscription. (Böckh, Corp. Insr. 105.)

A'GATHON (Ἀγαθὸν), an Athenian tragic poet, was born about B. C. 447, and sprung from a rich and respectable family. He was consequently contemporary with Socrates and Alcibiades and the other distinguished characters of their age, with many of whom he was on terms of intimate acquaintance. Amongst these was his friend Euripides. He was remarkable for the handsomeness of his person and his various accomplishments. (Plut. V. 186 b.) He gained his first victory at the Lenean festival in B. C. 416, when he was a little above thirty years of age: in honour of which Plato represents the Symposium, or banquet, to have been given, which he has made the occasion of his dialogue so called. The scene is laid at Agathon's house, and amongst the interlocutors are, Apollodorus, Socrates, Aristophanes, Diotima, and Alcibiades. Plato was then fourteen years of age, and a spectator at the tragic contest, in which Agathon was victorious. (Athen. v. p. 217, a.) When Agathon was about forty years of age (b. c. 407), he visited the court of Archelaus, the king of Macedonia (Aelian, V. H. xii. 4), where his old friend Euripides was also a guest at the same time. From the expression in the Ranae (83), that he was gone and μακάρως εὐεξιῶσα, nothing certain can be determined as to the time of his death. The phrase admits of two meanings, either that he was then residing at the court of Archelaus, or that he was dead. The former, however, is the more probable interpretation. (Clinton, Post. Hell. vol. ii. p. xxii.) He is generally supposed to have died about b. c. 400, at the age of forty-seven.

(Bode, Geschichte der dram. Dichtkunst, i. p. 553.) The poetical merits of Agathon were considerable, but his compositions were more remarkable for elegance and flowery ornaments than force, vigour, or sublimity. They abounded in antithesis and metaphor, "with cheerful thoughts and kindly images," (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 13), and he is said to have imitated in verse the prose of Gorgias the orator. The language which Plato puts into his mouth in the Symposium, is of the same character, full of harmonious words and softly flowing periods: an έλευθερός στυλός (Έλευση αὐτών). The style of his verses, and especially of his lyrical compositions, is represented by Aristophanes in his Thesmophoriusaeus (191) as affected and effeminate, corresponding with his personal appearance and manner. In that play (acted b. c. 409), where he appears as the friend of Euripides, he is ridiculed for his effeminacy, both in manners and actions, being brought on the stage in female dress. In the Ranae, acted five years afterwards, Aristophanes speaks highly of him as a poet and a man, calling him an άγάθος ποιητής καὶ θεωρητός τοῦ φίλου. In the Thesmophoriusaeus (29) also, he calls him άγάθος καὶ πρόφητας. In some respects, Agathon was instrumental in causing the decline of tragedy at Athens. He was the first to receive it, according to Aristotle (Poet. 18. § 22), who commenced the practice of inserting chorous between the acts, the subject-matter of which was unconnected with the story of the drama, and which were therefore called έξοδίας, or intercalary, as being merely lyrical or musical interludes. The same critic (Poet. 10. § 17) also blames him for selecting too extensive subjects for his tragedies. Agathon also wrote pieces, the story and characters of which were the creations of pure fiction. One of these was called the "Flower" (Χαλκός, Arist. Poet. 9. § 7); its subject-matter was neither mythical nor historical, and therefore probably "neither seriously affecting, nor terrible." (Schlegel, Dram. Ed. i. p. 189.) We cannot but regret the loss of this work, which must have been interesting and original. The titles of four only of his tragedies are known with certainty: they are, the Thystes, the Telephus, the Athene and the Alcmene. A fifth, which is ascribed to him, is of doubtful authority. It is probable that Aristophanes has given us extracts from some of Agathon's plays in the Thesmophoriusaeus, v. 100-130. The opinion that Agathon also wrote comedies, or that there was a comic writer of this name, has been refuted by Bentley, in his Dissertation upon the Epistles of Euripides, p. 417. (Ritschl, Commentatio de Agathonis vita, Arte et Tragediis religiosis, Halae, 1829, 8vo.)

AGATHON (Άγαθών), of Samos, who wrote a work upon Scythia and another upon Rivers. (Plat. de Plau. p. 1156, c. 1159, a; Stoaeans, Serm. tit. 100. 10. ed. Gaisford.)

AGATHON (Άγαθών), at first Reader, afterwards Librarian, at Constantinople. In a. D. 680, during his Readership, he was Notary or Recorder at the 6th General Council, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. He was one of the acts, written by himself, to the five Patriarchs. He wrote, a. D. 712, a short treatise, still extant in Greek, on the attempts of Philippicus Bardanes (711-713) to revive the Monothelite error, Conciliorum Nova Collectio ad Mansi, vol. ii. p. 189.

AGATHOSTHENES (Άγαθοσθένης), a Greek historian or philosopher of uncertain date, who is referred to by Tzetzes (ad Lycon. 704, 1021. Chit. vii. 645) as his authority in matters connected with geography. There is mention of a work of Agathosthenes called "Asiatica Carmina." (Germanicus, in Ars. Phain. 24), where Gale (Notae in Parthen. p. 125, &c.) wished to read the name Agathocles; for Agathocles or Agathostenes, who is by some considered to be the same as Agathosthenes, wrote a work on the history of Naxos, of which nothing is extant, but which was much used by ancient writers. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 16; Eratost. Catast. ii. 27; Pollux. ix. 83; Athen. iii. p. 78; Plin. H. N. iv. 22.) [L. S.]

AGATHOTUCHUS (Άγαθότουχος), an ancient veterinary surgeon, whose date and history are unknown, but who probably lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. Some fragments of his writings are to be found in the collection of works on this subject first published in a Latin translation by Jo. Ruellius, Veterinariae Medicinae Libri duo, Paris. 1530, fol., and afterwards in Greek by Grynaeus, Basil. 1537, 4to. [W. A. G.]

AGATHYLLUS (Άγαθυλλύς), of Arcadia, a Greek elegiac poet, whose name is quoted by Dionysius in reference to the history of Aeneas and the foundation of Rome. Some of his verses are preserved by Dionysius. (I. 49, 73.)

AGATHYRNAS (Άγαθύρνας), a son of Aulos, regarded as the founder of Agathyrnus in Sicily. (Diod. v. 8.) [L. S.

AGAYY (Αγαύς). 1. A daughter of Cadmus, and wife of the Spartan Echion, by whom she became the mother of Pentheus, who succeeded his grandfather Cadmus as king of Thebes. Agave was the sister of Autonoë, Ino, and Semele (Apollod. iii. 4. § 2); and when Semele, during her pregnancy with Dionysus, was destroyed by the sight of the splendour of Zeus, her sisters spread the report that she had only endeavoured to conceal her guilt, by pretending that Zeus was the father of her child, and that her destruction was a just punishment for her falsehood. This calumny was afterwards most severely averted upon Agave. For, after Dionysus, the son of Semele, had traversed the world, he came to Thebes and compelled the women to celebrate his Dionysian festivals on mount Cithæron. Pentheus wishing to prevent or stop these riotous proceedings, went himself to mount Cithæron, but was torn to pieces there by his own mother Agave, who in her frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. (Apollod. iii. 5, § 2; Ov. Met. iii. 725; comp. Penth. Hyginus (Fab. 240, 254) makes Agave, after this deed, go to Illyria and marry king Lycothems, whom however she afterwards killed in order to gain his kingdom for her father Cadmus. This account is manifestly transposed by Hyginus, and must have belonged to an earlier part of the story of Agave.

AGDISTIS (Ἀγδίστης), a mythical being connected with the Phrygian worship of Attes or Atys. Pausanias (vii. 17, § 3) relates the following story about Agdistis. On one occasion Zeus unwittingly beget by the Earth a superhuman being which was at once man and woman, and was called Agdistis. The gods dreaded it and unmanned it, and from its severed agōsa there grew up an almond-tree. Once when the daughter of the river-god Sangarion was gathering the fruit of this tree, she put some almonds into her bosom; but here the almonds disappeared, and she became the mother of Attes, who was of such extraordinary beauty, that when he had grown up Agdistis fell in love with him. His relatives, however, destined him to become the husband of the daughter of the king of Pessinus, whither he went accordingly. But at the moment when the hymeneal song had commenced, Agdistis appeared, and Attes was seized by a fit of madness, in which he unmanned himself; the king who had given him his daughter did the same. Agdistis now repented her deed, and obtained from Zeus the promise that the body of Attes should not become decomposed or disappear. This is, says Pausanias, the most popular account of an otherwise mysterious affair, which is probably part of a symbolical worship of the creative powers of nature. A hill of the name of Agdistis in Phrygia, at the foot of which Attes was believed to be buried, is mentioned by Pausanias. (i. 4. § 5.) According to Hesychius (s. v.) and Strabo (xix. p. 667; comp. x. p. 469), Agdistis is the same as Cybele, who was worshipped at Pessinus under that name. A story somewhat different is given by Arnobius. (Adv. Gent. ix. 5, § 4; comp. Matt. Felix, 21.)

[LS.]

AGELADAS (Ἀγέλαδας), a native of Argos (Pausan. vi. 3, § 4, vii. 24, § 2, x. 10, § 3), preeminently distinguished as a statue. His fame is enhanced by his having been the instructor of the three great masters, Phidias (Suidas, s. v.); Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 604; Teukrot, Child. vi. 154, vii. 101—for the names Ἐκαλέκτος and Πέλαγος are unquestionably merely corruptions of Ἀγέλαδος, as was first observed by Menenius, whom Winckelmann, Thiersch, and Müller agree); Myron, and Polyclus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6, s. 19.) The determination of the period when Ageladas flourished, has given rise to a great deal of discussion, owing to the apparently contradictory statements in the writers who mention the name. Pausanias (vi. 10, § 2) tells us that Ageladas cast a statue of Cleobulus (who gained a victory in the chariot race in the 46th Olympiad) with the chariot, horses, and charioteer, which was set up at Olympia. There were also at Olympia statues by him of Timasitheus of Delphi and Anochus of Te rentum. Now Timasitheus was put to death by the Athenians, for his participation in the attempt of

Iasogas in Ol. lxviii. 2 (n. c. 507); and Anochus (as we learn from Eusebius) was a victor in the games of the 65th Ol. So far everything is clear; and if we suppose Ageladas to have been born about n. c. 540, he may very well have been the instructor of Phidias. On the other hand Pliny (l. c.) says that Ageladas, with Polyeuctus, Phraemon, and Myron, flourished in the 87th Ol. This agrees with the statement of the scholiast on Aristophanes, that at Melfito there was a statue of Προκλῆς ἀλλαξάς, the work of Ageladas the Argive, which was set up during the great pesti lence. (Ol. lxxxvi. 3, 4.) To these authorities must be added a passage of Pausanias (iv. 33, § 3), where he speaks of a statue of Zeus made by Ageladas for the Messenians of Naupactus. This must have been after the year n. c. 456, when the Messenians were allowed by the Athenians to settle at Naupactus. In order to reconcile these conflicting statements, some suppose that Pliny's date is wrong, and that the statue of Hercules had been made by Ageladas long before it was set up at Melfito: others (as Moyer and Siebert) that Pliny's date is correct, but that Ageladas did not make the statues of the Olympic victors mentioned by Pausanias till many years after their victories; which in the case of three persons, the dates of whose victories are so nearly the same, would be a very extraordinary coincidence. The most probable solution of the difficulty is that of Thiersch, who thinks that there were two artists of this name; one an Argive, the instructor of Phidias, born about n. c. 540, the other a native of Sicyon, who flourished at the date assigned by Pliny, and was confounded by the scholiast on Aristophanes with his more illustrious namesake of Argos. Thiersch supports this hypothesis by an able criticism on a passage of Pausanias. (v. 24, § 1.) Sillius argues that there were two artists of the name of Ageladas, but both Argives. Ageladas the Argive executed one of a group of three Muses, representing respectively the presiding genii of the diatonic, chromatic and enharmonic styles of Greek music. Canachus and Aristocles of Sicyon made the other two. (Antipater, Anth. Pal. Plan. 226; Thiersch, Epoch. d. bild. Kunst. pp. 158—164.) [C. P. M.]

AGELAUS (Ἀγέλαος). 1. A son of Hermes and Omphale, as the date assigned by Croesus. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 8.) Herodotus (i. 7) derives the family of Croesus from one Alcmen, and Diodorus (iv. 31) from one Cleocles, while he calls the son of Hermes and Omphale Lanus, and others Ionocedes. (Anton. Lib. 2; Paus. iatrop., de Inoed. 45.)

2. A son of Damastor, and one of the suitors of Penelope. (Hom. Od. xx. 321.) In the struggle of Odysseus with the suitors, and after many of them had fallen, Agelaus encouraged and headed those who survived (xxii. 131, 241), until at last he too was struck dead by Odysseus with a javelin. (xxii. 293.)

3. A slave of Priam, who exposed the infant Paris on mount Ida, in consequence of a dream of his mother. Here Paris for a space of five days, the slave found the infant still alive and suckled by a bear, he took him to his own house and brought him up. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 4; compare Paris.)

There are several other mythical personages of the name of Agelaus, concerning whom no particulars are known. (Apollod. ii. 8, § 5; Antonin, v 2)
AGENOR. [A. CILLIUS.]

AGEGORTH (Ἄγγεγορθ), a son of Poseidon and Libya, king of Phoenicia, and twin-brother of Belus. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 4.) He married Telephassa, by whom he became the father of Cadmus, Phoenix, Cylix, Thasus, Philomus, and according to some of Europa also. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. b; Hygin. Fab. 1781; Paus. v. 25 § 7; Schol. ad Apollod. Rhod. ii. 176, ill. 1105.) After his daughter Europa had been carried off by Zeus, Agenor sent out his sons in search of her, and enjoined them not to return without their sister. As Europa was not to be found, none of them returned, and all settled in foreign countries. (Apollod. iii. i § 1; Hygin. Fab. 1788.) Virgil (Aen. i. 338) calls Carthage the city of Agenor, by which he alludes to the descent of Didon from Agenor. Buttman (Mythology, p. 292, &c.) points out that the genuine Phoenician name of Agenor was Chnas, which is the same as Camann, and upon these facts he builds the hypothesis that Agenor or Chnas is the same as the Camann in the books of Moses.

2. A son of Jesus, and father of Angus Punopeus, king of Sylus. (Apollod. ii. § 2.) Hellenicus (Fragment, ed. Sturz.) states that Agenor was a son of Phoeneus, and brother of Jesus and Pelasgus, and that after their father’s death, the two elder brothers divided his dominions between themselves in such a manner, that Pelasgus received the country about the river Emissus, and built Lorius, and Jesus the country about Elis. After the death of these two, Agenor, the youngest, invaded their dominions, and thus became king of Argos.

3. The son and successor of Triopas, in the kingdom of Argos. He belonged to the house of Phoeneus, and was father of Ciotopus. (Paus. ii. 16 § 1; Hygin. Fab. 145.)

4. A son of Phleus and Xanthippe, and grand-son of Aetolus. Epicaste, the daughter of Calydon, became by him the mother of Porthion and Demonice. (Apollod. i. 7 § 7.) According to Pausanias (iii. 13 § 5), Thestius, the father of Ledo, is likewise a son of this Agenor.

5. A son of Phagens, king of Paophis, in Arcadia. He was brother of Pronous and Arsinoe, who was married to Alecamon, but was abandoned by him. When Alecamon wanted to give the celebrated necklace and peplus of Harmonia to his second wife Calirrhoé, the daughter of Aechelous, he was slain by Agenor and Pronous at the instigation of Phagens. But when the two brothers came to Delphi, where they intended to dedicate the necklace and peplus, they were killed by Amphoterus and Aeacius, the sons of Alecamon and Calirrhoé. (Apollod. iii. 7 § 5.) Pausanias (viii. 24 § 4), who relates the same story, calls the children of Phagens, Teneaus, Axion, and Alphesiboea.

6. A son of the Trojan Antenor and Theano, the priestess of Athena. (Hom. ii. xi. 53, vi. 207.) He appears in the Iliad as one of the bravest among the Trojans, and is one of their leaders in the attack upon the fortifications of the Greeks. (iv. 467, xii. 93, xiv. 425.) He even venturs to fight with Achilles, who is wounded by him. (xxi. 570, &c.) Apollo rescued him in a cloud from the anger of Achilles, and then assumed himself the appearance of Agenor, by which means he drew Achilles away from the walls of Troy, and afforded to the fugitive Trojans a safe retreat to the city. (xxi. in fine.) According to Pausanias (x. 27 § 1) Agenor was slain by Neoptolemus, and was represented by Polygnathus in the great painting in the Laocoe of Delphi.

Some other mythical personages of this name occur in the following passages: Apollod. ii. 1 § 3, iii. 8 § 4; Hygin. Fab. 145; [L. S.]

AGESANDER (Ἄγγεςανδρα), a patronymic of Agenor, designating a descendant of an Agenor, such as Cadmus (Ov. Met. iii. 8, 31, 90; iv. 563), Phineus (Val. Placc. iv. 592), and Perses. (Ov. Met. iv. 771.)

AGEPOLIS (Ἄγγεπωλις), of Rhodes, was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to the consul Q. Marcus Philippus, b. c. 169, in the war with Perses, and had an interview with him near Heraeleum in Macedonia. In the following year, b. c. 168, he went as ambassador to Rome to deprecate the anger of the Romans. (Polyb. xxviii. 14, 15, xxix. 4, 7; Liv. xiv. 3.)

AGESANDER or AGESILAUS (Ἄγγεςανδρος or Ἀγεσίλαος), from ἄγγες and ἀνδρος or λαχ, a surname of Pliny. He is describing him as the god who carries away all men. (Callim. Hymn. in Pel- lad. 130, with Spanheim’s note; Heuch. s. v.; Aschyl. op. Athen. iii. p. 99.) Nicander (op. Athen. xvi. p. 684) uses the form Hesiglotoas. [L. S.]

AGESANDER, a sculptor, a native of the island of Rhodes. His name occurs in no author except Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4), and we know but of one work which he executed; it is a work however which bears the most decisive testimony to his surpassing genius. In conjunction with Polydorus and Athenodorus he sculptured the group of Laocoon, a work which is ranked by all competent judges among the most perfect specimens of art, especially on account of the admirable manner in which amidst the intense suffering portrayed in every feature, limb, and muscle, there is still preserved that air of sublime repose, which characterised the best productions of Grecian genius. This celebrated group was discovered in the year 1506, near the baths of Titus on the Esquiline hill: it is now preserved in the museum of the Vatican. Pliny does not hesitate to pronounce it superior to all other works both of statuary and painting. A great deal has been written respecting the age when Agesander flourished, and various opinions have been held on the subject. Winckelmann and Müller, forming their judgment from the style of art displayed in AGESILAEUS II, son by his second wife, Busila, of Archidamus II., succeeded his half-brother, Ages II., as nineteenth king of the Euryponid line; excluding, on the ground of spurious birth, and by the interest of Lysander, his nephew, Leotychides. [Leotychides.] His reign extends from 398 to 361 B.C., both inclusive; during most of which time he was, in Plutarch's words, "as good as thought commander and king of all Greece," and was for the whole of it greatly identified with his country's deeds and fortunes. The position of that country, though internally weak, was externally, in Greece, down to 394, one of supremacy for the Heges. Plutarch, who laid out to show that Ambition was Persia; from 394 to 397, the Corinthian and the Theban war, one of supremacy assaulting: in 387 that supremacy was restored over Greece, in the peace of Antalcidas, by the sacrifice of Asictic prospects: and thus more confined and more secure, it became also more wanton. After 378, when Thebes regained her freedom, we find it again assailed, and again for one moment restored, though on a lower level, in 371; then overthrown for ever at Leuctra, the next nine years being a struggle for existence amid dangers within and without.

Of the youth of Agesilaus we have no detail, beyond the mention of his intimacy with Lycurgus. On the throne, which he ascended at the age of forty, we first hear of him in the suppression of Cinyron's conspiracy. [Cinyron.] In his third year (390) he crossed into Asia, and after a short campaign, and a winter of preparation, he in the next overpowered the two satraps, Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus; and, in the spring of 394, was encamped in the plain of Thebe, preparing to advance into the heart of the empire, when a message arrived to summon him to the war at home. He calmly and promptly obeyed; expressing however to the Asiatic Greeks, and doubtless himself indulge, hopes of a speedy return. Marching rapidly by Xerxes' route, he met and defeated at Coronea in Boeotia the allied forces. In 393 he was engaged in a ravaging invasion of Argolis, in 392 in one of the Corinthian territory, in 391 he reduced the Acrabantes to submission; but, in the remaining years of the war, he is not mentioned. In the interval of peace, we find him declining the command in Sparta's aggression on Mantinea; but heading, from motives, it is said, of private friendship, that on Phlius; and openly justifying Phoebidas' seizure of the Cadmea. Of the next war, the first two years he commanded in Boeotia, more however to the enemy's gain in point of experience, than loss in any other; from the five remaining he was withdrawn by severe illness. In the congress of 371 an altercation is recorded between him and Epaminondas; and by his advice Thebes was preemptory excluded from the peace, and orders given for the fatal campaign of Leuctra. In 370 we find him engaged in an embassy to Mantinea, and reassuring the Spartans by an invasion of Arcadia: and in 369 to his skill, courage, and presence of mind, is to be ascribed the maintenance of the unwalled Sparta, amidst the attacks of four armies, and revolts and conspiracies of Helots, Perioeci, and even Spartans. Finally, in 362, he led his countrymen into Arcadia; by fortunate information was enabled to return in time to prevent the surprise of Sparta, and was, it seems, joint if not sole commander at the battle of Mantinea. To the ensuing winter must probably be referred his en-AGESILOCHUS, bassy to the coast of Asia and negotiations for money with the revolted satraps, alluded to in an obscure passage of Xenophon (Agesilaoi, ii. 36, 27); and, in performance perhaps of some stipulation then made, he crossed, in the spring of 361, with a body of Lacedaemonian mercenaries into Egypt. Here, after displaying much of his ancient skill, he died, while preparing for his voyage home, in the winter of 361-60, after a life of about eighteen years and a reign of thirty-eight. His body was embalmed in wax, and splendidly buried at Sparta.

Referring to our sketch of Spartan history, we find Agesilas shining most in its first and last parts; and we may take much of his career in Asia, and as, in extreme age, maintaining his prostrate country. From Coronea to Leuctra we see him partly unemployed, at times yielding to weak motives, at times joining in wanton acts of public injustice. No one of Sparta’s great defeats, but some of her bad policy belongs to him. In what others do, we miss him; in what he does, we miss the greatness and consistency belonging to unity of purpose and sole command. No doubt he was hampered at home; perhaps, too, from a man withdrawn, when now near fifty, from his chosen career, great action in a new one of any kind could not be looked for. Plutarch gives a glowing portrait of him in his letters to the eparchs on his recall:

"We have reduced most of Asia, driven back the barbarians, made arms abundant in Ionia. But since you bid me, according to the decree, come home, I shall follow your letter, may perhaps be even before it. For my command is not mine, but my country’s and her allies’. And a commander then commands truly according to right when he sees his own commander in the laws and eparchs, or others holding office in the state." Also, an exclamation on hearing of the battle of Corinth: "Alas for Greece! she has killed enough of her sons to have conquered all the barbarians!" Of his courage, temperance, and hardness, many instances are given: to these he added, even in excess, the less Spartan qualities of kindness and tenderness as a father and a friend. No one, indeed, had the story of his riding across a stick with his children; and to gratify his son’s affection for Cleonemus, son of the culprit, he saved Sphodrias from the punishment due, in right and policy, for his incursion into Attica in 378. So too the appointment of Peisander. [PEISANDER.] A letter of his runs, "If Nicias is innocent, acquit him for that; if guilty, for my sake; how any acquit him." From Spartan candor and dishonesty, and mostly, even in public life, from ill faith, his character is clear. In person he was small, mean-looking, and lame, on which last ground objection had been made to his accession, an oracle, curiously fulfilled, having warned Sparta of evils awaiting her under a "lame sovereignty." In his reign, indeed, her fall took place, but not through him. Agesilus himself was Sparta’s most perfect citizen and most consummate general; in many ways perhaps her greatest man. (Xen. Hell. iii. 3, to the end, Agesilau; Dion. xiv. xv; Paus. iii. 9, 10; Plut. and C. Nepos, in vita; Plut. Apophthegmata.) [A. H. C.]

AGESILAU'S (Ag̃ĩl̃azõ), a Greek historian, who wrote a work on the early history of Italy (TriaAx̃ẽd̃), fragments of which are preserved in Plutarch (Parallela, p. 312), and Stobaeus. (Piõr̃t̃eg̃, ix. 27, liv. 49, liv. 10, ed. Gaisf.) [C. P. M.]

AGESILOCHUS or HEGESIOLOCHUS (Agesilα̃kõzos, Agesilα̃kõzos, Ηγεσιλαίος), was the chief magistrate (Prõt̃ax̃ĩã) of the Rhodians, on the breaking out of the war between Rome and Perseus in B.C. 171, and recommended his countrymen to espouse the side of the Romans. He was sent as ambassador to Rome in B.C. 169, and to the conful Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia, in B.C. 168. (Polyb. xxvii. 3, xxviii. 2, 14, xxix. 4.)

AGESYMBOUS, commander of the Rhodian fleet in the war between the Romans and Philip, king of Macedon, in B.C. 202—197. (Liv. xxxv. 43, xxxvi. 15, 32.)

AGESYDORUS (Agesỹdõrous), king of Sparta, the twenty-first of the Agesid family, succeeding his father Pausanias, while yet a minor, in B.C. 394, and reigned fourteen years. He was placed under the guardianship of Aristocles, his nearest of kin. He came to the crown just about the time that the confederacy (partly brought about by the intrigues of the Persian satrap Thymbraeus), which was formed by Thubes, Athens, Corinth, and Argos, against Sparta, rendered it necessary to recall his colleague, Agesilus 11., from Asia; and the first military operation of his reign was the expedition to Corinth, where the forces of the confederates were then assembled. The Spartan army was led by Aristocles, and gained a signal victory over the allies. (Xen. Hell. iv. 2. § 9.) In the year B.C. 390 Agesipolis, who had now reached his majority, was entrusted with the command of an army for the invasion of Argolis. Having procured the sanction of the Olympic and Delphic gods for disregarding any attempt which the Argives might make to stop his march, on the pretext of a religious truce, he carried his ravages still further than Agesilus had done in B.C. 393; but as he suffered the aspect of the victims to deter him from occupying a permanent post, the expedition yielded no fruit but the plunder. (Xen. Hell. iv. 7, § 3-6; Paus. iii. 5, § 6.) In B.C. 383 the Spartans, seizing upon some frivolous pretences, sent an expedition to Corcyra, in which Agesipolis took the command, after it had been declined by Agesilus. In this expedition the Spartans were assisted by Thubes, and in a battle with the Mantinac, Epanomades, and Pelopidea, who were fighting side by side, narrowly escaped death. He took the town by diverting the river Ophius, so as to lay the low grounds at the foot of the walls under water. The bumsments, being made of unbaked bricks, were unable to resist the action of the water. The walls soon began to totter, and the Mantinac were forced to surrender. They were admitted to terms on condition that the population should be dispersed among the four hamlets, out of which it had been collected to form the capital. The democratic leaders were permitted to go into exile. (Xen. Hell. v. 2. § 17-7; Paus. viii. 8, § 5; Diod. xv. 5, &c.; Plut. Pelop. 4.) Isocr. Paneg. p. 67, n. De Pace, p. 179, c.)

Early in B.C. 382, an embassy came to Sparta from the cities of Acarnus and Apollonia, requesting assistance against the Olynthians, who were endeavouring to compel them to join their confederacy. The Spartans granted it, but were not at first very successful. After the defeat and death of Telecles in the second campaign (B.C. 381) Agesipolis took the command. He set out in 381, but did not begin operations till the spring of 380. He then acted with great vigour, and took Torone.
by storm; but in the midst of his successes he was seized with a fever, which carried him off in seven days. He died at Aphytis, in the peninsula of Pallene. His body was interred in his own tomb, and covered with his own spoils for burial. Though Agesipolis did not share the ambitious views of foreign conquest cherished by Agesilaus, his loss was deeply regretted by that prince, who seems to have had a sincere regard for him. (Xen. Hell. v. 3, § 8-9, 18-19; Diod. xv. 22; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. pp. 405, 438, &c., v. pp. 5, &c., 20.)

AGESIPOLIS II., son of Cleombrotus, was the 23rd king of the Agid line. He ascended the throne b. c. 371, and reigned one year. (Paus. iii. 6. § 1; Diod. xv. 60.)

C. P. M.]

AGESIPOLIS III., the 31st of the Agid line, was the son of Agesipolis, and grandson of Cleombrotus II. After the death of Cleomenes he was elected king while still a minor, and placed under the guardianship of his uncle Cleomenes. (Polyb. iv. 35.) He was however soon deposed by his colleague Lycurgus, after the death of Cleomenes. We hear of him next in b. c. 195, when he was at the head of the Lacedaemonian exiles, who joined Flamininus in his attack upon Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedaemon. (Liv. xxxiv. 26.) He formed one of an embassy sent about b. c. 183 to Rome by the Lacedaemonian exiles, and, with his companions, was intercepted by pirates and killed. (Polyb. xxiv. 11.)

AGESTRATHE. [Agis IV.]

AGETAS (Agytus), commander-in-chief of the Aetolians in b. c. 217, made an incursion into Aetolia, and ravaged both countries. (Polyb. iv. 26.)

AGFETOR (Agytros), a surname given to several gods, for instance, to Zeus at Lacedaemon (Stob. Serm. 42): the name seems to describe Zeus as the leader and ruler of men; but others think, that it is synonymous with Agamemnon [Agamennon, 2]:—to Apollo (Burp. Med. 426) where however Elusmy and others prefer Agyratos:—to Hermes, who conducts the souls of men to the lower world. Under this name Hermes had a statue at Megalopolis. (Paus. viii. 31. § 4.) [L. S.]

AGGENYS "URBICUS, a writer on the science of the Agrimensores. (Dict. of Ant. p. 30.)

It is uncertain when he lived; but he appears to have been a Christian, and it is not improbable from some expressions which he uses, that he lived at the latter part of the fourth century of our era. The extant works ascribed to him are:—" Aggenys Urbicis in Julianum Frontinum Commentarius," a commentary upon the work "De Agrorum Qualitate," which is ascribed to Frontinus; "in Julianum Frontinum Commentariorum Liber secundus qui Diao- graphus dicit," and "Commentariorum de Controversiis Agrorum Pars prior et altera." The last-named work Nibbhur supposes to have been written by Frontinus, and in the time of Donatian, since the author speaks of "praestantissimus Donatianus," an expression, which would never have been applied to this tyrant after his death. (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 621.)

AGGGRAMMES, called XANDRAMES (Xan- drakes) by Diodorus, the ruler of the Gangaridæ and Prasii in India, was said to be the son of a barbarian, whom the queen had married. Alexander was preparing to march against him, when he was compelled by his soldiers, who had become tired of the war, to give up further conquests in India. (Curt. v. 21; Diod. xvii. 93, 94; Arrian, Anab. v. 25, &c.; Plut. Alex. 60.)

A. GIAS (Agias), son of Agecleous and grandson of Tissamenus, a Spartan seer who predicted the victory of Lysander at Aegae-potami. (Paus. iii. 11. § 5.) [Tissamenus.]

A. GIAS (Agias). 1. A Greek poet, whose name was formerly written Angis, through a mistake of the first editor of the Excerpta of Proclus. It has been corrected by Thiersch in the Acta Philol. Moscav. ii. p. 534, from the Codex Monacensis, which in one passage has Agias, and in another Hagiias. The name itself does not occur in early Greek writers, unless it be supposed that Egaos or Hephas (Hyias) in Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. vi. p. 632), and Pausanias (i. 2. § 1), are only different forms of the same name. He was a native of Teos; and the time at which he wrote appears to have been about the year b. c. 740. His poem was celebrated in antiquity, under the name of Néstor, i.e. the history of the return of the Achaean hero from Troy, and consisted of five books. The poem began with the cause of the misfortunes which befell the Achaeans on their way home and after their arrival, that is, with the outrage committed upon Cassandra and the Palladium; and the whole poem filled up the space which was left between the work of the poet Arctinus and the Odyssey. The ancients themselves appear to have been uncertain about the author of this poem, for they refer to it simply by the name of Néstor, and when they mention the author, they only call him ἐν τῷ βουλής ἄρρητος ἄρης. (Athen. viii. p. 291; Paus. v. 29. § 4, 29. § 29.)

A. GIAS (Agias), the author of a work on Argolis. (Argyōnēs, Athen. iii. p. 86, f.) He is called ἄρης ἀράμαρκος in another passage of Athenaeus (xiv. p. 626, f.), but the musician may be another person.

AGITATIS. [Agis IV.]

AGIS I. (Agis), king of Sparta, son of Eurysthenes, begun to reign, it is said, about b. c. 1032. (Müller, Dor. vol. ii. p. 511, transl.) According to Eusebius (Chron. i. p. 166) he reigned only one year; according to Apollodorus, as it appears, about 51 years. During the reign of this Achaeus, the conquered people were admitted to an equality of political rights with the Dorians. Agis deprived them of these, and reduced them to the condition of subjects to the Spartans. The inhabitants of the town of Helos attempted to shake off the yoke, but they were subdued, and gave rise and name to the class called Helotta.
AGIS.

(Phor. ap. Strab. viii. p. 364.) To his reign was referred the colony which went to Crete under Polis and Delphus. (Conon. Narr. 36.) From him the kings of that line were called Αγίες. His colleague was Sous. (Paus. iii. 2. § I.)

[AGIS II., the 17th of the Euryponid line (beginning with Procles), succeeded his father Archidamus, b. c. 427, and reigned a little more than 28 years. In the summer of b. c. 426, he led an army of Peloponnesians and their allies as far as the isthmus, with the intention of invading Attica; but they were deterred from advancing farther by a succession of earthquakes which happened when they had got so far. (Thuc. iii. 39.) In the spring of the following year he led an army into Attica, but quitted it fifteen days after he had entered it. (Thuc. iv. 2, 6.) In b. c. 419, the Argives, at the instigation of Aleibiades, attacked Epidaurus; and Agis with the whole force of Lacedaemon set out at the same time and marched to the frontier city, Leuctra. No one, Thucydides tells us, knew the purpose of this expedition. It was probably to make a diversion in favour of Epidaurus. (Thirlwall, vol. iii. p. 342.) At Leuctra the aspect of the sacrifice deterred him from proceeding. He therefore led his troops back, and sent round notice to the allies to be ready for an expedition at the end of the sacred month of the Carnean festival; and when the Argives repeated their attack on Epidaurus, the Spartans again marched to the frontier town, Caryae, and again turned back, professedly on account of the aspect of the victims. In the middle of the following summer (b. c. 418) the Epidaurus being still hard pressed by the Argives, the Lacedaemonians with their whole force and some allies, under the command of Agis, invaded Argolis. By a skilful manoeuvre he succeeded in intercepting the Argives, and posted his army advantageously between them and the city. But just as the battle was about to begin, Thrasylus, one of the Argive generals, and Aleibiades, Agis and prevailed on him to conclude a truce for four months. Agis, without disclosing his motives, drew off his army. On his return he was severely censured for having thus thrown away the opportunity of reducing Argos, especially as the Argives had seized the opportunity afforded by his return and taken Orchomenos. It was proposed to pull down his house, and inflict on him a fine of 100,000 drachmae. But on his earnest entreaty they contented themselves with appointing a council of war, consisting of 10 Spartans, without whom he was not to lead an army out of the city. (Thuc. v. 54, 57, &c.) Shortly afterwards they received intelligence from Tegae, that, if not promptly suc-cseeded, the party favourable to Sparta in that city would be compelled to give way. The Spartans immediately sent their whole force under the com-mmand of Agis. He restored tranquillity at Tegae, and then marched to Mantinea. By turning the waters so as to flood the lands of Mantinea, he succeeded in drawing the army of the Mantinians and Athenians down to the level ground. A battle ensued, in which the Spartans were victorious. This was one of the most important battles ever fought between Greek states. (Thuc. v. 71-73.) In b. c. 417, when news reached Sparta of the counter-revolution at Argos, in which the oligarchical and Spartan faction was overthrown, an army was sent there under Agis. He was unable to restore the defeated party, but he destroyed the long walls which the Argives had begun to carry down to the sea, and took Hysiae. (Thuc. v. 83.) In the spring of b. c. 415, Agis entered Attica with a Peloponnesian army, and fortified Decelea, a steep eminence about 15 miles north-Agis was defeated and killed. It happened about the time of the battle of Arbela. (Arrian. II. 13; Diod. xvi. 63, 68, xvii. 62; Aesch. c. Ctesiph. p. 77; Curt. vi. 1: Justin, xiii. 1.) [C. P. M.]

AGIS IV., the elder son of Eumridas II., was the 24th king of the Euryptolid line. He succeeded his father in B.C. 244, and reigned four years. In B.C. 243, after the liberation of Corinth by Anatus, the general of the Achaean league, Agis led an army against him, but was defeated. (Paus. ii. 8 § 4.) The interest of his reign, however, is derived from events of a different kind. Through the influx of wealth and luxury, with their corrupting vices, the Spartans had greatly degenerated from the ancient simplicity and severity of manners. Not above 700 families of the genuine Spartan stock remained, and in consequence of the innovation introduced by Epitadeus, who procured a repeal of the law which secured to every Spartan head of a family an equal portion of land, the landed property had passed into the hands of a few individuals, of whom a great number were females, so that not above 100 Spartan families possessed estates, while the poor were bewildered with debt. Agis, who from his earliest youth had shown his attachment to the ancient discipline, undertook to reform these abuses, and re-establish the institutions of Lycurgus. For this end he determined to lay before the Spartan senate a proposition for the abolition of all debts and a new partition of the lands. Another part of his plan was to give landed estates to the Perioeci. His schemes were warmly seconded by the poorer classes and the young men, and strenuously opposed by the wealthy. He succeeded, however, in gaining over three very influential persons,—his uncle Agesilus (a man of large property, but who, being deeply involved in debt, hoped to profit by the innovations of Agis), Lycurges, and Mandrocles. Having procured Lycurges to be elected one of the ephors, he laid his plans before the senate. He proposed that the Spartan territory should be divided into two portions, one to consist of 4500 equal lots, to be divided amongst the Spartans, whose ranks were to be filled up by the admission of the most respectable of the Perioeci and strangers; the other to contain 15,000 equal lots, to be divided amongst the Perioeci. The senate could not at first come to a decision on the matter. Lycurges, therefore, convened the assembly of the people, to whom Agis submitted his measure, and offered to make the first sacrifice, by giving up his lands and money, telling them that his mother and grandmother, who were possessed of great wealth, with all his relations and friends, would follow his example. He was driven from the presidium by the presses of the multitude. The opposite party, however, headed by Leonidas, the other king, who had formed his habit at the luxurious court of Seleucus, king of Syria, got the senate to reject the measure, though only by one vote. Agis now determined to rid himself of Leonidas. Lycurges accordingly accused him of having violated the laws by marrying a stranger and living in a foreign land. Leonidas was deposed, and was succeeded by his son-in-law, Cleombrotus, who co-operated with Agis. Soon afterwards, however, Lycurges's term of office expired, and the ephors of the following year were opposed to Agis, and designed to restore Leonidas. They brought an accusation against Lycurges and Mandrocles, of attempting to violate the laws. Alarmed at the turn events were taking, the two latter prevailed on the kings to depose the ephors by force and appoint others in their room. Leonidas, who had returned to the city, fled to Teges, and in his flight was protected by Agis from the violence meditated against him by Agesilus. The selfish avarice of the latter frustrated the plans of Agis, when there now seemed nothing to oppose the execution of them. He persuaded his nephew and Lysander that the most effectual way to secure the consent of the wealthy to the distribution of their lands, would be, to begin by cancelling the debts. Accordingly all bonds, registers, and securities were piled up in the market place and burnt. Agesilus, having secured his own ends, contrived various pretenses for delaying the division of the lands. Meanwhile the Achaean league applied to Sparta for assistance against the Achaeans. Agis was accordingly sent at the head of an army. The cautious movements of Anatus gave Agis no opportunity of distinguishing himself in action, but he gained great credit by the excellent discipline he preserved among his troops. During his absence Agesilus so increased the poorer classes by his insolent conduct and the continued postponement of the division of the lands, that they made no opposition when the enemies of Agis openly brought back Leonidas and set him on the throne. Agis and Cleombrotus fled for sanctuary, the former to the temple of Athenae Chalcioeus, the latter to the temple of Poseidon. Cleombrotus was suffered to go into exile. Agis was entrapped by some treacherous friends and thrown into prison. Leonidas immediately came with a band of mercenaries and secured the prison without, while the ephors entered it, and went through the mockery of a trial. When asked if he did not repent of what he had attempted, Agis replied, that he should never repent of so glorious a design, even in the face of death. He was condemned, and precipitately executed, the ephors fearing a resuscitation, as a great concourse of people had assembled round the prison gates. Agis, observing that one of his executioners was moved to tears, said, "Weep not for me: suffering, as I do, unjustly, I am in a happier case than my murderers." His mother Agasistrate and his grandmother were strangled on his body. Agis was the first king of Sparta who had been put to death by the ephors. Pausanias, who, however, is undoubtedly wrong, says (vii. 10. § 4, 27. § 9), that he fell in battle. His widow Agatis was forcibly married by Leonidas to his son Cleomenes, but nevertheless they entertained for each other a mutual affection. (Plutarch, Agis, Cleomenes, Alcibiades; Paus. vii. 7. § 2.) [C. P. M.]

AGIS ("Agye"), a Greek poet, a native of Argos, and a contemporary of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied on his Asiatic expedition. Curtius (viii. 5) as well as Arrian (Anab. iv. 9) and Plutarch (De adulat. et amore, scrip. 60) describe him as one of the basest flatterers of the king. Curtius calls him "pessimum enennis post Chaerilum condidit," which probably refers rather to their flattering character than to their worth as poetry. The Greek Anthology (vi. 152) contains an epigram, which is probably the work of this flatterer. (Jacob, Anthol. iii. p. 636; Zimmermann, Zeitw., für die Alterth. 1841, p. 164.) AGNOUS, a Greek rhetorician, who wrote a work against rhetoric, which Quintilian (ii. 17, § 15) calls "Rhetorica accursoria." Flatten (Hist. Celt. Græc. Goth. p. 290) and after him most modern scholars have considered this Agnon to be the same man as Agnonides, the contemporary of Phocion, as the latter is in some MSS. of Corn. Nepos (Phoc. 3) called Agnon. But the manner in which Agnon is mentioned by Quintilian, shows that he is a rhetorician, who lived at a much later period. Whether however he is the same as the academic philosopher mentioned by Athenaeus (xxii. p. 602), cannot be decided. [L. S.]

AGNO'NIDES (Ἀγνώνιδης), an Athenian demagogue and sophistant, a contemporary of Theophrastus and Phocion. The former was accused by Agnonides of impiety, but was acquitted by the Areopagus, and Theophrastus might have ruined his accuser, had he been less generous. (Dio. Laec. v. 71.) Agnonides attended the Macedonian party at Athens, and called Phocion a traitor, for which he was exiled, as soon as Alexander, son of Polyperchon, got possession of Athens. Afterwards, however, he obtained from Antipater permission to return to his country through the mediation of Phocion. (Plut. Phoc. 29.) But the sophistant soon forgot what he owed to his benefactor, and not only continued to oppose the Macedonian party in the most vehement manner, but even induced the Athenians to sentence Phocion to death as a traitor, who had delivered the Ptolemaic into the hands of Nicanor. (Plut. Phoc. 32, 35; Corn. Nep. Phoc. 3.) But the Athenians soon repented of their conduct towards Phocion, and put Agnonides to death to appease his names. (Plut. Phoc. 38.)

AGÖN (Ἀγόν), a personification of the season Sense completes (Ἀγόνως). He was represented in a statue at Olympia with ˹醺αργας ˷ in his hands. This statue was a work of Dionysius, and dedicated by Sicyourus of Rhegium. (Paus. v. 26, § 3.) [L. S.]
AGROUS, or Agrovios, a surname or epithet of several gods. Aeschylus (Agam. 513) and Sophocles (Trach. 26) use it of Apollo and Zeus, and apparently in the sense of helpers in struggles and contests. (Comp. Eur. at H. p. 1335.) But Agoulin is more especially used as a surname of Hermes, who presides over all kinds of solemn contests. (Ayroes, Paus. vi. 14. § 7; Pind. Olymp. vi. 135, with the Schol.)

AGORA CRITUS (Ἀγορακρίτως), a famous statue and sculptor, born in the island of Paros, who flourished from about Ol. 85 to Ol. 88. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5, 4.) He was the favourite pupil of Phidias (Paus. ix. 34. § 1), who is even said by Pliny to have inscribed some of his own works with the name of his disciple. Only four of his productions are mentioned, viz. a statue of Zeus and one of the Ionian Athene in the temple of that goddess at Athens (Paus. l. c.) a statue, probably of Cybele, in the temple of the Great Goddess at Athens (Plin. l. c.); and the Rhamnusian Nemesis. Respecting this last work there has been a great deal of discussion. The account which Pliny gives of it is, that Agoracritus contended with Alcamenes (another distinguished disciple of Phidias) in making a statue of Venus; and that the Athenians, through an undue partiality towards their countryman, awarded the victory to Alcamenes. Agoracritus, indignant at his defeat, made some slight alterations so as to change his Venus into a Nemesis, and sold it to the people of Rhamnos, on condition that it should not be set up in Athens. Pausanias (i. 33. § 2), without saying a word about Agoracritus, says that the Rhamnusian Nemesis was the work of Phidias, and was made out of the block of Parian marble which the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes brought with them for the purpose of setting up a trophy. (See Theocritus and Parmenides, Anthol. Gr. Poet. iv. 12, 291, 222.) This account however has been rejected as involving a confusion of the ideas connected by the Greeks with the goddess Nemesis. The statue moreover was not of Parian, but of Pentelic marble. (Uned. Antiquities of Attica, p. 43.) Strabo (ix. p. 396), Strutio (Chalcid. vii. 154), Suinas and Photius give other variations in speaking of this statue. It seems generally agreed that Pliny's account of the matter is right in the main; and there have been various dissertations on the way in which a statue of Venus could have been changed into one of Nemesis. (Winckelmann, Sämmtliche Werke von J. Eisele, vol. v. 584; Zögg, Abhandlungen, pp. 56—62; K. O. Müller, Arch. d. Kuns, p. 102.) [C. P. M.]

AGORAEA and AGORAEUS (Agroidea and Agraioi), are epithets given to several divinities who were considered as the protectors of the assemblies of the people in the drys, such as Zeus (Paus. iii. 11. § 8, v. 16. § 3), Athena (iii. 11. § 8), Artemis (v. 15. § 8), and Hermes (i. 15. § 1, ii. 9. § 7, ix. 17. § 1). As Hermes was the god of commerce, this surname seems to have reference to the drys as the market-place. [L. S.]

AGRAEOS (Agraios), the hunter, a surname of Apollo. After he had killed the lion of Cithæron, a temple was erected to him by Alcathous at Megara under the name of Apollo Agraeos. (Paus. 41. § 4; Eustath. at Pd. 461.) [L. S.]

AGRAULOS or AGRAGULUS (Ἀγραύλους or Ἀγραύλης). 1. A daughter of Asterus. The first king of Athens. By her husband, Cecrops, she became the mother of Erysichthon, Agraus, Here, and Pandrosus. (Apolloid. iii. 14. § 2; Paus. i. 2. § 5.)

2. A daughter of Cecrops and Agraus, and mother of Alcege by Ares. This Agraulus is an important personage in the stories of Attic, and there were three different legends about her. 1. According to Pausanias (i. 16. § 5) and Hyginus (Fab. 106), Athena gave to her and her sisters Erichthonia in a chest, with the express command not to open it. But Agraulus and Here could not control their curiosity, and opened it; whereupon they were seized with madness at the sight of Erichthonius, and threw themselves from the steep rock of the Acropolis, or according to Hyginus into the sea. 2. According to Ovid (Met. ii. 710, &c.), Agraulus and her sister survived their opening the chest, and the former, who had instigated her sister to open it, was punished in this manner. Hermes came to Athens during the celebration of the Panathenaea, and fell in love with Here. Athena made Agraulus so jealous of her sister, that she even attempted to prevent the god entering the house of Here. But, indignant at such presumption, he changed Agraulus into a stone. 3. The third legend represents Agraulus in a totally different light. Athens was at one time involved in a long-continued war, and an oracle declared that it would cease, if some one would sacrifice himself for the good of his country. Agraulus came forward and threw herself down the Acropolis. The Athenians, in gratitude for this, built her a temple on the Acropolis, in which it subsequently became customary for the young Athenians, on receiving their first suit of armour, to take an oath that they would always defend their country to the last. (Suid. and Heich. s. v. Αγραῦλος; Ulpim, ad Domit. de fide leg. 9; Hor. od. v. 59; Plut. Alcib. 18; Philochorus, Frgm. p. 18, ed. Siebel.) One of the Attic ἤ ἢν (Agraule) derived its name from this heroine, and the festival and mysteries were celebrated at Athens in honour of her. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Αγραῦλη; Lobeck, Agapoph. p. 39; Dict. of Ant. p. 30, a.) According to Porphyry (De Abst. de anim. i. 2), she was also worshipped in Cyprus, where human sacrifices were offered to her down to a very late time. [L. S.]

AGRESHON (Ἀγρεσθόν), a Greek gram- marian mentioned by Suidas, (s. v. Ἀγραῦλος.) He wrote a work Περὶ Ὀμώνυμων (concerning persons of the same name). He cannot have lived earlier than the reign of Hadrian, as in his work he spoke of an Apolloius who lived in the time of that emperor. [C. P. M.]

AGREUS (Ἀγρεύς), a hunter, occurs as a surname of Parnassus and Aristida. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 115; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 507; Dict. of Ant. 81; Heich. s. m.; Solinus, ad Sol. v. 81.) [L. S.]

AGRICOLA, GNAEUS JULIUS, is one of the most remarkable men whom we meet with in the times of the first twelve emperors of Rome, for his extraordinary ability as a general, his great powers, shown in his government of Britain, and born witness to the deep and universal feeling excited in Rome by his death (Tac. Agric. 43), his singular integrity, and the esteem and love which he commanded in all the private relations of life.

His life of 55 years (from June 13th, A. n. 37, AGRICOLA.

to the 23rd August, A. D. 93) extends through the reigns of the nine emperors from Caligula to Domitian. He was born at the Roman colony of Forum Julii, the modern Fréjus in Provence. His father was Julius Gracianus of senatorial rank; his mother Julia Procilla, who throughout his education seems to have watched with great care and to have exerted great influence over him. He studied philosophy (the usual education of a Roman of higher rank) from his earliest youth at Marseilles.
His first military service was under Suetonius Paulinus in Britain (A. D. 60), in the relation of Contubernarius. (Suet. Const. de div. a. 25, 26.) Hence he returned to Rome, where married to Domitia Decidiana, and went the round of the magistracies;
the questorship in Asia (A. D. 63), under the pro consul Saluvius Titianus, where his integrity was shown by his refusal to join the proconsul in the ordinary system of extortion in the Roman provinces; the tribunate and the praetorship,—in Nero's time mere nominal offices, filled with danger to the man who held them, in which a prudent inactivity was the only safe course. By Galba
(A. D. 69) he was appointed to examine the sacred property of the temples, that Nero's system of robbery (Sueton. Ner. 32) might be stopped. In the same year he lost his mother; it was in returning from her funeral in Lepcis Magna, that he heard of Vespasian's accession, and immediately joined his party. Under Vespasian his first service was the command of the 20th legion in Britain. (A. D.
70.) On his return, he was raised by the emperor to the rank of patrician, and set over the province of Aquitania, which he held for three years. (A. D.
74-76.) He was recalled to Rome to be elected consul (A. D. 77), and Britain, the great scene of his power, was given to him, by general consent, as his province.

In this year he betrothed his daughter to the historian Tacitus; in the following he gave her to him in marriage, and was made governor of Britain, and one of the college of pontiffs.

Agricol a was the twelfth Roman general who had been in Britain; he was the only one who completely effected the work of subjugation to the Romans, not more by his consummate military skill, than by his masterly policy in reconciling the Britons to that yoke which hitherto they had so ill borne. He taught them the arts and luxuries of civilised life, to settle in towns, to build comfortable dwelling-houses and temples. He established a system of education for the sons of the British chiefs, amongst whom at last the Roman language was spoken, and the Roman toga worn as a fashionable dress.

He was full seven years in Britain, from the year A. D. 78 to A. D. 84. The last conquest of his predecessor Julius Frontinus had been that of the Silures (South Wales); and the last action of Agricola's command was the action at the foot of the Grampian hills, which put him in possession of the whole of Britain as far north as the northern boundary of Perth and Argyle. His first campaign
(A. D. 78) was occupied in the reconquest of Mona (Anglesea), and the Ordovices (North Wales), the strongholds of the Druids; and the remainder of this year, with the next, was given to making the before-mentioned arrangements for the security of the Roman dominion in the already conquered parts of Britain. The third campaign (A. D. 80) carried him northwards to the Taus,* probably the Solway Frith; and the fourth (A. D. 81) was taken up in fortifying and taking possession of this tract, and advancing as far north as the Friths of Clyde and Forth. In the fifth campaign (A. D.

82), he was engaged in subduing the tribes on the promontory opposite Ireland. In the sixth
(A. D. 83), he explored with his fleet and land forces the coast of Fife and Forfar, coming now for the first time into contact with the true Caledo-nians. They made a night attack on his camp (believed to be at Loch Oore, where ditches and other traces of a Roman camp are still to be seen), and succeeded in nearly destroying the ninth legion, but in the general battle, which followed, they were repulsed. The seventh and last campaign (A.
D. 84) gave Agricola complete and entire possession of the country, up to the northernmost point which he had reached, by a most decided victory over the assembled Caledonians under their general Galgacus (as it is believed, from the Roman and British remains found there, and from the two tumuli or sepulchral cairns) on the moor of Murdoch at the foot of the Grampian hills. In this campaign his fleet sailed northwards from the coast of Fife round Britain to the Trondelenian harbour (supposed to be Sandwick), thus for the first time discovering Britain to be an island. He withdrew his army into winter quarters, and soon after (A.
D. 84) was recalled by the jealous Domitian.

On his return to Rome, he lived in retirement, and when the government either of Asia or Africa would have fallen to him, he considered it more prudent to decline the honour. He died A. D. 93;
his death was, as his biographer plainly hints, either immediately caused or certainly hastened by the emissaries of the emperor, who could not bear the presence of a man pointed out by universal feeling as alone fit to meet the exigency of times in which the Roman arms had suffered repeted reverses in Germany and the countries north of the Danube. Dion Cassius (Liv. 20) says expressly, that he was killed by Domitian.

In this account we can do no more than refer to the beautiful and interesting description given by Tacitus (Agri. 39—46) of his life during his retirement from office, his death, his person, and his character, which though it had no field of action at home in that dreary time, shewed itself during the seven years in which it was unfelt in Britain, as great and wise and good. (Tacitus, Agricola.)

There is an epigram of Antiphius in the Greek Anthology (Anth. Tr. ii. 180) upon an Agricola, which is commonly supposed to refer to the celebrated one of this name.

AGRIOTNUS (Arquitinus), a surname of Dionysius, under which he was worshipped at Orcochaos in Boeotia, and from which his festivial Agronias in that place derived its name. (Dict.
of Ant. p. 30; Muller, Orestea, p. 166, &c.)

AGRIOPAS, a writer spoken of by Piny. (H. N.
viii. 22, where some of the MSS. have Acoras or Copas.) He was the author of an account of the Olympic victors.

AGrippa, an ancient name among the Romans, was first used as a praenomen, and afterwards as a cognomen. It frequently occurs as a cogmen in the early times of the empire, but not under the republic. One of the mythical kings of Alba is called by this name. (Liv. i. 3.) According to Aulus Gellius (xvi. 16), Pliny (H. N. vii. 6. s. 8), and Solinus (1), the word signifies a birth, at which the child is presented with its feet foremost; but their derivation of it from

AGrippa (Ἀγρίππας), a sceptical philosopher, only known to have lived later than Aenesidemus, the contemporary of Cicero, from whom he is said to have been the fifth in descent. He is quoted by Diogenes Laertius, who probably wrote about the middle of the 3rd century B.C. He composed: "The five grounds of doubt" (οἱ πνεύματα ᾗ ὕπομος), which are given by Sextus Empiricus as a summary of the later sceptics, as narrated by Diogenes Laertius (ix. 88) to Agrippa.

I. The first of these argues from the uncertainty of the rules of common life, and of the opinions of philosophers. II. The second from the "rejection ad infinitum:" all proof requires some further proof, and so on to infinity. III. All things are changed as their relations become changed, or, as we look upon them in different points of view. IV. The truth asserted is merely an hypothesis or, in a vicious circle. (Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrh. Hypot. i. 15.)

With reference to these πνεύματα ᾗ ὕπομος it need only be remarked, that the first and third are a short summary of the ten original grounds of doubt which were the basis of the later scepticism. (Pyrrh. Hypot. i. 15.) The three additional ones show a progress in the sceptical system, and a transition from the common objections derived from the fallibility of sense and opinion, to more abstract and metaphysical grounds of doubt. They seem to mark a new attempt to systematize the sceptical philosophy and adapt it to the spirit of a later age. (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, xii. 4.)

AGrippa (Μ. Ασίνιος), consul A.D. 25, died A.D. 26, was descended from a family more illustrious than ancient, and did not disgrace it by his mode of life. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34, 61.)

AGrippa Castor (Ἀγρίππας Ἐκατοτυλ), about A.D. 135, was a historian by Eusebius, and for his learning by St. Jerome (de Viris Illust. c. 21), lived in the reign of Hadrian. He wrote against the twenty-four books of the Alexandrian Gnostic Basildes, on the Gospel. Quotations are made from his work by Eusebius. (Hist. Eccl. iv. 7; see Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, col. i. p. 330.)

AGrippa, Fonteius. 1. One of the ac- users of Libo, A.D. 16, is again mentioned in... d. 19, as offering his daughter for a vestal vir- in. (Tac. Ann. ii. 30, 89.)

2. Probably the son of the preceding, command- ed the province of Asia with pro-consular power. d. 63, and was recalled from thence by Vespas- ian, and placed over Moesia in A.D. 70. He was shortly afterwards killed in battle by the Sarmatians. (Tac. Hist. iii. 46; Joseph. B. Jud. ii. 4. § 3.)

AGrippa, Haterius, called by Tacit- us (Ann. ii. 51) the proquinna of Germanicus, as tribune of the plebs A.D. 15, proconsul A.D. 17, and consul A.D. 22. His moral character was very low, and he is spoken of in A.D. 32, as plot- ing the destruction of many illustrious men. (Tac. Ann. i. 77, ii. 51, iii. 49, 62, vi. 4.)

AGrippa, Herodes I. (Ἡρώδης Ἀγρίππας), called by Josephus (Ant. Jud. xvi. 2. § 2), "Agrippa the Great," was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. Shortly before the death of his grandfather, he came to Rome, where he was educated with the future emperor Claudius, and Drusus the son of Tiberius. He squandered his property in giving sumptuous entertainments to gratify his princely friends, and in bestowing largesses on the freed- men of the emperor, and became so deeply involved in debt, that he was compelled to fly from Rome, and betook himself to a fortress at Miletus in Phrygia, in which he was a friend of his cousin, with his sister Herodias, the wife of He- rodes Antipas, he was allowed to take up his abode at Tiberias, and received the rank of count in that city, with a small yearly income. But hav- ing quarrelled with his brother-in-law, he fled to Flaccus, the proconsul of Syria. Soon afterwards he was convicted, through the information of his brother Aristobulus, of having received a bribe from the Damascenes, who wished to purchase his influence with the proconsul, and was again com- pelled to fly. He was arrested as he was about to sail for Italy, for a sum of money which he owed to the treasurer of Caesar, but made his escape, and reached Alexandria, where he was the receiver of the city, and procuring a supply of money from Alexander the Alabarch. He then set sail, and landed at Puteoli. He was favourably received by Tiberius, who en- trusted him with the education of his grandson Tiberius. He also formed an intimacy with Caligula. Having one day incantiously expressed a wish that the latter might soon succeed to the throne, his words were reported by his freedman Butychus to Tiberius, who forthwith threw him into prison. Caligula, on his accession (A.D. 37), set him at liberty, and gave him the tetrarchies of Lycaonia (Abilene) and Philippus (Batanaea, Trachonitis, and Aunisitis). He also presented him with a golden chain of equal weight with the iron one which he had worn in prison. In the following year Agrippa took possession of his king- dom, and after the banishment of Herodes Antipas, the tetrarchy of the latter was added to his domi- nions.

On the death of Caligula, Agrippa, who was at the time in Rome, materially assisted Claudius in gaining possession of the empire. As a reward for his services, Judea and Samaria were annexed to his dominions, which were now even more extensive than those of Herod the Great. He was also invested with the consular dignity, and a league was publicly made with him by Claudius in the forum. At his request, the kingdom of Chaleis was given to his brother Herodes. (A.D. 41.) He then went to Jerusalem, where he offered sacrifices, and suspended in the treasury of the temple the golden chain which Caligula had given him. His government was mild and gentle, and he was exceedingly popular amongst the Jews. In the city of Berytus he built a theatre and amphitheatre, baths, and porticoes. The suspicions of Claudius prevented him from finishing the impregnable fortifications with which he had begun to surround Jerusalem. His friendship was courted by many of the neighbouring kings and rulers. It was probably to increase his popularity with the Jews that he caused the apostle James, the brother of John, to be beheaded, and Peter to be cast into prison. (A. D. 44. Acts, xii.) It was not however merely by such acts that he strove to win their favour, as we see from the way in which, at the risk of his own life, or at least of his liberty, he interceded with Caligula on behalf of the Jews, when that emperor was attempting to set up his statue in the temple at Jerusalem. The manner of his death, which took place at Caesarea in the same year, as he was exhibiting games in honour of the emperor, is related in Acts xii., and is confirmed in all essential points by Josephus, who repeats Agrippa’s words, in which he acknowledged the justice of the punishment thus inflicted on him. After lingering five days, he expired, in the fifty-fourth year of his age.

By his wife Cypessa he had a son named Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, who first married her uncle Herodes, king of Chalcis, afterwards lived with her brother Agrippa, and subsequently married Polame, king of Citicia; she is alluded to by Juvenal (Sat. vi. 156); Marianne, and Drusilla, who married Felix, the procurator of Judea. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xvii. 1. § 2, xviii. 5-8, xix. 4-8; Bell. Jud. i. 28. § 1, ii. 9. 11; Dion Cass. ix. 8; Busch. Hist. Eccles. ii. 10.) [C. P. M.]

AGrippa, HeroDES II., the son of Agrippa I., was educated at the court of the emperor Claudius, and at the time of his father’s death was only seventeen years old. Claudius therefore kept him at Rome, and sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator of the kingdom, which thus again became a Roman province. On the death of Herodes, king of Chalcis (A. D. 49), his little principality, with the right of superintending the temple and appointing the high priest, was given to Agrippa, who four years afterwards received in its stead the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king. In A. D. 55, Nero added the cities of Tiberias and Tarichea in Galilee, and Julias, with fourteen villages near it, in Perea. Agrippa expended large sums in beautifying Jerusalem and other cities, especially Bethsaida. His partiality for the latter rendered him unpopular amongst his own subjects, and the capricious manner in which he appointed and deposed the high priests, with some other acts which were distasteful, made him an object of dislike to the Jews. Before the outbreak of the Jewish War, Agrippa attempted in vain to dissuade the people from rebelling. When the war was begun, he sided with the Romans, and was rewarded at the siege of Gamala. After the capture of Jerusalem, he went with his sister Berenice to Rome, where he was invested with the dignity of pretor. He died in the seventieth year of his age, in the third year of the reign of Trajan. He was the last prince of the house of the Herods. It was before this Agrippa that the apostle Paul made his defence. (A. D. 60. Acts xxv. xxvi.) He lived on terms of intimacy with the historian Josephus, who has preserved two of the letters he received from him. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xvii. 5. § 4, xix. 9. § 2, xx. 1. § 5, 2, 7, § 1, 8. § 4, 11, 9. § 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 11. § 6, 12, § 14, 17, § 1, iv. 1. § 3; Vit. s. 54; Phot. cod. 33.) [C. P. M.]

AGrippa, MARCIUS, a man of the lowest origin, was appointed by Markianus in A. D. 217, first to the government of Pannonia and afterwards to that of Dacia. (Dion. Cass. lxxviii. 13.) He seems to be the same person as the Marcius Agrippa, admiral of the fleet, who is mentioned by Sparitnus as prcy to the death of Antoninus Caracalla. (Anton. Cori. 6.)

AGrippa Menenius. [Menenius.]

AGrippa Posthumus, a posthumous son of M. Vipsanius Agrippa, by Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was born in A. D. 12. He was adopted by Augustus together with Tiberius in A. D. 4, and he assumed the toga virilis in the following year, A. D. 5. (Suet. Octav. 64, 65; Dion Cass. liv. 29, lv. 22.) Notwithstanding his adoption he was afterwards banished by Augustus to the island of Phanesia, on the coast of Cornicia, a disgrace which he incurred on account of his savage and intractable character; but he was not guilty of any crime. There he was under the surveillance of soldiers, and Augustus obtained a sentence of condemnation by which the banishment was legally confirmed for the time of his life. The property of Agrippa was assigned by Augustus to the treasury of the army. It is said that during his captivity he received the visit of Augustus, who secretly went to Phanesia, accompanied by Fabius Maximus. Augustus and Agrippa, both deeply affected, shed tears when they met, and it was believed that Agrippa would be restored to liberty. But the news of this visit reached Livius, the mother of Tiberius, and Agrippa remained a captive. After the accession of Tiberius, in A. D. 14, Agrippa was murdered by a centurion, who entered his prison and killed him after a long struggle, for Agrippa was a man of great bodily strength. When the centurion afterwards went to Tiberius to give him an account of the execution, the emperor denied having given any order for it, and it is very probable that Livias was the secret author of the crime. There was a rumour that Augustus had left an order for the execution of Agrippa, but this is positively contradicted by Tacitus. (Tac. Ann. i. 3-6; Dion Cass. iv. 32, lvii. 5; Suet. I. c. Tit. 22; Velleius. H. 104, 112.)

After the death of Agrippa, a slave of the name of Clemens, who was not informed of the murder, landed on Phanesia with the intention of restoring Agrippa to liberty and carrying him off to the army in Germany. When he heard of what had taken place, he tried to profit by his great resemblance to the murdered captive, and he gave himself out as Agrippa. He landed at Ostia, and found many who believed him, or affected to believe him, but he was seized and put to death by order of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. ii. 39, 40.)

AGrippa, VibuleNus, a Roman knight, who took poison in the senate house at the time of his trial, A. D. 36; he had brought the poison with him in a ring. (Tac. Ann. vi. 49; Dion Cass. lviii. 21.)

AGrippa, M. Vipsa’Nius, was born in n. c. 63. He was the son of Lucius, and was descended from a very obscure family. At the age of twenty he studied at Apollonia in Ilyria, together with young Octavius, afterwards Octavianus and Augustus. After the murder of J. Caesar in n. c. 44, Agrippa was one of those intimate friends of Octavius, who advised him to proceed immediately to Rome. Octavius took Agrippa with him, and charged him to receive the oath of fidelity from several legions which had declared in his favour having been chosen consul in n. c. 43, Octavius gave his friend to Agrippa the delicate commission of prosecuting C. Cassius, one of the murderers of J. Caesar. At the outbreak of the Perusinian war between Octavius, now Octavianus, and L. Antonius, in n. c. 38, Agrippa was sent praetor as commander-in-chief of the forces of Octavianus, and after distinguishing himself by skilful manoeuvres, besieged L. Antonius in Perusia. He took the town in n. c. 40, and towards the end of the same year retook Siponum, which had fallen into the hands of M. Antonius. In n. c. 38, Agrippa obtained fresh success in Gaul, where he quelled a revolt of the native chiefs; he also penetrated into Germany as far as the country of the Catti, and transplanted the Ubii to the left bank of the Rhine; whereupon he turned his arms against the revolted Aquitanians, whom he soon brought to obedience. His victories, especially those in Aquitania, contributed much to securing the power of Octavianus, and he was recalled by him to undertake the command of the war against Sex. Pompeius, which was on the point of breaking out, n. c. 37. Octavianus offered him a triumph, which Agrippa declined, but accepted the consulship, to which he was promoted by Octavianus in n. c. 37. Dion Cassius (lviii. 49) seems to say that he was consul when he went to Gaul, but the words ὁμολογήσω δὲ μετὰ Δωδώνεως Ὡλοκλονόμων seem to be suspicious; unless they are to be inserted a little higher, after the passage, τῷ Ἀργηνήτῃ τὴν τοῦ πατριωτικοῦ παρασκευῆς ἔχοντας, which refer to an event which took place during the consulship of Agrippa. For, immediately after his promotion to this dignity, he was charged by Octavianus with the construction of a fleet, which was the more necessary, as Sextus Pompeius was master of the sea, Agrippa in vain exerted himself and deeds were never separated (Velleii p. 79), executed this order with prompt energy. The Lucrine lake near Baiae was transformed by him into a safe harbour, which he called the Julian port in honour of Octavianus, and where he exercised his sailors and mariners till they were able to encounter the experienced sailors of Pompey. In n. c. 36, Agrippa defeated Sex. Pompey first at Mylne, and afterwards at Naupactus on the coast of Sicily, and the latter of these victories broke the naval supremacy of Pompey. He received in consequence the honour of a naval crown, which was first conferred upon him; though, according to other authorities, M. Varro was the first who obtained it from Pompey the Great. (Velleii p. 81; Liv. Eges. 120; Dion Cass. xlix. 14; Plin. H. N. xvi. 8. 6; Virg. Æv. viii. 684.)

In n. c. 35, Agrippa had the command of the army in Illyria, and afterwards served under Octavianus, when the latter had proceeded to that country. On his return, he voluntarily accepted the aedileship in n. c. 33, although he had been consul, and expended immense sums of money upon great public works. He restored the Appian, Marcian, and Aenian aqueducts, constructed a new one, fifteen miles in length, from the Tepula to Rome, to which he gave the name of the Julian, in honour of Octavianus, and had an immense number of smaller water-works made, to distribute the water within the town. He also had the famous temple of Tarrquinii Priscus entirely cleansed. His various works were adorned with statues by the first artists of Rome. These splendid buildings he augmented in n. c. 27, during his third consulship, by several others, and among these was the Pantheon, on which we still read the inscription: "M. Agrippa L. F. Cos. Tertium fecit." (Dion Cass. xlix. 43, liii. 27; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 15, s. 24 § 3; Strab. v. 235; From. On op. p. 69.)

When the war broke out between Octavius and M. Antonius, Agrippa was appointed commander-in-chief of the fleet, n. c. 32. He took Methone in the Peloponnesus, Leucas, Patrae, and Corinth, and in the battle of Actium (n. c. 31) where he commanded, the victory was mainly owing to his skill. On his return to Rome in n. c. 30, Octavianus, now Augustus, rewarded him with a "vegillum caeruleum," or sea-green flag.

In n. c. 28, Agrippa became consul for the second time with Augustus, and about this time married Marcella, the niece of Augustus, and the daughter of his sister Octavia. His former wife, Pomponia, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, was either dead or divorced. In the following year, n. c. 27, he was again consul the third time with Augustus.

In n. c. 25, Agrippa accompanied Augustus to the war against the Cantabrians. About this time jealousies arose between him and his brother-in-law Marcellus, the nephew of Augustus, and who seemed to be destined as his successor. Augustus, anxious to prevent differences that might have had serious consequences for him, sent Agrippa as proconsul to Syria. Agrippa of course left Rome, but he stopped at Mytilene in the island of Lesbos, leaving the government of Syria to his legate. The apprehensions of Augustus were removed by the death of Marcellus in n. c. 23, and Agrippa immediately returned to Rome, where he was the more anxiously expected, as troubles had broken out during the election of the consuls in n. c. 21. Augustus resolved to receive his faithful friend into his own family, and accordingly induced him to divorce his wife Marcella, and marry Julia, the widow of Marcellus and the daughter of Augustus by his third wife, Scribonia. (n. c. 21.)

In n. c. 19, Agrippa went into Gaul. He pacified the turbulent natives, and constructed four great public roads and a splendid aqueduct at Nemasus (Nemusa). From thence he proceeded to Spain and subdued the Cantabrians after a short but bloody and obstinate struggle; but, in accordance with his usual prudence, he neither announced his victories in pompos letters to the senate, nor did he accept a triumph which Augustus offered him. In n. c. 18, he was invested with the tribunician power for five years together with Augustus; and in the following year (n. c. 17), his two sons, Caius and Lucius, were adopted by Augustus. At the close of the year, he accepted an invitation of Herod the Great, and went to Jerusalem. He founded the military colony of Beytrus (Beyrut), thence he proceeded in n. c. 16 to the Pontus Enximus, and compelled the Bosporans to accept Ptolomy for their king and to restore the Roman eagles which had been taken by Mithridates. On his return he stayed some time in Ionia, where he granted privileges to the Jews whose cause was pleaded by Herod (Joseph. Antig. Jud. xvi. 2), and then proceeded to Rome, where he arrived in n. c. 14. After his tribunician power had been prolonged for five years, he went to Pan- monia to restore tranquillity to that province. He returned in n. c. 12, after having been successful as usual, and retired to Campania. There he died unexpectedly, in the month of March, n. c. 12, in his 51st year. His body was carried to Rome, and was buried in the mausoleum of Augustus, who himself pronounced a funeral oration over it.

Dion Cassius tells us (lil. I., &c.), that in the year B.C. 29 Augustus assembled his friends and counsellors, Agrippa and Macean, demanding their opinion as to whether it would be advisable for him to usurp monarchical power, or to restore to the nation its former republican government. This is corroborated by Statianus (Octavius, 20), who says that Augustus twice deliberated upon that subject. The speeches which Agrippa and Macean delivered on this occasion are given by Dion Cassius; but the artificial character of them makes them suspicious. However it does not seem likely from the general character of Dion Cassius as a historian that these speeches are invented by him; and it is not improbable, and such a supposition suits entirely the character of Augustus, that these speeches were really pronounced, though preconceived between Augustus and his counsellors to make the Roman nation believe that the fate of the republic was still a matter of discussion, and that Augustus would not assume monarchical power till he had been convinced that it was necessary for the welfare of the nation. Besides, Agrippa, who according to Dion Cassius, advised Augustus to restore the republic, was a man whose political opinions had evidently a monarchical tendency.

Agrippa was one of the most distinguished and important men of the age of Augustus. He must be considered as a chief support of the rising monarchical constitution, and without Agrippa Augustus could scarcely have succeeded in making himself the absolute master of the Roman empire. Dion Cassius (liv. 29, &c.), Velutius Paterculus (lil. 79), Seneca (Ep. 94), and Horace (Od. i. 6), speak with equal admiration of his merits.

Pliny constantly refers to the "Commentariorii" of Agrippa as an authority (Elenchus, lil. iv. v. vi. comp. ii. 2), which may indicate certain official lists drawn up by him in the measurement of the Roman world under Augustus [ARCHIPEL], in which he may have taken part.

Agrippa left several children. By his first wife Pompeonia, he had Vipsania, who was married to Tiberius Caesar, the successor of Augustus. By his second wife, Marcella, he had several children who are not mentioned; and by his third wife, Julia, he had two daughters, Julia, married to L. Aemilius Paullus, and Agrippina married to Germanicus, and three sons, Caes (CAESAR, C.), Lucius (CAESAR, L.), and Agrrippa Postumus. (Dion Cass. lib. 45-54; Liv. Epit. 117-136; Appian, Bell. Civ. lib. 5; Suet. Octavius; Frandsen, M. Vipsania Agrippa, eine historische Untersuchung über dessen Leben und Wirken, Altona, 1835.)

There are several medals of Agrippa ; in the one figured below, he is represented with a naval crown; on the reverse is Neptune indicating his success by sea.

AGrippina.

AGrippina I., the youngest daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was born some time before B.C. 12. She married Caeser Germanicus, the son of Drusus Nero Germanicus, by whom she had nine children. Agrippina was gifted with great powers of mind, a noble character, and all the moral and physical qualities that constituted the model of a Roman matron: her love for her husband was sincere and lasting, her charity was spotless, her fertility was a virtue in the eyes of the Romans, and her attachment to her children was an eminent feature of her character. She yielded to one dangerous passion, ambition. Augustus showed her particular attention and attachment. (Sueton. Caligula. 8.)

At the death of Augustus in A.D. 14, she was on the Lower Rhine with Germanics, who commanded the legions there. Her husband was the idol of the army, and the legions on the Rhine, dissatisfied with the accession of Tiberius, manifested their intention of proclaiming Germanicus master of the state. Tiberius hated and dreaded Germanicus, and he showed as much antipathy to Agrippina, as he had love to her elder sister, his first wife. In this perilous situation, Germanicus and Agrippina saved themselves by their prompt energy; he quelled the outbreak and pursued the war against the Germans. In the ensuing year his lieutenant Cæcina, after having made an invasion into Germany, returned to the Rhine. The campaign was not inglorious for the Romans, but they were worn out by hardships, and perhaps harassed on their march by some bands of Germans. Thus the rumour was spread that the main body of the Germans was approaching to invade Gaul. Germanicus was absent, and it was proposed to destroy the bridge over the Rhine. (Comp. Strab. iv. p. 194.) If this had been done, the retreat of Cæcina's army would have been cut off, but it was saved by the firm opposition of Agrippina to such a cowardly measure. When the troops approached, she went to the bridge, acting as a general, and receiving the soldiers as they crossed it; the wounded among them were presented by her with clothes, and they received from her hands everything necessary for the cure of their wounds. (Tac. Ann. i. 60.) Germanicus having been recalled by Tiberius, she accompanied her husband to Asia (A.D. 17), and after his death, or rather murder [GERMANICIUS], she returned to Italy. She stayed some days at the island of Corcyra to recover from her grief, and then landed at Brundusium, accompanied by two of her children, and holding in her arms the urn with the ashes of her husband. At the news of her arrival, the port, the walls, and even the roofs of the houses were occupied by crowds of people who were anxious to see and salute her. She was solemnly received by the officers of two Praetorian cohorts, which Tiberius had sent to Brundusium for the purpose of accompanying her to Rome; the urn containing the ashes of Germanicus was borne by tribunes and centurions, and the funeral procession was received on its march by the magistrates of Calabria, Apulia, and Campania; by Drusus, the son of Tiberius; Claudius, the brother of Germanicus; by the other children of Germanicus; and at last, in the environs of Rome, by the consuls, the senate, and crowds of the Roman people. (Tac. Ann. iii. 1, &c.)
AGrippina.

During some years Tiberius disguised his hatred of Agrippina; but she soon became exposed to secret accusations and intrigues. She asked the emperor's permission to choose another husband, but Tiberius neither refused nor consented to the proposition. Sejanus, who exercised an unbounded influence over Tiberius, then a prey to mental disorders, persuaded Agrippina that the emperor intended to poison her. Alarmed at such a report, she refused to eat an apple which the emperor offered her from his table, and Tiberius in his turn complained of Agrippina regarding him as a poisoner. According to Suetonius, all this was an intrigue preconceived between the emperor and Sejanus, who, as it seems, had formed the plan of leading Agrippina into false steps. Tiberius was extremely suspicious of Agrippina, and showed his hostile feelings by allusive words or neglectful silence. There were no evidences of ambitious plans formed by Agrippina, but the rumour having been spread that she would fly to the army, he banished her to the island of Pandataria (A.D. 30) where her mother Julia had died in exile. Her sons Nero and Drusus were likewise banished and both died an unnatural death. She lived three years on that barren island; at last she refused to take any food, and died most probably by voluntary starvation. Her death took place precisely two years after and on the same date as the murder of Sejanus, that is in A.D. 33. Tacitus and Suetonius tell us, that Tiberius boasted that he had not strangled her. (Sueton. Tib. 53; Tac. Ann. vi. 25.) The ashes of Agrippina and those of her son Nero were afterwards brought to Rome by order of her son, the emperor Caligula, who struck various medals in honour of his mother. In the one figured below, the head of Caligula is on one side and that of his mother on the other. The words on each side are respectively, C. CAESAR AVG. GER. P. M. TR. POT., and AGrippina. MAT. C. CAES. AVG. GERM.

AGrippina. 11, the daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina the elder, daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa. She was born between A.D. 13 and 17; at the Oppidum Ullomum, afterwards called in honour of her Colonia Agrippina, now Cologne, and then the head-quarters of the legions commanded by her father. In A.D. 28, she married Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a man not unlike her, and whom she lost in A.D. 40. After his death she married Crispus Passienus, who died some years afterwards; and she was accused of having poisoned him, either for the purpose of obtaining his great fortune, or for some secret motive of much higher importance. She was already known for her scandalous conduct, for her most perfidious intrigues, and for an unbounded ambition. She was accused of having committed incest with her own brother, the emperor Caius Caligula, who under the pretext of having discovered that she had lived in an adulterous intercourse with M. Aemilius Lepidus, the husband of her sister Drusilla, banished her to the island of Pontia, which was situated opposite the bay of Caleta, off the coast of Italy. Her sister Drusilla was likewise banished to Pontia, and it seems that their exile was connected with the punishment of Lepidus, who was put to death for having conspired against the emperor. Previously to her exile, Agrippina was compelled by her brother to carry to Rome the ashes of Lepidus. This happened in A.D. 39. Agrippina and her sister were released in A.D. 41, by their uncle, Claudius, immediately after his accession, although his wife, Messalina, was the mortal enemy of Agrippina. Messalina was put to death by order of Claudius in A.D. 48; and in the following year, A.D. 49, Agrippina succeeded in marrying the emperor. Claudius was her uncle, but her marriage was legalized by a senatusconsultum, by which the marriage of a man with his brother’s daughter was declared valid; this senatusconsultum was afterwards abrogated by the emperors Constantine and Constantius. In this intrigue Agrippina displayed the qualities of an accomplished courtier, and such was the influence of her charm and superior talents over the old emperor, that, in prejudice of his own son, Britannicus, he adopted Domitian, the son of Agrippina by her first husband, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. (A.D. 51.) Agrippina was assisted in her secret plans by Pullus, the perfidious confidant of Claudius. By her intrigues, L. Junius Silius, the husband of Octavia, the daughter of Claudius, was put to death, and in A.D. 53, Octavia was married to young Nero. Lollia Paulina, once the rival of Agrippina for the hand of the emperor, was accused of high treason and condemned to death; but she put an end to her own life. Domitia Lepida, the sister of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, met with a similar fate. After having thus removed those whose rivalry she dreaded, or whose virtues she envied, Agrippina resolved to get rid of her husband, and to govern the empire through her ascendency over her son Nero, his successor. A vague rumour of this reached the emperor; in a state of drunkenness, he forgot prudence, and talked about punishing his ambitious wife. Having no time to lose, Agrippina, assisted by Locusta and Xenophon, a Greek physician, poisoned the old emperor, in A.D. 54, at Sinnessa, a watering-place to which he had retired for the sake of his health. Nero was proclaimed emperor, and presented to the troops by Burrus, whom Agrippa had appointed prefectus praetorio. Narcissus, the rich freedman of Cn. Domitius, procurator of Asia, the brother of L. Junius Silius, and a great-grandson of Augustus, lost their lives at the instigation of Agrippina, who would have augmented the number of her victims, but for the opposition of Burrus and Seneo, recalled by Agrippina from his exile to conduct the education of Nero. Meanwhile, the young emperor took some steps to shake off the insupportable ascendency of his mother. The jealousy of Agrippina rose from her son’s passion for Acte, and, after her, for Poppea Sabina, the wife of M. Salvius Otto. To reconcile his affection, Agrippina employed, but in vain, most daring and most revolting means. She threatened to oppose Britannicus as a rival to Nero, but Britannicus was poisoned by Nero; and she even solicited his son to an incestuous intercourse. At last, her death was resolved upon by Nero, who wished to repudiate Octavia and marry Poppaea, but whose plan was thwarted by his mother. Thus petty feminine intrigue became the cause of Agrippina's ruin. Nero invited her under the pretext of a reconciliation to visit him at Baiae, on the coast of Campania. She went thither by sea. In their conversation hypocrisy was displayed on both sides. She left Baiae by the same way; but the vessel was so contrived, that it was to break to pieces when out at sea. It only partly broke, and Agrippina saved herself by swimming to the shore; her attendant Accorina was killed. Agrippina fled to her villa near the Lucrine lake, and informed her son of her happy escape. Now, Nero charged Burros to murder his mother; but Burros declining it, Anicius, the commander of the fleet, who had invented the stratagem of the ship, was compelled by Nero and Burros to undertake the task. Anicius went to her villa with a chosen band, and his men surprised her in her bedroom. "Ventrici feri" she cried out, after she was but slightly wounded, and immediately afterwards expired under the blows of a centurion. (A. d. 60.) (Tac. Ann. xiv. 8.) It was told, that Nero went to the villa, and that he admired the beauty of the dead body of his mother: this was believed by some, doubted by others. (xiv. 9.) Agrippina left commentaries concerning her history and that of her family, which Tacitus consulted, according to his own statement (ib. iv. 54; comp. Pline. Hist. Nat. viii. 36, 49; Eumenius, vi. &c.)

There are several medals of Agrippina, which are distinguishable from those of her mother by the title of Augusta, which those of her mother never have. On some of her medals she is represented with her husband Claudius, in others with her son Nero. The former is the case in the one annexed. The words on each side are respectively, AGrippinæ Augustae, and Ti. Claud. Cæsar. AVG. GREEK: F.M. TRIB. POT. P.P. [Tac. Ann. lib. xii. xiii. xiv.; Dion Cass. lib. lxix.—Lxi.; Sueton. Claud. 43, 44. Nero, 6, 6.] [W.P.]

AGrippINUS, Bishop of Carthage, of venerable memory, but known for being the first to maintain the necessity of re-baptizing all heretics. (Vincent Lirisena. Compend. ii. 9.) St. Cyprian regarded this opinion as the correction of an error (S. Augustin. De Baptismo, b. 7, vol. i. p. 102, ed. Benzol., and St. Augustin seems to imply he denied his error in writing. (Epist. 98, c. 10.) He held the Council of 70 Bishops at Carthage about A. d. 200 (Vulg. A. d. 215, Mans. A. d. 217) on the subject of Baptism. Though he erred in a matter yet undefined by the Church, St. Augustine notices that neither he nor St. Cyprian thought of separating from the Church. (De Baptismo, iii. 3, p. 109.) [A. J. C.]

AGrippinus Pacontius, whose father was put to death by Tiberinus on a charge of treason. (Suet. Tib. 61.) Agrippinus was accused at the same time as Thrasius, A. d. 67, and was exiled from Italy. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 29, 38.) He was a Stoic philosopher, and is spoken of with respect by Epictetus (op. Sol. Sem., 7) and Arrian. (I. 1.)

A'GRIUS (Ἀγρίος), a son of Porthnion and Euryte, and brother of Oeneus, king of Calydon in Aetolia, Alcathous, Melas, Loucopeus, and Storope. He was father of six sons, of whom Thersites was one. These six sons of Agrius deprived Oeneus of his kingdom, and gave it to their father; but all of them, with the exception of Thersites, were slain by Diomedes, the grandson of Oeneus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10, 8. § 5, &c.) Apollodorus places these events before the expedition of the Greeks against Troy, when Hyginus (Pud. 175, comp. 242 and Antonin. Lib. 87) states, that Diomedes, when he heard, after the fall of Troy, of the misfortune of his grandfather Oeneus, hastened back and expelled Agrius, who then put an end to his own life; according to others, Agrius and his sons were slain by Diomedes. (Comp. Paus. ii. 23. § 2; Ov. Hœrôd. ix. 153.)

There are some other mythical personages of the name of Agrius, concerning whom nothing of interest is known. (Hesiod. Thig. 1013, &c.; Apollod. i. 6. § 2, ii. 8. § 4.) [L.S.]

AGROECIUS or AROETIUS, a Roman grammarian, the author of an extant work "De Orthographia et Differentia Sermonis," intended as a supplement to Aetius, on the same subject, by Flavius Copera, and dedicated to a bishop, Euche- rius. He is supposed to have lived in the middle of the 6th century of our era. His work is printed in Putschius' "Grammaticae Latinae Antiqui," pp. 2266—2275. [C. P. M.]

AGROETAS (Ἀγροετας), a Greek historian, who wrote a work on Scythia (Σκυθίδας), from the thirteenth book of which the scholar on Apollonius (ii. 1348) quotes, and one on Libya (Λιβυκα), the fourth book of which is quoted by the same scholar. (iv. 1396.) He is also mentioned by Stephano Byz. (s. v. Αγροέτας). [C. P. M.]

AGRON (Ἀγρών). 1. The son of Ninus, the first of the Lydian dynasty of the Hecaleidæ. The tradition was, that this dynasty supplanted a native Lydian house, having been originally entrusted with the government as deputies. The names Ninus and Belus in their genealogy render it probable that they were either Assyrian governors, or princes of Assyrian origin, and that their succession marks the period of an Assyrian conquest. (Hercod. i. 7.)

2. The son of Plemusus, a king of Illyria. In the strength of his land and naval forces he surpassed all the preceding kings of that country. When the Aetolians attempted to compel the Macedonians to join their confederacy, Agron undertook to protect them, having been induced to do so by a large bribe which he received from Demetrius, the father of Philip. He accordingly sent to their assistance a force of 5000 Illyrians, who gained a decisive victory over the Aetolians. Agron, overjoyed at the news of this success, gave himself up to feasting, and, in consequence of his excess, contracted a pleurisy, of which he died. (b.c 231.) He was succeeded in the government by his wife Tenta. Just after his death, an embassy arrived from the Romans, who had sent to mediate in behalf of the inhabitants of the island of Issa, who had revolted from Agron and placed themselves under the protection of the Romans. By his first wife, Tritea, whom he divorced, he had a son named Pinnæus, or Pinneas, who survived him, and was placed under the guardianship of Demetrius Phærus, who married his mother after the death of Touia. (Dion Cass. xxxiv. 46, 135; Polyb. ii. 25; Appian, Ill. 7; Flor. ii. 5; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6.)

AGROTERRA (Ἀγρώτερα), the huntress, a surname of Artemis. (Horn. L. xxi. 471.) At Aegae on the Ileus, where she was believed to have first hunted after her arrival from Delos, Artemis Agrotæra had a temple with a statue carrying a bow. (Paus. i. 19. § 7.) Under this name she was also worshipped at Aegæa. (vii. 26. § 2.)

The name Agrotæra is synonymous with Aegaea [Aragus], but Eustathius (ad ll. p. 361) derives it from the town of Aegae. Concerning the worship of Artemis Agrotæra at Athens, see Diod. of Anth. s. v. "Ἀγρώτερα" Struck, p. 31.

[La S.]

AGYIEUS (Ἀγγιεός), a surname of Apollo describing him as the protector of the streets and public places. As such he was worshipped at Acharnae (Paus. i. 31. § 3), Mycenes (ii. 19. § 7), and at Tegea. (viii. 53. § 1.) The origin of the worship of Apollo Agyieus in the last of these places is related by Pausanias. (Compare Hor. Carm. iv. 6. 28; Macrobo. Sac. i. 9.)

AGYRIANUS (Ἀγγριάνος), a native of Colossus in Attica, where Andocides ironically calls τὸν καλὸν κατάγον (de Myth. p. 63, ed. Relke), after being in prison many years for embezzlement of public money, obtained about b. c. 395 the restoration of the Theorion, and also tripled the pay for attending the assembly, though he reduced the salaries of the magistrates given to the comic writers. (Harpocren. s. v. Θεόπολιος, Ἀγγριάνος; Suzidès, s. v. Ἀγρίαστονος; Schol. ad Aristoph. Elc. 102; Dem. c. Timoer. p. 742.) By this expenditure of the public revenue Agyrianus became so popular, that he was appointed general in b. c. 389. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 31; Diod. xiv. 99; Böckh, Pab. Erl. v. Athens, pp. 223, 224, 316, &c., 2nd ed. Engl. transl.; Schimm, de Comitiis, p. 65, &c.)

AHA/ALA, the name of a patrician family of the Servilia gens. There were also several persons of this gens with the name of Servius Aha/la, who may have formed a different family from the Aha/lae; but as the Aha/lae and Sertuci Aha/lae are frequently confounded, all the persons of these names are given here.

1. C. Servilius Structus Aha/la, consul b.c. 478, died in his year of office, as appears from the Fasti. (Liv. ii. 49.)

2. C. Servilius Structus Aha/la, magister equitum b. c. 439, when L. Cincinnatus was appointed dictator on the pretense that Sp. Maelius was plotting against the state. In the night, in which the dictator was appointed, the capital and all the strong posts were garrisoned by the partisans of the patriots. In the morning, when the people assembled in the forum, and Sp. Maelius among them, Aha/la summoned the latter to appear before the dictator; and upon Maelius disbelieving and taking refuge in the crowd, Aha/la rushed into the throng and killed him. (Liv. iv. 13, 14; Zos. vii. 20; Dionys. Exc. Mai. i. p. 3.) This act is mentioned by later writers as an example of ancient heroism, and is frequently referred to by Cicero in terms of the highest admiration (in Cuiil. 1, pro Mil. 3, Cato, 16); but it was in reality a case of murder, and was so regarded at the time. Aha/la was brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile. (Val. Max. v. 3. § 2; Cic. de Rep. l. 9, pro Dom. 31.) Livy passes over this, and only mentions (iv. 21), that a bill was brought in three years afterwards, b. c. 436, by another Sp. Maelius, a tribune, for confiscating the property of Aha/la, but that it failed.

A representation of Aha/la is given on a coin of M. Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, but we cannot suppose it to be anything more than an imaginary likeness. M. Brutus pretended that he was descended from L. Brutus, the first consul, on his father's side, and from C. Aha/la on his mother's, and this was sprung from two tyrannies. (Comp. Cic. ad Att. xii. 40.)

The head of Brutus on the annexed coin is therefore intended to represent the first consul.

4. C. Servilius P. f. Q. n. Structus Aha/la, consul tribune b. c. 408, and magister equitum in the same year; which latter dignity he obtained in consequence of supporting the senate against his colleagues, who did not wish a dictator to be appointed. For the same reason he was elected consul tribune a second time in the following year, 407. He was consul tribune a third time in 402, when he assisted the senate in compelling his colleagues to resign who had been defeated by the enemy. (Liv. iv. 50, 57, v. 8, 9.)

5. C. Servilius Aha/la, magister equitum b. c. 389, when Camillus was appointed dictator a third time. (Liv. vi. 2.) Aha/la is spoken of as magister equitum in 383; on occasion of the trial of Manlius. Manlius summoned him to bear witness in his favour, as one of those whose lives he had saved in battle; but Aha/la did not appear. (iv. 20.) Pliny, who mentions this circumstance, calls Aha/la P. Servilius. (H. N. vii. 30.)

6. Q. Servilius Q. f. Q. n. Aha/la, consul b. c. 305, and again b. c. 362, in the latter of which years he was appointed Ap. Claudius dictator, after his plebeian colleague L. Genucius had been slain in battle. In 360 he was himself appointed dictator in consequence of a Gallic invasion, and defeated the Gauls near the Colline gate. He held the comitia as interrex in 355. (Liv. vii. 1, 4, 6, 11, 17.)

7. Q. Servilius Q. f. Q. n. Aha/la, magister equitum b. c. 351, when M. Fabius was appointed dictator to frustrate the Licinian law, and consul b. c. 342, at the beginning of the first Samnite war. He remained in the city, his colleague had the charge of the war. (Liv. vii. 22, 38.)

AHENOBARIUS, the name of a plebeian family of the Domitia gens, so called from the red hair which many of this family had. To explain this name, which signifies "Red-Beard," and to assign a high antiquity to their family, it was said that the Dioscuri announced to one of their ancestors the victory of the Romans over the Latins at lake Regillus (a. c. 496), and, to confirm the truth of what they said, that they stoked his black hair and beard, which immediately became red. (Suet. Ner. 1; Plut. Aemil. 25, Coriol. 3; Dionys. vi. 13; Tertull. Apol. 42.)

Stemma Athenobarbusorum.
5. L. Domitius Athenobarbus, Cos. n. c. 94.
7. L. Domitius Athenobarbus, Cos. b. c. 54. Married Porzia, sister of M. Cato.
8. Cn. Domitius Athenobarbus, Cos. b. c. 32.
13. L. Domitius Athenobarbus, the emperor Nero.

1. Cn. Domitius I. P. L. n. Athenobarbus, plebeian aedile b. c. 196, prosecuted, in conjunction with his colleague C. Curio, many pecuniae, and with the fines raised therefrom built a temple of Fannus in the island of the Tiber, which he dedicated in his praetorship, b. c. 184. (Liv. xxxii. 42, xxxiv. 42, 43, 53.) He was consul in 192, and was sent against the Boii, who submitted to him; but he remained in their country till the following year, when he was succeeded by the consul Scipio Nasica. (xxxv. 10, 20, 22, 40, xxxvi. 37.) In 190, he was legate of the consul L. Scipio in the war against Antiochus the Great. (xxxvii. 39; Plut. Apoph. Rom. Cn. Domit.) In his consularship one of his excons is said to have uttered the warning "Roma, cave sibi." (Liv. xxxv. 21; Val. Max. i. 6. § 5, who falsely says, Bello Punico secundo.)

2. Cn. Domitius Cn. f. L. n. Athenobarbus, son of the preceding, was chosen pontifex in b. c. 172, when a young man (Liv. xiii. 28), and in 169 was sent with two others as commissioner into Macedonia. (xvii. 18.) In 167 he was one of the ten commissioners for arranging the affairs of Macedonia in conjunction with Aemilius Paullus (xiv. 17); and when the consuls of 162. added on account of some fault in the auspices in their election, he and Cornelius Lentulus were chosen consul in their stead. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 4, de Div. ii. 35; Val. Max. i. 1. § 3.)

3. Cn. Domitius Cn. f. Cn. n. Athenobarbus, son of the preceding, was sent in his consularship, b. c. 129, against the Allobroges in Gaul, because they had received Teutoniamus, the king of the Salluvii and the enemy of the Romans, and had laid waste the territory of the Acervi, the friends of the Romans. In 121 he conquered the Allobroges and their ally Vivitius, king of the Arverni, near Vindaladium, at the confluence of the Sulga and the Rhodanus; and he gained the battle mainly through the terror caused by his elephants. He commemorated his victory by the erection of trophies, and went in procession through the province carried by an elephant. He triumphed in 120. (Liv. Epit. 61; Florus, iii. 2; Suet. iv. p. 191; Cic. pro Font. 12, Brut. 26; Vel. ii. 10, 39; Oros. v. 13; Suet. Ner. 2, who confounds him with his son.) He was censor in 115 with Caelius Metellus, and expelled twenty-two persons from the senate. (Liv. Epit. 62; Cic. pro Cluent. 42.) He was also Pontifex. (Suet. L. C.) The Via Domitiana in Gaul was made by him. (Cic. pro Font. 8.)

4. Cn. Domitius Cn. f. Cn. n. Athenobarbus, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs b. c. 104, in the second consularship of Marius. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 81, ed. Orelli.) When the college of pontiffs did not elect him in place of his father, he brought forward the law (Lex Domitia), by which the right of election was transferred from the priestly colleges to the people. (Dict. of Ant. pp. 773, 774, a.) The people afterwards elected him Pontifex Maximus out of gratitude. (Liv. Epit. 67; Cic. pro Deiot. 11; Val. Max. vi. 5. § 5.) He prosecuted in his tribunate and afterwards several of his private enemies, as Aemilius Scarrus and Junius Silanus. (Val. Max. l. c.; Dion Cass. F. 100; Cic. Div. in Caecid. 20, Verr. ii. 47, Cornel. 2, pro Scaur.) He was consul b. c. 96 with C. Cassius, and censor b. c. 92, with Licinius Crassus, the orator. In his censorship he and his colleague shut up the schools of the Latin rhetoricians (Cic. de Orat. iii. 24; Gall. xv. 11), but this was the only thing in which they acted in concert. Their censorship was long celebrated for their disputes. Domitius was of a violent temper, and was moreover in favour of the ancient simplicity of living, while Crassus loved luxury and encouraged AHENOBARBUS.

ART.

Among the many sayings recorded of both, we are told that Crassus observed, 'that it was no wonder that a man had a head of brass, who had a mouth of iron and a heart of lead.' (Plin. H. N. xviii. 1; Suet. L. c.; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 4; Macrobr. Sut. ii. 11.) Cicero says, that Domitius was not to be reckoned among the orators, but that he spoke well enough and had sufficient talent to maintain his high rank. (Cic. Brut. 44.)

5. L. DOMITIUS CN. P. CN. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of No. 6 and brother of No. 4, was proctor in Sicily, probably in B.C. 56, shortly after the Servile war, when had been forbidden to carry arms. He ordered a slave to be crucified, for killing a wild boar with a hunting spear. (Civ. Ferr. v. 3; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 5.) He was consul in 94. In the civil war between Marius and Sulla, he espoused the side of the latter, and was murdered at Rome, by order of the younger Marius, by the praetor Daminus. (Appian, B. C. i. 88; Vell. ii. 26; Oros. v. 20.)

6. CN. DOMITIUS CN. P. CN. F. AHENOBARBUS, apparently a son of No. 4, married Cornelia, daughter of L. Cornelius Cnna, consul in B.C. 87, and in the civil war between Marius and Sulla espoused the side of the former. When Sulla obtained the supreme power in 82, Ahenobarbus was proscribed, and fled to Africa, where he was joined by many who were in the same condition as himself. With the assistance of the Numidian king, Hiirbas, he collected an army, but was defeated near Uticbn by Cn. Pompeius, whom Sulla had sent against him, and was afterwards killed in the storming of his camp, B.C. 81. According to some accounts, he was killed after the battle by command of Pompey. (Liv. Epit. 89; Plut. Pompey, 10, 12; Zonaras, x. 2; Jos. v. 21; Val. Max. vi. 2. § 3.)

7. L. DOMITIUS CN. P. CN. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of No. 4, is first mentioned in B.C. 70 by Acher, as a witness against Verres. In 61 he was curule aedile, when he exhibited a hundred Numidian horses, and continued the games so long, but the people were obliged to leave the circus ear the exhibition was over, in order to take sod, which was the first time they had done so. Dion Cass. xxxvii. 46; Plin. H. N. viii. 54; this use in the games was called diadumen, Hor. Ep. 19. 47.) He married Porcia, the sister of M. Cato, and in his aedileship supported the latter in his proposals against bribery at elections, which were directed against Pompey, who was purchasing votes for Afranius. The political opinions of Ahenobarbus coincided with those of Cato; he was a rough task one of the strongest supporters of the aristocratic party. He took an active part in the measures of Caesar and Pompey, but their coalition, and the war was accused by Attius, as the instigation of Caesar, of being an accomplice to the pretended conspiracy against the emperor. In the civil war between Caesars and Pompey, he was a strong supporter of Caesar, and was one of the most active of the consular triumvirate. In 50 B.C. he became a candidate again in the following year, and Caesar and Pompey, whose power was firmly established, did not oppose him. He was accordingly elected consul for 49 with Ap. Claudius Pulcher, a relation of Pompey, but was not able to effect anything against Caesar and Pompey. He did not go to a province at the expiration of his consulate; and as the friendship between Caesar and Pompey cooled, he became closely allied with the latter. In B.C. 52, he was chosen by Pompey to preside, as a quaestor, in the court for the trial of Clodius. For the next two years during Cicero's absence in Cilicia, our information about Ahenobarbus is principally derived from the letters of his enemy Cicero to Cicero. In B.C. 50 he was a candidate for the place in the college of augurs, vacant by the death of Horatius, but was defeated by Antony through the influence of Caesar.

The senate appointed him to succeed Caesar in the province of further Gaul, and on the march of the latter into Italy (49), he was the only one of the aristocratic party who showed any energy or courage. He threw himself into Corfinium with about twenty cohorts, expecting to be supported by Pompey but as the latter did nothing to assist him, he was compelled by his own troops to surrender to Caesar. His own soldiers were incorporated into Caesar's army, but Ahenobarbus was dismissed by Caesar unmercifully— an act of clemency which he did not expect, and which he would certainly not have showed, if he had been the conqueror. Despairing of life, he had ordered his physician to administer to him poison, but the latter gave him only a sleeping draught. Ahenobarbus' feelings against Caesar remained unaltered, but he was too deeply offended by the conduct of Pompey to join him immediately. He retired for a short time to Cos in Etruria, and afterwards sailed to Massilia, of which the inhabitants appointed him governor. He prosecuted the war vigorously against Caesar, but the town was eventually taken, and Ahenobarbus escaped in a vessel, which was the only one that got off.

Ahenobarbus now went to Pompey in Thessaly, and proposed that after the war all senators should be brought to trial who had remained neutral in it. Cicero, whom he branded as a coward, was not a little afraid of him. He fell in the battle of Pharsalia (48), where he commanded the left wing, and, according to Cicero's assertion in the second Philippic, by the hand of Antony. Ahenobarbus was a man of great energy of character; he remained firm to his political principles, but was little scrupulous in the means he employed to maintain them. (The passages of Cicero in which Ahenobarbus is mentioned are given in Orelli's Commentaries Tullianus; Suet. N. B. 2; Dion Cass. lib. xxxiv. xli.; Ces. Bell. Civ.)

8. CN. DOMITIUS L. P. CN. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of the preceding, was taken with his father at Corfinium (B. C. 49), and was present at the battle of Pharsalia (48), but did not take any further part in the war. He did not however return to Italy till 46, when he was pardoned by Caesar. He probably had no share in the murder of Caesar (44), though some writers expressly assert that he was one of the conspirators; but he followed Brutus into Macedonia after Caesar's death, and was condemned by the Lex Pediea in 43 as one of the murderers of Caesar. In 42 he commanded a fleet of fifty ships in the Ionian sea, and completely defeated Domitius Calvinus on the day of the first battle of Philippi, as the latter attempted to sail out of Brundusium. He was selected Imperator in consequence, and a record of this victory is preserved in the anemoned coin, which represents a trophy placed upon the prow of a vessel. The head on the other side of the coin has a beard, in reference to the reputed origin of the family.

After the battle of Philippi (42), Ahenobarbus conducted the war independently of Sex. Pompeius, and with a fleet of seventy ships and two legion plundered the coasts of the Ionian sea.

In 40 Ahenobarbus became reconciled to Antony, which gave great offence to Octavius, and was placed over Bithynia by Antony. In the peace concluded with Sex. Pompeius in 39, Antony provided for the safety of Ahenobarbus, and obtained for him the promise of the consulate for 32. Ahenobarbus remained a considerable time in Asia, and accompanied Antony in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians in 38. He became consul, according to agreement, in 32, in which year the open rupture took place between Antony and Augustus. Ahenobarbus fled from Rome to Antony at Ephesus, where he found Cleopatra with him, and endeavoured, in vain, to obtain her removal from the army. Many of the soldiers, disgusted with the conduct of Antony, offered the command to him; but he preferred deserting the party altogether, and accordingly went over to Augustus shortly before the battle of Actium. He was not, however, present at the battle, as he died a few days after joining Augustus. Suetonius says that he was the best of his family. (Cic. Phil. ii. 11, x. 6; Brut. 25; ad Fam. vi. 22; Appian, B. C. v. 55, 63; Plut. Anton. 70, 71; Dion Cass. lib. xiv.—1; Velleius. ii. 76, 84; Suet. Ner. 3; Tac. Ann. iv. 44.)

9. L. DOMITIUS CN. F. L. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of the preceding, was betrothed in b. c. 36, at the meeting of Octavius and Antony at Tarentum, to Antonia, the daughter of the latter by Octavia. He was aced in b. c. 22, and consul in b. c. 16. After his consularship, and probably as the successor of Tiberius, he commanded the Roman army in Germany, crossed the Elbe, and penetrated further into the country than any of his predecessors had done. He received in consequence the insignia of a triumph. He died a. d. 25. Suetonius describes him as haughty, prodigal, and cruel, and relates that in his adolescents he commanded the censor L. Plancus to make way for him; and that in his praetorship and consulship he brought Roman knights and matrons on the stage. He exhibited shows of wild beasts in every quarter of the city, and his gladiatorial combats were conducted with so much bloodshed, that Augustus was obliged to put some restraint upon them. (Suet. Ner. 4; Tac. Ann. iv. 44; Dion Cass. liv. 59; Velleii. ii. 72.)

10. CN. DOMITIUS L. F. CN. F. AHENOBARBUS, son of the preceding, and father of the emperor Nero. He married Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus. He was consul a. d. 32, and afterwards praetor in Sicily. He died at Pyrgi in Etruria of dropsy. His life was stained with crimes of every kind. He was accused as the accomplice of Albanus of the crimes of adultery and murder, and also of incest with his sister Domitia Lepida, and only escaped execution by the death of Tibullus. When congratulated on the birth of his son, afterwards Nero, he replied that whatever was sprung from him and Agrippina could only bring ruin to the state. (Suet. Ner. 5, 6; Tac. Ann. iv. 75, vi. 1, 47, xii. 64; Velleii. ii. 72; Dion Cass. lib. iv. 17.)

14. CN. DOMITIUS AHENOBARBUS, praetor in b. c. 54, presided at the second trial of M. Coelius. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 12.) He may have been the son of No. 5.
15. L. DOMITIUS AHENOBARBUS, praetor b. c. 80, commanded the province of nearer Spain, with the title of proconsul. In 79, he was summoned into further Spain by Q. Metellus Pius, who was in want of assistance against Sertorius, but he was defeated and killed by Hiruleius, quaeator of Sertorius, near the Annae. (Plut. Sert. 12; Liv. Epit. 30; Eutrop. vi. 1; Florus, iii. 22; Oros. vii. 23.)

1. Ajax (Ajax). 1. A son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Periboea or Eriboea (Apollod. iii. 12 § 7; Paus. i. 42. § 4; Pind. Ist. vi. 65; Diod. iv. 72), and a grandson of Aeneas. Homer calls him Ajax the Telamonician, Ajax the Great, or simply Ajax (II. ii. 766, ix. 169, xiv. 410; comp. Pind. Ist. vi. 38), whereas the other Ajax, the son of Oileus, is always distinguished from the former by some epithet. According to Homer, Ajax joined the expedition of the Greeks against Troy, with his Salamisians, in twelve ships (II. ii. 557; comp. Strab. i. 9. p. 394), and was next Achilles the most distinguished and the bravest among the Greeks. (Ili. 766, xvi. 273, &c.) If it is described as tall of stature, and his head and broad shoulders as rising above those of all the Greeks (iii. 226, &c.); in beauty he was inferior to none but Achilles. (Od. xi. 550, xxiv. 17 comp. Paus. i. 35. § 3.) When Hector challenged the bravest of the Greeks to single combat, Ajax came forward among several others. The people prayed that he might fight, and when the lot fell to Ajax (II. vii. 179, &c.), he and Ajax, he opposed Hector himself began to tremble. (215) He wounded Hector and dashed him to the ground by a huge stone. The combatants were separate and upon putting they exchanged arms with another as a token of mutual esteem. (266, 8) Ajax was also one of the ambassadors whom Agamemnon sent to conciliate Achilles. (ix. 160.) If fought several times besides with Hector, as in the battle near the ships of the Greeks (xiv. 409, &c. 415, xvi. 114), and in protecting the body of Patroclus. (xviii. 128, 7 82.) In the games at the funereal pile of Patroclus, Ajax fought with Odysseus, without gaining any decided advantage over him (xxiii. 720, &c.), and in like manner with D AJAX.

In the contest about the armour of Achilles, he was conquered by Odysseus, and this, says Homer, became the cause of his death. (Od. xi. 541, &c.) Odysseus afterwards met his spirit in Hades, and endeavoured to appease it, but in vain.

Thus far the story of Ajax, the Telamonian, is related in the Homeric poems. Later writers furnish us with various other traditions about his youth, but more especially about his death, which is so vaguely alluded to by Homer. According to Apollodorus (iii. 12. § 7) and Pindar (Isth. vi. 51, &c.), Ajax became invulnerable in consequence of a prayer which Hercules offered to Zeus, with regard to his son. The child was called Ajax from δέρας, an eagle, which appeared immediately after the prayer as a favourable omen. According to Lycurphon (455 with the Schol.), Ajax was born before Hercules came to Telamon, and the hero made the child invulnerable by wrapping him up in his lion's skin. (Comp. Schol. ad Il. xxiii. 941.) Ajax is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 81.) During the war against Troy, Ajax, like Achilles, made excursions into neighbouring countries. The first of them was to the Thracian Chersonese, where he took Polydorus, the son of Pricam, who had been entrusted to the care of Priam, and who had a large body. Thence, he went into Phrygia, slow king Teuthras, or Teleutas, in single combat, and carried off great spoils, and Teuesas, the king's daughter, who became his mistress. (Dict. Cret. ii. 18; Soph. A. 310, 349, &c.; Hor. Carm. iv. 4. 5.) In the contest about the armour of Achilles, Agamemnon, on the advice of Athena, awarded the prize to Odysseus. This discomfiture threw Ajax into an awful state of madness. In the night he rushed from his tent, attacked the sheep of the Greek army, made great havoc among them, and dragged dead and living animals into his tent, fancying that they were his enemies. When, in the morning, he recovered his senses and beheld what he had done, shame and despair led him to destroy himself with the sword which Hector had once given him as a present. (Pind. Nem. vii. 39; Soph. A. 427, 777, 795, &c.; Met. xiii. 1, &c.; Lycurphon.) Less poetical traditions make Ajax die by the hands of others. (Dict. Cret. v. 15; Dar. Phryg. 35, and the Greek argument to Soph. Ajax.) His step-brother Teucer was charged by Telamon with the murder of Ajax, but succeeded in clearing himself from the accusation. (Paus. i. 28. § 12.) A tradition mentioned by Pausanias (i. 35. § 8; comp. Ov. Met. xiii. 397, &c.) states, that from his blood there sprang up a purple flower which bore the letters of on its leaves, which were at once the initials of his name and expressive of a sigh. According to Dictys, Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, deposited the ashes of the hero in a golden urn on mount Ithraion; and according to Sophocles, he was buried by his brother Teucer against the will of the Aventiae. (Comp. Q. Smyrn. v. 500; Philostr. Hor. vi. 3.) Pausanias (iii. 19. § 11) relates Ajax, like many other heroes, as living after his death in the island of Leuce. It is said that when, in the time of the emperor Hadrian, the sea had washed open the grave of Ajax, bones of superhuman size were found in it, which the emperor, however, ordered to be buried again. (Philost. Hor. i. 2; Paus. iii. 39. § 11.) Respecting the state and wandering of his soul after his death, see Plato, De res Publica x. in fin.; Plut. Sympos. ix. 5.

Ajax was worshipped in Salamis as the tutelary hero of the island, and had a temple with a statue there, and was honoured with a festival, Aleurosia. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) At Athens too he was worshipped, and was one of the eponymous heroes, one of the Attic tribes (Aeacids) being called after him. (Paus. i. 35. § 2; Plut. Sympos. i. 10.) Not far from the town Rhoetoon, on the promontory of the same name, there was likewise a sanctuary of Ajax, with a beautiful statue, which Antoninus sent to Egypt, but which was restored to its place by Augustus. (Strab. xiii. p. 595.) According to Dictys Cretensis (v. 16) the wife of Ajax was Glauce, by whom she had a son, Aeácides; by his beloved Teocessa, he had a son, Euryssaes. (Soph. A. 333.) Several illustrious Athenians of the historical times, such as Miltiades, Cimon, and Alcibiades, traced their pedigree to the Telamonian Ajax. (Paus. ii. 29. § 4; Plut. Alcid. 1.) The traditions about this hero furnished plentiful materials, not only for poets, but also for sculptors and painters. His simple conflict with Hector was represented on the chest of Cypselus (Paus. v. 19. § 1); his statue formed a part of a large group at Olympia, the work of Lyelles. (Paus. v. 32. § 7; Paus. vii. 39. § 7; Eustath. Ad poet. Ael. V. H. ix. 11.) A beautiful sculptured head, which is generally believed to be a head of Ajax, is still extant in the Egremont collection at Petworth. (Böttiger, Anecdotes, iii. p. 258.)

2. The son of Oileus, king of the Locrians, who is also called the Lesser Ajax. (Hom. Ill. ii. 527.) His mother's name was Eriopis. According to Strabo (ix. p. 425) his birthplace was Naryx in Locris, whence Ovid ( Met. xiv. 468) calls him Naryxos heros. According to the Iliad (ii. 527, &c.) he led his Locrians in forty ships (Hygin. Fab. 97, says twenty) against Troy. He is described as one of the great heroes among the Greeks, and acts frequently in conjunction with the Telamonian Ajax. He is small of stature and wears a lion's eaves (αυρατόρια), but is brave and intrepid, especially skilled in throwing the spear, and, next to Achilles, the most swift-footed among all the Greeks. (II. xiv. 520, &c., xxii. 789, &c.) His principal exploits during the siege of Troy are mentioned in the following passages: xii. 700, &c., xiv. 520, &c., xvi. 350, xvii. 756, 732, &c. In the funeral games at the pyre of Patroclus he contended with Odysseus and Antiocbus for the prize in the footrace; but Athena, who was hostile towards him and favoured Odysseus, made him stumble and fall, so that he gained only the second prize. (xxii. 754, &c.) On his return from Troy his vessel was wrecked on the Whirling Rocks (Τοπαλ πετραι), but he himself escaped upon a rock through the assistance of Poseidon, and would have been saved in spite of Athena, but he used presumptuous words, and said that he would escape the dangers of the sea in defiance of the immortals. Hereupon Poseidon split the rock with his trident, and Ajax was swallowed up by the sea. (Od. iv. 499, &c.)

In later traditions this Ajax is called a son of Oileus and the nymph Rhene, and is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Hygin. Fab. 81, 97; Apollod. Ill. 10. § 6.) According to a tradition in Philostratus (Her. viii. 1), Ajax had a tame dragon, five cubits in length, which followed him everywhere like a dog. After the taking of Troy, it is said, he rushed into the temple of Athena, where Cassandra had taken refuge, and was embracing the statue of the goddess as a suppliant. Ajax dragged her away with violence and led her to the other captives. (Virg. Aen. ii. 403; Eurip. Troad. 70, &c.; Dict. Cret. v. 12; Hygin. Fab. 116.) According to some statements he even violated Cassandra in the temple of the goddess (Tryphiod. 633; Q. Smyrn. xiii. 422; Lycophr. 300, with the Schol.); Odysseus at least accused him of this crime, and Ajax was to be stoned to death, but saved himself by establishing his innocence by an oath. (Paus. ii. 26, § 10; Smith. v. 38.) The whole charge, it is on the other hand, said to have been an invention of Agamemnon, who wanted to have Cassandra for himself. But whether true or not, Athena had sufficient reason for being indignant, as Ajax had dragged a suppliant from her temple. When on his voyage homeward he came to the Capharean rocks on the coast of Euboia, his ship was wrecked in a storm, he himself was killed by Athena with a flash of lightning, and his body was washed upon the rocks, which henceforth were called the rocks of Ajax. (Hygin. Fab. 110; comp. Virg. Aen. i. 40, &c., xi. 360.) For a different account of his death see Philostr. Hero. viii. 3, and Schol. ad Lycophr. v. 6. After his death his spirit dwelled in the island of Lerne. (Paus. iii. 19, § 11.) The Oropian Locrians worshipped Ajax as their national hero, and so great was their faith in him, that when they drew up their army in battle array, they always left one piece open for him, believing that, although invisible to them, he was fighting for and among them. (Paus. l. c.; Conon. Narrat. 18.)

The story of Ajax was frequently used by of ancient poets and artists, and the hero who appears on some Oropian coins with the helmet, shield, and sword, is probably Ajax the son of Oileus. (Mianset, No. 570, &c.)

AIDES, 'Aides. [Hades.]

AI'DONEUS ("Aidos). 1. A lengthened form of 'Aidos. (Hom. Il. v. 190, xx. 61.)

[Hades.]

2. A mythical king of the Molossians, in Epirus, who is represented as the husband of Persephone, and father of Here. After Theseus, with the assistance of Peirithous, had carried off Helen, and concealed her at Aphidnae ['Aidaknosis], he went with Peirithous to Epirus to procure for him as a reward Core, the daughter of Alconeus. This king thinking the two strangers were well-meaning suitors, offered the hand of his daughter to Peirithous, on condition that he should fight and conquer his dog, which bore the name of Cerberus. But when Alconeus discovered that they had come with the intention of carrying off his daughter, he had Peirithous killed by Cerberus, and kept Theseus in captivity, who was afterwards released at the request of Hercules. (Plat. Theo. 31, 35.) Enesidem (Chron. p. 27) calls the wife of Alconeus, a daughter of queen Demeter, with whom he had eloped. It is clear that the story about Alconeus is nothing but the sacred legend of the rape of Persephone, dressed up in the form of a history, and is undoubtably the work of a late interpreter, or rather destroyer of genuine ancient myths. [L. S.]

AIUIS LOCUSITUS or LOQUENS, a Roman divinity. In the year B.C. 393, a short time before the invasion of the Gauls, a voice was heard at Rome in the Via nova, during the silence of night, announcing that the Gauls were approaching. (Liv. v. 32.) No attention was at the time paid to the warning, but after the Gauls had withdrawn from the city, the Romans remembered the prophetic voice, and stoned for their neglect by erecting on the spot in the Via nova, where the voice had been heard, a temple, that is, an altar with a sacred enclosure around it, to Auis Locitus, or the "Annoing Speaker." (Liv. v. 50; Varro, op. Gall. xvi. 17; Cic. de Divin. i. 45, iii. 22.)

ALABANDUS ('Alabandos), a Castic hero, son of Eupippus and Calorhio, whom the inhabitants of Alabanda worshipped as the founder of their town. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Alabandos; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 15, 19.)

ALAGONIA ('Alagonia), a daughter of Zeus and Europa, from whom Alagonia, a town in Lycia, derived its name. (Paus. iii. 21, § 6; 26, § 8; Nat. Com. vii. 23.)

ALACOMENETES ('Alakomenetês), a surname of Athena, derived from the hero Alacomenes, or from the Boeotian village of Alacomenes, where she was believed to have been born. Others derive the name from the verb Ἀλακοῦμαι, so that it would signify "the powerful defender." (Hom. Il. iv. 8; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Alakomenetês; Müller, Orators, p. 213.)

ALACOMENES ('Alakomenês), a Boeotian antechthon, who was believed to have given the name to the Boeotian Alacomena, to have brought up Alachna, who was born there, and to have been the first who introduced her worship. (Paus. ix. 33, § 4.) According to Plutarch (De Doxal. Fragm. 5), he advised Zeus to have a figure of oak-wood dressed in bridal attire, and carried about amidst hymnical songs, in order to change the anger of Hera into jealousy. The name of the wife of Alacomenes was Alacnai, and that of his son, Glaucopis, both of which refer to the goddess Athena. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Alakomenetês; Paus. ix. 3, § 5; comp. Heron. lib. vi. 5; Dict. of Ant. s. v. 'Alakomenes; Müller, Orators, p. 213.)

ALACOMENIA ('Alakomeniâ), one of the daughters of Ogyges, who as well as her two sisters, Thléxiona and Aulis, were regarded as supernatural beings, who watched over oaths and saw that they were not taken rashly or thoughtlessly. Their name was Πραιδίσσα, and they had a temple in common at the foot of the Telephusian mount in Boeotia. The representations of these divinities consisted of mere heads, and no parts of animals were sacrificed to them, except heads. (Paus. ix. 33, § 2, 4; Panmysia, op. Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Traríaxos; Said. s. v. 'Praídisa; Müller, Orators, p. 120, &c.)

ALACITUS, in German Alricus, i.e., "All rich," king of the Visigoths, remarkable as being the first of the barbarian chiefs who entered and sacked the city of Rome, and the first enemy who had appeared before its walls since the time of Hannibal. He was of the family of Balthis, or Bol, the second noblest family of the Visigoths. (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 29.) His first appearance in history is in a.d. 594, when he was invested by Theodosius with the command of the Gothic auxiliaries in his war with Eugenius. (Zosimus, v. 5.) In 596, partly from anger at being refused the command of the armies of the eastern empire, partly at the instigation of Rufinus (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 10), who had invaded and devastated Greece, till, by the arrival of Stilicho in 397, he was compelled to escape to Epirus. Whilst there he was, by the weakness of Arcadius, appointed prefect of eastern Illyricum (Zosimus, v. 5, 6), and partly owing to this office, and the use he made of it in providing arms for his own purposes, partly to his birth and fame, was by his countrymen elected king in 398. (Claudian, Extrp. ii. 212, Bell. Got. 533-548.)

The rest of his life was spent in the two invasions of Italy. The first (400-403), apparently unprovoked, brought him only to Ravenna, and, after a bloody defeat at Pollentia, in which his wife and treasures were taken, and a masterly retreat to Verona (Oros. vii. 37), was ended by the treaty with Stilicho, which transferred his services from Arcadius to Honorius, and made him prefect of the western instead of the eastern Illyricum. In this capacity he fixed his camp at Acmona, in expectation of the fulfilment of his demands for pay, and for a western province, as the future home of his nation. The second invasion (408-410) was occasioned by the delay of this fulfilment, and by the massacre of the Gothic families in Italy on Stilicho's death. It is marked by the three sieges of Rome. The first (408), as being a protracted blockade, was a mere occupation, but was raised by a ransom. The second (409), was occasioned by his refusal to comply with Alaric's demands, and, upon the occupation of Ostia, ended in the unconditional surrender of the city, and in the disposal of the empire by Alaric to Ataulf, till on discovery of his incapacity, he restored it to Honorius. (Zosimus, v. vi.)

The third (410), was occasioned by an assault upon his troops under the imperial sanction, and was ended by the treacherous opening of the Salarian gate on August 24, and the sack of the city for six days. It was immediately followed by the occupation of the south of Italy, and the design of invading Sicily and Africa. This intention, however, was interrupted by his death, after a short illness at Constance, where he was buried in the best of the adjacent river Bosphorus, and the peace of the empire was saved by the massacre of all the workmen employed on the occasion. (Oros. vii. 39; Jornandes, 30.)

The few personal traits that are recorded of him—his answer to the Roman embassy with a horrid laugh in answer to their threat of desperate resistance, "The thicker the hay, the easier mown," and, in reply to their question of what he would leave them, "Your lives"—are in the true savage humour of a barbarian conqueror. (Zosimus, v. 40.) But the impression left upon us by his general character is of a higher order. The real military skill shown in his escape from Greece, and in his retreat to Verona; the wish at Athens to shew that he adopted the use of the bath and the other external forms of civilized life; the moderation and justice which he observed towards the Romans in the times of peace; the humanity which distinguished him during the sack of Rome—indicate something superior to the mere craft and lawless ambition which he seems to have possessed in common with other barbarian chiefs. So also his scruples against fighting on Easter-day when attacked at Pollentia, and his reverence for the churches during the sack of the city (Oros. vii. 37, 39), imply that the Christian faith, in which he had been instructed by a priest, and to which he had been attached by that fierce hostility against the orthodox party which marked the Arians of the Vandal tribes. Accordingly, we find that the Christian part of his contemporaries regarded him, in comparison with the other invaders of the empire as the representative of civilization and Christianity, and as the fit instrument of divine vengeance on the still half pagan city (Oros. vii. 37), and the very slight injury which the great buildings of Greece and Rome sustained from his two invasions confirm the same view. And amongst the Pagans the same sense of the prettyness character of his invasion prevailed, though expressed in a different form. The dialogue which Cambrius (Bell. Got. 435-540) represents on him to have held with the aged counsellors of his own tribe seems to be the heathen version of the ecclesiastical story, that he stopped the monk who begged him to spare Rome with the answer, that he was driven on to battle by a voice which he could not resist. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 10.) So also his vision of Achilles and Minerva appearing to defend the city of Athens, as recorded by Zosimus (v. 6), if it does not imply a lingering respect and fear in the mind of Alaric himself towards the ancient worship, at least expresses the belief of the pagan historian, that his invader was invested by one of the ancient character as to call for divine interference.

The permanent effects of his career are to be found only in the establishment of the Visigothic kingdom of Spain by the warriors whom he was the first to lead into the west.

The authorities for the invasion of Greece and the first two sieges of Rome are Zosimus (v. vi.): for the first invasion of Italy, Jornandes de Reb. Got. 30; Claudian, B. Got.: for the third siege and sack of Rome, Jornandes, 30.; Orosius, vii. 39; Aug. Civ. Del. i. 1-10; Hieronymus. Epist. ad Princip. Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 2; Sozomem, Hist. Eccl. ix. 9, 10; Isid. Hispalensis, Chronicon Gotorum.) The invasions of Italy are involved in great confusion by these writers, especially by Jornandes, who brands the battle of Pollentia in 403 with the massacre of the Goths in 409. By conjecture and inference they are reduced in Gibbon (c. 30, 31) to the order which has been here followed. See also Godfrey, ad Philostor. xii. 3. [APS.]

ALASTOR (Άλαστόρ). 1. According to Hesychius and the Etymologicum M., a surname of Zeus, describing him as the avenger of evil deeds. But the name is also used, especially by the tragic writers, to designate any deity or demon who avenges wrongs committed by men. (Paus. vii. 24. § 4; Plut. De Def. Orocl. 13, &c.; Aeschyl. Agam. 1479, 1508, Pers. 343; Soph. Trach. 1092, Eurip. Ploem. 1550, &c.)

2. A son of Nelles and Chloris. When Heracles took Pylus, Alaster and his brothers, except Nestor, were slain by him. (Apollod. i. 9, § 8; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 156.) According to Parthenius (c. 13) he was to be married to Harpalyce, who, however, was taken from him by her father Clymenus.

3. A Lydian, who was a companion of Sarpedon, and slain by Odysseus. (Hom. Η. v. 677; Ov. Met. xiii. 257.) Another Alaster is mentioned in Hom. Η. viii. 333, xii. 422. [L. S.]

ALASTORIDES (Άλαστορίδες), a patro-
ALBINUS:

The fragment of Albinus on the voyage of Germanicus, has been published by H. Stephens, Fragmenta, p. 416, Pithoicus, Epigramm. et poëmis. vet., p. 239. Burnann, Anth. Lat. ii. ep. 121, Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min. iv. i. p. 229, &c. All that has been ascribed to Albinus was published at Amsterdam, 1703, with the notes of J. Scaliger and others. The last edition is by Meinecke, which contains the text, and a German translation in verse, Quedlinburg, 1819.

ALBINUS, P. TUILLIUS, belonged to the party of Marius in the first civil war, and was one of the twelve who were declared enemies of the state in n. c. 97. He then applied to Hierostratus, and after the defeat of Carbo and Norbanus in n. c. 81, he obtained the pardon of Sulla by treacherously putting to death many of the principal officers of Norbanus, whom he had invited to a banquet. Ariminum in consequence revolted to Sulla, whence the Pseudo-Aeschinus (in Cic. Ferr. p. 168, ed. Orelli) speaks of Albinus betraying it. (Appian, B. C. i. 60, 62, 91; Florus, iii. 21. § 7.)

ALBINUS or ALBUS, the name of the principal family of the patrician Postumia gens. The original name was Albus, as appears from the Fasti, which was afterwards lengthened into Albinus. We find in proper names in Latin, derivatives in annus, equus, and avis, used without any additional meaning, in the same sense as the simple forms. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. n. 219.)

1. A. POSTUMIUS P. F. ALBUS REGILLIENSIS, was, according to Livy, dictator n. c. 498, when he conquered the Latins in the great battle near lake Regillus. Roman story relates that Castor and Pollux were seen fighting in this battle on the side of the Romans, whence the dictator afterwards dedicated a temple to Castor and Pollux in the forum. He was consul n. c. 496, in which year some of the annals, according to Livy, placed the battle of the lake Regillus; and it is to this year that Dionysius assigns it. (Livy, i. 19, 20, 21; Dionys. v. iii. &c.; Val. Max. i. 8, § 1, Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 2, iii. 5.) The surname Regilliensis is usually supposed to have been derived from this battle; but Niebuhr thinks that it was taken from a place of residence, just as the Claudii bore the same name, and that the later annalists only spoke of Postumius as commander in consequence of the name. Livy (xxx. 45) states expressly, that Scipio Africanus was the first Roman who obtained a surname from his conquests. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 556.)

Many of the coins of the Albinii commemorate this victory of their ancestor, as in the one annexed. On coins, however, the letters ROMA underneath, which are partly effaced, and on the reverse are three horses tramping on a foot-soldier.

2. SP. POSTUMIUS A. F. P. N. ALBUS REGILLIENSIS, apparently, according to the Fasti, the son of the preceding, (though it must be observed, that in these early times no dependances can be placed upon these genealogies,) was consul b. c. 466. (Liv. iii. 2; Dionys. i. 69.) He was one of the three commissiones sent into Greece to collect information about the laws of that country, and was a member of the first decemvirate in 451. (Liv. iii. 31, 33; Dionys. x. 52, 56.) He commanded, as legatus, the centre of the Roman army in the battle in which the Aquilines and Volscians were defeated in 446. (Liv. iii. 70.)

3. A. POSTUMIUS A. F. P. N. ALBUS REGILLINUS, apparently son of No. 1, was consul b. c. 454, and carried on war against the Aquilines. He was sent as regillus to the Aquilines in 450, on which occasion he was insulted by their commander. (Liv. iii. 4, 5, 25; Dionys. i. 62, 63.)

4. SP. POSTUMIUS SP. F. N. ALBUS REGILLINUS, apparently son of No. 2, was consul tribune b. c. 452, and served as legatus in the war in the following year. (Liv. iv. 25, 27.)

5. P. POSTUMIUS A. F. N. ALBUS REGILLINUS, whose līva calls Marcus, was consul tribune b. c. 414, and was killed in an incesstion of the soldiers, whom he had deprived of the plunder of the Aquician town of Dolae, which he had promised them. (Liv. iv. 49, 50.)

6. M. POSTUMIUS A. F. N. ALBUS REGILLINUS, mentioned by Livy (iv. 25) as consul tribune in b. c. 403, but was in reality censor in that year with M. Furius Camillus. (Fasti Capitol.) In their censorship a fine was imposed upon all men who remained single up to old age. (Val. Max. ii. 9, § 1; Plut. Cam. 2; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Usurum.)

7. A. POSTUMIUS ALBUS REGILLINUS, consul tribune b. c. 397, collected with his colleague L. Julius an army of volunteers, since the tribunes prevented them from making a regular levy, and cut off a body of Tarquinienses, who were returning home after plundering the Roman territory. (Liv. v. 16.)

8. SP. POSTUMIUS ALBUS REGILLINUS, consul tribune b. c. 394, carried on the war against the Aquilines; he at first suffered a defeat, but afterwards conquered them completely. (Liv. v. 26, 28.)

9. SP. POSTUMIUS ALBUS, was consul b. c. 334, and invaded, with his colleague T. Veturius Calvinus, the country of the Sidicini; but, on account of the great forces which the enemy had collected, and the report that the Sammites were coming to their assistance, a dictator was appointed. (Liv. viii. 16, 17.) He was censor in 332 and magister equitum in 327, when M. Claudius Marcellus was appointed dictator to hold the comitia. (viii. 17, 25.) In 321, he was consul a second time with T. Veturius Calvinus, and marched against the Sammites, but was defeated near Caen- dium, and obliged to surrender with his whole army, who were sent under the yoke. As the price of his deliverance and that of the army, he and his colleague and the other commanders swore, in the name of the republic, to a humiliating peace. The consul, on their return to Rome, laid down their office after appointing a dictator; and the senate, on the advice of Postumius, resolved that all persons who had sworn to the peace should be given up to the Sammites. Postumius, with the other prisoners, accordingly went to the Sammites, but they refused to accept them. (Liv. ix. 1—10; Appian, de Bell. Sarm. 2—6; C. C. de Off. iii. 30, Cato, 12.)

10. A. POSTUMIUS A. F. L. N. ALBUS, was consul b. c. 242 with Lucius Catulus, who defeated the Carthaginians off the Aegates, and thus brought the first Punic war to an end. Albinus was kept in the city, against his will, by the Pontifex Maximus, because he was Flaminius Marcellus. (Liv. Epit. 19, xxiii. 13; Enmot. ii. 27; Val. Max. i. 1, § 2.) He was censor in 234. (Fasti Capitol.)

11. L. POSTUMIUS A. F. A. N. ALBUS, apparently a son of the preceding, was consul b. c. 234, and again in 229. In his second censorship he made war upon the Illyrians. (Enmot. iii. 4; Coss. iv. 135; Dionys. Frag. 151; Polyb. ii. 11, &cc, who erroneously calls him Ambus instead of Lucius.) In 216, the third year of the second Punic war, he was made praetor, and sent into Cisalpine Gaul, and while absent was elected consul the third time for the following year, 215. But he did not live to enter upon his censorship; for he and his army were destroyed by the Boii in the wood Latana in Cisalpine Gaul. His head was cut off, and after being lined with gold was dedicated to the gods by the Boii, and used as a sacred drinking-vessel. (Liv. xxii. 33, xxiii. 24; Polyb. iii. 106, 119; C. C. C. i. 37.)

12. SP. POSTUMIUS L. F. A. N. ALBUS, was praetor peregrinus in b. c. 180 (Liv. xxxvii. 47, 50), and consul in 186. In his censorship the senatusconsultum was passed, which is still extant, suppressing the worship of Bacchus in Rome, in consequence of the abominable crimes which were committed in connexion with it. (xxxiv. 6, 11, &c.; Val. Max. vi. 3, § 7; Plin. N. H. xxxiii. 10; Dict. of Ant. p. 344.) He was also augur, and died in 179 at an advanced age. (Liv. x. 42; C. C. C. i. 3.)

13. A. POSTUMIUS A. F. A. N. ALBUS, was curule aedile in b. c. 167, when he exhibited the Great Games, praetor 185, and consul 180. (Liv. xxxix. 7, 29, xli. 35.) In his censorship he conducted the war against the Ligurians. (xl. 41.) He was censor 174 with Q. Fulvius. Their censorship was a severe one; they expelled nine members from the senate, and degraded many of equestrian rank. They executed, however, many public works. (xii. 32, xii. 10; comp. C. C. F. i. 41.) He was elected in his censorship one of the deemviri sacrorum in the place of L. Cornelius Lentulus. (Liv. xl. 10.) Albinus was engaged in many public missions. In 175 he was sent into northern Greece to inquire into the truth of the representations of the Dardaniens and Thesalians about the Bastarnae and Parthaeans. (Polyb. xxxvi. 9.) In 171 he was sent as one of the ammamachos to Samos. (Livy xii. 32; C. C. C. xlii. 1.) After the conquest of Macedon in 168 he was one of the ten commissioners appointed to settle the affairs of the country with Aquilius Paullus. (Liv. xiv. 17.) Livy not unfrequently calls him Luscus, from which it would seem that he was blind of one eye.

14. SP. POSTUMIUS A. F. A. N. ALBUS PAULLULUS, probably a brother of No. 13 and 15, perhaps obtained the surname of Paullulus, as being small of stature, to distinguish him more exactly from his two brothers. He was praetor in Sicily, b. c. 163, and consul, 174. (Liv. xxxiv. 45, xlii. 26, xlii. 2.)

15. L. POSTUMIUS A. F. A. N. ALBUS, probably a brother of No. 13 and 14, was praetor b. c. 180, and obtained the province of further Spain. His command was prolonged in the follow-

Albinus. After conquering the Vaccaei and Lucani, he returned to Rome in 178, and obtained a triumph on account of his victories. (Liv. xl. 35, 44, 47, 48, 50, xili. 3, 11.) He was consul in 173, with M. Popillius Laenas; and the war in Liguria was assigned to both consuls. Albinus, however, was first sent into Campania to separate the land of the state from that of private persons; and this business occupied him all the summer, so that he was unable to go into his province. He was the first Roman magistrate who put the allies to any expense in travelling through their territories. (xili. 13, xili. 1, 8.) The festival of the Pleiades, which had been disconnected, was restored in his consulship. (Ov. Fast. v. 329.) In 171, he was one of the ambassadors sent to Masisnus and the Carthaginians in order to raise troops for the war against Pessineus. (Liv. xili. 13.) In 169 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship. (xili. 16.) He served under Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia in 168, and commanded the second legion in the battle with Pessineus. (xili. 41.) The last time he is mentioned is in this war, when he was sent to plunder the town of the Aenini. (Liv. xili. 27.)

16. A Posthumius Albinus, one of the officers in the army of Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia, B.C. 168. He was sent by Paulus to thrive with Pessineus; and afterwards Pessineus and his son Philip were committed to his care by Paulus. (Liv. xiv. 4, 28.)

17. L. Posthumius Sc. P. L N. Albinus, apparently son of No. 12, was curule aedile B.C. 161, and exhibited the Ludi Megalenses, at which the Eunuch of Terence was actcd. He was consul in 154, and died seven days after he had set out from Rome in order to go to his province. It was supposed that he was poisoned by his wife. (Obser. 76; Val. Max. vi. 3, § 8.)

18. A Posthumius A. F A. N. Albinus, apparently son of No. 13, was praetor B.C. 155 (Cic. Ad Att. xiii. 48; Polyb. xxxiii. 1), and consul in 151 with Aemilius Locullus. He, and his colleague were thrown into prison by the tribunes for the levies with too much severity. (Liv. Epit. 48; Polyb. xxxv. 3; Oros. iv. 21.) He was one of the ambassadors sent in 153 to make peace between Attalus and Prusias (Polyb. xxxii. 11), and accompanied L. Munnius Aemilius into Greece in 146 as one of his legates. There was a statute erected to his honour on the Isthmus. (Cic. ad Att. xili. 30, 32.) Albinus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote in that language a poem and a Roman history, the latter of which is mentioned by several ancient writers. Polybius (xl. 8) speaks of him as a man who disparaged his own people, and was skillfully devoted to the study of Greek literature. He relates a tale of him and the elder Cato, who reproved Albinus sharply, because in the absence to his history he begged the pardon of his readers, if he should make any mistakes in writing in a foreign language; Cato reminded him that he was not compelled to write at all, but that if he chose to write, he had no business to ask for the indulgence of his readers. This tale is also related by Gellius (xi. 8), Macrobius (De somn. Saturni), Plutarch (Cato, 12), and Suidas (s. v. Παντόπουλος). Polybius also says that Albinus imitated the worst parts of the Greek character, that he was entirely devoted to pleasure, and shirked all labour and danger. He relates that he retired to Thbes, when the battle was fought at Phocis, on the plea of indisposition, but afterwards wrote an account of it to the senate as if he had been present. Cicero speaks with rather more respect of his literary merits; he calls him doctus homo et litteratus et disertus. (Cic. Acad. ii. 45, Brut. 21.) Macrobius (ib. 16) quotes a passage from the first book of the Annals of Albinus respecting Brutus, and as he uses the words of Albinus, it has been supposed that the Greek history may have been translated into Latin. A work of Albinus, on the arrival of Augustus in Italy, is referred to by Suetonius (a Vit. Aug. ix. 710), and the author of the work "De Origine Gentis Romanae," c. 15. (Krause, Vitae & Fragm. Veterum Historiarum Romanorum, p. 127, &c.)

19. Sp. Posthumius Albinus Magnus, was consul B.C. 148, in which year a great fire happened at Rome. (Obser. 76.) It is this Sp. Albinus, of whom Cicero speaks in the Brutus (c. 25), and says that there were many orations of his.

20. Sp. Posthumius Sc. P. Sc. N. Albinus, probably son of No. 19, was consul B.C. 110, and obtained the province of Numidia to carry on the war against Jugurtha. He made vigorous preparations for war, but when he reached the province, he did not adopt any active measures, but allowed himself to be deceived by the artifices of Jugurtha, who constantly promised to surrender. Many persons supposed that his inactivity was intentional, and that Jugurtha had bought him over. When Albinus departed from Africa, he left his brother Aulus in command. [See No. 21.] After the defeat of the latter he returned to Numidia, but in consequence of the disorganized state of his army, he did not prosecute the war, and handed over the army in this condition, in the following year, to the consul Metellus. (Sall. Jug. 35, 36, 38, 44; Oros. iv. 15; Entrop. iv. 26.) He was condemned by the Mamilia Lex, which was passed to punish all those who had been guilty of treasonable practices with Jugurtha. (Gic. Brut. 34; comp. Sall. Jug. 40.)

21. A Posthumius Albinus, brother of No. 20, and probably son of No. 19, was left by his brother as pro-praetor, in command of the army in Africa B.C. 110. [See No. 20.] He marched to besiege Suthal, where the treasures of Jugurtha were deposited; but Jugurtha, under the promise of giving him a large sum of money, induced him to lead his army into a retired place, where he was suddenly attacked by the Numidian king, and only saved his troops from total destruction by allowing them to pass under the yoke, and under the promise of leaving Numidia in ten days. (Sall. Jug. 36—38.)

22. A Posthumius A. F A. N. Albinus, grandson of No. 19, and probably son of No. 21, was consul B.C. 99, with M. Antonius. (Plut. H. N. viii. 7; Obser. 106.) Gellius (iv. 6) quotes the words of a senatorial consultation passed in their consulship in consequence of the spears of Mars having moved. Cicero says that he was a good speaker. (Brut. 35, post Red. ad Quir. 5.) The following coin is supposed by Eckhel (vol. v. p. 288) and others to refer to this Albinus. On one side is the head of a female with the letters HISPAN., which may perhaps have reference to the victory which his ancestor L. Albinus obtained in Spain. [See No. 15.] On the other side a man is represented stretching out his hand to an eagle, a military standard, and behind him are the faces with the axe. On it are the letters A. POST. A. V. N. S. ABIN (so on the coin, instead of ALBIN.). On the coins of the Postumian gens the praenomen Syrus is always written s. and not sp.

23. A. Postumius Albinus, a person of praetorian rank, commanded the fleet, n. c. 89, in the Marsea war, and was killed by his own soldiers under the plea that he meditated treachery, but in reality on account of his cruelty. Sulla, who was then a legate of the consul Porcius Cato, incorporated his troops with his own, but did not punish the offenders. (Liv. Epit. 75; Plut. Sulla, 6.)

24. A. Postumius Albinus was placed by Caesar over Sicily, n. c. 48. (Appian, B. C. ii. 48.)

25. D. Junius Brutus Albinus, adopted by No. 23, and commemorated in the annexed coin, where Brutus is called ALBINUS BRVT. F. [BRUTUS.]

ALBINUS, procurator of Judaea, in the reign of Nero, about a. d. 63 and 64, succeeded Festus, and was guilty of almost every kind of crime in his government. He pardoned the vilest criminals for money, and shamelessly plundered the provincials. He was succeeded by Florus. (Joseph. Antiq. Jud. x. 8. § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 14. § 1.) The Lucius Albinus mentioned below may possibly have been the same person.

Albinus ('Albino), a Platonic philosopher, who lived at Smyrna and was a contemporary of Galen. (Galen, vol. iv. p. 372, ed. Basili.) A short tract by him, entitled Προσαρχών εἰς τοὺς Πατρίως Διαλόγους, has come down to us, and is published in the second volume (p. 44) of the first edition of Fabricius; but omitted in the reprint by Harles, because it is to be found prefixed to Etwill's edition of three dialogues of Plato, Oxon. 1771; and by Fischer's four dialogues of Plato, Lips. 1783. It contains hardly anything of importance. After explaining the nature of the Dialogue, which he compares to a Drama, the writer goes on to divide the Dialogues of Plato into four classes, λογικάς, εὐελπιστικάς, πράσινοις, σκηνικος, and mentions another division of them into Tetralogies, according to their subjects. He advises that the Alcibiades, Phaedo, Republic, and Timaeus, should be read in a series.

The authorities respecting Albinus have been collected by Fabricius. (Bibl. Gracca, iii. p. 658.) He is said to have written a work on the arrangement of the writings of Plato. Another Albinus is mentioned by Bothius and Cassiodorus, who wrote in Latin some works on music and geometry.

Albinus, Cloidius, whose full name was Decimus Clodius Ceionius Septimius Albinus, the son of Ceionius Postumius and Aurelia Massalina, was born at Adrumetum in Africa; but the year of his birth is not known. According to his father's statement (Capitol. Ced. Albin. 4), he received the name of Albinus on account of the extraordinary whiteness of his body. Shewing great disposition for a military life, he entered the army at an early age and served with great distinction, especially during the rebellion of Avidius Cassius against the emperor Marcus Aurelius, in a. d. 175. His merits were acknowledged by the emperor in two letters (ib. 10) in which he calls Albinus an African, who resembled his countrymen but little, and who was praiseworthy for his military experience, and the gravity of his character. The emperor likewise declared, that without Albinus the legions (in Bithynia) would have gone over to Avidius Cassius, and that he intended to have him chosen consul. The emperor Commodus gave Albinus a command in Gaul and afterwards in Britain. A false rumour having been spread that Commodus had died, Albinus hurried the army in Britain on the occasion, attacking Commodus as a tyrant, and maintaining that it would be useful to the Roman empire to restore to the senate its ancient dignity and power. The senate was very pleased with these sentiments, but not so the emperor, who sent Junius Severus to supersede Albinus in his command. At this time Albinus must have been a very distinguished man, which we may conclude from the fact, that some time before Commodus had offered him the title of Caesar, which he wisely declined. Notwithstanding the appointment of Junius Severus as his successor, Albinus kept his command till after the murder of Commodus and that of his successor Pertinax in a. d. 193. It is doubtful if Albinus was the secret author of the murder of Pertinax, to which Capitolinus makes an allusion. (ib. 14.)

After the death of Pertinax, Didius Julianus purchased the throne by bribing the praetorians; but immediately afterwards, C. Pescennius Niger was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria; L. Septimius Severus by the troopers of Albinus and Pannonia; and Albinus by the armies in Britain and Gaul. Julianus having been put to death by order of the senate, who dreaded the power of Septimius Severus, the latter turned his arms against Pescennius Niger. With regard to Albinus, we must believe that Severus made a provisional arrangement with him, conferring upon him the title of Caesar, and holding with him the consulship in a. d. 194. But after the defeat and death of Niger in a. d. 194, and the complete discomfiture of his adherents, especially after the fall of Byzantium in a. d. 196, Severus resolved to make himself the absolute master of the Roman empire. Albinus seeing the danger of his position, which he was increased by his insulitude, prepared for resistance. He narrowly escaped being assassinated by a messenger of Severus (ib. 7, 8), whereupon he put himself at the head of his army, which is said to have consisted of 150,000 men. He met the equal forces of Severus at Lugdumum (Lyon), in Gaul, and there fought with him on the 19th of February, 197 (Spartian. Sever. 11), a ALBINEA. bloody battle, in which he was at first victorious, but at last was entirely defeated, and lost his life either by suicide, or by order of Severus, after having been made a prisoner. His body was ill treated by Severus, who sent his head to Rome, and accompanied it with an insolent letter, in which he mocked the senate for their adherence to Albinus. The town of Lugdunum was plundered and destroyed, and the adherents of Albinus were cruelly prosecuted by Severus.

Albinus was a man of great bodily beauty and strength; he was an experienced general; a skilful gladiator; a severe, and often cruel commander; and he has been called the Catiline of his time. He had one son, or perhaps two, who were put to death with their mother, by order of Severus. It is said that he wrote a treatise on agriculture, and a collection of stories, called Miletian. (Cassius, CLaudius Albinus; Dion Cass. Hist. 4:7; Herod. ii. 15, iii. 5-7.)

There are several medals of Albinus. In the one annexed he is called D. Clod. Sept. Albin. CAES.

[W. P.]

ALBINEUS, LUCEFIBUS, was made by Nero procurator of Mauretania Caesariensis, to which Galba added the province of Tingitana. After the death of Galba, A.D. 69, he espoused the side of Otho, and prepared to invade Spain. Chludius Rufus, who commanded in Spain, being alarmed at this, sent CENTURIONS into Mauretania to induce the Mauri to revolt against Albinus. They accomplished this without much difficulty; and Albinus was murdered with his wife. (Tac. Hist. ii. 58, 59.)

ALBION or ALE' BION (Ἀλβίον or Αλεβίον), a son of Poseidon and brother of Doreycus or Bergen, together with whom he attacked Heraclea, when he passed through their country (Liguria) with the oxen of Ceryon. But they paid for their presumption with their lives. (Apollod. ii. 5:10; Pomp. Mela, ii. 5:30.) The Scholion on Lyco- phon (648) calls the brother of Albinus, Ligius. The story is also alluded to in Hyginus (Post. Astr. ii. 6) and Dionysius. (i. 41.)

ALBUCILLA, the wife of Satrius Secundus, and infamous for her many amours, was accused in the last year of the reign of Tibaurus (A.D. 57) of treason, or impiety, against the emperor (impietatis in principio), and, with her, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, Vibia Marus, and L. Arruntius, as accomplices. She was cast into prison by command of the senate, after making an ineffectual attempt to destroy herself. (Tac. Ann. vii. 47, 48.)

ALBUNEA, a prophetic nymph or Sibyl, to whom in the neighborhood of Tibur a grove was consecrated, with a well and a temple. Near it was the oracle of Panas Fatibus. (Virg. Aen. vii. 81, &c.; Hor. Carm. i. 7, 12; Tibull. ii. 5. 69.) Lactantius (De Sibyll. i. 6) states, that the tenth Sibyl, called Albinus, was worshipped at Tibur, and that her image, holding a book in one hand, was found in the bed of the river Anio. Her oracles, or oracles, which belonged to the libri fatales, were, at the command of the senate, deposited and kept in the Capitol. The small square temple of this Sibyl is still extant at Tivoli. Respecting the locality, see Kephalides, Reisen durch Italien, i. p. 125, &c.

ALBUCIUS or ALBUTTIUS, a physician at Rome, who lived probably about the beginning or middle of the first century after Christ, and who is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxix. 5) as having gained by his practice the annual income of two hundred and fifty thousand sesterces (about 1953. 2s. Ed.). This is considered by Pliny to be a very large sum, and may therefore give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire. (W. A. G.)

T. ALBUCIUS or ALBUTTIUS, finished his studies at Athens at the latter end of the second century B.C., and belonged to the Epicurean sect. He was well acquainted with Greek literature, or rather, says Cicero, was almost a Greek. (Brut. 35.) On account of his affecting on every occasion the Greek language and philosophy, he was satirized by Lucilius, whose lines upon him are preserved by Cicero (de Fin. i. 3); and Cicero himself speaks of him as a light-minded man. He accused, but unsuccessfully, Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, of maladministration (repetanda) in his province. (Brut. 26, De Orat. ii. 70.) In A.D. 103 Albinus was greater in Sardinia, and in consequence of some insignificant success which he had gained over some robbers, he celebrated a triumph in the province. On his return to Rome, he applied to the senate for the honour of a suppliant, but this was refused, and he was accused in A.D. 103 of repetundae by C. Julius Caesar, and condemned. Cn. Pomponius Strabo had offered himself as the accuser, but he was not allowed to conduct the prosecution, because he had been the quaestor of Albinus. (De Propr. Cons. 7, in Pleb. 38, De div. in casei, 19, de Off. ii. 14.) After his condemnation, he retired to Athens and pursued the study of philosophy. (Tact. v. 57.) He left behind him some orations, which had been read by Cicero. (Brut. 33.)

Varro (de Lc Rast. iii. 2, § 17) speaks of some satries by L. Albiusus written in the style of Lucilius; he appears to be the same person as Titus.

C. ALBUCIUS SILLAS. [Silas.]

ALBUS OVIDIUS JUVENITUS. [Juven.]

ALCÆUS (Ἀλκέας). 1. A son of Perseus and Andromeda, and married to Hippomenes, the daughter of Menoeceus of Thebes, by whom he became the father of Amyrthion and Anaxo. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5; Schol. ad Eurip. Helcat. 888.) According to Pausanias (viii. 14. § 2) his wife's name was Laomone, a daughter of the Arcadian Ganeus, or Lysiades, a daughter of Polops.

2. According to Diodorus (i. 14) the original name of Heracles, given him on account of his descent from Alcaeus, the son of Perseus. [Her.]

3. A son of Heracles by a female slave of Jardanus, from whom the dynasty of the Hermelidae in Ilia was descended. (Herod. i. 7.) Diodorus (iv. 91) calls this son of Heracles, Cleophas. (Comp. Hellanikus, ap. Sync. Bz. s. v. 'Akeal); Wesseling, ad Diod. L. c.)

4. According to Diodorus (v. 79) a general of Rhodamuthys, who presented him with the island of Paros. Apollodorus (ii. 5 § 8) relates that he was a son of Androgeus (the son of Minos) and brother of Theseus, and that when Heracles, on his expedition to fetch the girdle of Ares, which was in the possession of the queen of the Amazons, arrived at Paros, some of his companions were slain by the sons of Minos, residing there. Heracles, in his anger, slew the descendants of Minos, except Alcaeus and Theseus, whom he took with him, and to whom he afterwards assigned the island of Thasus as their habitation. [L. S.]

ALCAEUS (Ἀλκαῖος), of Mesene, the author of a number of epigrams in the Greek anthology, from some of which his date may be easily fixed. He was contemporary with Philip III., king of Macedon, and son of Demetrios, against whom several of his epigrams are pointed, apparently from patriotic feelings. One of these epigrams, however, gave even more offence to the Roman general, Flamininus, than to Philip, on account of the author's ascribing the victory of Cynocephalus to the Aetolians as much as to the Romans. Philip contented himself with writing an epigram in reply to that of Alcaeus, in which he gave the Messenian a very broad hint of the fate he might expect if he fell into his hands. (Plut. Flamin. 9.) This reply has singularly enough led Salmantius (De Circe, p. 449, ap. Fabric. Bibl. Græca, ii. p. 59) to suppose that Alcaeus was actually crucified. In another epigram, in praise of Flamininus, the mention of the Roman general's name, Titus, led Tzetzes (Proleg. in Lyceophron) into the error of imagining the existence of an epigrammatist named Alcaeus under the emperor Titus. These epigrams of Alcaeus which bear internal evidence of their date, were written between the years 219 and 190 B.C.

Of the twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology which bear the name of "Alcaeus," two have the word "Mytileenae" added to it; but Jacobse seems to be perfectly right in taking this to be the addition of some ignorant copist. Others bear the name of "Alcaeus Messenius," and some of Alcaeus alone. But in the last class there are several which must, from internal evidence, have been written by Alcaeus of Messene, and, in fact, there seems no reason to doubt his being the author of the whole twenty-two epigrams.

There are mentioned as contemporaries of Alcaeus, two other persons of the same name, one of them an Epicurean philosopher, who was expelled from Rome by a decree of the senate about 173 or 154 B.C. (Pericon. ad Aelian. V. H. i. 22; Athen. xii. p. 547 allotted; Suidas, s. v. Ἐπικουρός): the other is incidentally spoken of by Polybius as being accustomed to ridicule the grammarian Isocrates. (Polyb. xxxii. 6; n. c. 160.) It is just possible that these two persons, of whom nothing further is known, may have been identical with each other, and with the epigrammatist.

(Jacobse, Anthol. Graec. xiii. pp. 836-838; there is a reference to Alcaeus of Messene in Eusebius, Praep. Ezech. i. 2.) [P. S.]

ALCAEUS (Ἀλκαῖος), of Mytilene, in the island of Lesbos, the earliest of the Aeolian lyric poets, began to flourish in the 42nd Olympiad when a contest had commenced between the nobles and the people in his native state. Alcaeus belonged by birth to the former party, and warmly espoused their cause. In the second year of the 42nd Olympiad (n. c. 611), we find the brothers of Alcaeus, namely, Cisca and Antimenidas, fighting under Pittacus against Melanchmus, who is described as the tyrant of Lesbos, and who fell in the conflict. (Dio. Laert. i. 74; Strab. xiii. p. 617; Suidas, s. v. Μικας and Μιττακας; Eust. 1p. M. p. 613, s. v. Κέφασσος, instead of Κίσας; Clinton, Fasti, i. p. 216.) Alcaeus does not appear to have taken part with his brothers on this occasion: on the contrary, he speaks of Melanchmus in terms of high praise. (Fr. 7, p. 426, Blomfield.) Alcaeus is mentioned in connexion with the war in Troas, between the Athenians and Mytileneans for the possession of Sigeum. (n. c. 606.) Though Pittacus, who commanded the army of Mytilene, slew with his own hand the leader of the Athenians, Phrynion, an Olympic victor, the Mytileneans were defeated, and Alcaeus in the disgrace of leaving his arms behind on the field of battle; those arms were hung up as a trophy by the Athenians in the temple of Pallas at Sigeum. (Herod. v. 95; Plut. de Horat. Malig. s. a. 15, p. 858; Strab. xiii. pp. 599, 600; Euseb. Chron. Olyn. xiii. 3; Clinton, Fasti, i. p. 219.)

His sending home the news of this disaster in a poem, addressed to his friend Melanippos (Fr. 56, p. 438, Blomfiel), seems to show that he had a reputation for courage, such as a single disaster could not endanger; and accordingly we find him spoken of by ancient writers as a brave and skilful warrior. (Anthol. Palat. i. 104; Cix. Tus. Disq. iv. 83; Hor. Carm. i. 32; Athen. xv. p. 607.) He thought that his lyre was best employed in animating his friends to warlike deeds, and his house is described by himself as furnished with the weapons of war rather than with the instruments of his art. (Athen. xiv. p. 627; Fr. 24, p. 430, Blomf.) During the period which followed the war about Sigeum, the contest between the nobles and the people of Mytilene was brought to a crisis; and the people, headed by a succession of leaders, who are called tyrants, and among whom are mentioned the names of Myrtilus, Megalagyrus, and the Cleombolids, succeeded in driving the nobles into exile. During this civil war Alcaeus engaged actively on the side of the nobles, whose spirits he endeavoured to cheer by a number of most animated odes full of invective against the tyrants; and after the victory of the party, he, with other Antimenidas, led them again in an attempt to regain their country. To oppose this attempt Pittacus was unanimously chosen by the people as ἀδυνατορ (dictator) or tyrant. He held his office for ten years (n. c. 569-579), and during that time he defeated all the efforts of the exiled nobles, and established the constitution on a popular basis; and then he resigned his power. (Strab. xiii. p. 617; Alcaeus, Fr. 23, p. 290, Blomf.; Arist. Rep. iii. 9, § 8, or iii. 14; Plut. Amat. § 10, p. 705; Dio. Laert. i. 79; Dionys. v. p. 386, Syb.) [Pittacus.]

Notwithstanding the invectives of Alcaeus against him, Pittacus is said to have set him at liberty when he had been taken prisoner, saying that "forgiveness is better than revenge." (Dio. Laert. i. 76; Valer. Max. iv. 1, § 6.) Alcaeus has not escaped the suspicion of being moved by personal ambition in his opposition to Pittacus. (Strab. xiii. p. 617.) When Alcaeus and Antimenidas perceived that all hope of their restoration to Mytilene was gone, they travelled over different countries. Alcaeus visited Egypt (Strab. i. p. 37), and he appears to have written poems in which his adventures by sea were described. (Hor. Carm. ii. 13, 28.) An inscription on a brass edge of a Greek sword used to be supposed to record the name of the king of Babylon, and performed an exploit which was celebrated by Alcaeus. (Strob. xiii. p. 617, Fr. 33, p. 433, Blomf.) Nothing is known of the life of Alcaeus after this period; but from the political state of Mytilene it is most probable that he died in exile.

Among the nine principal lyric poets of Greece some ancient writers assign the first place, others the second, to Alcaeus. His writings present to us the Aeolic lyric at its highest point. But their circulation in Greece seems to have been limited by the strange ness of the Aeolic dialect, and perhaps their loss to us may be partly attributed to the same cause. Two recensions of the works of Alcaeus were made by the grammarians Aristarchus and Aristophanes. Some fragments of his poems which remain, and the excellent imitations of Horace, enable us to understand something of his character.

His poems, which consisted of at least ten books (Athen. xi. p. 481), were called in general Odes, Hymns, or Songs (Σημεύμα). Those which have received the highest praise are his warlike or patriotic odes referring to the factions of his state σταθμούς and ἀθανασία, the "Alcaei minaces Caenoeas" of Horace. (Carm. ii. 13, 27; Quintil. x. 1, § 63; Dionys. de Vet. Script. Ecens. ii. 8, p. 73, Syll.) Among the fragments of these are the beginning of a song of exultation over the death of Myrsilus (Fr. 4, Blomf.), and part of a composition of his ruined party to a disabled ship (Fr. 2, Blomf.), both of which are finely imitated by Horace. (Carm. i. 27, i. 14.) Many fragments are preserved, especially by Athenaeus (x. pp. 429, 430), in which the poet sings the praises of wine. (Fr. 1, 8, 16, 18, 20, Blomf.; comp. Hor. Carm. i. 9, 18.) Müller remarks, that "it may be doubted whether Alcaeus composed a separate class of drinking songs (συμφωνικά); ... it is more probable that he connected every exhortation to drink with some reflection, either upon the particular circumstances of the time, or upon man's destiny in general." Of his erotic poems we have but few remains. Among them were some addressed to Stepho; one of which, with Stepho's reply, is preserved by Aristoph. (Phut. L. 2; Fr. 26, Blomf.; Steph. 159, &c.), and others to beautiful youths. (Hor. Carm. i. 32, 10; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 28, Tuc. Quest. iv. 33.) Most of his remaining poems are religious hymns and epigrams. Many of his poems are addressed to his friends individually.

The poetry of Alcaeus is always impassioned. Not only with him, but with the Aeolic school in general, poetry was not a mere art, but the plain and warm outpouring of the writer's inmost feelings. The metres of Alcaeus were generally lively, and his poems seem to have been constructed in short single strophes, in all of which the corresponding lines were of the same metre, as in the odes of Horace. He is said to have invented the well-known Aeolic strophe.

His likeness was engraved, together with that of Pittacus, on a brass coin of Mytilene in the Royal Museum at Paris, which is engraved by Visconti. (Icon. Pl. iii. No. 3.)

The fragments of Alcaeus were first collected by Mich. Neander in his "Aristologia Pindarica," Basil. 1556, 8vo., then by Henry Stephens in his collection of the fragments of the nine chief lyric poets of Greece (1557), of which there are several editions, and by Fulvius Uranus, 1668, 8vo. The more modern collections are those by Jani, Halko San. 1780—1782, 4to.; by Strange, Halle, 1810, 8vo.; by Blomfield, in the "Museum Criticum," vol. i. p. 421, &c., Camb. 1836, reprinted in Gaisford's "Poetica Graeci Minores;" and the most complete edition is that of Matthieae, "Alcaei Mytilenei reliquiæ," Lips. 1827. Additional fragments have been printed in the Rhenish Museum for 1829, 1833, and 1835; in Jahn's "Jahrb. für Philol." for 1830; and in Cramer's "Anecdota Graeca," vol. i. Oxfl. 1833.

ALCAEUS (Αλκαίος), the son of Mucus, was a native of MYTILENE, according to Suidas, who may, however, have confounded him in this point with the lyric poet. He is found exhibiting at Athens as a poet of the old comedy, or rather of that mixed comedy, which formed the transition between the old and the middle. In n. 238, he brought forward a play entitled Παισίδεο, in the same contest in which Aristophanes exhibited his second Plutus, but, if the meaning of Suidas is rightly understood, he obtained only the fifth place. He left ten plays, of which some fragments remain, and the following titles are known, Αδελφαί μυκηναίων, Παμφυλοῦ, Κοπρικυν, Μάρτυς, Καλλιτεία, Κυμάτωργα, Παλάμειρα.

Alcaeus, a tragic poet, mentioned by Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. ii. p. 282), does not appear to be a different person from Alcaeus the comic. The mistake of calling him a tragic poet arose simply from an erroneous reading of the title of his "Comedoe-tragoeidin."

(The Greek Argument to the Plutus; Suidas, s. v.; Pollux, x. 1; Casaubon on Athen. iii. p. 206; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc. i. p. 244, ii. p. 324; Bode, Geschichte der Dramatischen Dichtkunst der Hellenen, ii. p. 386.) [P. S.]

ALCAMEONES (Αλκαμηνῶν), king of Sparta, 10th of the Agids, son of Teleclus, commanded, according to Pausanius, in the night-expedition against Amphipolis, which commenced the first Messenian war, but died before its 4th year. This would fix the 33 years assigned him by Apollodorus, about 170 to 422 n. c. In his reign Helos was wrested from the Athenians, the last independent hold most likely of the old Achaean population, and the supposed origin of the term Helot. (Paus. iii. 2, 7; iv. 4, 3, 5, 8; Herod. vii. 204; Plut. Apophth. Loc.) [A. H. C.]

ALCAMEONES (Αλκαμηνῶν), the son of Thbechades, whom Agis appointed as har中新 of the Lesbians, when they wished to revolt from the Athenians in c. 412. When Alcameses put to sea with twenty-one ships to sail to Chios, he was pursued by the Athenian fleet off the isthmus of Corinth, and driven on shore. The Athenians attacked the ships when on shore, and Alcameses was killed in the engagement. (Thuc. viii. 5, 10.)

ALCAMEONES (Αλκαμηνῶν), a distinguished satyr and sculptor, a native of Athens. (Plin. H. N. xcvii. 54.) Suidas (s. v.) calls him a Lemnian (if by Alcameses he means the artist). This K. O. Müller (Arch. der Kunst, p. 90) interprets to mean that he was a sculptor, or holder of one of the κληρονομιῶν in Lemnos. Voss, who is followed by Thiersch (Epos von der bild. Kunst, p. 130), conjectured that the true reading is Αλκαμηνός, and accordingly that Alcamenes was born in the district called the Amares, which is in some degree confirmed by his having made a statue of Dionysus in gold and ivory to adorn a temple of that god in the Lemneum, a part of the Limaeae. (Paus. i. 20, § 2.) He was the most famous of the pupils of Phidias, but was not so close an imitator of his master as Agoracritus. Like his fellow-pupil, he exercised his talent chiefly in making statues of the deities. By ancient writers he is ranked amongst the most distinguished artists, and is considered by Pausanias second only to Phidias. (Quintil. xii. 10. § 8; Dionys. De Deoost., accv., vol. vi. p. 1108, ed. Reiske; Paus. v. 10. § 2.) He flourished about from about Ol. 84 (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 19) to Ol. 95 (P. c. 440-444). Pliny's date is confirmed by Pausanias, who says (viiii. 9. § 1), that Praxiteles flourished in the third generation after Alcamenes; and Praxiteles, as Pliny tells us, flourished about Ol. 104 (P. c. 364). The last works of his which we hear of, were the colossal statues of Athene and Hercules, which Thrasylus erected in the temple of Hercules at Thebes after the expulsion of the tyrants from Athens. (P. c. 403.) The most beautiful and renowned of the works of Alcamenes was a statue of Venus, called from the place where it was set up, 'H Ǣν κυασας Άπρο-βιττ. (Lucian, Imagines, 4, 6; Paus. i. 19, § 2.) It is said that Phidias himself put the finishing touches to this work. (P. c. 405.) The breasts, cheeks, and hands were especially admired. It has been supposed by some that this was the Venus for which he gained the prize over Agoracritus. There is no direct evidence of this, and it is scarcely consistent with what Pliny says, that Alcamenes owed his success more to the favour of his fellow-artists than to the excellence of his statue. Another celebrated specimen of his genius was the western pediment of the temple at Olympia, ornamented with a representation of the battle between the Centaurs and the Lapithae. (Paus. v. 10, § 2.) Other works of his were: a statue of Mars in the temple of that god at Athens (Paus. i. 8, § 5); a statue of Hephaestus, in which the manners of the god was so ingeniously represented as not to give the appearance of deformity (Cic., De Nat. Deor. i. 50; Val. Max. viii. 11. ext. 3); an Aesculapius at Mantinea (Paus. viii. 9, § 1); a three-formed Hecate (the first of the kind), and a Proce in the Acropolis at Athens (Paus. ii. 30, § 2, i. 24, § 3); and a bronze statue of a victor in the Pentathlon. (P. c. 404. 8. a. 10.) A story of very doubtful credibility is told by Tacteas (Cith. viii. 198), that Alcamenes and Phidias contended in making a statue of Athene, and that before the statues were erected in their destined elevated position, that of Alcamenes was the most admired on account of its delicate finish; but that, when set up, the effect of the more strongly defined features in that of Phidias caused the Athenians to change their opinion.

On a Roman altar in the villa Albani there is the following inscription:

Q. LOLLISIUS ALCAEMENES

DEG ET DUUMVIR.

If this contains the name of the artist, he would seem to have been a descendant of an Alcamenes, who had been the slave and afterwards the freedman of one of the Lollian family, and to have attained to the dignity of decurio and duumvir in some municipality. He perhaps exercised the art of carving as an amateur. (Winckelmann, viii. 4, 6.)

ALCANDER ('Άκεανήδερος). There are three mythical personages of this name, who are mentioned respectively in Hom. H. v. 673; Virg. Aen. ix. 766; Antonin, Lib. 14. A female Alcander occurs in the Od. iv. 125. (L. S.)

ALCANDER ('Άκεανήδρος), a young Spartan, who attacked Lycurgus and thrust out one of his eyes, when his fellow-citizens were discontented with the laws he proposed. His mangled face, however, produced shame and repentance in his enemies, and they delivered up Alcander to him to be punished as he thought fit. But Lycurgus pardoned his outrage, and thus converted him into one of his warmest friends. (Plut. Lyce. 11; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 22; Val. Max. v. 2. § 3 ext. 9.)

ALCATHOE or ALCITHOE ('Άλκαθη, or 'Άλκθη), a daughter of Minyas, and sister of Leucippe and Arisepe. Instead of Arisepe, Aelian (V. H. iii. 42) calls the latter Aristippe, and Plutarch (Quoest. Gr. 39) Arsinoe. At the time when the worship of Dionysus was introduced into Boeotia, and while the other women and maidens were revelling and ranging over the mountains in Bacchic joy, these two sisters alone remained at home, devoting themselves to their usual occupations, and thus profaning the days sacred to the god. Dionysus punished them by changing them into bats, and their work into vines. (Ov. Met. iv. 1-40, 390-415.) Plutarch, Aelian, and Antoninus Liberalis, though with some differences in the detail, relate that Dionysus appeared to the sisters in the form of a maiden, and invited them to partake in the divine mysteries. When this request was not complied with, the god metamorphosed himself successively into a bull, a lion, and a panther, and the sisters were seized with madness. In this state they were eager to honour the god, and Leucippe, who was chosen by lot to offer a sacrifice to Dionysus, gave up her own son Hippasus to be torn to pieces. In extreme Bacchic frenzy the sisters now roamed over the mountains, until at last Hermes changed them into birds. Plutarch adds that down to his time the men of Orchemenea descended from that family were called χρόναι, that is, mourners, and the women άδελεα or αδελεά, that is, the destroyers. In what manner the neglect of the Dionysiac worship on the part of Alcaith and her sister was atoned for every year at the festival of the Agr.DEBUG, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. ALCATHOE; comp. Buttmann, Mythol. ii. p. 201, &c.

ALCATHOES ('Άλκαθος). 1. A son of Pelops and Hippodameia, brother of Atreus and Thyestes, first married Pyrgo and afterwards Eunechme, and was the father of Echepolis, Calippos, Iphinoe, Periboea, and Automedon. (Paus. i. 42. § 1, 43. § 4; Apollod. ii. 4. § 11, iii. 12. § 7.) Pausanias (i. 41. § 4) relates that, after Eunippe, the son of king Megareus, was destroyed by the Cythterion lion, Megareus, whose elder son Timallus had likewise fallen by the hands of Theseus, offered his daughter Eunechme and his kingdom to him who should slay that lion. Alcathues undertook the task, conquered the lion, and thus obtained Eunechme for his wife, and afterwards became the father of Megareus. In gratitude for this success, he built at Megara a temple of Artemis Agrotera and Apollo Agrenerus. He also restored the walls of Megara, which had been destroyed by the Cretans. (Paus. i. 11. § 5.) In this work he said he had been assisted by Apollo, and the stone, upon which the god used to place his lyre while he was at work, was even in late times believed, when struck, to give forth in a sound similar to that of a lyre. (Paus. i. 42. § 1; Ov. Met. viii. 15, &c.; Virg. Æn. 195; Theogn. 751.) Ebusus, one of the sons of Alcathous, was killed during the Cyprian hunt in Aetolia, and when his brother Callipolis hastened to carry the sad tidings to his father, he found him engaged in offering a sacrifice to Apollo, and thinking it unfit to offer sacrifices at such a moment, he snatched away the wood from the altar. Alcathous imagining this to be an act of sacrilegious wantonness, killed his son on the spot with a piece of wood. (Paus. i. 42. § 7.) The acropolis of Megara was called by a name derived from that of Alcathous. (ib. 42. § 7.)

2. A son of Porthion and Euryte, who was slain by Tydeus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10, 8. § 5; Diod. iv. 63.)

3. A son of Acesytides and husband of Hippodamia, the daughter of Anicthea and sister of Aeneas, who was educated in his house. (Hom. H. xiii. 466.) In the war of Troy he was one of the Trojan leaders, and one of the handsomest and bravest among them. (ib. xii. 93; xiv. 427.) He was slain by Idomeneus with the assistance of Poseidon, who struck Alcathous with blindness and paralyzed his limbs so that he could not flee. (Il. xii. 433, &c.) Another personage of this name is mentioned by Virgil, Aen. x. 747. [L. S.]

ALCEIDES ('Alkeides), according to some accounts the name which Heracles originally bore (Apollod. ii. 4. § 12), while, according to Diodorus, his original name was ALCATUS. [L. S.]

ALCÆBUS or ALCÆSTE ('Akleistis or 'Akleistis), a daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, and mother of Enneus and Admetus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 10, 15.) Homer (Il. ii. 715) calls her the fairest among the daughters of Pelias. When Alcatus, king of Phrace, sued for her hand, Pelias, in order to get rid of the numerous suitors, declared that he would give his daughter to him only who should win her to his court in a clunch drawn by lions and boars. The suitors entered the court of Alcatus, with the aid of Apollo. For the further story, see ADMETUS. The sacrifice of her self for Alcatus was highly celebrated in antiquity. (Aedid. V. H. xiv. 45; Animal. i. 15; Philostr. Her. ii. 4; Ov. Ars Am. iii. 19; Euph. Alcæotis.) Towards her father, too, she showed her filial affection, for, at least, according to Diodorus (iv. 52; comp. however, Palæph. De inced. 41), she did not share in the crimes of her sisters, who murdered their father. Ancient as well as modern critics have attempted to explain the return of Alcatus to life in a rationalistic manner, by supposing that during a severe illness she was restored to life by a physician of the name of Heracles. (Palæph. L. c.) Plut. Ama- thon. p. 761.) Alcatus was represented on the chest of Cypselus, in a group showing the funeral solemnities of Pelias. (Paus. v. 17. § 4.) In the museum of Florence there is an alto relievo, the work of Cleomenes, which is believed to represent Alcatus devoting herself to death. (Meyer, Gesch. dcr bildent. Künste, i. p. 162, ii. 159.) 'ALCEAS' ('Alkeas), whose age is unknown, was the author of a work on the offerings (dowth-had attained their 20th year, he could not have been born later than n.c. 440. If he served in the first campaign (n. c. 432), he must have been at least five years old at the time of his father's death. Nepos (Alcib. 10) says he was about forty years old at the time of his death (n. c. 404), and his mistake has been copied by Mitford.

Alcibiades was connected by birth with the noblest families of Athens. Through his father he traced his descent from Euryvaces, the son of Ajax (Plat. Alcib. l. p. 121), and through him from Aesacus and Zeus. His mother, Deione-mach, was the daughter of Megacles, the head of the house of the Alcmeonids. Thus on both sides he had hereditary claims on the attachment of the people; for his paternal grandfather, Alcibiades, took a prominent part in the expulsion of the Peisistratids (Isocrat. De Big. 10), and his mother was descended from Cleisthenes, the friend of the commonalty. His father Cleinias did good service in the Persian war. He fitted out and manned a trireme at his own expense, and greatly distinguished himself in the battle of Artemision. (Herod. vii. 17.) One of his ancestors of the name of Cleinias earned a less enviable notoriety by taking fraudulent advantage of the Seisachtheion of Solon. The name Alcibiades was of Lacedaemon origin (Thuc. viii. 6), and was derived from the Spartan family to which the ephor Endius belonged, with which that of Alcibiades had been anciently connected by ties of hospitality. The first who bore the name was the grandfather of the great Alcibiades. On the death of his father (n. c. 447), Alcibiades was left to the guardianship of his relations Pericles and Ariphon. Zopyrus, the Thracian, is mentioned as one of his instructors. (Plat. Ate. i. p. 122.) From his very boyhood he exhibited signs of that indescribable determination which marked him throughout life.

He was at every period of his life remarkable for the extraordinary beauty of his person, of which he seems to have been exceedingly vain. Even when on military service he carried a shield inlaid with gold and ivory, and bearing the device of Zeus hurling the thunderbolt. When he grew up, he displayed a disgraceful notoriety by his amours and debaucheries. At the age of 16 he entered upon the possession of his fortune, which had doubtless been carefully husbanded during his long minority by his guardians. Connected as he was with the most influential families in the city, the heir of one of the largest fortunes in Athens (to which he afterwards received a large accession through his marriage with Hipparchia, the daughter of Hippocrates), gifted with a mind of singular ver-

utility and energy, possessed of great powers of eloquence, and urged on by an ambition which no obstacle could daunt, and which was not over scrupulous as to the means by which its ends were to be gained,—in a city like Athens, amongst a people like the Athenians, (of the leading features of whose character he may not unaptly be regarded as an impersonation,) and in times like those of the Peloponnesian war, Alcibiades found a field singularly well adapted for the exercise and display of his brilliant powers. Accustomed, however, from his boyhood to the flattery of aspiring companions and needy parasites, he early imbibed that inordinate vanity and love of distinction, which marked his whole career; and he was thus led to place the most perfect confidence in his own powers long before he had obtained strength of mind sufficient to withstand the seductive influence of the temptations which surrounded him. Socrates saw his vast capabilities, and attempted to win him to the path of virtue. Their intimacy was strengthened by mutual services. In one of the engagements before Potidaea, Alcibiades was dangerously wounded, but was rescued by Socrates. At the battle of Delium (n. c. 424), Alcibiades, who was mounted, had an opportunity of protecting Socrates from the pursuers. (Plat. Convic. pp. 320, 321; Isocr. De Big. 12.)

The lessons of the philosopher were not altogether without influence upon his pupil, but the evil tendencies of his character had taken too deep root to render a thorough reformation possible, and he listened more readily to those who advised him to secure by the readiest means the gratification of his desires.

Alcibiades was excessively fond of notoriety and display. At the Olympic games (probably in Ol. 80, n. c. 424) he contended with seven chariots in the same race, and gained the first, second, and fourth prizes. His liberality in discharging the office of trierarch, and in providing for the public amusements, rendered him very popular with the multitude, who were ever ready to excuse, on the score of youthful imprudence and thoughtlessness, his most violent and extravagant acts, into which he was probably as often led by his love of notoriety as by any other motive. Accounts of various instances of this kind, as his forcible detention of Agatharchus, his violence to his wife Hipparchia, his assault upon Teucer, and the audacious manner in which he saved Hegemon from a lawsuit, by openly obliterating the record, are given by Plutarch, Andocide, and Athenaeus. (ix. p. 407.) Even the more prudent citizens thought it safer to connive at his dolings, than to exasperate him by punishment. As Aeschylus is made to say by Aristophanes (Ergys, 1427), “A lion’s whelp ought not to be reared in a city; but if a person rears one, he must let him have his way.” Of the early political life of Alcibiades we hear but little. While Cleon was alive he probably appeared but seldom in the assembly. From allusions which were contained in the Acharnai of Aristophanes (acted n. c. 427) it appears that he had already spoken there. (For the story connected with his first appearance in the assembly, see Plutarch, Alcib. 10.) At some period or other son. His marriage took place before the battle of Delium (n. c. 424), in which Hippocion was slain. (Andoc. Alcib. p. 80.)

before b. c. 420, he had carried a decree for increasing the tribute paid by the subject allies of Athens, and by his management it was raised to double the amount fixed by Aristeides. After the death of Cleon there was no rival able at all to cope with Alcibiades except Nicias. To the political views of the latter, who was anxious for peace and repose and averse to all plans of foreign conquest, Alcibiades was completely opposed, and his jealousy of the influence and high character of his rival, led him to entertain a very cordial dislike towards him. On one occasion only do we find them united in purpose and feeling, and that was when Hyperbolus threatened one of them with banishment. On this they united their influence, and Hyperbolus himself was exiled. The date of this occurrence is uncertain.

Alcibiades had been desirous of renewing those ties of hospitality by which his family had been connected with Sparta, but which had been broken off by his grandfather. With this view he vied with Nicias in his good offices towards the Spartan prisoners taken in Sphacteria; but in the negotiations which ended in the peace of 421, the Spartans preferred employing the intervention of Nicias and Laches. Incensed at this slight, Alcibiades threw all his influence into the opposite scale, and in n. c. 420, after tricking the Spartan ambassadors who had come for the purpose of thwarting his plans, brought about an alliance with Argos, Elis, and Mantinea. In 419 he was chosen Strategos, and at the head of a small Athenian force marched into Peloponnese, and in various ways furthered the interests of the new confederacy. During the next three years he took a prominent part in the complicated negotiations and military operations which were carried on. Whether or not he was the instigator of the unjust expedition against the Melians is not clear; but he was at any rate the author of the decree for their barbarous punishment, and himself purchased a Melian woman, by whom he had a son.

In n. c. 416 Alcibiades appears as the foremost among the advocates of the Sicilian expedition (Thuc. vi.); which his ambition led him to believe would be a step towards the conquest of Italy, Carthage, and the Peloponnese. (Thuc. vi. 86.) While the preparations for the expedition were going on, there occurred the mysterious mutilation of the Herm of Hera. A man named Pythoicus charged Alcibiades with having divulged and profaned the Eleusinian mysteries; and another man, Androcles, endeavoured to connect this and similar offences with the mutilation of the Herm. In spite of his demands for an investigation, Alcibiades was sent out with Nicias and Lamachus in command of the fleet, but was recalled before he could carry out the plan of operations which at his suggestion had been adopted, namely, to endeavour to win over the Greek towns in Sicily, except Syracuse and Selinus, and excite the native Sicels to revolt, and then attack Syracuse. He was allowed to accompany the Salaminia in his own galley, but managed to escape at Thrace, from which place he crossed over to Cyllene, and thence proceeded to Sparta, at the invitation of the Spartan government. He now appeared as the avowed enemy of his country; disclosed to the Spartans the plans of the Athenians, and recommended them to send Glytippus to Syracuse, and to fortify Decelea. (Thuc. vi. 88, &c., vii. 18, 27, 28.) Before he left Sicily he had managed to defeat a plan which had been laid for the acquisition of Messana. At Athens sentence of death was passed upon him, his property confiscated, and a curse pronounced upon him by the ministers of religion. At Sparta he rendered himself popular by the facility with which he adopted the Spartan manners. Through his instrumentality many of the Asiatic allies of Athens were induced to revolt, and an alliance was brought about with Tissaphernes (Thuc. viii. 6, &c.); but the machinations of his enemy Ages Agis II. induced him to abandon the Spartans and take refuge with Tissaphernes (n. c. 412), whose favour he soon gained by his unrivalled talents for social intercourse. The estrangement of Tissaphernes from his Spartan allies ensued. Alcibiades, the enemy of Sparta, wished to return to Athens. He accordingly entered into correspondence with the most influential persons in the Athenian fleet at Samos, offering to bring over Tissaphernes to an alliance with Athens, but making it a condition, that oligarchy should be established there. This coinciding with the wishes of those with whom he was negotiating, those political movements were set on foot by Pselas and Echelocrates, which ended (n. c. 411) in the establishment of the Four Hundred. The oligarchs, however, finding he could not perform his promises with respect to Tissaphernes, and conscious that he had at heart no real liking for an oligarchy, would not recall him. But the soldiers in the camp at Samos, headed by Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus, declare their resolution to restore democracy, and passed a vote, by which Alcibiades was pardoned and recalled, and appointed one of their generals. He conferred an important benefit on his country, by restraining the soldiers from returning at once to Athens and so commencing a civil war; and in the course of the same year the oligarchy was overthrown without their assistance. Alcibiades and the other exiles were recalled, but for the next four years he remained abroad, and under his command the Athenians gained the victories of Cynossema, Abydos,* and Cynus, and got possession of Chalecedon and Byzantium. In n. c. 407, he returned to Athens, where he was received with great enthusiasm. The records of the proceedings against him were sunk in the sea, his property was restored, the priests were ordered to recount their oaths, and he was appointed commander-in-chief of all the land and sea forces, (Diod. xiii. 69; Plut. Alc. 33; Xen. Hell. i. 4. § 18—20.) He signalled his return by conducting the mystic procession to Eleusis, which had been interrupted since the occupation of Decelea, but his unsuccessful expedition against Andros and the defeat at Notium, occasioned during his absence by the imprudence of his lieutenant, Antiochus, who brought on an engagement against his orders, furnished his enemies with a handle against him, and he was superseded in his command. (n. c. 406.)

Thinking that Athens would scarcely be a safe place for him, Alcibiades went into voluntary exile.

* Shortly after the victory at Abydos, Alcibiades paid a visit to Tissaphernes, who had arrived in the neighbourhood of the Hellespont, but was arrested by him and sent to Sardis. After a month's imprisonment, however, he succeeded in making his escape. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 9.)
to his fortified domain at Bisanthe in the Thradian Chersonesus. He collected a band of mercenaries, and made war on the neighbouring Thradian tribes, by which means he considerably enriched himself, and afforded protection to the neighbouring Greek cities. Before the fatal battle of Aegospotami (n. c. 465), he gave an ineffectual warning to the Athenian generals. After the establishment of the tyranny of the Thirty (n. c. 404), he was condemned to banishment. Upon this he took refuge with Pherหลวง, and was about to proceed to the court of Artaxerxes, when one night his house was surrounded by a band of armed men, and set on fire. He rushed out sword in hand, but fell, pierced with arrows. (n. c. 404.) According to Diodorus and Ephorus (Diod. xiv. 11) the assassins were emissaries of Pherหลวง, who had been led to this step either by his own jealousy of Alcibiades, or by the instigation of the Spartans. It is more probable that they were either employed by the Spartans, or (according to one account in Plutarch) by the brothers of a lady whom Alcibiades had seduced. His corpse was taken up and buried by his mistress Timandros. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 574) mentions a monument erected to his memory at Melissia, the place of his death, and a statue of him erected thereon by the emperor Hadrian, who also instituted certain yearly sacrifices in his honour. He left a son by his wife Hipparette, named Alcibiades, who never distinguished himself. It was for him that Isocrates wrote the speech Περὶ τοῦ Ζεύγους. Two of Lyssias’ speeches (xiv. and xv.) are directed against him. The fortune which he left behind turned out to be smaller than his patrimony. (Plut. Alcib. and Nicia; Thucyd. lib. v.—viii.; Xenophon, Hellen. lib. i. 26; Andoc. in Alcib. and de Myoton.; Isocr. De Bifjas; Nemos, Alcib.; Diod. xii. 78—81, xxx. 2—37, 41, 45, 46, 49—51, 64—73; Athen. l. p. 3, iv. p. 184, v. pp. 218, 219, ix. p. 407, xi. p. 506, xii. pp. 525, 534, 535, xiii. pp. 574, 575.)

ALCIBIADES (Ἀλκιβίας), a Spartan exile, was restored to his country about n. c. 194, by the Aetians, but was sent away enough to be ambassador from Sparta to Rome, in order to accuse Philopoemen and the Athenians. (Polyb. xxxii. 4, 11, 12, 44; Liv. xxxiv. 35.)

ALCIBIADES (Ἀλκιβίας), a Greek rhetorician, was a native of Icaia in Aeolis, in Asia Minor. (Quintil. i. § 10, with Spalding’s note.) He was a pupil of Gorgias, and resided at Athens between the years n. c. 432 and 411. Here he gave instructions in eloquence, according to Eudoxia (p. 100), as the successor of his master, and was the last of that school of sophists, with which the only object of eloquence was to please the hearers by the pomp and brilliance of words. That the works of Alcibiades bore the strongest marks of this character of his school is stated by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. § 8), who censures his pompous diet and the inartistic use of poetical epithets and phrases, and by Dionysius (De Isocr., 19), who calls his style vulgar and inflated. He is said to have been an opponent of Isocrates (Tzet. Chil. xi. 679), but whether this statement refers to real personal enmity, or whether it is merely an inference from the fact, that Alcibiades condemned the practice of writing orations for the purpose of delivering them, is uncertain.

The ancient mention several works of Alcibiades, such as an Eulogy on Death, in which he enumerated the evils of human life, and of which Cicero seems to speak with great praise (Tusc. i. 48); a speech about the acquisition of wealth (Aristot. Rhet. i. 13, § 5); a work on music (Sindus. s. v. Ἀλκιβίας); and some scientific works, viz. on rhetoric (τέχνη ἱστορίας, Plut. Demosth. 5), and another called λόγος φωνής (Diog. Laert. viii. 56); but all of them are now lost. Isocrates (Chil. xi. 792) had still before him several orations of Alcibiades, but we now possess only two declarations which go under his name. 1. Ἐσορασία, ἃ κατὰ Παλαμήδους προβαίνει, in which Odyssey is made to accuse Palamedes of treachery to the cause of the Greeks during the siege of Troy. 2. Περὶ σφηκατον, in which the author sets forth the advantages of delivering extemporaneous speeches over those which have previously been written out. These two orations, the second of which is the better one, both in form and thought, bear scarcely any traces of the faults which Aristotle and Dionysius censured in the works of Alcibiades; their fault is rather being frigid and inapt. It has therefore been maintained by several critics, that these orations are not the works of Alcibiades; and with regard to the first of them, the supposition is supported by strong probability; the second may have been written by Alcibiades with a view to counteract the influence of Isocrates. The first edition of them is that in the collection of Greek orators published by Aldus, Venice, 1518, fol. The best modern editions are those in Reiske’s Oratores Graeci, vol. viii. p. 64, &c.; and in Bekker’s Oratores Attici, vol. vii. (Oxford.) [L.S.] ALCIDIAS (Ἀλκίδιας), was appointed, n. c. 428, commander of the Peloponnesian fleet, which was sent to Lesbos for the relief of Mytilene, then besieged by the Athenians. But Mytilene surrendered to the Athenians seven days before the Peloponnesian fleet arrived on the coast of Asia; and Alcidas, who, like most of the Spartan commanders, had little enterprise, resolved to return home, although he was recommended either to attempt the recovery of Mytilene, or to capture a settlement on the Ionian coast. While sailing along the coast, he captured many vessels, and put to death all the Athenian allies whom he took. From Ephesus he sailed home with the utmost speed, being chased by the Athenian fleet, under Paches, as far as Patmos. (Thuc. iii. 16, 26—33.) After receiving reinforcements, Alcidas sailed to Corycyra, n. c. 427; and when the Athenians and Corycyreans sailed out to meet him, he defeated them and drove them back to the island. With his habitual caution, however, he would not follow up the advantage he had gained; and being informed that a large Athenian fleet was approaching, he sailed back to Peloponnesus. (iii. 69—81.) In n. c. 426, he was one of the leaders of the colony founded by the Lacedaemonians at Heraclea, near Thermopylae. (iii. 92.) ALCI/DICE (Ἀλκιδία), the daughter of Aleus, and wife of Salomeus, by whom she had a daughter, Tyro. Alcide died early, and Salomeus afterwards married Sidero. (Diod. iv. 68; Apollod. i. 9, § 6.) ALCIMACHUS, a painter mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxxv.i. 11. s. 40.) He is not spoken of by any other writer, and all that is known about him is, that he painted a picture of Dioxippus, a victor in the pancration at Olympia. 101
Dioecius lived in the time of Alexander the Great. (Aelian, V. H. x. 22; Diod. xvii. 100; Athen. vi. p. 251, e.) Alcimus therefore probably lived about the same time. [C. P. M.]

ALCIMÉDE (Αλκίμηδης), a daughter of Phyraeus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 45; Schol. ad loc. and ad i. 230.) She married Aecon, by whom she became the mother of Jason (Ov. Herod. iv. 105; Hyggin. Fab. 15 and 14), who, however, is called by others a son of Polydeuces, Arce, or Scarpe. (Apollod. i. 9. § 8; comp. Aesoc. Jason.) [L. S.]

ALCIMÉDON (Αλκιμεδών). 1. An Arcadian hero, from whom the Arcadian plain Alcimégara derived its name. He was the father of Philo, by whom Hercules begot a son, Aecumagarus, whom Alcimédon exposed, but Hercules saved. (Paus. vii. 12. § 2.) [AECIMAGORAS]

2. One of the Tyrrhenian sailors, who wanted to carry off the infant Dionysus from Naxos, but was metamorphosed, with his companions, into a dolphin. (Ov. Met. iii. 618; Hyggin. Fab. 134; comp. AECYTÉS.)

3. A son of Laercius, and one of the commanders of the Myrmidons under Patroclus. (Hom. II. xvi. 107, xvii. 475, &c.) [L. S.]

ALCIMÉNÉ (Αλκιμήνη), an embosser or chaser, spoken of by Virgil (Elog. iii. 37, 44), who mentions some goblets of his workmanship. [C. P. M.]

ALCIMÉNÉS (Αλκιμήνης). 1. A son of Glauce, who was unintentionally killed by his brother Bellerophon. According to some traditions, this brother of Bellerophon was called Dáides, or Peiren. (Apollod. ii. 3. § 1.)

2. One of the sons of Jason and Medea. When Jason subsequently wanted to marry Glauce, his son Alcimeus and Thasander were murdered by Medea, and were afterwards buried by Jason in the sanctuary of Hera at Corinth. (Diod. iv. 54, 55.) [L. S.]

ALCIMÉNÉS (Αλκιμήνης), an Athenian comic poet, apparently a contemporary of Aeschylus. One of his pieces is supposed to have been the Καλεμέγδαι (the Female Swimmers). His works were greatly admired by Tyronymus, a younger contemporary of Aeschylus. There was a tragic writer of the same name, a native of Megara, mentioned by Suidas. (Meineke, Hist. Gr. Comicorum Graec. p. 481; Suid. s. v. Άλκημήνης, and ΄Αλκημήν) [C. P. M.]

ALCIMUS (Αλκίμος), also called Jacinus, or Joachim (Iōáchos), one of the Jewish priests, who espoused the Syrian cause. He was made high priest by Demetrius, about B.C. 161, and was installed in his office by the help of a Syrian army. In consequence of his cruelties he was expelled by the Jews, and obliged to fly to Antioch, but was restored by the help of another Syrian army. He continued in his office, under the protection of the Syrians, till his death, which happened suddenly (a. C. 155) while he was pulling down the wall of the temple that divided the court of the Gentiles from that of the Israelites. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xii. 9. § 7; 1 Macrob. vii. 19.)

ALCIMUS (Αλκίμος), a Greek rhetorician, whom Diogenes Laertiuss (ii. 114) calls the most distinguished of all Greek rhetoricians, flourished about B.C. 300. It is not certain whether he is the same as the Alcimus to whom Diogenes in another passage (iii. 9) ascribes a work πρὸς Αισι αποκοσμ. Athenaeus in several places speaks of a Si-was impossible from the writings of Plato to get a system complete in its parts, and hence the temptation of later writers, who sought for system, to join Plato and Aristotle, without perceiving the inconsistency of the union, while everything which suited their purpose was feebly ascribed to the founder of their own sect. In the treatise of Aleinus, however, there are still traces of the spirit of Plato, however low an idea he gives of his own philosophical talent. He held the world and its animating soul to be eternal. This soul of the universe (ἡ ψυχὴ τῶν κόσμων) was not created by God, but, to use the image of Aleinus, it was awakened by him as from a profound sleep, and turned towards himself, "that it might lock out upon the intellectual things (c. 14) and receive forms and ideas from the divine mind." It was the first of a succession of intermediate beings between God and man. The ἔδεικνυμι proceeded immediately from the mind of God, and were the highest object of our intellect; the "form" of matter, the types of sensible things, having a real being in themselves. (c. 9.) He differed from the earlier Platonists in confining the ἔδεικνυμι to general laws: it seemed an unworthy notion that God could conceive an ἔδεικνυμι of things artificial or unnatural, or of individuals or particulars, or of any thing relative. He seems to have aimed at harmonizing the views of Plato and Aristotle on the ἔδεικνυμι, as he distinguished them from the ἔφη, forms of things, which he allowed were inseparable: a view which seems necessarily connected with the doctrine of the eternity and self-existence of matter. God, the first fountain of the ἔδεικνυμι, could not be known as he is: it is but a faint notion of him we obtain from negations and analogies: his nature is equally beyond our power of expression or conception. Below him are a series of beings (βασιλείας) who superintend the production of all living things, and hold intercourse with men. The human soul passes through various transmigrations, thus connecting the series with the lower classes of being, until it is finally purified and rendered acceptable to God. It will be seen that his system was a compound of Plato and Aristotle, with some parts borrowed from the east, and perhaps derived from a study of the Pythagorean system. (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, iv. p. 249.)

Aleinus first appeared in the Latin version of Pietro Baldi, which was published at Rome with Apuleius, 1469, fols. The Greek text was printed in the Aldine edition of Apuleius, 1521, 8vo. Another edition is that of Fell, Oxford, 1667. The best is by J. F. Fischer, Leipzig, 1783, 8vo. It was translated into French by J. J. Combes-Donnay, Paris, 1800, 8vo., and into English by Stanley in his History of Philosophy. [B. J.]

ALCIPHRON (Ἀλκίφρων), a Greek sophist, and the most eminent among the Greek epistolographers. Respecting his life or the age in which he lived we possess no direct information whatever. Some of the earlier critics, as La Crozé and J. C. Wolf, placed him, without any plausible reason, in the fifth century of our era. Berger, and others who followed him, placed Alciphron in the period between Lucian and Aristeneus, that is, between A.D. 170 and 338, while others again assigned him a date even earlier than the time of Lucian. The only circumstance that suggests anything respecting his age is the fact, that among the letters of Aristeneus there are two (I. 5 and 22) between Lucian and Alciphron; now as Aristeneus is nowhere guilty of any great historical inaccuracy, we may safely infer that Alciphron was a contemporary of Lucian—an inference which is not incompatible with the opinion, whether true or false, that Alciphron imitated Lucian.

We possess under the name of Alciphron 116 fictitious letters, in 3 books, the object of which is to delineate the characters of certain classes of men, by introducing them as expressing their peculiar sentiments and opinions upon subjects with which they were familiar. The classes of persons which Alciphron chose for this purpose are fishermen, country people, parasites, and hetairae or Athenian courtesans. All are made to express their sentiments in the most graceful and elegant language, even where the subjects are of a low or obscene kind. The characters are thus somewhat raised above their common standard, without any great violation of the truth of reality. The form of these letters is exquisitely beautiful, and the language is the pure Attic dialect, such as it was spoken in the best times in familiar but refined conversation at Athens. The scene from which the letters are dated is, with a few exceptions, Athens and its vicinity; and the time, wherever it is discernible, is the period after the reign of Alexander the Great. The new Attic comedy was the principal source from which the author derived his information respecting the characters and manners which he describes, and for this reason these letters contain much valuable information about the private life of the Athenians of that time. It has been said, that Alciphron is an imitator of Lucian; but besides the style, and, in a few instances, the subject matter, there is no resemblance between the two writers: the spirit in which the two treat their subjects is totally different. Both derived their materials from the same sources, and in style both aimed at the greatest perfection of the genuine Attic Greek. Bergler has truly remarked, that Alciphron stands in the same relation to Menander as Lucian to Aristophanes. The first edition of Alciphron's letters is that of Aldus, in his collection of the Greek Epistolographers, Venice, 1499, 4to. This edition, however, contains only those letters which, in more modern editions, form the first two books. Seventy-two new letters were added from a Vitruvia of a Venetian MSS. by Bergler, in his edition (Leipzig, 1715, 8vo.) with notes and a Latin translation. These seventy-two epistles form the third book in Bergler's edition. J. A. Wagner, in his edition (Leipzig, 1798, 2 vols. 8vo., with the notes of Bergler), added two new letters entire, and fragments of five others. One long letter, which has not yet been published entire, exists in several Paris MSS. [L. S.]

ALCIPPE (Ἀλκίππη). 1. A daughter of Ares and Aegalo, the daughter of Cecrops. Harirhothis, the son of Poseidon, intended to violate her, but was surprised by Ares, and killed, for which Poseidon bore a grudge against Ares. (Paus. l. 21, § 7 ; Apollod. iii. 14. § 2.)

2. A maiden, who was dishonoured by her own brother, Astraenus, unwittingly. When Astraenus became aware of his deed, he threw himself into a lake and received from him the name of Astar- nous, but was afterwards called Caeus. (Plut. De Plan. 21.)

Other personages of this name are mentioned in desire to possess the necklace and peoplis of Harmonia, and Alemoeon, to gratify her wish, went to Psophis to get them from Phegeus, under the pretext that he intended to dedicate them at Delphi in order to be freed from his madness. Phegeus complied with his request, but when he heard that the treasures were fetched for Calirrhoë, he sent his sons Pronous and Agemor (Apollod. iii. 7 § 6) or, according to Pausanias (vii. 24 § 4), Tenemus and Axiom, after him, with the command to kill him. This was done, but the sons of Alcmene by Calirrhoë took bloody vengeance at the instigation of their mother. (Apoll. Paus. ii. 38; Ov. Met. iv. 407.)

The story about Alcmene furnished rich materials for the epic and tragic poets of Greece, and their Roman imitators. But none of these poems is now extant, and we only know from Apollodorus (iii. 7 § 7), that Euripides, in his tragedy "Alcmene," stated that after the fall of Thebes he married Manto, the daughter of Teiresias, and that he had two children by her, Amphimachus and Tisiphone, whom he gave to Creon, King of Corinth, to educate. The wife of Creon, jealous of the extraordinary beauty of Tisiphone, afterwards sold her as a slave, and Alcmene herself bought her, without knowing that she was his daughter. (Diod. iv. 69; Paus. viii. § 1, i. 33 § 1.) Alcmene after his death was worshipped at Athens, and at Thebes he seems to have had an altar, near the house of Pindar (Pith. viii. 80, &c.), who calls him his neighbour and the guardian of his property, and also seems to suggest that prophetic powers were ascribed to him, as to his father Amphimachus. At Psophis his tomb was shown, surrounded with lfty and sacred epxresses. (Paus. viii. 24 § 4.) At Oropus, in Attica, where Amphimachus and Amphimachus were worshipped, Alcmene enjoyed no such honours, because he was a martiride. (Paus. i. 54 § 2.) He was represented in a statue at Delphi, and on the chest of Cepheus. (x. 10 § 2, i. 17 § 4.) [L. S.]

ALCMEOON (Ἀλκμεών), son of the Megasces who was guilty of sacrilege with regard to the followers of Cimon, was invited by Croesus to Sardis in consequence of the services he had rendered to him and Croesus sent by Croesus to consult the Delphic oracle. On his arrival at Sardis, Croesus made him a present of as much gold as he could carry out of the treasure. Alcmone took the king at his word, by putting on a most capacious dress, the folds of which (as well as the vacant space of a pair of very wide boots, also provided for the occasion) he stuffed with gold, and then filled his mouth and hair with gold dust. Croesus laughed at the trick, and presented him with as much again (about 869 n. c.). The wealth thus acquired is said to have contributed greatly to the subsequent prosperity of the Alcmaceonidae. (Herod. vi. 125.)

Alcmene was a breeder of horses for chariots, and on one occasion gained the prize in a chariot-race at Olympia. (Herod. i. 72; Isocrates, de Beata 10. 551.) We are informed by Plutarch (Solon. c. 11), that he commanded the Athenians in the Cirtæan war, which began n. c. 600. [P. S.]

ALCMÆON (Ἀλκμαίος), one of the most eminent natural philosophers of antiquity, was a native of Crotone in Magna Graecia. His father's name was Pitius, and he is said to have been a pupil of Pythagoras, and must therefore have lived.
Although Alcmaeon is termed a pupil of Pythagoras, there is great reason to doubt whether he was a Pythagorean at all; his name seems to have crept into the lists of supposititious Pythagoreans given us by later writers. (Brandis, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. i. p. 507.) Aristotle (Metaph. A. 5) mentions him as nearly contemporary with Pythagoras, but distinguishes between the στοιχεῖα of opposites, under which the Pythagoreans included all things, and the double principle of Alcmaeon, according to Aristotle, less extended, although he does not explain the precise difference. Other doctrines of Alcmaeon have been preserved to us. He said that the human soul was immortal and partook of the divine nature, because like the heavenly bodies it contained in itself a principle of motion. (Arist. de Anima, i. 2, p. 405; Cit. de Nat. Doctr. i. 11.) The eclipse of the moon, which was also eternal, he supposed to arise from its shape, which he said was like a boat. All his doctrines which have come down to us, relate to physics or medicine; and seem to have arisen partly out of the speculations of the Ionian school, with which rather than the Pythagorean, Aristotle appears to connect Alcmaeon, partly from the traditional lore of the earliest medical science. (Brandis, vol. i. p. 508.)

ALCMAEAONIDAE (Ἀλκμαεωνίδαι), a noble family at Athens, members of which fill a space in Grecian history from 1100 to 400 B.C. The following is a genealogical table of the family.

The Alcmaeonidae were a branch of the family of the Neleidai. The Neleidai were driven out of Pylos in Messenia by the Dorians, about 1100 B.C., and went to Athens, where Melanthus, the representative of the elder branch of the family became king, and Alcmaeon, the representative of the second branch, became a noble and the ancestor of the Alcmaeonidae. Alcmaeon was the great-grandson of Nestor. (Paus. ii. 18. § 7.) Among the archons for life, the sixth is named Megacles, and the last Alcmaeon. But, as the archons for life appear to have been always taken from the family of Mec- don, it is probable that these were only Alcmae- nids on the mother's side. The first remarkable man among the Alcmaeonids was the archon Me- gladhes, who brought upon the family the guilt of sacrilege by his treatment of the insurgents under Cylon. (a. c. 612.) [CIMON MEGACLES.] The expulsion of the Alcmaeonidae was now loudly de- manded, and Solon, who probably saw in such an event an important step towards his intended re- forms, advised them to submit their cause to a tribunal of three hundred nobles. The result was that they were banished from Athens and retired to Phocis, probably about 596 or 595 B.C. Their wealth having been augmented by the liberality of Croesus to Alcmaeon, the son of Megacles [AL- GMASON], and their influence increased by the mar- riage of Megacles, the son of Alcmaeon, to Agaristo, the daughter of Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, they took advantage of the divided state of Athens, and by joining the party of Lycurgus, they effected their return; and shortly afterwards, by a similar union, they expelled Peisistratus soon after he had seized the government. (B.C. c. 559.) [PEISISTRATUS.] This state of things did not last long; for, at the end of five years, Megacles gave his daughter Coesryra in marriage to Peisistratus, and assisted in his restoration to Athens. But a new quarrel immediately arose out of the conduct of Peisistratus towards his wife, and the Alcmaeonidae once more expelled him. During the following ten years, Peisistratus collected an army, with which he invaded Attica, and defeated the Alcmaeonids, who were now once more driven into exile. They were, however, still formidable enemies. After the death of Hipparchus, they took possession of Lipysydrium, a fortress on the frontier of Attica, and made an at- tempt to restore themselves, but were defeated by Hippasus. They had, however, a more important source of influence. In the year 548 B.C. the temple of Apollo at Delphi was burnt, and the Alcmaeonidae having contracted with the Amphicy- onic council to rebuild it, executed the work in a style of magnificence which much exceeded their engagement. They thus gained great popularity throughout Greece, while they contrived to bring the Peisistratids into odium by charging them with having caused the fire. The oracle, besides, fi-

The time at which Alcman lived is rendered somewhat doubtful by the different statements of the Greek and Armenian copies of Eusebius, and of the chronographers who followed him. On the whole, however, the Greek copy of Basebius appears to be right in placing him at the second year of the twenty-seventh Olympiad. (a. c. 671.) He was contemporary with Ardys, king of Lydia, who reigned from 678 to 629 B.C., with Lesches, the author of the "Little Iliad," and with Ter- pander, during the later years of these two poets; he was older than Stesichorus, and he is said to have been the teacher of Arion. From these cir- cumstances, and from the fact which we learn from himself (Fr. 29), that he lived to a great age, we may conclude, with Clinton, that he flourished from about 671 to about 631 B.c. (Clinton, Fast. i. pp. 189, 191, 365; Hermann, Autiq. Lacon. pp.
67, 77.) He is said to have died, like Sulla, of the morbus pectinarius. (Aristot. Hist. Anim. v. 31 or 25; Plut. Sulla, 36; Plin. H. N. xi. 33. § 39.)

The period during which most of Alcman's poems were composed, was that which followed the conclusion of the second Messenian war. During this period of quiet, the Spartans began to cherish that taste for the spiritual enjoyment of poetry, which, though felt by them long before, had never attained to a high state of cultivation, while their attention was absorbed in war. In this process of improvement Alcman took immediate part, and in the year 676 B.C., he removed from Lesbos to the mainland of Greece, and had introduced the Attic lyric into the Peloponnesus. This new style of poetry was speedily adopted to the choral form in which the Doric poetry had hitherto been cast, and gradually supplanted that earlier style which was nearer to the epic. In the 33rd or 34th Olympiad, Terpander made his great improvements in music. Terpander. Hence arose the peculiar character of the poetry of his younger contemporary, Alcman, which presented the choral lyric in the highest excellence which the music of Terpander enabled it to reach. But Alcman had also an intimate acquaintance with the Phrygian and Lydian styles of music, and he was himself the inventor of new forms of rhythm, one of which bore his name.

A large portion of Alcman's poetry was erotic. In fact, he is said by some ancient writers to have seen the inventor of erotic poetry. (Athen. xiii. 600; Suidas, s. a.) From his poems of this class, which are marked by a freedom bordering on coarseness, he obtained the epithets of "sweet" and "pleasant" (γλυκός, καλεῖται). Among these poems were many hymnical pieces. The Parthenia, which form a branch of Alcman's poems, must not be confused with the erotic. They were so called because they were composed for the purpose of being sung by chores of virgins, and on account of their subjects, which were very various, sometimes indeed erotic, but often religious. Alcman's other poems embrace hymns to the gods and hymns in praise of different religious festivals, and short ethical or philosophical pieces. It is disputed whether he wrote any of those Analectic war-songs, or marches, which were called επεταρμάμα, but it seems very likely that he should have neglected a kind of composition which had been rendered so popular by Tyrtaeus.

His metres are very various. He is said by nidas to have been the first poet who composed iambic verses but dactylic hexameter. This statement is incorrect; but Suidas seems to refer to the other dactylic lines into which Alcman broke up a Homerice hexameter. In this practice, however, he had been preceded by Archilochus, from whom he borrowed several others of his peculiar stases: others he invented himself. Among his stases we find various forms of the dactylic, anapestic, trochaic, and iambic, as well as lines composed of different metres, for example, iambic and aspastic. The Cretic hexameter was named cinaire, from his being its inventor. The poems Alcman were chiefly in strophes, composed of es sometimes of the same metre throughout the pohpe, sometimes of different metres. From their choral character we might conclude that they sometimes had an antistrophic form, and this seems to be confirmed by the statement of Hesychius (p. 134, Gaiaef), that he composed odes of fourteen strophes, in which there was a change of metre after the seventh strophe. There is no trace of an epode following the strophe and antistrophe, in his poems.

The dialect of Alcman was the Spartan Doric, with an intermixture of the Aeolic. The popular Idioms of Laconia appear most frequently in his more familiar poems.

The Athenian grammarians placed Alcman at the head of their canon of the nine lyric poets. Among the proofs of his popularity may be mentioned the tradition, that his songs were sung, with those of Terpander, at the first performance of the gymnopaedia at Sparta (s. c. 665, Aelian, V. H. xii. 50), and the ascertained fact, that they were frequently afterwards used at that festival. (Athen. xxi. p. 678.) The few fragments which remain scarcely allow us to judge how far he deserved his reputation; but some of them display a true poetical spirit.

Alcman's poems comprised six books, the extant fragments of which are included in the collections of Nemesius, H. Stephens, and Fulvius Ursinus. The latest and best edition is that of Welcker, Giessen, 1815. [P. S.]

ALCMENÉ (Αλκμήνη), a daughter of Elec-tryon, king of Messene, by Anaxo, the daughter of Alcaeus. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.) According to other accounts her mother was called Lyssaille (Schol. od. Pind. Ol. vii. 49; Plut. These. 7), or Eurydice. (Did. iv. 9.) The poet Asius represented Alcmené as a daughter of Amphimarus and Eriphyle. (Paus. u. 17. § 4.) Apollodorus mentions ten brothers of Alcmené, who, with the exception of one, Licymnius, fell in a contest with the sons of Terelmus, who had carried off the cattle of Electryon. Electryon, on setting out to avenge the death of his sons, left his kingdom and his daughter Alcmené to Amphimurion, who, unintentionally, killed Electryon. Sthenelus thereupon expelled Amphimurion, who, together with Alcmené and Lycymnus, went to Thebes. Alcmené thereupon would marry him, who should avenge the death of her brothers. Amphimurion undertook the task, and invited Creon of Thebes to assist him. During his absence, Zeus, in the disguise of Amphimurion, visited Alcmené, and, pretending to be her husband, related to her in what way he had avenged the death of her brothers. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6—8; Od. Amor. i. 13. 45; Did. iv. 9; Hygin. Fab. 29; Lucian, Dialog. Dar. 10.) When Amphimurion himself returned on the next day and wanted to give an account of his achievements, she was surprised at the repetition, but Teiresias solved the mystery. Alcmené became the mother of Heracles by Zeus, and of Iphicles by Amphimurion. Here, jealous of Alcmené, delayed the birth of Heracles for seven days, that Eurytheus might be born first, and thus be entitled to greater rights, according to a vow of Zeus himself. (Hom. II. xii. 95, &c.; Od. Met. ix. 273, &c.; Did. l. c.) After the death of Amphimurion, Alcmené married Rhadamathy, a son of Zeus, at Oenoe in Boeotia. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 11.) After Heracles was raised to the rank of a god, Alcmené and his sons, in dread of Eurytheus, fled to Trachis, and thence to Athens, and when Hyllus had cut off the head of Euryus, the Alcmena satisfied her revenge by picking the eyes out of the head. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.)
The accounts of her death are very discrepant. According to Pausanias (i. 41. § 1), she died in Megara, on her way from Argos to Thebes, and as the sons of Hercules disagreed as to whether she was to be carried to Argos or to Thebes, she was buried in the place where she had died, at the command of an oracle. According to Plutarch, (De Gen. Sex. p. 578.)
she was killed by her own sons, and that of Rhodamnathy were at Haliartus in Bocotia, and hers was opened by Agaeusias, for the purpose of carrying her remains to Sparta. According to Pherecydes (Cyp. Auton. Lib. 38), she lived with her sons, after the death of Eurythus, at Thebes, and died there at an advanced age. When the sons of Hercules wished to bury her, Zeus sent Hermes to take her body away, and to carry it to the islands of the blessed, and give her in marriage there to Rhadamantus. Hermes accordingly took her out of her coffin, and put it in a stone so heavy that the Helmedics could not move it from the spot. When, on opening the coffin, they found the tone, they erected it in a grove near Thebes, which in later times contained the sanctuary of Alemene. (Paus. ix. 16. § 4.) At Athens, too, she was worshipped as a heroine, and an altar was erected to her in the temple of Heracles. (Cynergeses, Paus. i. 19. § 3.) She was represented on the chest of Cypasia (Paus. v. 18. § 1), and epic as well as tragic poets made frequent use of her story, though no poem of the kind is now extant. (Her. Sent. H.ore. init.; Paus. v. 17. § 4, 18. § 1.)

ALCORN or ALCO (Ἀλκων). 1. A son of Hippo-cocoon, and one of the Calydonian hunters, was killed by the arrows of Apelles and Pan, who were friends of Hercules, and had a heroum at Sparta. (Paus.
iii. 10. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 173; Paus. iii. 11. § 7, 15. § 3.)

2. A son of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and father of Phalerus the Argonaut. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 97; Hygin. Fab. 14.) Valerius Flacceus (i. 399, &c.) represents him as such a skilful archer, that once, when a serpent had entwined his son, he shot the serpent without hurting his child. Virgil (Eclog. v. 11) mentions an Alcon, whom Servius calls a Cretan, and of whom he relates almost the same story as that which Valerius Flacceus ascribes to Alcon, the son of Erechtheus.

Two other personages of the same name occur in Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 21), and in Hyginus.
(Pet. 172.)

in the reign of Claudius. A. n. 41-54, who is said by Pliny (H. N. xxix. 8) to have been banished to Gaul, and to have been fined ten million of sesterces: H. s. sentio cent. mill. (about 78,125). On his return from banishment, he is said to have gained by his practice an equal sum within a few years, which, however, seems so enormous (compare Albus and Arrastius), that there must probably be some mistake in the text. A surgeon of the same name, who is mentioned by Martial (Epigr. xi. 34) as a contemporary, may possibly be the same person.

1. A Pleiad, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, by whom Poseidon beget Aeolus, Hyrieus and Hypernor. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Hygin. P. A.
Fab. 11. ed. Stavrov. 0v. Herod. 8. 335.) To these children Pausanias (ii. 30. § 7) adds two others, Hyperes and Anthus.

2. A daughter of Aeolus and Eurydice or Aegiale.
She was married to Ceüx, and lived so happy with him, that they were presumptuous enough to call each other Zeus and Hera, for which Zeus metamorphosed them into birds, ἄλκυώνη and ἄλκυς.
(Apollod. i. 7. § 8, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 65.) Hyginus relates that Ceüx perished in a shipwreck, that Alcyone for grief threw herself into the sea, and that the gods, out of compassion, changed the two into birds. It was fabled, that during the seven days before, and as many after, the shortest day of the year, while the bird ἄλκυς was breeding;
there always prevailed calms at sea. An embellished form of the same story is given by Ovid (Met. xi. 410, &c.; comp. Virg. Georg. i. 399.)

3. A surname of Cleopatra, the wife of Meleag-killed by Apollo. (Hom. II. ix. 562; Estath.

ALCYONEUS (Ἀλκυώνευς). 1. A giant, who kept possession of the Isthmus of Corinth at the time when Hercules drove away the oxen o Geryon. The giant attacked him, crushed twelve wagon and twenty-four of the men of Hercules with a huge block of stone. Hercules himself warded off the stone with his club and slew Aley onous. The block, with which the giant had at tempted the life of Hercules, was shown on the Isthmus down to a very late period. (Pind. N e.
iv. 80, with the Schol.) In another passage (Istet.
i. 48, &c. Paus. 12. § 15) Pausinus calls Alcyoneus a Thracian shepherd, and places the struggle with him in the Phlegmian plains.

Drimo, and Asteria. (Estath. ad Hom. p. 776

ALEA (Ἀλεά), a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Aelae, Mantinea and Tegea. (Paus. viii. 23. § 1, § 4, § 17. § 7)
The temple of Athena Alea at Tegae, which was the oldest, was said to have been built by Aelae son of Apheidas, from whom the goddess probably derived this surname. (Paus. viii. 4. § 5)
This temple was burnt down in B. C. 394, and a new one built by Scopas, which in size and splendour surpassed all other temples in Pelopo-nesus, and was surrounded by a triple row columns of different orders. The statue of the goddess, which was made by Endoeus all of ivor was subsequently carried to Rome by Augustus adorn the Forum Augusti. (Paus. viii. 45. § 4, § 1 and 2, 47, § 1.) The temple of Athena Al Tegae was an ancient and revered asylum, as the names of many persons are recorded who ask themselves by seeking refuge in it. (Paus. iii.
§ 6, ii. 17. § 7, iii. 7. § 6.) The priestess Athena Alea at Tegae was always a maiden, who held her office only until she reached the age puberty. (Paus. viii. 47. § 2.) Respecting the

2. A son of Amaugoras and father of Iphikles, king of Argos. He was consulted by Polyneices as to the manner in which Amphipolis might be compelled to take part in the expedition against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 3; Paus. ii. 18. § 4.) Two others of the same name are mentioned in Homer (Od. iv. 10; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 303 and 1598.)

ALEMON, ALEMO'NIDES. [MYSELUS.]

ALETES (ALETES), a son of Hippotes and a descendant of Heracles in the fifth degree. He is said to have taken possession of Corinth, and to have expelled the Sinclerid family from the city after the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Hellenida. His family, sometimes called the Ateleidae, maintained themselves at Corinth down to the time of Achaia. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, v. 18. § 2; Strab. vii. p. 389; Callim. Erym. 103; Pind. Ol. xiii. 17.) He called himself Paterculus (i. 3) and he calls himself a descendant of Heracles in the sixth degree. He received an oracle, promising him the sovereignty of Athens, if using the war, which was then going on, its king should remain uninjured. This oracle became known at Athens, and Codrus sacrificed himself at his country. (Conon, Narrat. 26.)

Other persons of this name are mentioned in Apollod. i. 10. § 8; Hygin. Fug. 122.; in Pind. Pht. ix. 463. (L. S.)

AULEAS and AULE'ADAE. (Auleas and Auleiadas.) Auleas is the ancestral hero of the Hesnian, or, more particularly, of the Larissaean family of the Aulea. (Pind. Pht. x. 8, with the Schol.) The Aulea were the noblest and most powerful among all the families of Thermopylae, hence Herodotus (vii. 6) calls its members Basileis. (Comp. Diod. xvi. 61, xvi. 14.) The first Auleas, who bore the surname of Tapylos, that is, red-haired, is called king (here synonymous with Tagus, see Dict. of Aut. p. 932) of Thermopylae, and a descendant of Heracles through Thermopylae, of the many sons of Heracles. (Suidas, s. v. Βασιλεύς; Ulpius, ad Dem. Olyph. 1; Schol. d' Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1090; Velleius. i. 3.) Plutarch (De Am. Prot. in fin.) states, that he was hated by his father on account of his haughty and savage manner; but the Auleas, when thirty years of age, at his election king and mentioned by the god of wealthy soldiers. His reign was more glorious than that of any of his ancestors, and the nation rose in power and importance. This Auleas, who belongs to the mythical period of Greek history, is in all probability the same one who, according to Hege- lon (ap. Ath. Alex. viii. 11), was beloved by a magician. According to Aristotle (ap. Haporetal. v. Tersaphyta) the division of Thermopylae into four parts, of which traces remained down to the latest times, took place in the reign of the first Auleas. Umann places this hero in the period between the so-called return of the Hellenida and the age of Elisistratus. But even earlier than the time of Elisistratus the family of the Auleiades appears to have been divided into two branches, the Auleiades and the Scopadai. called after Scopas, probably a son of Aulea. (Or. Ibs. 612.) The Scopadai inhabited Cramon and perhaps Phthartus also, while the main branch, the Aulea, remained at Larissa. The influence of the families, however, was not confined to these towns, but extended more or less over the greater part of Thessaly. They formed in reality a powerful aristocratic party (Baileis) in opposition to the great body of the Thessalians. (Herod. viii. 172.)

The earliest historical person, who probably belongs to the Aulea, is Euryleocles, who terminated the war of Cirnna about 600 B.C. (Strab. iv. p. 418.) [Euryleocles.] In the time of the post-Simonides we find a second Auleas, who was a friend of the poet. He is called a son of Echecratis and Syris (Schol. ad Theocrit. xvi. 34); but besides the suggestion of Ovid (Ibis, 223), that he had a tragic end, nothing is known about him. At the time when Xerxes invaded Greece, three sons of this Auleas, Thorax, Euryppylus, and Thracis, appear as representatives of the family, to request him to go on with the war, and to promise him their assistance. (Herod. vii. 6.) [Thorax.] When, after the Persian war, Leotychides was sent to Thessaly to chastise those who had acted as traitors to their country, he allowed himself to be bribed by the Auleiades, although he might have subdued all Thessaly. (Herod. vii. 72; Paus. iii. 7. § 8.) This fact shows that the power of the Auleiades was then still so great as before. About the year n.c. 460, we find an Aulean Cretes, son of Echecratis, who came to Athens as a fugitive, and persuaded the Athenians to exert themselves for his restoration. (Thuc. i. 111.) He had been expelled either by the Thessalians or more probably by a fiction of his own family, who wished to exclude him from the dignity of Baileis (i.e. probably Tagus), for such feuds among the Auleiades themselves are frequently mentioned. (Xen. Anab. i. 1. § 10.)

After the end of the Peloponnesian war, another Thessalian family, the dynasts of Pherna, gradually rose to power and influence, and gave a great shock to the power of the Auleiades. As early as n.c. 375, Jason of Pherna, after various struggles, succeeded in raising himself to the dignity of Tagus. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 4; Diod. xiv. 62, xiv. 63.) When the dynasts of Pherna became tyrannical, some of the Larissaean Auleiades conspired to put an end to their rule, and for this purpose they invited Alexander, king of Macedon, the son of Amyntas. (Dioc. xiv. 61.) Alexander took Larissa and Cramon, but kept them to himself. Afterwards, Ptolemaios came to the aid of the Auleiades, and assisted in the control of things in Thessaly; but the dynasts of Pherna soon recovered their power, and the Auleiades again solicited the assistance of Macedonia against them. Philip willingly complied with the request, broke the power of the tyrants of Pherna, restored the towns to an appearance of freedom, and made the Auleiades his faithful friends and allies. (Dioc. xvi. 14.)

In what manner Philip used them for his purposes, and how little he spared them when it was his interest to do so, is sufficiently attested. (Dem. de Cor. p. 241; Polyen. iv. 2. § 11; Ulpius, i.e.) Among the tetrarchs whom he entrusted with the administration of Thermopylae, there is one Thrasymedes (Theopomp. ap. Athen. vi. p. 249), who undoubtedly belonged to the Auleiades, just as the Thessalian Medius, who is mentioned as one of ALEXANDER, an artist who was famous for his statues of philosophers. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 13. 26.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), a son of Apelles, and grandson of Ages, was king of Tegea in Arcadia, and married to Neanm, and is said to have founded the town of Atea and the first temple of Athena Atea at Tegea. (Paus. viii. 23. § 1. 4. § 3. sc.; Apollod. iii. 9. § 1.) [A. E. A.] [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), of Teo, was, according to Aristotle, in his work upon poets (ποιητῶν), the first person who wrote dialogues in the Socratic style before the time of Plato. (Athén. xii. p. 565, b. c.; Diog. Laér. iii. 48.) [A. E. A.]

ALEXANDER, [P. R.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), the defender of men, a surname of Hera under which she was worshipped at Sicyon. A temple had been built there to Hera Alexandros by Aeneas after his flight from Argos. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 50; comp. Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), a man whom Mithridates is charged by Sulla with having sent to assassinate Nicomedes. (Appian, De Bell. Mithr. 57.) He seems to be the same person as Alexander the Phaphagonian, who is afterwards (76, &c.) mentioned as one of the generals of Mithridates, and was made prisoner by Lucullus, who kept him to adorn his triumph at Rome. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), a saint and martyr, whose memory is celebrated by the Romish church, together with the other martyrs of Lyon and Vienne, on the second of June. He was native of Phrygia, and a physician by profession and was put to death, A.D. 177, during the persecution that raged against the churches of Lyon and Vienne under the emperor Marcus Aurelius (Epist. Eccles. Lagiani. et Vianae, apud Euseb. His Eccl. v. 1. p. 163.). He was condemned, together with another Christian, to be devoured by wild beasts in the amphitheatre, and died (as the historiographer expresses it) “neither uttering a groan nor a syllable, but conversing in his heart with God.” (Bzovius, Nomenclator Sactorurn Professions M. dicorum; Martyrolog. Roman. ed. Baron; Acta Sanctorum, June.) [W. A. G.]

ALEXANDER, an Acarnanian, who has been a friend of Philip II. of Macedon but forsook him, and insulted himself so much in the favour of Antiochus the Great, that he was admitted to his most secret deliberations. He advised the king to invade Greece, holding out to him the most brilliant prospects of victory over the Romans, b.c. 192. (Livy. xxxv. 18.) Antiochus followed his advice. In the battle of Cynoscephalae in which Antiochus was defeated by the Roman Alexander was covered with wounds, and in that state he carried the news of the defeat to his king, who was staying at Thronium, on the Maliac Gulf. When the king, on his retreat from Greece, he reached Cnossus in Euboia, Alexander died and was buried there, b.c. 191. (Livy. xxxvi. 20.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER of AEoGEOE (Ἀλέξανδρος Αἰγαῖος), a peripatetic philosopher, who flourished at Rome in the first century, and a disciple of the celebrated mathematician Sosigenes, whose calcul
tions were used by Julius Caesar for his connection of the year. He was tutor to the emperor Nero. (Sididas, s. c., Ἀλέξανδρος Νεῷος; Stat. Thb. 67.) Two treatises on the writings of Aristotle are attributed to him by some, but are assigned by others to Alexander Aphrodisiænsis. 1. On the Meteorology of Aristotle, edited in Greek by F. Asulam, Ven. 1537, in Latin by Alex. Piccolomini, 1540, fol. II. A commentary on the Metaphysics. The Greek has never been published, but there is a Latin version by Sepulveda, Rom. 1527. [B.J.]

ALEXANDER AEGUS. [ALEXANDER IV., KING OF MACEDONIA.] Alexander (Ἀλέξανδρος), a son of Alexæus, was one of the commanders of the Macedonian ἀλεξανδρίται in the army of Antigonus Doson during the battle of Sellasia against Cleomenes III. of Sparta, in B.C. 322. (Polyb. II. 66.) [L.S.]

ALEXANDER AETIMIANUS. [AETIMIANUS, No. 3.] Alexander (Ἀλέξανδρος), son of Alexander, a native of the Macedonian district called Lyconestis, whom he is usually called Alexander Lyconestis. Justin (xii. 4) makes the singular mistake of calling him a brother of Lyconestis, while in other passages (xii. 7, xii. 11) he uses the correct expression. He was a contemporary of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. He had two brothers, Herocenes and Arrhabaeus; of these, two were known to have been accomplices in the murder of Philip, in B.C. 336. Alexander the Great on his accession put to death all those who had taken part in the murder, and Alexander he Lyconestis was the only one that was pardoned, because he was the first who did homage to Alexander the Great as his king. (Arrh. Hist. 28; Curtius, viii. 11, Justin, xii. 2.) But, king Alexander not only pardoned him, but even made him his friend and raised him to high honours. He was first entrusted with the command of an army in Thrace, and afterwards received the command of the Thessalian horse. In this capacity he accompanied Alexander on his eastern expedition. In B.C. 334, when Alexander was treading at Phasis, he was informed, that the Lyconestis was carrying on a secret correspondence with king Darius, and that a large sum of money was promised, for which he would be ready to murder his sovereign. The bearer of the letters from Darius was taken by Parmenion and brought before Alexander, and the treachery was manifest. Yet Alexander, dreading to create any hostile feeling, Antipater, the regent of Macedon, whose daughter was married to the Lyconestis, thought advisable not to put him to death, and had him only deposed from his office and kept in custody. In this manner he was dragged about for three years with the army in Asia, until in B.C. 30, when, Philotas having been put to death for similar crime, the Macedonians demanded that Alexander the Lyconestis should likewise be tried and punished according to his desert. King Alexander gave way, and as the traitor was unable to calculate himself, he was put to death at Paphlagonia, in the country of the Drangae. (Curtius, viii., and xii. 4, Justin, xii. 44; Dio. vili. 52, 62.) is object of this traitor was probably, with the 1 of Perga, to gain possession of the throne of Macedon, which prevailed to the contrary, for Lyconestis, king Ill., had for a time belonged to his family. [L.S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), an Aetolian, who, in conjunction with Doryphorus, put himself in possession of the town of Aegela in Achaea, during the Social war, in B.C. 220. But the conduct of Alexander and his associates was so insolent and rapacious, that the inhabitants of the town rose to expel the small band of the Aetolians. In the ensuing contest Alexander was killed while fighting. (Polyb. iv. 57, 58.) [L.S.]

ALEXANDER AETOLUS ('Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ Ἀετόλος), a Greek poet and grammarian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Philadelphia. He was the son of Satyrus and Stratoceles, and a native of Plemorn in Aetolia, but spent the greater part of his life at Alexandria, where he was reckoned one of the seven tragic poets who constituted the tragic school. (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 62; Fauss. ii. 22, § 7; Schol. ad Hom. B. vi. 193.) He had an office in the library at Alexandria, and was commissioned by the king to make a collection of all the tragedies and satyric dramas that were extant. He spent some time together, with Antigons and Aratus, at the court of Antigonus Gonatas. (Aratus, Phaenomena et Diagram. ii. pp. 431, 443, &c. 446, ed. BuHLE. Notwithstanding the distinction he enjoyed as a tragic poet, he appears to have had greater merit as a writer of epic poems, elegies, epigrams, and cynæci. Among his epic poems, we possess the tile and some fragments of three pieces: the Fisherman (Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ Αθην. vii. p. 296). Kirka or Kirka (Athen. vii. p. 293), which, however, is designated by Athenaeus as doubtful, and Helena. (Bekker, Ath. vi. p. 96.) Of his elegies, some beautiful fragments are still extant. (Athen. iv. p. 170, p. 496, xv. p. 689; Strab. xii. p. 656, xiv. p. 651; Parthen. Erot. 4; Tzetz. ad Ioc. 463; Schol. ad Esop. praef. ad II. iii. 314.) His Cynæci, or ἔσωκα εἰρημένα, are mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 648) and Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 620.) Some euphemiæ in verse in praise of Euripides are preserved in Gallus. (xv. 20.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), (ST.) of ALEXANDRIA, succeeded as patriarch of that city St. Achillas, (as his predecessor, St. Peter, had predicted, Martyr. S. Petri, ap. Surius, vol. vi. p. 577,) A.D. 312. He, "the noble Champion of Apostolic Doctrine," (Theodoret, Hist. Arm. 2,) first laid bare the illusion of Arius, and condemned him in his dispute with Alexander Baurus. St. Alexander was at the Oecumenical Council of Nicea, A.D. 325, with his deacon, St. Athanasius, and, scarcely five months after, died, April 17th, A.D. 326. St. Epiphanius (adu. Haeres. 69, § 4) says he wrote some seventy circular epistles against Arius, and Socinæi (H. E. i. 6), and Socomei (H. E. i. 1), that he collected them into one volume. Two epistles remain; 1. to Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, written after the Council at Alexandria which condemned Arius, and before the other circular letters to the various bishops. (See Theodoret, H. E. i. 4; Galland. Bull. Patr. vol. iv. p. 441.)

ARIUS and his, i.e., an Address to the Priests and Deacons, desiring their concurrence therein (ap. S. Athanas. vol. 1 Ps. 1. p. 396, Paris, 1868; see Galland. L. c. p. 455). Two fragments more, apud Galland. (i. c. p. 456.) St. Athanasius also gives the second epistle. (i. c. p. 397.) [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), commander of the horse in the army of Arrhidaeus, who assisting the war against Cleomenes III of Sparta. (Pol. ii. 66.) He fought against Philopoemen, then a young man, whose prudence and valor forced him to a disadvantageous engagement at Sellusia. (ii. 68.) This Alexander is probably the same person as the one whom Antigonus, as the guardian of Philip, had appointed commander of Philip's body-guard, and who was calumniated by Apelles. (iv. 87.) Subsequently he was sent by Philip as ambassador to Thebes, to persecute Megasceas. (v. 28.) Polybius states, that at all times he manifested a most extraordinary attachment to his king. (vii. 12.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), of Antiochia, a friend of M. Antonius, who being acquainted with the Syriac language, acted twice as interpreter between Antonius and the Parthians, and saved the Romans that happened in B.C. 36. (Pseudo-Appian, Porth. pp. 93, 96, ed. Schweigh.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), son of Antonius, the triumvir, and Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. He and his twin-sister Cleopatra were born B.C. 40. Antonius bestowed on him the titles of "Helius," and "King of Kings," and called his sister "Selene." He also destined for him, as an independent kingdom, Armenia, and such countries as might yet be conquered between the Bosphorus and Indus, and wrote to the senate to have his grants confirmed; but his letter was not suffered to be read in public. (u. c. 34.) After the conquest of Armenia Antonius betrothed Jotape, the daughter of the Median king Artavasdes, to his son Alexander. When Cithernus was appointed master of Alexandria, he spared Alexander, but took him and his sister to Rome, to adorn his triumph. They were generously received by Octavia, the wife of Antonius, who educated them with her own children. (Dion Cassius, xlix. 32, 40, 41, 44, l. 25, l. 21; Plut. Anton. 36, 54, 87; Liv. Epit. 131, 132.) [C. P. M.]

ALEXANDER AFRORDISIENSIS (Ἀλέξανδρος Αφροδισιακός), a native of Aphrodisis in Caria, who lived at the end of the second and the beginning of the third century after Christ, the most celebrated of the commentators on Aristotle. He was the disciple of Hermias and Aristotle the Messenian, and like them endeavored to free the Peripatetic philosophy from the syncretism of Ammonius and others, and to restore the genuine interpretation of the writings of Aristotle. The title of Εὐγνώμων was the testimony to the extent or the excellence of his commentaries. About half his voluminous works were edited and translated into Latin at the revival of literature; there are a few more extant in the original Greek, which have never been printed, and an Arabic version is preserved of several others, whose titles may be seen in the Bibliotheca of Cassiri. (Vol. i. p. 243.)

If we view him as a philosopher, his merit cannot be rated highly. His excellences and defects are all on the model of his great master; there is the same pernicacity and power of analysis, united with almost more than the Aristotelian plenitude of style, and he asserts everything with nothing to interrupt or strike the attention. In a mind so thoroughly imbued with Aristotle, it cannot be expected there should be much place for original thought. His only endeavour is to adapt the works of his master to the spirit and language of his own age; but in doing so he is constantly recalled to the earlier philosophy, and attacks bygone opinions, as though they had the same living power as when the writings of Aristotle were directed against them. (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. iv. p. 255.)

The Platonists and earlier Stoics are his chief opponents, for he regarded the Epicureans as too sensual and unphilosophical to be worth a serious answer. Against the notion of the first, that the world is contrary to reason, and yet by the will of God be beyond alteration, he urged that God could not alter the nature of things, and quoted the Platonist doctrine of the necessary coexistence of evil in all corruptible things. (Ritter, p. 262.) God himself, he said, was the very form of things. Yet, however difficult it may be to enter into this abstract notion of God, it would be unjust, as some have done, to charge him with atheism, as in many passages he attributes mind and intelligence to the divine Being. This is one of the points in which he has brought out the views of Aristotle more clearly, from his living in the light of a later age. God, he says (in Metaph. ix. p. 320,) is "properly and simply one, the self-existent substance, the author of motion himself unmoved, the great and good Deity, without beginning and without end;" and again (in Metaph. xii.) he says, that "the providence of Providence is the same thing as depriving honey of sweetness, fire of warmth, snow of whiteness, and coldness, or the soul of motion. The providence of God, however, is not directed in the same way to the sublunary world and the rest of the universe the latter is committed not indeed to fate, but to general laws, while the concerns of man are the immediate care of God, although he find not in the government of them the full perfection of being. (Quaest. Nat. i. 25, li. 21.) He saw no incoherence, as perhaps there was none, between these high notions of God and the materialism which they were connected. As God was the form of all things, so the human soul was likewise a form of matter, which it was impossible to conceive as existing in an independent state. It seems however to have made a distinction between the powers of reflection and sensation, for he says (de Anima, i. p. 139,) that the soul needed not the body as an instrument to take in objects of thought but was sufficient of itself; unless the latter is to be looked upon as an inconsistency into which he has been led by the desire to harmonize the end Peripateticism with the purer principle of a later philosophy. (Brucker, vol. ii. p. 481.)

The most important treatise of his which has come down to us, is the "De Fato," an inquirer into the opinions of Aristotle on the subject Fate and Foresight. It is probably one of his late works, and must have been written between the years 199-211, because dedicated to the joint emperors Severus and Caracalla. Here the earlier Stoics are his opponents, who ascertained that all things arise from an eternal and indiscernible chain of causes and effects. The subject is treated practically rather than speculatively. Under this opinion, the common use of language, and internal consciousness, are his main arguments. That fate has a real existence, is proved by the distinction we draw between fate, chance, and possibility, and between free and necessary actions. It is another word for nature, and its workings are seen in the tendencies of men and things (c. 5), for it is an all-pervading cause of real, but not absolute, power. The fatalism of the Stoics does away with free-will, and so destroys responsibility: it is at variance with every thought, word, and deed, of our lives. The Stoics, indeed, attempt to reconcile necessity and free-will; but, properly speaking, they use free-will in a new sense for the necessary co-operation of our will in the decrees of nature. Men may be morally responsible, and, of course, into practice the subtle distinction of a will necessarily yet freely acting; and hence, by destroying the accountsableness of man, they destroy the foundation of morality, religion, and civil government. (c. 12-20.) Supposing their doctrine true in theory, it is impossible in action. And even speculatively their argument from the universal chain is a confusion of an order of sequence with a series of causes and effects. If it be said again, that the gods have certain foreknowledge of future events, and what is certainly known must necessarily be, it is answered by denying that in the nature of things there can be any such foreknowledge, as foreknowledge is proportioned to divine power, and is a knowledge of what divine power can perform. The Stoical view inevitably leads to the conclusion, that all the existing ordinances of religion are blasphemous and absurd.

This treatise, which has been edited by Orelli, gives a good idea of his style and method. Upon the whole, it must be allowed that, although with Ritter we cannot place him high as an independent thinker, he did much to encourage the accurate study of Aristotle, and exerted an influence which, according to Julius Scaliger, was still felt in his day. (Brucker, vol. ii. p. 460.)

The following list of his works is abridged from Harles's Fabricéna. (Vol. v. p. 630.) 1. Περὶ εἰραμένου καὶ τοῦ εἰ ἦν οὐρά, De Plato, dico co quod in nostra potestas est; the short treatise mentioned above, dedicated to the emperors Severus and Caracalla; first printed by the successors of Aldus Manutius, 1534, folio, at the end of the works of Theistius: translated into Latin by Grotius in the collection entitled "Veterem Philos. Sententiae de Plato," Paris, 1648, 4to, Lond. 1688, 12mo, and edited by Orelli, Zurich, 1824, 8vo, with a fragment of Alexander Aphrodissius. De Fortuna, and treatises of Ammonius, Plotinus, &c. on the same subject. 11. Commentarii (Τεμπόριενα) in primum librum Analyticiam Priorum Aristotelis, Venet. Aldii, 1520, fol.; Flor. 1521, 4to, with a Latin translation by J. Bap. Felicianus. 11. Commentarii in VIII libros Topicaeun, Ven. Aldii, 1513; with a Latin version by A. Dorotheus, Ven. 1555 and 1541, and Paris, 1552, folio; and another by Rastiani, Ven. 1563, 1573, folio. IV. Commentarii in Euchelii Sophistes; Graece, Ven. Aldii, 1520, fol.; Flor. 1520, fol.; translated into Latin by J. B. Basarius. V. Comment. in Metaphysicorum XII libros; ex versione J. G. Sepulvedae, Rom. 1827, Paris, 1556, Ven. 1544 and 1561. The Greek text has never been printed, although it exists in the Paris library and several others. VI. In librum de Senen et suo quae sub se sumum content; the Greek text is printed at the end of the commentary of Simplicius on the De Animâ, Ven. Aldii, 1527, folio; there is also a Latin version by Lucilius Philotheus, Ven. 1544, 1549, 1554, 1559, 1573. VII. In Aristotelis Meteorologici; Ven. Aldii, 1557; supposed by some not to be the work of Alexander Aphrodissius. VIII. De Miastone; bound up in the same edition as the preceding. IX. De Animâ libri duo (two distinct works), printed in Greek at the end of Theismius: there is a Latin version by Hieronymus Donatus, Ven. 1502, 1514, folio. X. Philosophia Scelcia, dubitationes et solutiones; in Greek, Ven. Trinaciva, 1536, folio; in Latin, by Hieronymus Bogolius, Ven. 1541, 1551 and 1563. XI. De Breviarum Aulicarum et Religiosarum Quaestiones Medicae et Providentia Physica. XII. Peri Pteron, Libri duo de Fabulis. The last two treatises are attributed by Theodore Gaza and many other writers to Alexander Trallianus. They are spoken of below.

His treatises are also entitled Περὶ σειρῆνος καὶ φοινικὸς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, together with a work entitled Liber I de Theologia, probably distinct from the Commentaries on the Metaphysics, are still extant in Arabic. A Commentary on the prior Analytics, which is a treatise on the Virtues, a work entitled τηλος μεγαλομοίρας, a treatise against Zenodorus the Epicurean, and another on the nature and qualities of Stones, also a book of Allegories from mythological fables, are all either quoted by others or referred to by himself [B. J.]

Besides the works universally attributed to Alexander Aphrodissius, there are extant two others, of which the author is not certainly known, but which are by some persons supposed to belong to him, and which commonly go under his name. The first of these is entitled Ιάτρικα Ανθρώπινα καὶ Φυσικὰ Προβλήματα, Quaestiones Medicæ et Problemata Physicae, which there are strong reasons for believing to be the work of some other writer. In the first place, it is not mentioned in the list of his works given by the Arabic author quoted by Cassi (Biblioth. Arab. Hisp. Escorial. vol. i. p. 243); secondly, it appears to have been written by a person who belonged to the medical profession (i. e. ψευτ et § 11), which was not the case with Alexander Aphrodissius; thirdly, the writer refers to a work by himself, entitled Ἀλέξανδρος τῶν εἰς Θεοὺς ἀναλογίαιν Παναθεὰν Ἰστορίαν, Alexandri Historianarum Credibilitatem de Dios Fabricandum, which we do not find mentioned among Alexander's works; fourthly, he more than once speaks of the soul as immortal (ii. prof. et § 68, 67), which doctrine Alexander Aphrodissius denied; and fifthly, the style and language of the work seem to belong to a later age. Several eminent critics suppose it to belong to Alexander Trallianus, but it does not seem to be true that a Christian writer would have composed the mythological work mentioned above. It consists of two books, and contains several interesting medical observations along with much that is frivolous and trifling. It was first published in a Latin translation by George Vallis, Venet. 1498, fol. The Greek text is to be found in the Aldine edition of Aristotle's works, Venet. fol. 1495, and in that by Sylburgius, Francof. 1556, 8vo.; it was published with a Latin translation by J. Davion, Paris, 1540, 1541, 16mo.; and it is inserted in the first volume of Idele's Physici et Medicâ Graeci Minores, Berol. 1841, 8vo. The other work is a short treatise, Περί Παρατρές, De Fœribus, which is addressed to a medical pupil whom the author offers to instruct in any other branch of medicine; it is also omitted in the Arabic list of Alexander's works mentioned above. For these reasons it does not seem likely to be the work of Alexander Aphrodisiacus, while the whole of the twelfth book of the great medical work of Alexander Trallianus (to whom it has also been attributed) is taken up with the subject of Fever, and he would hardly have written two treatises on the same disease without making in either the slightest allusion to the other. It may possibly belong to one of the other numerous physicians of the name of Alexander. It was first published in a Latin translation by George Vallis, Venet. 1498, fol., which was several times reprinted. The Greek text first appeared in the Cambridge Museum Criticium, vol. ii. pp. 359—369, transcribed by Demetrius Schlins from a manuscript at Florence; it was published, together with Vallis's translation, by Franz Passow, Vratislav, 1822, 4to, and also in Passow's Opera Selecta Aemilius, Lips, 1835, 8vo., p. 521. The Greek text alone is contained in the first volume of Idele's Physici et Medicâ Graeci Minores, Berol, 1841, 8vo. [W. A. G.] ALEXANDER ('Αλεξάνδρος), the eldest son of Aristobulus II., king of Judaea, was taken prisoner, with his father and brother, by Pompey, on the capture of Jerusalem (n. c. 63), but made his escape as they were being conveyed to Rome. In n. c. 57, he appeared in Judaea, raised an army of 10,000 foot and 1500 horse, and fortified Alexandria and other strong posts. Hyronius applied for aid to Gabinius, who brought a large army against Alexander, and sent M. Antonius with a body of troops in advance. In a battle fought near Jerusalem, Alexander was defeated with great loss, and took refuge in the fortress of Alexander, which was with great difficulty. Through the mediation of his mother he was permitted to depart, on condition of surrendering all the fortresses still in his power. In the following year, during the expedition of Gabinius into Egypt, Alexander again excited the Jews to revolt, and collected an army. He massacred all the Romans who fell in his way, and besieged the rest, who had taken refuge on Mount Gerizim. After rejecting the terms of peace which were offered to him by Gabinius, he was defeated near Mount Tabor with the loss of 10,000 men. The spirit of his adherents, however, was not entirely crushed, for in n. c. 58, on the death of Onias, he again collected some forces, but was compelled to come to terms with Gabinius. (n. c. 52.) In n. c. 49, on the breaking out of the civil war, Caesar set Aristobulus at liberty, and sent him to Judea, to further his interests in that quarter. He was poisoned on the journey, and Alexander, who was preparing to support him, was seized at the command of Pompey, and beheaded at Antioch. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. iv. 5—7 ; Bell. Jud. i. 8, 9.) [C. P. M.] ALEXANDER, of Athens, a comic poet, the son of Aristion, whose name occurs in an inscription given in Bickel (Corp. Inscri. i. p. 765), who refers it to the 145th Olympiad. (n. c. 206.) There seems also to have been a poet of the same name who was a writer of the middle comedy, quoted by the Scholi on Homer (H. i. 216), and Aristoph. (Rim. 864), and Athen. (V. p. 170, e. x. p. 496, c. ; Meineke, Fragm. Com. vol. i. p. 487.) [C. P. M.] ALEXANDER ('Αλεξάνδρος), an ambassador of king Attalus, sent to Rome in n. c. 103, to negotiate peace with the Roman senate. (Polyb. xvii. 10.) [L. S.] ALEXANDER BALAS ('Αλεξάνδρος Βαλᾶς), a person of low origin, usurped the throne of the Greek kingdom of Syria, in the year 150, n. c., pretending that he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. His claim was set up by Heracleides, who had been the treasurer of the late king Antiochus Epiphanes, but had been banished to Rhodes by the reigning king, Demetrius Soter; and he was supported by Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, Ariobarzanes Philopator, king of Cappadocia, and Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. Heracleides also, having taken Alexander to Rome, succeeded in obtaining a decree of the senate in his favour. Furnished with forces by these allies, Alexander entered Syria in 152, n. c., took possession of Ptolemais, and fought a battle with Demetrius Soter, in which, however, he was defeated. In the year 150 n. c. Alexander again met Demetrius in battle with better success. The army of Demetrius was completely routed, and he himself perished in the flight. No sooner had Alexander thus obtained the kingdom than he gave up the administration of affairs to his minister Ammonius, and himself to a life of pleasure. Ammonius put to death all the members of the late royal family who were in his power; but two sons of Demetrius were safe in Crete. The elder of them, who was named Demetrius, took the field in Cilicia against the usurper. Alexander applied for help to his father-in-law, Ptolemy Philometor, who marched into Syria, and then declared himself in favour of Demetrius. Alexander now returned from Cilicia, whither he had gone to meet Demetrius, and engaged in battle with Ptolemy at the river Oenopara. In this battle, though Ptolemy fell, Alexander was completely defeated, and he was afterwards murdered by an Armenian emir with whom he had taken refuge. (n. c. 146.) The meaning of his surname (Balas) is doubtful. It is most probably a title signifying "lord" or "king." On some of his coins he is called "Epiphanes" and "Nicator" after his pretended father. On others "Energetes" and "Theopator." (Polyb. xxxiii. 14, 16; Liv. Epit. l. liii.; Justin. xxv.; Appian, Syrac. c. 67; 1

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), at first bishop in Capadocia, flourished A.D. 212. On the death of Severus, A.D. 211, he visited Jerusalem, and was made conductor of the aged Narcissus, bishop of that city, whom he afterwards succeeded.
He founded an ecclesiastical library at Jerusalem, of which Eusebius made great use in writing his History. After suffering under Severus and Caracalla, he was at last thrown into prison at Caesarea, and, and, after witnessing a good confession, died A.D. 250. Eusebius has preserved fragments of a letter written by him to the Antiochians of another to the Antiochenes (Hist. Eccl. vi. 11); of a third to Origen (vi. 14); and of another, written in conjunction with Theoclistus of Caesarea, to Demetrius of Alexandria. (vi. 10.)

ALEXANDER, CARBONARIUS (Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ Ἀρταχάς), flourished in the third century.
To avoid the dangers of a handsome person, he disguised himself and lived as a coat-heaver at Cuma, in Asia Minor. The see of this city being vacant, the people asked St.
Gregory Thaumaturgus to come and ordain him a bishop. He rejected many who were offered for consecration, and when he said the people prefer to rank, one in mockery cried out, "Well, then! make Alexander, the coat-heaver, bishop!" St. Gregory had him summoned, discovered his disguise, and having arrayed him in sacerdotal vestments, presented him to the people, who, with surprise and joy, accepted the appointment.
He addressed them in homely but dignified phrase, and guarded the church till the Decian persecution, when he was burnt, A. D. 251. (S. Greg. Nyssen.
Biblia Patr. vol. iii. pp. 457—460.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), third son of CASSANDER, king of Macedonia, by Thessalonia, ica, sister of Alexander the Great. In his quarrel with his elder brother Antipater for the government: [ANTIPATER], he called in the aid of tyrians of Ephesus and Demetrius Philoiocedes.
To the former he was compelled to surrender, as the price of his alliance, the land on the sea-coast of Macedonia, together with the provinces of Am bracia, Acarnania, and Amphicloea. (Plut.
Pyrrh. p. 336, b.)

Demetrius, according to Plut.
Praet. (Pyrrh. 356, a., Demetr. 906, a.), arrived after Pyrrhus had retired, and when matters, through his mediation, had been arranged between the brothers. Demetrius, therefore, was now an unwelcome visitor, and Alexander, while he received him with all outward civility, is said by Plutarch to have laid a plan for murdering him at a banquet, which was baffled, however, by the precaution of Demetrius. (Demetr. 906, a.)
The execution of this design, however, did not allow Alexander attended him as far as Thessaly. Here, at Larissa, he went to dine with Demetrius, and (taking no guard with him by a flunkey refi-mement of policy) was assassinated, together with his friends who attended him, one of whom is said to have exclaimed, that Demetrius was only one day beforehand with them. (Plut. Demetr. p. 906,
c. d.; Just. xvi. 1; Diod. xxi. Exc. 7.)

Macedon and Epirus by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus; upon which he took refuge amongst the Aeolrians. By their assistance and that of his own subjects, who entertained a great attachment for him, he recovered Epirus. It appears that he was in alliance with the Antiochians. He married his sister Olympias, by whom he had two sons, Pyrrhus and Ptolemaeus, and a daughter, Pithia. On the death of Alexander, Olympias assumed the regency on behalf of her sons, and married Pithia to Demetrius. There are extant silver and copper coins of this king. The former bear a youthful head covered with the skin of an elephant's head, as appears in the one figured below. The reverse represents Pallas holding a spear in one hand and a shield in the other, and before her stands an eagle on a thunderbolt. (Just., xviii. 1, xxvi. 2, 3, xxviii. 1; Polyb. ii. 45, ix. 34; Plut. Pyrrh. 9.)

ALEXANDER, a Greek Grammarian, who is mentioned among the instructors of the emperor M. Antoninus. (Capitol. M. Ant. ii. 3; M. Antonin. i. § 10.) We still possess a kōyros ἀρχαῖος pronounced upon him by the rhetorician Aristides. (Vol. i. Oral. xii. p. 142, &c.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER, son of Herod. [Hierodex.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), 1. Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, flourished a. d. 253. He was the author of a book entitled, Οἱ νέοι λόγοι ἃνεξακαίρους ὄρθρους ἄρη ἐπὶ τὰς κατὰς Χριστοῦ εἰς τὸν κόσμον, κεφ. ο', not extant. (Suid.)

2. Bishop of Hierapolis, a. d. 431. He was sent by John, bishop of Antioch, to advocate the cause of Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus. His hostility to St. Cyril was such, that he openly charged him with Apollinarism, and rejected the communion of John, Theodoret, and the other Eastern bishops, on their reconciliation with him. He appealed to the pope, but was rejected, and was at last banished by the emperor to Fanothis in Egypt. Twenty-three letters of his are extant in Latin in the Synodicon adversus Trgyoladon Irenæi ap. Novum Collecticon Conciliorum à Balsio, p. 670, &c. Paris, 1683. [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), ST., HIEROSOLYMITANUS, a disciple, first of Pantæenus, then of St. Clement, at Alexandria, where he became acquainted with Origen. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 14.) He was bishop of Flippiolis, (Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. iii. 415.) in Cappadocia. (S. Hier. Vit. Ill. § 62.) In the persecution under Severus he was thrown into prison, (circ. A.D. 294, Euseb. vii. 11.) where he remained till Asclepiades succeeded Seprim at Antioch, A. D. 211, the beginning of Caracalla's reign. (See [s] the Epistle St. Alexander sent to the Antiochenes by St. Clement of Alexandria. Euseb. H. E. vi. 11.) Eusebius relates (l. c.), that by Divine revelation he became conductor bishop to Narsesius, bishop of Aelia, i.e. Jerusalem, a. d. 319. (See Euseb. H. E. vi. 8; Chronici ad a. d. 293, and Alexander's [5] Epistle to the Antinoises ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 11.) During his episcopate of nearly forty years (for he continued bishop on the death of St. Narsesius), he collected a valuable library of Ecclesiastical Epistles, which existed in the time of Eusebius. (H. E. vi. 20.) He received Origen when the troubles at Alexandria drove him thence, a. d. 216, and made him, though a layman, explain the Scriptures publicly, a proceeding which he justified in [7] an epistle to Bishop Demetrius, of Alexandria, (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 10,) who, however, sent some deacons to bring Origen home. As Origen was passing through Palestine, on some necessary business, St. Alexander ordained him priest. (S. Hier. l. c. §§ 54, 62,) which caused great disturbance in the church. (Origen.) A fragment of a [5] letter from St. Alexander to Origen on the subject exists, ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14. St. Alexander died in the Decian persecution, a. d. 251, in prison (S. Dion. Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 49) after great sufferings (Euseb. vi. 39), and is commemorated in the Eastern church on 12th December, in the Western on 16th March. Mazabanes succeeded him. St. Clement of Alexandria dedicated to him his De Canonis Ecclesiastico about the observance of Easter. (H. E. vi. 13.) His fragments have been mentioned in chronological order, and are collected in Gallandi, Bibl. Patr. ii. p. 201, and in Rothe's Hagiographa Sacra, ii. p. 39. [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER, JANNAEUS (Ἀλεξάνδρου Ἰάνναεος), was the son of Johannes Hyrcanus, and brother of Aristobulus I., whom he succeeded, as King of the Jews, in a. d. 104, after putting to death one of his brothers, who laid claim to the crown. He took advantage of the unequal state of Syria to attack the cities of Ptolemais (Acre), Dora, and Gaza, which, with several others, had made themselves independent. The people of Ptolemais applied for aid to Ptolemy Lathyrus, then king of Cyprus, who came with an army of thirty thousand men. Alexander was defeated on the banks of the Jordan, and Ptolemy ravaged the country in the most barbarous manner. In a. d. 103, Cleopatra came to the assistance of Alexander with a fleet and army, and Ptolemy was compelled to return to Cyprus. (a. d. 101.) Soon afterwards Alexander invaded Coele Syria, and renewed his attacks upon the independent cities. In a. d. 98 he took Gaza, destroyed the city, and massacred all the inhabitants. The result of these undertakings, and his having attached himself to the party of the Sadducees, drew upon him the hatred of the Pharisees, who were by far the more numerous party. He was attacked by the people in a. d. 94, while officiating as high-priest at the feast of Tabernacles; but the insurrection was put down, and six thousand of the insurgents slain. In the next year (a. d. 93) he made an expedition against Arabia, and made the Arabs of Gilad and the Mombites tributary. But in a. d. 92, in a campaign against Olybria, the emir of the Arabs of Goulonio, he fell into an ambush in the mountains of Udara; his army was entirely destroyed, and he himself escaped with difficulty. The Pharisees seized the opportunity thus afforded, and broke out into open revolt. At first they were successful, and Alexander was compelled to fly to the mountains (a. d. 88); but two years afterwards he gained two decisive victories. After the second of these, he caused eight hundred of the chief men amongst the rebels to be crucified, and their wives and children to be butchered before their eyes, while he and his comrades banqueted in sight of the victims. This act of atrocity procured for him the name of "the Timoleon." It produced its effect, however, and the rebellion was shortly afterwards suppressed, after the war had lasted six years. During the next three years Alexander made some successful campaigns, recovered several cities and fortresses, and pushed his conquests beyond the Jordan. On his return to Jerusalem, in a. d. 81, his excessive drinking brought on a quartan ague, of which he died three years afterwards, while engaged in the siege of Rapho in Gennesa, after a reign of twenty-seven years. He left his kingdom to his wife Alexandra. Coins of this king are extant, from which it appears that his proper name was Jonathan, and that he bore a name which he assumed according to the prevalent custom. (Josephus, Ant. Jud. xii. 12-15.) [C. P. M.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), summed Isius, the chief commander of the Aetolians, was a man of considerable ability and eloquence for an Aetolian. (Livy. xxxii. 33; Polyb. xvii. 3, &c.) In a. d. 186 he was present at a conference held at Nicaea on the Malian gulf, and spoke against Philip III. of Macedon, saying that the king ought to be compelled to quit Greece, and to restore to the Aetolians the towns which had formerly been subject to them. Philip, indignant at such a demand being made by an Aetolian, answered him in a speech from his ship. (Livy. xxxii. 34.) Soon after this meeting, he was sent as ambassador of the Aetolians to Rome, where, together with other envoys, he was to treat with the senate about peace, but at the same time to bring accusations against Philip. (Polyb. xvii. 10.) In a. d. 197, Alexander again took part in a meeting, at which T. Quinctius Flamininus with his allies and king Philip were present, and at which peace with Philip was discussed. Alexander dissuaded his friends from any peaceful arrangement with Philip. (Polyb. xviii. 18, &c.; Appian, Mucc. vii. 1.) In a. d. 185, when a congress of all the Greek states that were allied with Rome was convoked by T. Quinctius Flamininus at Corinth, for the purpose of considering the war that was to be undertaken against Nabis, Alexander spoke against the Athenians, and also insinuated that the Romans were acting fraudulently towards Greece. (Livy. xxxiv. 29.) When in a. d. 189 M. Fulvius Nobilior, after his victory over Antiochus, was expected to march into Aetolia, the Aetolians sent envoys to Athens and Rhodes; and Alexander Isius, together with Phanesus and Lycopus, were sent to Rome to sue for peace. Alexander, now an old man, was at the head of the embassy; but he and his colleagues were made prisoners in Cephalene by the Epidorans, for the purpose of extorting a heavy ransom. Alexander, however, although he was very wealthy, refused to pay it, and was accordingly kept in captivity for some days, after which he was liberated, at the command of the Romans, without any ransom. (Polyb. xxi. 9.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), summed Lycur- nous (Λυκοῦρος), a Greek rhetorician and poet. He was a native of Ephesus, whence he is sometimes called Alexander Ephesius, and must have lived shortly before the time of Murex (xiv. p. 642), who mentions him among the more recent Ephesian authors, and also states, that he took a part in the political affairs of his native city. Strabo ascribes to him a history, and poems of a didactic kind, viz. one on astronomy and another on geography, in which he describes the great continents of the world, treating of each in a separate work or book, which, as we learn from other sources, bore the name of the continent of which it contained an account. What kind of history it was that Strabo alludes to, is uncertain. The so-called Aurelius Victor (de Orig. Gent. Rom. 9) quotes, it is true, the first book of a history of the Marsey war by Alexander the Ephesian; but this authority is more than doubtful. Some writers have supposed that this Alexander is the author of the history of the succession of Greek philosophers (αἱ τῶν φιλοσόφων διαθέσεις), which is so often referred to by Diogenes Laertius (i. 116, ii. 19, 106, iii. 4, 5, iv. 62, vii. 179, vii. 24, ix. 61); but this work belonged probably to Alexander Polyhistor. His geographical poem, of which several fragments are still extant, is frequently referred to by Stephanus Byzantius and others. (Steph. Byz. s.n. Ἀδράπος, Ταπρόηνδος, Δάρκος, Τρακωδών, Μελετίας, &c.; comp. Eustath., ad Dionys. Perig. 358, 591.) Of his astronomical poem a fragment is still extant, which has been erroneously attributed to Oiclea (Add. ad Poliorc. p. 49) and Schneider (ad Vitruvii. ii. p. 23, &c.) to Alexander Aetolus. (See Nauck, Scholia Critica, p. 7, &c.) It is highly probable that Cicero (ad Att. ii. 90, 22) is speaking of Alexander Lychnus when he says, that Alexander is not a good poet, a careless writer, but yet possesses some information. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER LYCOPOLES (Ἀλέξανδρος Λυκόπολης), was so called from Lyceopolis, in Egypt, whether as born there, or because he was bishop there, is uncertain. At first a pagan, he was next instructed in Manicheism by persons acquainted with Manes himself. Converted to the faith, he wrote a confutation of the heresy (Πραξιατικὸς Πλατώνος Μανιχαικοῦ) in Greek, which was first published by Comenius, with a Latin version, in the Auctoriem Numismatum Bull. a S. Petri. Pater. ii. pag. 3, &c. It is published also by Gallandi, Bull. Petri. vol. i. p. 78. He was bishop of Lycoopolis, (Plut. Epitome de Manich. op. Montfaucon, Bull. Cassin. p. 354,) and probably immediately preceded Melitius, (Le Quien, Oriens. xxx. vol. i. p. 597.) [A. J. G.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), the son of Lysmachus by an Odrysian woman, whom Polyxenus (his father) in n. c. 284, he fled into Asia with the widow of his brother, and solicited aid of Seleucus. A war ensued in consequence between Seleucus and Lysmachus, which terminated in the defeat and death of the latter, who was slain in battle in n. c. 281, in the plain of Coros in Phrygia. His body was brought to the town of Chersonesus, and there buried between Cardia and Pactya, where his tomb was remaining in the time of Pausanias. (i. 10, § 4, 5; Appian, Syr. 61.)

ALEXANDER I. (Ἀλέξανδρος), the tenth king of Macedonia, was the son of Amyntas I. When Megalazus sent to Macedonia, about n. c. 507, to demand earth and water, as a token of submission to Darius, Amyntas was still reigning. At a banquet given to the Persian envoys, the latter demanded the presence of the ladies of the court, and Amyntas, through fear of his guests, ordered them to attend. But when the Persians proceeded to offer indignities to them, Alexander caused them to retire, under pretence of arraying them more beautifully, and introduced in their stead some Macedonian youths, dressed in female attire, who slew the Persians. As the Persians did not return, Megalazus sent Bubares with some troops into Macedonia; but Alexander escaped the danger by giving his sister Gygene in marriage to the Persian general. According to Justin, Alexander succeeded his father in the kingdom soon after these events. (Herod. v. 17—21, viii. 136; Justin, vii. 2—4.) In n. c. 492, Macedonia was obliged to submit to the Persian general Mandonius (Herod. vi. 44); and in Xerxes’ invasion of Greece (n. c. 480), Alexander accompanied the Persian army. He gained the confidence of Mandonius, and was sent by him to Athens after the battle of Salamis, to propose peace to the Athenians, which he strongly recommended, under the conviction that it was impossible to contend with the Persians. He was unsuccessful in his mission; but though he continued in the Persian army, he was always secretly inclined to the cause of the Greeks, and informed them the night before the battle of Platæae of the intention of Mandonius to fight on the following day. (viii. 136, 140—143, ix. 44, 45.) He was alive in n. c. 465, when Clion recovered Thessos. (Plut. Cim. 14.) He was succeeded by Peiremenes II.

ALEXANDER I. (Ἀλέξανδρος), the sixteenth king of Macedonia, the eldest son of Amyntas II., succeeded his father in n. c. 369, and appears to have reigned nearly two years, though Diodorus assigns only one to his reign. While engaged in Thessaly in a war with Alexander of Pherae, a usurper rose up in Macedonia of the name of Potemly Alorites, whom Diodorus, apparently without good authority, calls a brother of the king. Pelopidas, being called in to mediate between them, left Alexander in possession of the kingdom, but took with him to Thebes several hostages; among whom, according to some accounts, was Philip, the youngest brother of Alexander, afterwards king of Macedonia, and father of Alexander the Great. But he had scarcely left Macedonia, before Alexander was murdered by Potemly Alorites, or according to Justin (vii. 5), through the intrigues of his mother, Barrycide.

Demosthenes (de fals. Leg. p. 492) names Apollophanes as one of the murderers. (Diod. xv. 60, 61, 67, 71, 77; Plut. Pelop. 26, 27; Athen. xiv. p. 629, d.; Aeschyl. de fals. Leg. p. 31, l. 39.)

ALEXANDER III. (Ἀλέξανδρος), king of Macedonia, surnamed the Great, was born at Pella, in the autumn of B. C. 356. He was the son of Philip II. and Olympias, and he inherited much of the natural disposition of both of his parents—the cool forethought and practical wisdom of his father, and the ardent enthusiasm and un- governable passions of his mother. His mother belonged to the royal house of Epeiros, and through her he traced his descent from the great hero Achilles. His early education was committed to Leonidas and Lysimachus, the former of whom was a relation of his mother's, and the latter an Acanianer. Leonidas early accustomed him to endure toil and hardship, but Lysimachus recommended himself to his royal pupil by obsequious flattery. But Alexander was also placed under the care of Aristotle, who acquired an influence over his mind and character, which is manifest to the latest period of his life. Aristotle wrote for his use a treatise on the art of government; and the clear and comprehensive views of the political relations of nations and of the nature of government, which Alexander shews in the midst of all his conquests, may fairly be ascribed to the lessons he had received in his youth from the greatest of philosophers. It is not impossible too that his love of discovery, which distinguishes him from the herd of vulgar conquerors, may also have been implanted in him by the researches of Aristotle. Nor was his physical education neglected. He was early trained in all manly and athletic sports; in horsemanship he excelled all of his age; and in the art of war he had the advantage of his father's instruction.

At the early age of sixteen, Alexander was entrusted with the government of Macedonia by his father, while he was obliged to leave his kingdom to march against Byzantium. He first distinguished himself, however, at the battle of Chaeronea (B. C. 338), where the victory was mainly owing to his impetuousness and courage.

On the murder of Philip (B. C. 336), just after he had made arrangements to march into Asia at the head of the confederate Greeks, Alexander ascended the throne of Macedon, and found himself surrounded by enemies on every side. Attalus, the uncle of Cleopatra, who had been sent into Asia by Permannon with a considerable force, aspired to the throne; the Greeks, roused by Demosthenes, threw off the Macedonian supremacy; and the barbarians in the north threatened his dominions. Nothing but the promptest energy could save him; but in this Alexander was never deficient. Attalus was seized and put to death. His head was hurled into the south of Greece overawed all opposition; Thebes, which had been most active against him, submitted when he appeared at its gates; and the assembled Greeks at the Isthmus of Corinth, with the sole exception of the Lacedaemonians, elected him to the command against Persia, which had previously been bestowed upon his father. Being now at liberty to reduce the barbarians of the north to obedience, he marched (early in B. C. 335) across mount Haemus, defeated the Triballi, and advanced as far as the Danube, which he crossed, and received emissaries from the Scythians and other nations. On his return, he marched westward, and subdued the Illyrians and Taulanti, who were obliged to submit to the Macedonian supremacy. While engaged in these distant countries, a report of his death reached Greece, and the Thessalians once more took up arms. But a terrible punishment awaited them. He advanced into Boeotia by rapid marches, and appeared before the gates of the city almost before the inhabitants had received intelligence of his approach. The city was taken by assault; all the buildings, with the exception of the house of Pindar, were levelled with the ground; most of the inhabitants was butchered, and the rest sold as slaves. Athens feared a similar fate, and sent an embassy deprecating his wrath; but Alexander did not advance further; the punishment of Thebes was a sufficient warning to Greece.

Alexander now directed all his energy to prepare for the expedition against Persia. In the spring of B. C. 334, he crossed over the Hellespont into Asia with an army of about 25,000 men. Of these 30,000 were foot and 3000 horse; and of the former only 12,000 were Macedonians. But he soon showed to have a force which no Persian king could resist. Darius, the reigning king of Persia, had no military skill, and could only hope to oppose Alexander by engaging the services of mercenary Greeks, of whom he obtained large supplies.

Alexander's first engagement with the Persians was on the banks of the Granicus, where they attempted to prevent his passage over it. Mennon, a Rhodian Greek, was in the army of the Persians, and had recommended them to withdraw as Alexander's army advanced, and lay waste the country; but this advice was not followed, and the Persians were defeated. Mennon was the ablest general that Darius had, and his death in the following year (B. C. 333) relieved Alexander from a formidable opponent. After the capture of Haliacarnassus, Mennon had collected a powerful fleet, in which Alexander was greatly deficient; he had taken many of the islands in the Aegean, and threatened Macedonia.

Before marching against Darius, Alexander thought it expedient to subdue the chief towns on the western coast of Asia Minor. The last event of importance in the campaign was the capture of Halicarnassus, which was not taken till late in the autumn, after a vigorous defence by Mennon. Alexander marched along the coast of Lydia and Pamphylia, and then northward into Phrygia and to Gordium, where he cut or untied the celebrated Gordian knot, which, it was said, was to be loosed only by the conqueror of Asia.

In B. C. 333, he was joined at Gordium by reinforcements from Macedonia, and commenced his second campaign. From Gordium he marched through the centre of Asia Minor into Cilicia to the city of Tarsus, where he nearly lost his life by a fever, brought on by his great exertions, or through throwing himself, when heated, into the cold waters of the Cydnus. Darius meantime had collected an immense army of 500,000, or 600,000 men, with 30,000 Greek mercenaries; but instead of waiting for Alexander's approach in the wide plain of Sochi, where he had been stationed for some time, and which was favourable to his numbers and the evolution of his cavalry, he advanced into the narrow plain of Issus, where defeat was almost inevitable. Darius had nearly reached this plain when Darius reached it; but as soon as he received intelligence of the movements of Darius, he retraced his steps. In the battle which followed the Persian army was defeated with dreadful slaughter. Darius took to flight, as soon as he saw his left wing routed, and escaped across the Euphrates by the ford of Thapsacus; but his mother, wife, and children fell into the hands of Alexander, who treated them with the utmost delicacy and respect. The battle of Issus, which was fought towards the close of n. c. 333, decided the fate of the Persian empire; but Alexander judged it prudent not to pursue Darius, but to subdue Phoenicia, which was especially formidable by its navy, and constantly threatened to attack the coasts of Greece and Macedonia. Most of the cities of Phoenicia submitted as he approached: Tyre alone refused to surrender. This city was not taken till the middle of n. c. 332, after an obstinate defence of seven months, and was fearfully punished by the slaughter of 8000 Tyrrians and the sale of 30,000 into slavery. Next followed the siege of Gaza, which again delayed Alexander two months, and afterwards, according to Josephus, he marched to Jerusalem, intending to punish the people for refusing to assist him, but he was diverted from his purpose by the appearance of the high priest, and pardoned the people. This story is not mentioned by Arrian, and rests on questionable evidence.

Alexander next marched into Egypt, which gladdily submitted to the conqueror, for the Egyptians had ever hated the Persians, who insulted their religion and violated their temples. In the beginning of the following year (n. c. 331), Alexander founded at the mouth of the western branch of the Nile, the city of Alexandria, which he intended should form the centre of commerce between the eastern and western worlds, and which soon more than realized the expectations of its founder. He now determined to visit the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and after proceeding from Alexandria along the coast to Paraconium, he turned southward through the desert and thus reached the temple. He was saluted by the priests as the son of Jupiter Ammon.

In the spring of the same year (n. c. 331), Alexander set out to meet Darius, who had collected another army. He marched through Phoenicia and Syria to the Euphrates, where he crossed at the ford of Thapsacus; from thence he proceeded through Mesopotamia, crossed the Tigris, and at length met with the immense hosts of Darius, said to have amounted to more than a million of men, in the plains of Gaugamela. The battle was fought in the month of October, n. c. 331, and ended in the complete defeat of the Persians, who suffered immense slaughter. Alexander pursued the fugitives to Arbela (Erbil), which place has given its name to the battle, and which was distant about fifty miles from the spot where it was fought. Darius, who had left the field of battle only in the day, fled to Ecbatana (Hamadan), in Media. Alexander was now the conqueror of Asia; and he began to assume all the pomp and splendour of an Asiatic despot. His adoption of Persian habits and customs tended doubtless to conciliate the affections of his new subjects, but these outward signs of eastern royalty were also accompanied by practices which had been only too familiar to personal tyrants: he exercised no control over his passions, and frequently gave way to the most violent and uncontrollable excesses.

From Arbela, Alexander marched to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, which all surrendered without striking a blow. He is said to have set fire to the palace of Persepolis, and, according to some accounts, in the revelry of a banquet, at the instigation of Thisis, an Athenian courtier.

At the beginning of n. c. 330, Alexander marched from Persepolis into Media, where Darius had collected a new force. On his approach, Darius fled through Rhaeae and the passes of the Elburz mountains, called by the ancients the Caspian Gates, into the Bactrian provinces. After stopping a short time at Ecbatana, Alexander pursued him through the deserts of Parthia, and had nearly reached him, when the unfortunate king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, and his associates. Alexander sent his body to Persepolis, to be buried in the tombs of the Persian kings. Bessus escaped to Bactria, and assumed the title of king of Persia. Alexander advanced into Hyrcania, in order to gain over the remnant of the Greeks of Darius's army, who were assembled there. After some negotiation he succeeded; they were all pardoned, and a great many of them taken into his pay. After spending fifteen days at Zunderaun, the capital of Parthia, he marched to the frontiers of Atropatis, which he entrusted to Satibrazus, the former satrap of the country, and set out on his march towards Bactria to attack Bessus, but had not proceeded far, when he was recalled by the revolt of Satibrazus. By incredible exertions he returned to Artacamae, the capital of the province, in two days' march: the satrap took to flight, and a new governor was appointed. Instead of resuming his march into Bactria, Alexander seems to have thought it more prudent to subdue the south-eastern parts of Arachosia, and accordingly marched into the country of the Drangae and Sarangae.

During the army's stay at Prophthasis, the capital of the Drangae, an event occurred, which shows the altered character of Alexander, and represents him in the light of a suspicious oriental despot by instincts, the son of his faithful general, Parmenion, and the foremost personal friend of Alexander, was accused of a plot against the king's life. He was accused by Alexander before the army, condemned, and put to death. Parmenion, who was at the head of an army at Ecbatana, was also put to death by command of Alexander, who feared lest he should attempt to revenge his son. Several other trials for treason followed, and many Macedonians were executed.

Alexander now advanced through the country of the Areiates to the Arachot, a people west of the Indus, whom he conquered. Their conquest and the complete subjugation of Arachia occupied the winter of this year. (n. c. 330.) In the beginning of the following year (n. c. 330), he crossed the mountains of the Paropamisus (the Hindoo Coonch), and marched into Bactria against Bessus. On the approach of Alexander, Bessus fled across the Oxus into Sogdiana. Alexander followed him, and transported his army across the river on the skins of the tents stuffed with straw.
ALEXANDER.

Shortly after the passage Bessus was betrayed into his hands, and, after being cruelly mutilated by order of Alexander, was put to death. From the Oxus Alexander advanced as far as the Jaxartes
(the Sir), which he crossed, and defeated several Scythian tribes north of that river. After falling a city Alexandria on the Jaxartes, he retracted his steps, recrossed the Oxus, and returned to Zaraia or Bactra, where he spent the winter of 329. It was here that Alexander killed his friend Cleitus in a drunken revel. [CLEITUS.]

In the spring of B.c. 328, Alexander again crossed the Oxus to complete the subjugation of Sogdiana, but was not able to effect it in the year, and accordingly went into winter quarters at Nautaen, a place in the middle of the province. At the beginning of the following year, B.c. 327, he took a mountain fortress, in which Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, had deposed his wife and daughter.
The beauty of Roxana, one of the latter, captivated the conqueror, and he accordingly married her with his wife. This marriage with one of his eastern subjects was in accordance with all his policy.
Having completed the conquest of Sogdia, Alexander marched southward into Bactra, and made preparations for the expedition of India.
While in Bactra, another conspiracy was discovered for the murder of the king. The plot was formed by Hermolaus with a number of the royal pages, and Callisthenes, a pupil of Aristotle, was involved in it. All the conspirators were put to death.

Alexander did not leave Bactria till late in the spring of B.c. 327, and crossed the Indus, proba-ably near the modern Attock. He now entered the country of the Punjub, or the Five Rivers.
Inchis, he then proceeded immediately east of the Indus, submitted to him, and thus he met with no resistance till he reached the Hydaspes, upon the opposite bank of which Pirus, an Indian king, was posted with a large army and a considerable number of elephants. Alexander managed to cross the river unperceived by the Indian king, and then an obstinate battle followed, in which Pirus was defeated after a gallant resistance, and his army driven back. Alexander restored to him his kingdom, and treated him with distinguished honour.

Alexander remained thirty days on the Hydaspes, during which time he founded two towns, one on each bank of the river: one was called Attock, the other (later called Abasa), a honour of his house Euphorbinus, who died here, after carrying him through so many victories; and the other Nicon, to commemorate his victory.

From thence he marched to the Acesines (the Jhelum), which he crossed, and subsequently to the Hydrosates (the Ravi), which he also crossed, attacking another Porus, who had prepared his army; but as he approached nearer, his army fled, and his dominions were given over to the one whom he had conquered on the Hydaspes. The Cethai, however, who also attacked the Hydrosates, offered a vigorous resistance, but were defeated. Alexander still pressed forward till he reached the Hyphasis (Sarn), which he was preparing to cross, when the Macedonians, worn out by long service, tired of the war, refused to proceed; and Alexander, notwithstanding his entreaties and prayers, was obliged to lead them back. He returned to the Hydaspes, where he had previously given orders for the building of a fleet, and then sailed down the river with about 8000 men, while the remainder marched along the banks in two divisions. This was late in the autumn of 327. The people on each side of the river submitted with out resistance, except the Malli, in the conquest of one of whose places Alexander was severely wounded. At the confluence of the Acesines and the Indus, Alexander founded a city, and left Philip as satrap, with a considerable body of Greeks. Here he built some fresh ships, and shortly afterwards sent about a third of the army, under Craterus, through the country of the Arcadoi and Drangae into Carmania. He himself continued his voyage down the Indus, opened a city at Pattala, the apex of the delta of the Indus, and sailed into the Indian ocean.

He seems to have reached the mouth of the Indus about the middle of 326. Necharus was sent with the fleet to sail along the coast to the Persian Gulf (NEACHARUS), and Alexander set out from Pattala, about September, to return to Persis. In his march through Gedrosia, his army suffered greatly from want of water and provisions, till they arrived at Purna, where they obtained supplies. From Purn he advanced to Carmen (Kizman), the capital of Carmania, where he was joined by Craterus, with his detachment of the army, and also by Necharus, who had accomplished the voyage in safety. Alexander sent the great body of the army, under Ho-phasis, along the Persian Gulf, while he himself, with a small force, marched to Pasargadae, and from thence to Persepolis, where he appointed Pomecas, a Macedonian, governor, in place of the former one, a Persian, whom he sent to death, for opposing the province.

From Persepolis Alexander advanced to Susa, which he reached in the beginning of 325. Here he allowed himself and his troops some rest from their labours; and faithful to his plan of forming his European and Asiatic subjects into one people, he assigned to about eighty of his generals Asiatic wives, and gave them rich dowries. He himself took a second wife, Barseme, the eldest daughter of Darus, and according to some accounts, a third, Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus. About 10,000 Macedonians also followed the example of their king and generals, and married Asiatic women; all those received presents from the king.

Alexander gave a free hand to his generals among his troops, and taught them the Macedonian military arts. He moreover directed his attention to the increase of commerce, and for this purpose had the Euphrates and Tigris made navigable, by removing the artificial obstructions which had been made in the river for the purpose of irrigation.

The Macedonians, who were discontented with several of the new arrangements of the king, and especially at his placing the Persians on an equality with themselves in many respects, rose in mutiny against him, which he quelled with some little difficulty, and he afterwards dismissed about 10,000 Macedonian veterans, who returned to Europe under the command of Craterus. Towards the close of the same year (B.c. 325) he went to Bactra, where he lost his great favourite Hophniestion; and his grief for his loss knew no bounds. From Babylon he marched to Babylon, subduing in his way the Cossæi, a mountain tribe; and before he reached Babylon, he was met by ambassadors from almost every part of the known world, who had come to do homage to the new conqueror of Asia.

Alexander reached Babylon in the spring of B.C. 324, about a year before his death, notwithstanding the warnings of the Chaldeans, who predicted evil to him if he entered the city at that time. He intended to make Babylon the capital of his empire, as the best point of communication between his eastern and western dominions. His schemes were numerous and gigantic. His first object was the conquest of Arabia, which was to be followed, it was said, by the subjugation of Italy, Carthage, and the west. But his views were not confined merely to conquest. He sent Heracleides to build a fleet on the Caspian, and to explore that sea, which was said to be connected with the northern ocean. He also intended to improve the distribution of waters in the Babylonian plain, and for that purpose sailed down the Euphrates to inspect the canal called Palcopeus. On his return to Babylon, he found the preparations for the Arabian expedition nearly complete; but almost immediately afterwards he was attacked by a fever, probably brought on by his recent exertions in the marshy districts around Babylon, and aggravated by the quantity of wine he had drunk at a banquet given to his principal officers. He died after an illness of eleven days, in the month of May or June, B.C. 323. He died at the age of thirty-two, after a reign of twelve years and eight months. He appointed no one as his successor, but just before his death he gave his ring to Perdiccas. Roxana was with child at the time of his death, and afterwards bore a son, who is known by the name of Alexander Eurydes. The history of Alexander forms an important epoch in the history of mankind. Unlike other Asiatic conquerors, his progress was marked by something more than devastation and ruin; at every step of his course the Greek language and civilization took root and flourished; and after his death Greek kingdoms were formed in all parts of Asia, which continued to exist for centuries. By his conquests the knowledge of mankind was increased; the sciences of geography, natural history and others, received vast additions; and it was through him that a road was opened to India, and that Europeans became acquainted with the products of the remote East.

No contemporary author of the campaigns of Alexander survives. Our best account comes from Arrian, who lived in the second century of the Christian era, but who drew up his history from the accounts of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and Aristobulus of Cassandria. The history of Quintus Curtius, Plutarch's life of Alexander, and the epitomes of Justin and Diodorus Siculus, were also compiled from earlier writers. The best modern writers on the subject are: St. Croix, Études critique des anciens Historiens d' Alexandre le Grand, Droysen, Geschichte Alexanders des Grossen; Williams, Life of Alexander; Thirlwall, History of Greece, vols. vi. and vii.

ALEXANDER IV. (Ἀλεξάνδρος), king of MACEDONIA, the son of Alexander the Great and Roxana, was born shortly after the death of his father, in B.C. 323. He was acknowledged as the partner of Philip Arrhidæus in the empire, and was under the guardianship of Perdiccas, the regent, till the death of the latter in B.C. 321. He was then for a short time placed under the guardianship of Pithon and the general Arrhidæus, and subsequently under that of Antipater, who conveyed him with his mother Roxana, and the king Philip Arrhidæus and his wife to Macedonia in 320. (Diod. xvii. 36, 39.) On the death of Antipater in 319, the government fell into the hands of Polysperchon; but Eurydice, the wife of Philip Arrhidæus, began to form a powerful party in Macedonia in opposition to Polysperchon; and Roxana, dreading her influence, fled with her son Alexander into Epirus, where Olympias had lived for a long time. At the instigation of Olympias, Aeneides, king of Epirus, made common cause with Polysperchon, and restored the young Alexander to Macedonia in 317. [Aeetes.] Eurydice and her husband were put to death, and the supreme power fell into the hands of Olympias. (xii. 11; Justin, xiv. 5.) But in the following year Cassander obtained possession of Macedonia, put Olympias to death, and imprisoned Alexander and his mother. They remained in prison till the general peace made in 311, when Alexander's title to the crown was recognized. Many of his partizans demanded that he should be immediately released from prison and placed upon the throne Cassander therefore resolved to get rid of so dangerous a rival, and caused him and his mother Roxana to be murdered secretly in prison. (B.C. 311. Diod. xiv. 51, 52, 61, 105; Justin, xx. 2. Pana. ix. 7. § 2.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), a Megalomachos. He was originally a Macedonian, but he received the franchise and was settled at Megale polis about B.C. 190. He pretended to be a descendant of Alexander the Great, and accordingly called his two sons Philip and Alexander. His daughter Apama was married to Amyntaeus, king of the Aethamians. Her eldest brother Philip, followed her to her court, and being of vain character, he allowed himself to be tempted with the prospect of gaining possession of the throne of Macedonia. (Liv. xxxv. 47; Appian, Syr. 13; comp. Philip, son of Alexander.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), brother of Mol. On the accession of Antiochus III., afterward called the Great, in B.C. 224, he entrusted Ale- ander with the government of the satrapies of Persia and Mol. received Media. Antiochus was the only fifteen years of age, and this circumstanee together with the fact that Hermias, a base flatterer and crafty intriguer, whom every one had fear, was all-powerful at his court, induced the two brothers to form the plan of causing the app satrapies of the kingdom to revolt. It was the object of Hermias to see the king involved in as many difficulties as possible, and it was on l advice that the war against the rebels was entrusted to men without courage and ability. In * Ec.

220, however, Antiochus himself undertook the command. Men were deserted by his mother of a to avoid falling into the hands of the king, put an end to his own life. All the leaders of the rebellion followed his example, and one of them, who escaped to Persia, killed Molo’s mother and children, persuaded Alexander to put an end to his life, and at last killed himself upon the borders of his life. (Polyb. v. 40, 41, 43, 54.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος) of MYNDUS in Cilicia, a Greek writer on zoology of uncertain date. His works, which are now lost, must have been considered very valuable by the ancients, since they refer to them very frequently. The titles of his works are: Περὶ γαστρίκων, a long fragment of which, belonging to the second book, is quoted by Athenaeus. (v. p. 221, comp. ii. p. 65; Aelian, Hist. An. iii. 23, iv. 32, v. 27, x. 34.) This work is probably the same as that which in other passages is simply called Περὶ ζώων, and of which Athenaeus (ix. p. 392) likewise quotes the second book. The work on birds (Περὶ πτερυγίων, Plut. Mar. 17; Athen. ix. pp. 387, 388, 390, &c.) was a separate work, and the second book of it is quoted by Athenaeus. Diogenes Laertius (i. 29) mentions one Alexander of Myndus who wrote a work on myths, of which he quotes the ninth book. This author being otherwise unknown, Menage proposed to read Ἀλεξάνδρος νῦν Μύδιος instead of Ἀλεξάνδρος. But everything is uncertain, and the conjecture at least is not very probable. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER NUMENIUS (Ἀλεξάνδρος Νομενίου, or Νομανίου, as Suidas calls him), a Greek rhetorician, who lived in the reign of Hadrian or that of the Antonines. About his life nothing is known. We possess two works which are ascribed to him. The one which certainly is his work bears the title Περὶ τῶν τῆς Διαμοίωσις καὶ Ἀλεξάνδρου Σχετικῶν, i.e. De Figuris Sententiarum et Elucubrationum.” J. Runesius in his work on the same subject (p. 195, ed. Rahnken) expressly states that Aquila Romanus, in his treatise “De Figuris Sententiarum et Elucubrationum,” took his materials from Alexander Numenius’ work mentioned above. The second work bearing the name of Alexander Numenius, entitled Περὶ ἐκδηκτικῶν, i.e. “On Show-speeches,” is admitted on all hands not to be his work, but of a later grammarian of the name of Alexander; it is, to speak more correctly, made up very clumsily from two distinct ones, one of which was written by one Alexander, and the other by Memander. (Vales. ad Euseb. Hist. Eccl. p. 28.)

The first edition of these two works is that of Aldus, in his collection of the *Rhetores Graeci, Venice, 1508, fol., vol. i. p. 574, &c. They are also contained in Wale’s *Rhetores Graeci, vol. viii. The genuine work of Alexander Numenius has also been edited, together with Minucianus and Phoehammon, by L. Normann, with a Latin translation and useful notes. Upsala, 1690, 8vo. (See Rahnken, ad April. Rom. p. 133, &c.; Wester-}

ALEXANDER, an Athenian PÄINTER, one of whose compositions is extant painted on a marble tablet which bears his name. (Winckelmann, vol. ii. p. 47, v. p. 120, ed. Sieclein.) There was a son of king Perseus of this name, who was a skilful toretes. (Plut. Aemil. Paul. 37.) There was also a M. Lollius Alexander, an engraver, whose name occurs in an inscription in Dami, p. 319, No. 14. [C. P. M.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), the PHILHAGONIAN, a celebrated impostor, who flourished about the beginning of the second century (Lucian, Aet. 6), a native of Abonotichos on the Euxine, and the pupil of a friend of Apollonius Tyaneus. His history, which is told by Lucian with great naïveté, is chiefly an account of the various contrivances by which he established and maintained the credit of an oracle. Being, according to Lucian’s account, at his wit’s end for the means of life, with many natural advantages of manner and person, he determined on the following imposture. After missing the expectations of the Paphlogonians with a reported visit of the god Aeceleus, and giving himself out, under the sanction of an oracle, as a descendant of Perseus, he gratified the expectation which he had himself raised, by finding a serpent, which he juggled out of an egg, in the foundations of the new temple of Aeceleus. A larger serpent, which he brought with him from Pella, was disguised with a human head, until the dull Paphlogonians really believed that a new god Gleyon had appeared among them, and gave oracles in the likeness of a serpent. Dark and crowded rooms, juggling tricks, and the other arts of magical magicians, were the chief means used to impress on a credulous populace, which Lucian detects with as much zest as any modern sceptic in the marvels of animal magnetism. Every one who attempted to expose the impostor, was accused of being a Christian or Epicurean; and even Lucian, who amused himself with his contradictory oracles, hardly escaped the effects of his malignity. He had his spies at Rome, and busied himself with the affairs of the whole world: at the time when a pestilence was raging, many were executed at his instigation, as the authors of this calamity. He said, that the soul of Pythagoras had migrated into his body, and prophesied that he should live a hundred and fifty years, and then die from the fall of a thunderbolt; unfortunately, an ulcer in the leg put an end to his imposture in the seventieth year of his age, just as he was in the height of his glory, and had requested the emperor to have a medal struck in honour of himself and the now god. The influence he attained over the populace seems incredible; indeed, the narrative of Lucian would appear to be a mere romance, were it not confirmed by some medals of Antoninus and M. Aurelius. [B. J.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος) of PAPHNUS, a Greek writer on mythology of uncertain date. Basedattus (ad Hom. Od. x. pp. 1658, 1713) refers to him as his authority. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), native of PAPHNUS (Ἀπάφνοι), a Greek rhetorician of the age of the Antonines, was a son of Alexander of Seleucia, in Glicia, and of Seleucus. (Philostor. Vit. Sph. ii. 5, § 1, compared with Epist. Apollon. Tyana, 13, where the father of Alexander Paphno-
ALEXANDER.

Alexander worshipped as a god the spear with which he slew his uncle. (Plut. Pelo. p. 293, &c.; Wess. ad Diol. l. c.) Alexander governed tyrannically, and according to Diodorus (l. c.), differently from the former rulers, but Polyphron, at least, seems to have set him the example. (Xen. l. c.) The Thessalian states, however, which had acknowledged the authority of Jason the Tangus (Xen. Hell. vi. 1. § 4, 5, &c.; Diol. xv. 60), were not so willing to submit to the oppression of Alexander the tyrant, and they applied therefore (and especially the old family of the Alcandae of Larissa, who had been driven out by them) to Alexander, king of Macedon, son of Amyntas 11. The tyrant, with his characteristic energy, prepared to meet his enemy in Macedonia, but the king anticipated him, and, reaching Larissa, was admitted into the city, obliged the Thessalian Alexander to flee to Pharsæ, and left a garrison in Larissa, as well as in Crannon, which had also come over to him. (Diol. xv. 61.) But the Macedonian having retired, his friends in Thessaly, dreading the vengeance of Alexander, sent for aid to Thebes, the policy of which state, of course, was to check a neighbour who might otherwise become so formidable, and Pelopidas was accordingly despatched to Thessaly to strengthen the garrison; whence according to Diodorus (xv. 67) he dislodged the Macedonian garrison, Alexander presented himself and offered submission; but soon after escaped by flight, alarmed by the indignation which Pelopidas expressed at the tales he heard of his cruelty and tyrannical profligacy. (Diol. l. c.; Plut. Pelo. p. 291, d.) These events appear to be referable to the early part of the year 368. In the summer of that year Pelopidas was again sent into Thessaly, in consequence of fresh complaints against Alexander. Accompanied by Ismenius, he went merely as a negociator, and without any military force, and venturing incautiously within the power of the tyrant, was seized by him and thrown into prison. (Diol. xv. 71; Plut. Pol. p. 292, &c; Polyb. viii. 1.) The language of Demosthenes (c. Aristoc. p. 660) will hardly support Mitford's inference, that Pelopidas was taken prisoner in battle. (See Mitford, Gr. Hist. ch. 27, sect. 5.) The Thebans sent a large army into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas, but they could not keep the field against the superior cavalry of Alexander, who, aided by auxiliaries from Athens, pursued them with great slaughter; and the destruction of the whole Theban army is said to have been averted only by the ability of Epanomondas, who was serving in the campaign, but not as general.

The next year, 367, was signalized by a specimen of Alexander's treacherous cruelty, in the massacre of the citizens of Scotussa (Plut. Pol. p. 293; Diol. xv. 75; Paus. vi. 5); and also by another expedition of the Thebans under Epanomondas into Thessaly, to effect the release of Pelopidas. According to Plutarch, the tyrant did not dare to offer resistance, and was glad to purchase even 30 days' truce by the delivery of the prisoners (Plut. Pol. pp. 298, 294; Diol. xv. 75.) During the next three years Alexander would seem to have renewed his attempts against the states of Thessaly, especially those of Magnesia and Phthiotis (Plut. Pol. p. 295, a), for at the end of that time, b. c. 364, we find them again applying to Thebes for protection against him. The army appointed to march under Ptolomæus is said to have been dismayed by an eclipse (June 15, 304), and Ptolomæus, leaving it behind, entered Thebes at the head of three hundred volunteer horsemen and some mercenaries. A battle ensued at Cynœphonæa, wherein Ptolomæus was himself slain, but defeated Alexander (Plut. Pel. pp. 295, 296; Diod. xv. 80); and this victory was closely followed by another of the Thebans under Mæleites and Diogiton, who obliged Alexander to restore to the Thessalians the conquered towns, to confine himself to Phæra, and to be a dependent ally of Thebes. (Plut. Pel. p. 297, &c.; Diod. xv. 80; comp. Xen. Hell. vii. 5. 4.)

The death of Epaminondas in 362, if it freed Athens from fear of Thebes, appears at the same time to have exposed her to annoyance from Alexander, who, as though he felt that he had no further occasion for keeping up his Athenian alliance, made a plausible descent on Tenedos and others of the Cyclades, plundering them, and making slaves of the inhabitants. Papparetus too he besieged, and "even landed troops in Attic itself, and seized the port of Panormus, a little eastward of Sunium." Leosthenes, the Athenian admiral, defeated him, and relieved Papparetus, but Alexander delivered his men from blockade in Panormus, took several Attic triremes, and plundered the Piræus. (Diod. xv. 95; Polyæn. VI. 2; Demosth. c. Polyb. pp. 1207, 1208; περὶ στράτος τῆς τριπόρ. p. 1330; Thrivyll, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 209: but for another account of the position of Panormus, see Xen. Alex. 1. c.)

The murder of Alexander is assigned by Diodorus to Thebe. (c. 80.) This gives a more detailed account of it, containing a lively picture of a semi-barbarian palace. Guards watched throughout all the night, except at the tyrant's bedchamber, which was situated at the top of a ladder, and at the door of which a ferocious dog was chained. Thebe, the wife and cousin of Alexander, and daughter of Jason (Plut. Pel. p. 293, &c.), on learning she had three brothers in the house during the day, caused the dog to be removed when Alexander had retired to rest, and having covered the steps of the ladder with wool, brought up the young men to her husband's chamber. Though she had taken away Alexander's sword, they feared to set about his deed till she threatened to awake him and discover all; they then entered and despatched him. His body was cast forth into the streets, and exposed to every indignity. On Thebe's motive for the murder different accounts are given. Plutarch states it to have been fear of her husband, together with hatred of his cruel and brutal character, and ascribes these feelings principally to his representations of Ptolomæus, when she visited him in his prison. In Cicero the deed is ascribed to jealousy. (Plut. Pel. pp. 293, b, 297, d; Diod. xvi. 14; Xen. Hell. vi. 4. § 87; Cic. de Off. 7. See also Cic. de Inv. ii. 49, where Alexander's murder illustrates a knotty point for special pleading; also Aristop. op. Cic. de Div. i. 25; in dream of Bedemus.)

ALEXANDER PHILALETHES ('Αλέξανδρος Φιλαλθής), an ancient Greek physician, who was called by Octavius Herennianus (Liv. p. 102, 4. ed. quæst. 1532), Alexander Anaxi-Megara, and who probably the same person who is quoted by Nicæus Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 1, p. 74) under the name of Alexander Loothecius. He lived probably towards the end of the first century before Christ, as Strabo speaks of him (xii. p. 380) as a contemporary; he was a pupil of Aesculapius (Octav. Hornt. l.c.) succeeded Zeuxis on the head of a celebrated Herophilæan school of medicine, established in Phrygia between Laodicea and Cæsarea (Strab. l.c.), and was tutor to Aristoxenus and Demosthenes Philalethès. (Galen. De Differ. Puls. iv. 4, 10, vol. vii. pp. 737, 746.) He is several times mentioned by Galen and also by Seraunus (De Arte Obstetr. c. 93, p. 210), and appears to have written some medical works, which are no longer extant. [W. A. G.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), was appointed governor of Phocis by Philip III. of Macedonia. The Phocian town of Phainomus was commanded by Jason, to whom he had entrusted this post. In concert with him he invited the Aetolians to come and take possession of the town, promising that it should be opened and surrendered to them. The Aetolians, under the command of Aegastas, accordingly entered the town at night; and when their best men were within the walls, they were made prisoners by Alexander and his associates. This happened in B.C. 317. (Polyb. v. 96.; L. S.)

ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR. [ALEXANDER CORNELIUS.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), son of Polyperchon, the Macedonian. The regent Antipater, on his death (B.C. 320), left the regency to Polyperchon, to the exclusion and consequent discontent of his own son, Cassander. (Diod. xviii. 49; Plut. Phoc. p. 755, E.) The chief men, who had been placed in authority by Antipater in the guardianship of the infant Alexander, were Cassander, as his patron's son, and Polyperchon's policy, therefore, was to reverse the measures of Antipater, and restore democracy where it had been abolished by the latter. It was then, in the prosecution of this design, that his son Alexander was sent to Athens, b.c. 318, with the alligned object of delivering the city from Nicon, who by Cassander's appointment commanded the garrison placed by Antipater in Munychia. (Plut. Phoc. 755, f. 756, e; Diod. xviii. 65.) Before his arrival, Nicon, hedging strengthening himself with fresh troops in Munychia, had also treacherously seized the Piræus. To occupy these two ports himself soon appeared to be no less the intention of Alexander,—an intention which he had probably formed before any communication with Phocion, though Diodorus (l.c.) does not appear to imply the contrary. The Athenians, however, looked on Phocion as the author of the design, and their suspicions and anger being excited by the private conferences of Alexander with Nicon, Phocion was accused of treason, and, fleeing with several of his friends to Alexander, was by him despatched to Polypérchon. (Diod. xviii. 66; Plut. Phoc. 756, f. 757, a.) Cassander, arriving at Athens soon after and occupying the Piræus, was there besieged by Polypérchon with a large force; but the supplies of the latter being inadequate, he was obliged to withdraw a portion of his army, with which he went to attempt the reduction of Megalopolis, while Alexander was left in command of the remnant at Athens. (Diod. xviii. 68.) Here he appears to have continued without effecting anything, till the treaty and capitulation of Athens with Cassander (Paus. i. 25; Diod. xviii. 74) gave the city to the power of the latter.
ALEXANDER.

When Polyperchon, baffled at Megalopolis (Diod. xvi. 72), withdrew into Macedon, his son seems to have been left with an army in Peloponnesus, where, as we read in Diodorus (xix. 69), the field was left open and the flocks unguarded. He was alarmed by the departure of Cassander into Macedon on the intelligence of the murder of Arrhidæus and Eurydice by Olympias, b. c. 317. (Paus. i. 11; Diod. xix. 11.) During his absence, Alexander succeeded in bringing over to himself several cities and important places in the Peloponnesus (Diod. xix. 58); but, on Cassander's return to the south, after crushing Olympias in Macedon, he in vain attempted to check him by his fortification of the isthmus, for Cassander, passing to Epidaurus by sea, regained Argos and Hermione, and afterwards also the Messenian towns, with the exception of Ithome. (Diod. xix. 54.)

In the next year, 315, Antigonus (whose ambition and successes in the east had united against him Cassander, Lysimachus, Asander, and Polyæus Soter) among other measures, sent Aristodemus into the Peloponnesus to form a league of amity with Polyperchon and Alexander; and the latter was persuaded by Aristodemus to pass over to Asia for a personal conference with Antigonus. Finding him at Tyre, a treaty was made between them, and Alexander returned to Greece with a present of 500 talents from Antigonus, and a multitude of magnificent promises. (Diod. xix. 60, 61.) Yet, in the very same year, we find him renouncing his alliance with Antigonus, and bribed by the title of governor of the Peloponnesus to reconcile himself to Cassander. (Diod. xix. 64.)

In the ensuing year, 314, we read of him as engaged for Cassander in the siege of Cyllene, which however was raised by Aristodemus and his Aetolian auxiliaries. After the return of Aristodemus to Aetolia, the citizens of Dyne, in Achaia, having bestowed the citadel, which was occupied by one of Cassander's garrisons, Alexander forced his way into the city, and made himself master of it, punishing the adverse party with death, imprisonment, or exile. (Diod. xix. 66.) Very soon after this he was murdered at Sicyon by Alexion, a Sicyonian, leaving the command of his forces to one who proved himself fully adequate to the task,—his wife Cratespilis. (b. c. 314, Diod. xix. 67.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλεξάνδρος), a Rhodian. In the war against Cassius he was at the head of the popular party, and was rashly to the office of praetor, b. c. 43. (Appian, de Bell. Civ. iv. 66.) But soon after, he and the Rhodian admirals, Mains, were defeated by Cassius in a sea-fight off Cnidus. (Appian, de Bell. Civ. iv. 71.)

ALEXANDER (ST.), bishop of Rome, A. D. 109—119. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 4.) There are three Epistles falsely ascribed to him by Isidore Mercator, as well as a deacon, according to Gratian. (Mansi, Concil., vol. i. pp. 643—647.) Heracleon is said (in the book Praeconianus, ap. Siron. Opp. vol. i. p. 470) to have broken his heresy in Syria in the time of St. Alexander, and to have been confuted by him. But Heracleon was not, perhaps, yet born.

p. 198), and also under another person, whose name he does not mention, but to whose son Cosmas he dedicates his chief work (xii. 1. p. 313), which he wrote out of gratitude at his request.
He was a man of an extensive practice, of a very long experience and great reputation, not only at Rome, but wherever he travelled in Spain, Gaul, and Italy (l. 15. pp. 156, 157), whence he was called by way of eminence "Alexander the Physician." Agathias speaks also with great praise of his four brothers, Anthemius, Dioscorus, Metrodorus, and Olympius, who were all eminent in their several professions. Alexander is not a mere compiler, like Aetius, Oribasius, and others, but is an author of quite a different stamp, and has more the air of an original writer. He wrote his great work (as he tells us himself, xii. 1. p. 313) in an extreme old age, from the results of his own experience, when he could no longer bear the fatigue of practice. His style in the main, says Freind, is very good, short, clear, and (as to use his own terms
p. 313) is full of concise expressions; and though (through a mixture of some foreign words occasioned perhaps by his travels) it not always perfectly elegant, yet very expressive and intelligible.
Fabricius considers Alexander to have belonged to, the sect of the Methodists, but in the opinion of Freind this is not proved sufficiently by the passages adduced. The weakest and most curious part of his practice appears to be his belief in charms and amulets, some of which may be quoted as specimens. For a quotation agree, "A gather in olive leaf before sun-rise, write on it with common ink κα, με, σ, and hang it round the neck." (xii. 7. p. 539); for the got, " Write on a thin plate of gold, during the waning of the moon, με, με, με, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, ψ, and wear it round the anus; pronouncing also λα, λα, λα, σελε, σελε, και, και, και, και, και, και, και, the moon is in Libra, but it is much better
she should be in Leo." (Ibid.) In exercising the got (ibid. p. 314) he says, "I adjure thee by the great name Iao Zαααααααααααααααααααααααа, that is, Ἰησοῦς Ναζαρέτου, and a little further on, "I adjure thee by the holy names Iao, Zαααααααααααααααααααααααа, Ἀδωνα, Ἐχαλία, at is, Ἰησοῦς Ναζαρέτου, of Trichonion in Aetolia, was commander of the Aetolians in n. c. 218 and 219. He attacked the rear of the army of Philip on his return from Thessaly, but the attempt was unsuccessful, and many Aetolians fell. (Polyb. v. 13.)

ALEXANDER ZEBINA or ZABINAS ("Αλέξανδρος Ζεβίνας"), the son of a merchant named Protorus, was set up by Ptolemy Phasaen, king of Egypt, as a pretender to the crown of the Greek kingdom of Syria shortly after the death of Antiochus Sidetes and the return of Demetrius Nicator from his captivity among the Parnithians.
(n. c. 128.) Antioch, Apamea, and several other cities, disgusted with the tyranny of Demetrius, acknowledged the authority of Alexander, who pretended to have been adopted by Antiochus Sidetes; but he never succeeded in obtaining power over the whole of Syria. In the earlier part of the year 125 he defeated Demetrius, who fled to Tyre and was there killed; but in the middle of the same year Alexander's patron, the king of Egypt, set up against him Antiochus Grypus, a son of Demetrius, by whom he was defeated in battle. Alexander fled to Antioch, where he attempted to plunder the temple of Jupiter, in order from which he would appear to have been either a Jew or a Christian, and, from his frequently prescribing rince's flux, it is most probable that he was a Christian. His chief work, entitled Επιστολαί Ἡβριτι εἰς Ἰουδαίους (Epistles to the Hebrews in Greek), was published in Greek with a new translation by Jo. Guinther Andermann, vll. 1558, with a rare and valuable Quintus's translation has been several emended, and is inserted by H. Stephens in Medicae Artis Principes, Paris, 1567, fol.; it forms part of Haller's Collection of Medical Hera, Lissamn, 1772, 8vo. 2 vol. The other work of Alexander's that is still extant is a short treatise, Περὶ Ἐπίλουν τοῦ Δουλικοῦ, which was first published in Greek and Latin by Hieron.
Marchialis, Venet. 1570, 4to. It is also inserted in his work De Morbis Puerperarum, Francof. 1584, 4vo, and in the tenth volume of the old edition of Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca; the Latin translation alone is included in Haller's Collection mentioned above.
An Arabian translation is mentioned by Dr. Sprunger in his dissertation De Originibus Medicinæ Arabicae sub Khalisipta, Lugd. Bat. 1840, 8vo.; and also by J. G. Weitrich, De Authorum Graecorum Versiones et Commentariorum Syraceti, Arabici, Armeniaci, Persicarum, Lips. 1842, 8vo.
Alexander seems also to have written several other medical works which are now lost. He expresses his intention of writing a book on Fractures, and also on Wounds of the Head. A treatise on Urine written by him is alluded to by Joannes Actuarius (De Urin. Diat. c. 2. p. 43), and he himself mentions a work of his on Diseases of the Eyes, which was translated into Arabic; (Sprunger, Weitrich, &c.) The other medical treatise on Pleurisy, which is said to have been also translated into Arabic, was probably only the sixth book of his great work, which is entirely devoted to the consideration of this disease. A very full account of the life and works of Alexander Trallianus was published at London, 1724, 8vo., by Edward Mid-ward, M.D., entitled "Tralliania Reviviscens; or,
An Account of Alexander Trallian, one of the Greek Writers that flourished after Galen; shewing that these Authors are far from deserving the imputation of more compilers," &c. Two other medical works which are sometimes attributed to Alexander Trallianus (viz. a Collection of Medical and Physiological Problems, and a treatise on Fevers) are not noticed under Alexander Aphrodisiennes. (Freind's Hist. of Physic, whose words have been sometimes cæ, tom. i.; Sprungel, Hist. de la Méd. tom. ii.;

ALEXIA, to pay his troops; but the people rose against him and drove him out of the city. He soon fell into the hands of robbers, who delivered him up to Antiochus, by whom he was put to death, B.C. 122. He was weak and effeminate, but sometimes generous. His surname, Zohina, which means "a purchased slave," was applied to him as a term of reproach, from a report that he had been bought by Ptolemy as a slave. Several of his coins are extant. In the one figured below Jupiter is represented on the reverse, holding in the right hand a small image of victory. (Justin, xxxix. 1, 21; Joseph, Antiq. xiii. 9, 10; Clinton, Fasti, iii. p. 334.) [P. S.]

ALEXANDRA. [CASSANDRA.] ALEXANDRIDES (Ἀλεξάνδρις) of Delphi, a Greek historian of uncertain date. If we may judge from the subjects on which his history is quoted as an authority, it would seem that his work was a history of Delphi. (Plut. Lycaon. 18; Schol. ad Eurip. Acest. 1, where undoubtedly the same person is meant, though the MS. reading is Anaxandrides; Schol. ad Aristoph. Plunt. 926. [L. S.]

ALEXANOR (Ἀλεξάνωρ), a son of Macham, and grandson of Aeschylus, who built to his sire a temple at Titane in the territory of Sicyon. He himself too was worshipped there, and sacrifices were offered to him after sunset only. (Paus. ii. 23, § 4, 11, § 6, &c.) [L. S.]

ALEXARCHUS (Ἀλεξάρχος), a Greek historian, who wrote a work on the history of Italy (ἸταλΩδική), of which Plutarch (Parallel. 7) quotes the third book. Servius (ad Aen. iii. 334) mentions an opinion of his respecting the origin of the names Epireus and Campania, which unquestionably belonged to his work on Italy. The writer of this name, whom Plutarch mentions in another passage (De Is. et Os. p. 356), is probably a different person. [L. S.]

ALEXARCHUS (Ἀλεξάρχος). 1. A brother of Cassander of Macedon, who is mentioned as the founder of a town called Uranopolis, the site of which is unknown. Here he is said to have introduced a number of words of his own coinage, which, though very expressive, appear to have been regarded as a kind of slang. (Athen. iii. p. 98.) 2. A Corinthian, who, while the Macedonians were fortifying Duceleia in Attica, B.C. 413, and were sending an expedition to Sicily, was entrusted with the command of 600 hoplites, with whom he joined the Sicilian expedition. (Thucyd. vii. 19.) [L. S.]

ALEXIAS (Ἀλεξίας), an ancient Greek physician, who was a pupil of Thrasyas of Mantinea, and lived probably about the middle of the fourth century before Christ. Theophratus mentions him as having lived shortly before his time (Hist. Plant. ix. 16, § 8), and speaks highly of his abilities and acquirements. [W. A. G.]

ALEXIPHACUS (Ἀλεξίφακος), the averter of evil, is a surname given by the Greeks to several deities, as—Zeus (Orph. De Lapid. Proem. 1)—to Apollo, who was worshipped under this name by the Athenians, because he was believed to have stopped the plague which raged at Athens in the time of the Peloponnesian war (Paus. 1. 3, § 3, viii. 41, § 5)—and to Hercules. (Lactantius, div. Rer. 3.) [L. S.]

ALEXICLES (Ἀλεξίκλες), an Athenian general, who belonged to the oligarchical or Macedonian party at Athens. After the revolution of B.C. 411, he and several of his friends quitted the city and went to their friends at Duceleia. But he was afterwards made prisoner in Poinenes, and sentenced to death for his participation in the guilt of Phrynichus. (Thucyd. vii. 52; Lycurg. et Lseor. p. 164.) [L. S.]

ALEXICRATES (Ἀλεξίκρατος), a Pythagorean philosopher who lived at the time of Plutarch, and whose disciples continued to observe the ancient diet of the Pythagoreans, abstaining from fish altogether. (Plut. Sermone. viii. p. 726.) Another person of this name occurs in Plutarch, Periv. 75. [L. S.]

ALEXIDA (Ἀλεξίδα), a daughter of Amphiarus, from whom certain divinities called Elassi (Ἐλασσίοι, i.e. the averters of epileptic fits) were believed to be descended. (Plut. Quest. Gr. 23.) [L. S.]

ALEXYNUS (Ἀλεξύνος), a philosopher of the Dialectic or Megarian school and a disciple of Eubulides (Εὐβολίδης), from his eristic propensities facetiously named Εὐβολικος, who lived about the beginning of the third century before Christ. He was a native of Elis, and a contemporary of Zeno. From Elia he went to Olympia, in the view of his fame, is said, of founding a sect which might be called the Olympian; but his disciples soon became disgusted with the unhealthiness of the place and the scanty means of subsistence, and left him with a single attendant. None of his doctrine have been preserved to us, but from the brief mention made of him by Cicero (Acad. ii. 24), I seem to have dealt in sophistical puzzles, like the rest of his sect. Athenaeus (xx. p. 696e) mentions a poem which he wrote in honour of Craterus, the Macedonian, and which was sung at Delphi to the sound of the lyre. Alexanderus Al wrote against Zeno, whose professional antagonist he was, and against Euphorus the historian. Diogen Laertius has preserved some lines on his death which was occasioned by his being pierced with a reed while swimming in the Alpheus. (Di. Lact. ii. 109, 110.) [B. J.]

ALEXION, an ancient physician, who was probably (juggling from his name) a native of Greece he was a friend of Cicero, who praises his medical skill, and deeply laments his sudden death, B.C. 44. (Ad Att. vii. 2, iii. 23, xx. 1. d. 2.) [W. A. C.

ALEXIPPUS (Ἀλέξιππος), an ancient Greek physician, who is mentioned by Plutarch (Att. c. 41) as having received a letter from Alexander himself, to thank him for having cured Ptolemy one of his officers, of an illness probably about B.C. 327. [W. A. G.]

ALEXIS (Ἀλέξις). 1. A comic poet, born Thriss, in Magna Graecia (Suidas s. v. A.). admitted subsequently to the privileges of ALEXIS ('Αλέξιος), a sculptor and statuary, mentioned by Pliny (xxiv. 8. 19) as one of the pupils of Polycleitus. Pausanias (vi. 3, § 3) mentions an artist of the same name, a native of Creon, and father of the sculptor Chresilas. It cannot be satisfactorily settled whether these are the same, or different persons. Pliny's account implies that he had the elder Polycleitus in view, in which case Alexis could not have flourished later than Ol. 95 (n. c. 400), whereas Eutychides, under whom Canthus studied, flourished about Ol. 120, b. c. 300. (Pliny, H. N. xxiv. 8. 19.) If the two were identical, as Thiersch (Epochen der bild. Kunst, p. 276) thinks, we must suppose either that Pliny made a mistake, and that Alexis studied under the younger Polycleitus, or else that the Eutychides, whose date is given by Pliny, was not the artist under whom Canthus studied.

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS I. COMNENUS ('Αλέξιος ο Κομνηνός) (n. c. 1048), emperor of Constantinople, was probably born in n. c. 1048. He was the son of John Commnenus, and was educated in the house of the emperor Isaac Comnenus, and received a careful education from his mother Anna. He accompanied the emperor Romanus Diogenes in the war against Alp-Aralan, sultan of the Turks-Seljuks, and was present at the battle of Malazkurd, where this emperor was made a prisoner by the sultan. After the deposition of Romanus Diogenes in 1071, Alexis Commnenus and his elder brother Isaac joined the party of the new emperor, Michael VII. Ducas, who employed Alexis against the rebels who had produced great disturbances in Asia Minor. In this war Alexis distinguished himself as a successful general, and showed that extraordinary shrewdness which afterwards became the principal feature of his character. He defended Michael VII. against the rebel Niephorus Botaniates, but the cause of Michael becoming hopeless, he readily joined the victorious rebel, who became emperor under the title of Niephorus III. in 1077. The authority of Niephorus III. was disobeyed by several rebels, among whom Niephorus Byrinnias in Epirus was the most dangerous; but Alexis defeated them one after the other, and the grateful emperor conferred upon him the title of "Sebastos." Alexis was then considered as the first general of the Byzantine empire, but his military renown made him suspected in the eyes of the emperor, who kept him at Constantinople and tried to get rid of him by base intrigues. But Alexis opposed intrigues to intrigues, and as he was not only the most gallant, but also the most useful among his shrewd countrymen, he outdid the emperor, who at last gave orders, that his eyes should be put out. Alexis now fled to the army on the Danube, and was proclaimed emperor by the troops. Assisted by his brother Isaac, who acted with great generosity, Alexis marched to Constantinople, obtained possession of the city by a stratagem, deposed the emperor, and ascended the throne in 1081. The Byzantine empire was then at the point of ruin. While Alexis carried on the war against the rebel Niephorus Byrinnias, and afterwards during his forced sojourn at Constantinople, and the time of his differences with Niephorus III., Melek-Shah, sultan of Alp-Aralan, and the greatest prince of the Seljuks, had conquered the Byzantine part of Asia Minor, which he ceded to his cousin Selimân. The Bulgarians threatened to
The life of Alexis has been carefully, though very partially, described by his daughter, Anna Comnena, in her Alexias, which is the principal source concerning this emperor. (Comp. Glycias, p. 4; Albertus Aquensis, li. 6-10; Wilhelmus Tyronis, ii. 5, 23; comp. S. F. Wilken, "Rerum ab Alexis I., Ioanne, Manuele et Alexio II. Comnenis gesta- rum libri quator," Heidelberg, 1811.) [W. P.]

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS II. COMNENUS ('Aλεξίους ο 'Αλεξίους Κομνηνός), emperor of Con- stantineople, the son of the emperor Manuel Com- nenus, was born in 1167, according to Nicetas. In 1179, he married Agnes or Anna, the daughter of king Louis VII. of France, and succeeded his father in 1180, under the guardianship of his mother Maria, the daughter of Raymond, prince of Antioch. They both became victims of the ambition of Andronicus Comnenus, who first compelled the young emperor to sign the death of his mother, and then put Alexis to death in 1183; whereupon he succeeded him on the throne. (Nicetas, Alexis Manuel. Comn. fil.; comp. Duensing, Familien By- zantinas, p. 188.) [W. P.]

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS III. AN'GELUS ('Aλεξίους ο 'Αλεξίους Ἄγγελος), the brother of the emperor Isaac II. Angelus, whom he deposed and blinded in 1185. Being a descendant of Alexis I. Comnenus by Theodora, the youngest daughter of the latter, he assumed the family-name of his great ancestor, and is therefore commonly called Alexis Angelus-Comnenus. In 1197 and 1198, he carried on war with Porzicus and the Seljuks of Koniah, but his armies were defeated. Being base, rapacious, and cruel, he incurred the hatred and contempt of his subjects, and prepared his ruin. He lost the crown through his nephew, Alexis, the son of Isaac II. Angelus, who, having escaped from Constantinople, succeeded in per- suading the Crusaders assembled in Venice to make an expedition against the usurper. Amounting to 20,000 men, and commanded by Dandolo, doge of Venice, they attacked Constantinople in the month of July, 1203; but before they had taken this city, Alexis III. abandoned his palace and fled to Italy, carrying with him 10,000 pounds of gold. After his flight, Constantinople was oc- cupied by the Crusaders, who recognised as emperors the blinded Isaac and his son Alexis. [At this point, the manuscript is missing the name of the scribe or editor.]

V. Murzuphus, who after his deposition in 1204, had fled to Alexis III., whose daughter he had married. Meanwhile, Theodore Lascaris succeeded in making himself independent at Nicaea, but was involved in a war with Ghyath-ed-din, sultan of Koniah. In 1210, Alexis III. fled to this sultan, and persuaded him to support his claims to the throne of Byzantium, and to declare war against Theodore Lascaris. The war proved fatal for the sultan, who was killed in the battle of Antioch, and Alexis III. was made prisoner. Theodore Lascaris had married Anna Angelis-Com- nena, the second daughter of Alexis III., but this circumstance did not prevent him from confining his father-in-law to a monastery at Nicaea. (1210.) There Alexis III. died some years after at an advanced age; the exact year of his birth is not known. (Nicetas, Alexis Angelus, Isaacius Angelus, iii. 8, &c.; Isaacien et Alex. fil. c. 1.; Villehardouin, De la Conquête de Constantinople, Paris, 1838, c. 51, 56, &c.) [W. P.]

invade Thrace, and Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, with a mighty host of Norman knights, had crossed the Adriatic and laid siege to Durazzo, the ancient Dyrrachium. In this critical position Alexis evinced extraordinary activity. He con- cluded peace with the Seljuks, ceding Asia to them; he made an alliance with Venice and Henry IV., emperor of Germany; and he sold the sacred vessels of the churches to pay his troops. His struggle with the Normans was long and bloody, but famine, diseases, civil troubles, and a powerful division of Henry IV., compelled the Normans to leave Epirus in 1084. During this time the Sol- jukus had recommenced hostilities, and threatened to block up Constantinople with a fleet constructed by Greek captives. In this extremity Alexis fitted a strong armada, but the dangerous project failed. The conquest of Jerusalem by the Seljuks, the interruption of the pious pilgrimages to the holy grave, and the vexations which the Christians in the East had to endure from the infidels, had pro- duced an extraordinary excitement among the nations in Europe. The idea of rescuing the town of Saviour became popular; the pope and the princes shewed themselves favourable to such an expedition, and they resolved upon it after the ambassadors of Alexis had related to them at Piacenza in 1095 the hopeless state of the Chris- tians in Asia. The first Crusaders appeared in Constantinople in 1096. They were commanded by Peter the Hermit and Walter the Pennyless, and were rather a band of vagabonds than an army. Alexis hastened to send them to Asia, where they were massacred by the Turks. Soon after them came a powerful army, command- ed by Godfrey of Bouillon, and their continued stay in the neighbourhood of Constantinople gave occasion to serious differences between the Latins and the Greeks. However Alexis, by the alternate use of threats and persuasions, not only succeeded in getting rid of the dangerous foreigners by carrying them over to Asia, but also managed the pride of Godfrey of Bouillon and his turbulent barons with so much dexterity, that they consented to take the oath of vassalage for those provinces which they might conquer in Asia, and promised to restore to the emperor the Byzantine territories, which had been taken by the Seljuks. In his turn he promised to assist them in their enterprise with his whole might, and his word was soon amply verified. The empire prevented him from keeping his word. However, in proportion as the Crusaders, in 1097, advanced into Asia, Alexis followed them with a chosen body, and thus gradually reunited with his empire Nicea, Chios, Rhodes, Smyrna, Ephesus, Sardes, and finally all Asia Minor. The descend- ants of Bohemond, prince of Antioch, did homage to Alexis, to whom they restored Tarsus and Malimistra. During the latter years of his reign, Alexis was occupied with consolidating the do- mestic peace of his empire, which was then often disturbed by religious troubles. He died in 1118, at the age of seventy, and his successor was his son John, generally called Calo-Joannes. Alexis was the author of a work entitled Λαογραφία, which was published in the 4th volume of the Anacta Graeca, Par. 1688, and also from a later manuscript by Gronovius at the end of his work De Sentent. Lugd. Bat. 1691. Respecting the ecclesiastical edicts of Alexis, several of which are extant, see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 729.
ALEXIS or ALEXIUS IV. ANGELUS ('Αλέξιος or Α'λεξιος Ἄνγγελος), was the son of the emperor Isaac II. Angelus. It is mentioned under ALEXIS III. that, after the deposition of this emperor, he and his father were placed on the throne by the Crusaders. Alexis IV. was crowned together with Isaac II. on the 29th of July, 1203, and, to secure himself on the throne, engaged the Crusaders to continue at Constantinople. He had promised them to put an end to the schism of the Greek Church, but did not do anything for that purpose, nor did he fulfill his other engagements towards the Crusaders. At the same time, he did not understand how to maintain his dignity among the turbulent and haughty barons of Italy, France, and Flanders, who were assembled in his capital. Serious differences consequently arose between him and his deliverers. Alexis Ducas, surnamed Murzuphalus, an ambitious and enterprising man, took advantage of these troubles, and suddenly seized the crown. By his order Alexis IV. was put to death on the 30th of January, 1204; Isaac II. died of grief. (Nicetas, Isaiaimi Angelow, ill. c. 8, &c.; Isaiaimi et Alexei fil.; Villehardouin, Ibid. c. 51, 56, 60, &c. 102—107.)

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS V. DUCAS or ('Αλέξιος Δόκας) or ('Αλέξιος Α'λέξιος), surnamed "Murzuphalus," on account of the close junction of his shaggy eyebrows, was crowned emperor of Constantinople on the 8th of February, 1204, after having been present at the murder of Alexis IV., who was put to death by his order. His earlier life is almost unknown. Nicetas, however, states, that he had always been impudent and volupitous; on the other hand, he was a man of great courage and energy. Immediately after he had usurped the throne, the Crusaders, who were still assembled under the walls of Constantinople, laid siege to this city. Alexis V. disdained to conclude peace with them on dishonourable conditions, and prepared for resistance, in which he was vigorously assisted by Theodore Lascaris. However, courage suddenly abandoned him, and he fled to the despoiled emperor Alexis III., whose daughter Eudokia Angelacommene he had just married. Constantinople was taken by storm by the Crusaders (12th of April, 1204), who, after having committed those horrors, of which Nicetas, an eye-witness, gives such an emphatical description, chose Baldwin, count of Flanders, emperor of Constantinople, but leaving him only the fourth part of the empire. After being deprived of sight by his father-in-law, Alexis V. fled to the Morea, but was arrested and carried to Constantinople, where the Crusaders put him to death by casting him from the top of the Theodosian column. (1204.) (Nicetas, Murzuphalus; Isaiaimi Angelow et Alexei fil., c. 4, 5; Gesta Francorum, c. 54; Villehardouin, Ibid. c. 51, 56, 60, &c. 86, 104, 113—115, 127, &c.)

ALEXIUS ARISTIENUS ('Αλέξιος Αρίστηνος), Oeconomus of the Great Church at Constantinople, flourished A. D. 1166, in which year he was present at the Council of Constantinople. He edited a Synopsis Canonum with scholia, which is given by Bishop Beveridge in his Punducta Canonum, Oxon. 1672, fol. vol. ii. post pag. 188, and vol. i. p. 1, &c. Other works by him are quoted. See Fabrie. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 280. [A. J. C.]

ALEXIUS ('Αλέξιος), Patriarch of Constantinople, a member of the monastery of Studius (founded A. D. 490), succeeded Eustathius as Patriarch A. D. 1025. In A. D. 1034 he crowned Michael IV. the favourite of Zoe, who, to make way for him, procured the death of her husband, the Emperor Romanus. He thwarted the attempts of John (the emperor's brother) to gain the patriarchal see (A. D. 1036), and died A. D. 1035. Decrees of his are extant, ap. Jus Gr. Rom. vol. i. lib. iv. p. 250, Leunelav. Francof. 1586. See Fabrie. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 558. [A. J. C.]

ALEXIUS ('Αλέξιος), Metropolitan of Nicæa, composed a Caenum or Hymn on St. Demetrios the Martyr. It is uncertain when he lived. The Caenum is in manuscript. See Lonicereus, Biblioth. Vindobon. vol. v. p. 599, ed. Kollar. [A. J. C.]

ALEXON ('Αλέξων), an Achaean who served in the Carthaginian garrison at Lilybaenum while it was besieged by the Romans in B. C. 250. During this siege some of the Gallic mercenaries engaged in the service of the Carthaginians formed the plan of betraying the fortresses into the hands of the Romans. But Alexon, who had on a former occasion saved the town of Agrigentum from a similar attempt of treacherous mercenaries, now acted in the same faithful spirit, and gave information of the plot to the Carthaginian commander Himilco. He also assisted him in inducing the mercenaries to remain faithful and resist the temptations offered by their comrades. (Polyb. i. 43. ii. 7.) [L. S.]

ALEXON MYNDIUS. [ALEXANDER MYNDUS.]

ALFEWUS VARUS. [VARUS.]

ALFIUS FLAVIS. [FLAVIS.]

ALGOS ('Αλγός), is used by Ilesid (Theog. 227) in the plural, as the personification of sorrow and grief, which are there represented as the daughters of Eris. [L. S.]

ALIACMON. [PALAESTRINUS.]

L. ALIENUS, plebeian aedile B. C. 434, accused Veturius, the consul of the former year, on account of selling the booty which had been gained in war, and placing the amount in the auriarium. (Liv. iii. 51.)

ALIENUS CAECINNA. [CAECINA.]

ALIMENTUS, L. GNUNIUS, a celebrated Roman annalist, antiquary, and jurist, who was praetor in Sicily, B. C. 209, with the command of two legions. He wrote an account of his imprisonment in the second Punic war, and a history of Gorgias Lecontius; but these works probably formed part of his Annales. (Liv. xxi. 38.) He is frequently cited by Festus, and the fragments which have been thus preserved were collected by Wasse, and may be found appended to Corte's Sallust.

Niebuhr (i. p. 272) praises Alimentus as a really critical investigator of antiquity, who threw light on the history of his country by researches among its ancient monuments. That he possessed eminent personal qualities, such as a stroke a great man, is clear, inasmuch as Hannibal, who used to treat his Roman prisoners very roughly, made a distinction in his behalf, and gave him an account of his passage through Gaul and over the Alps, which Alimentus afterwards incorporated in his history. It is only in his fragments that we find a distinct statement of the earlier relation between Rome and Latium, which in all the annals has been misrepresented by national pride. The point, however, upon which Niebuhr lays most stress, is the remarkable difference between Alimentus and all other chronologers in dating the building of the city about the fourth year of the 12th Olympiad. [2]
A. ALLIENUS.

This difference is the more important in an historical view, from Allienus having written on the old Roman calendar and having carefully examined the most ancient Etruscan and Roman chronology. It is ingeniously accounted for by Niebuhr, by supposing our author to have reduced the ancient cyclical years, consisting of ten months, to an equivalent number of common years of twelve months. Now, the pontiffs reckoned 132 cyclical years before the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, from which time, according to Julius Gracchus, the use of the old calendar was discontinued. The reduction makes a difference of 22 years, for 132 = 22, and 22 years, add to the era of Polybius and Nepos, viz. Ol. 7, 2, bring us to the very date of Allienus, Ol. 12, 4.

Allienus composed a treatise De Officio Justiciae consulii, containing at least two books; one book De Veris priscis, one De Consulatu Poliutae, one De Comitiis, two, at least, Mystagogiônica, and several De Re Militari. In the latter work he handles the subjects of military levies, of the ceremonies of declaring war, and generally of the Jus Civile. (Gell. xvi. 4; Voss. Hist. Gr. iv. 13, fin., Hist. Lat. i. 4; F. Lachmann, de Pontif. Histor. Tit. Livii Com. i. 17, 4to. 1622; Zimmerm., Röm. Rituale-geensch. i. § 75.)

[J. T. O.]

ALIMENTUS, M. CINCIUS, tribune of the plebs n. c. 204, proposed in his tribunship the law known by the name of Ciccia Lex de Dominis et Manerubis, or Mineralia Lex. (Liv. xxiv. 4; Cic. Cato, 4; de Octet. R. 71, 1, ad Att. i. 20, Festus, s. v. Mineralia.) This law was confirmed in the time of Augustus. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ciccia Lex.)

ALIPHERUS or HALIPHERUS (Ἀλίφηρος) was one of the sons of Lycaon, killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning for their insolence. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1.) The town of Aliphar or Alipheira in Arcadia was believed to have been founded by him, and to have derived its name from him. (Paus. viii. 3, § 1, 26, § 4; Steph. Byz. s. v. Άλιφηρος.)

ALITTA or ALLAT (Ἀλίττα or Ἀλάτη), the name by which, according to Herodotus (1. 131, iii. 8), the Arabs called Aphrodite Urania. [L. S.]

ALLECTUS was raised to the highest dignities in Punic during the dominion of Carthage; but the crimes which he committed, and the fear of punishment on account of them, led him in A. D. 293 to murder Carthage and assume the imperial title in Britain for himself. He enjoyed his honours for three years, at the end of which his Constantius sent Aselepiodotus with an army and fleet against him. Allietus was defeated in A. D. 296, and Britain was thus cleared of usurpers. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 39.; Entrop. ix. 14.) On the annexed coin the inscription is IMP. C. ALECTUS. P. P. AVG.

A. ALLIENUS. 1. A friend of Cicero’s, who is spoken of by him in high terms. He was the legate of Q. Cicero in Asia, B. C. 60 (Cic. ad Qu.}

d prætor in n. c. 49. (All. Att. x. 15.) In the following year, he had the province of Sicily, and sent to Caesar, who was then in Africa, a large body of troops. He continued in Sicily till n. c. 47, and received the title of proconsul. Two of Cicero’s letters are addressed to him. (Hist. Bact. Afr. 2, 34; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 78, 79.) His name occurs on a coin, which has on one side C. CAES. IMP. COS. ITER, and on the other A. ALLIENVS PROCOX. 2. Was sent by Dolabella, B. C. 43, to bring to him the legions which were in Egypt. On his return from Egypt with four legions, he was surprised at Cassius in a camp where he had formed his legions. As his forces were so inferior, Allienus joined Cassius. (Appian. B. C. iii. 78, iv. 59; Cic. Philo. xii. 12, 13; Cassius, ap. Cic. ad Fam. xii. 11, 12.) This Allienus may perhaps be the same person as No. 1.

ALLUCIUS, a prince of the Celibere, betrothed to a most beautiful virgin, who was taken prisoner by Scipio in Spain, B. C. 209. Scipio generously gave her to Allusius, and refused the presents her parents offered him. The story is beautifully told in Livy (xxvi. 50), and is also related by other writers. (Polyb. x. 19; Val. Max. iv. 3, § 1; Sil. Ital. xv. 368, &c.)

Allius was king of a river in the neighbourhood of Rome, who, like Tiberinus and others, were prayed to by the augurs. In the water of Almus the statue of the mother of the gods used to be washed. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20; comp. Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 71, ed. Müller.)

ALMOPS ('Ἀλμόπης), a giant, the son of Poseidon and Helle, from whom the district of Almopia and its inhabitants, the Almopes in Macedonia, were believed to have derived their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀλμόπης.)

ALOEIDÆ, ALOÍDÆ, or ALOÍDÆ (Ἀλωίδαι, Ἀλωίδας or Ἀλωίδας), are patronymic forms from Alous, but are used to designate the two sons of his wife Iphimedia by Poseidon: viz. Otus and Ephialtes. The Aloidae are renowned in the earliest stories of Greece for their extraordinary strength and daring spirit. When they were nine years old, each of their bodies measured nine cubits in breadth and twenty-seven in height. At this early age, they threatened the Olympian gods with war, and attempted to pile mount Ossa upon Olympus, and Peion upon Ossa. They would have accomplished their object, says Homer, had they been allowed to grow up to the age of manhood; but Apollo destroyed them before their beards began to appear. (Od. x. 306, &c.) In the Iliad (v. 385, &c.; comp. Philostr. de Vitr. Soph. ii. 1 § 1) the poet relates another feat of their early age. They put the god Ares in chains, and kept him imprisoned for thirteen months; so that he would have perished, had not Hermes been informed of it by Erichthon, and secretly liberated the prisoner. The same stories are related by Apollo- doneus (7. 7, § 4), who however does not make them perish in the attempt upon Olympus. According to him, they actually piled the mountains upon one another, and threatened to change land into sea and sea into land. They are further said to have grown every year one cubit in breadth and three in height. As another proof of their daring, it is related, that Ephialtes sued for the hand of Hem, and Otus for that of Artemis. But this led to their destruction in the island of Naxos. (Comp.
APELO.

Pind. Pyth. iv. 156, &c.) Here Artemis appeared to them in the form of a stag, and ran between the two brothers, who, both aiming at the animal at the same time, shot each other dead. Hyginus (Fab. 28) relates their death in a similar manner, but makes Apollo send the fatal stag. (Comp. Callim. Hygin. in Dion. 204; Apollon. Rhod. i. 484, with the Schol.) As a punishment for their presumption, they, in Hades, tied to a pillar with serpents, with their faces turned away from each other, and were perpetually tormented by the shrieks of his owl. (Delta. ed Turgot, &c.; Virg. Aen. vi. 582.) Diodorus (v. 50, &c.), who does not mention the Hecore stories, contrives to give to his account an appearance of history. According to him, the Aiolidae are Thessalian heroes who were sent out by their father Aeoleus to fetch back their mother Thymomedea and her daughter Pan克拉锡亚, who had been carried off by Thracians. After having overtaken and defeated the Thracians in the island of Strongylae (Naxos), they settled there as rulers over the Thracians. But soon after, they killed each other in a dispute which had arisen between them, and the Naxians worshipped them as heroes. The foundation of the town of Alofum in Thessaly was ascribed to them. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) In all these traditions, the Aiolus, as a god, is represented as only remarkable for their gigantic physical strength; but there is another story which places them in a different light. Pausanias (ix. 29. § 1) relates, that they were believed to have been the first of all men who worshipped the Muses on mount Helicon, and to have consecrated this mountain to them; but they worshipped only three Muses—Melete, Mneme, and Aoide, and founded the town of Ascr in Boeotia. Sepulchral monuments of the Aiolidae were seen in the time of Pausanias (ix. 22. § 5) near the Boeotian town of Anthedon. Later times fabled of their bones being seen in Thessaly. (Phil. T. i. 3.) The interpretation of these traditions by etymologies from ἀώτεω and ἀώνεω, which has been attempted by modern scholars, is little satisfactory. [L. S.]

ALOPE (Ἀλόπη), 1. A son of Poseidon and Amphinome, the daughter of Triops, who was in love with Poseidon, and used to walk by the sea-side, take her hands full of its water, and sprinkle her bosom with it. The two sons whom she had by Poseidon were called Alopia, (Hom. H. v. 395; Od. xii. 305; Apollon. i. 7. § 4.) [ALOPIAE.]

2. A son of Helios by Circe or Antiope, who received from his father the sovereignty over the district of Asopin. (Paus. ii. 1. § 6, 3. § 8.) [L. S.]

APLOPE (Ἀπλόπη), a daughter of Cercyon, who was beloved by Poseidon on account of her great beauty, and became by him the mother of a son, whom she exposed immediately after his birth. But a mare came and suckled the child until it was found by shepherds, who fell into a dispute as to who was to have the beautiful kingling, and the child was exposed again. The latter was fed and found in the same manner as before, and the shepherds called him Hippothus. [HIPPOTHUS.] The body of Apollo was changed by Poseidon into a well, which bore the same name. (Hygin. Fab. 187; Paus. i. 5. § 2; Aristoph. Av. 553.) The town of Alope, in Thessaly, was believed to have derived its name from her. (Pherecyd. ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀπλόη, where, however, Philonides speaks of an Apollo as a daughter of Actor.) There was a monument of Apollo on the road from Eileusis to Megara, on the spot where she was believed to have been killed by her father. (Paus. i. 39. § 3.) [L. S.]

ALORCUS, [ASTRABACUS.]

ALORCUS, a Spaniard in Hannibal's army, who was a friend and hospes of the Saguntines, went into Saguntum, when the city was reduced to the last extremity, to endeavour to persuade the inhabitants to accept Hannibal's terms. (Liv. xxi. 12.)

ALPHAEA, ALPHRAEA, or ALPEIUSA (Ἀλφαέα, Ἀλφραέα, or Ἀλπειοῦσα), a surname of Artemis, who she derived from the river god Alpheus, who loved her, and under which she was worshipped at Letrini in Elis (Paus. vi. 22. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 343), and in Ortygia. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 12, Nom. i. 5.) [L. S.]

ALPEIAS, a name by which Ovid (Met. v. 467) designates the nymph of the Sicilian well Arethusa, because it was believed to have a subterranean communication with the river Alpheus, in Peloponnesus. [L. S.]

ALPHEUS, or ALPEUS (Ἀλφέας, or Ἀλφεύς), the god of the river Alpheus in Peloponnesus, a son of Oceanus and Theis. (Pind. Nom. i. 1; Hes. Theog. 333.) According to Pausanias (v. 7. § 2) Alpheus was a passionate hunter and fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, but she fled from him to the island of Ortygia near Syracuse, and metamorphosed herself into a well, whereupon Alpheus became a river, which flowing from Peloponnesus under the sea to Ortygia, there united its waters with those of the well Arethusa. (Comp. Schol. ad Pind. Nom. i. 3.) This story is related somewhat differently by Ovid. (Met. v. 572, &c.) Arethusa, a fairy-nymph, once while bathing in the river Alpheus in Arcadia, was surprised and pursued by the god; but Artemis took pity upon her and changed her into a well, which flowed under the earth to the island of Ortygia. (Comp. Schol. ad Verg. Aen. iii. 694; Stat. Silv. ii. 2, 203; Theb. i. 271, iv. 239; Lucian, Dial. Marini, 5.) Artemis, who is here only mentioned incidentally, was, according to other traditions, the object of the love of Alpheus. Once, it is said, when pursued by him she fled to Letrini in Elis, and there she covered her face and those of her companions (nymphs) with mud, so that Alpheus could not discover or distinguish her, and was obliged to return. (Paus. vi. 22. § 5.) This occasioned the building of a temple of Artemis Alpea at Letrini. According to another version, the goddess fled to Ortygia, where she had likewise a temple under the name of Alphne. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 12.) An allusion to Alpheus love of Artemis is also contained in the fact, that at Olympia the two divinities had one altar in common. (Paus. v. 14. § 5; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. v. 10.) In these accounts two or more distinct stories seem to be mixed up together, but they probably originated in the popular belief, that there was a natural subterranean communication between the river Alpheus and the well Arethusa in Ortygia. (Strab. vi. p. 270, viii. p.) ALTHEA. 343; Senec. Quaes. Nat. iii. 26; Fulgent. Myth. iii. 12.) Plutarch (de Pleur. 10) gives an account which is altogether unconnected with those mentioned above. According to him, Alpheus was a son of Helios, and killed his brother Cercaphus in a contest. Haunted by despair and the Erinyes he leapt into the river Nyctimæus which hence received the name Alpheus. [L. S.]

APHEINOR. [IOBE.]

APHEUS]US VARUS. [VARUS.]

APHISIOBOA (Ἀφίσιαβοα). 1. The mother of Adonis. [ADONIS.]

2. A daughter of Phegeus, who married Alemedon. [ALMEDES.]

3. According to Theocritus (iii. 45) a daughter of Bias, and the wife of Pelias. The latter, however, is usually called Anaxibia.

4. An Indian nymph, who was passionately loved by Dionysus, but could not be induced to yield to his wishes, until the god changed himself into a tiger, and thus compelled her by fear to allow him to carry her across the river Sollux, which from this circumstance received the name of Tigris. (Plut. de Pleur. 24.) [L. S.]

ALPHIEUS MYTILENAEUS (Ἀρφίευς Μυτιληναῖος), the author of about twelve epigrams in the Greek Anthology, some of which seem to point out the time when he wrote. In the seventh epigram (Jacobs) he refers to the state of the Roman empire, as embracing almost all the known world; in the ninth he speaks of the restored and flourishing city of Troy; and in the tenth he alludes to an epigram by Antipater Sidonius. Now Antipater lived under Augustus, and Troy had received great favours from Julius Caesar and Augustus. (Strab. xiii. p. 869.) Hence it is not improbable that Alpheus wrote under Augustus. It is true that in the fourth epigram he addresses a certain Macrinus, but there is no reason to suppose that this was the emperor Macrinus. Another difficulty has been started, on the ground that the eleventh epigram was inscribed, as we learn from Pausanias (viii. 52. § 3), on the statue of Philopoemen in Tegea, and that it is very improbable that such a statue should have stood without an inscription till the time of Alpheus. But the simple fact is, that no reference has been discovered for attributing this epigram to Alpheus. (Jacobs, Ant. Hist. Græc. xiii. p. 829.) [P. S.]

APPHAUS AVITUS. [AVITUS.]

ALPÆUS, a name which Homer (Sat. i. 10. 36) gives in ridicule to a bombastic poet. He probably means M. Furius Bibaculus. [BIBACULUS.]

ALPÆUS MONTANVS, one of the Treviri, the most powerful of the Belgic people, and the commander of a cohort in the army of Vitellius, was sent into Germany after the battle of Cremona, A. D. 70. Together with his brother, D. Alpinus, he joined Civilis in the next year. (The. Hist. iii. 35, iv. 31, v. 58.) [CIVILIS.]

ALTHAEA (Ἀλθαία), a daughter of the Aetolian king Theastos and Eurythamis, and sister of Leda, Hypermnestra, Iphicles, Euphuis, &c. She was married to Ourus, king of Callydon, by whom she became the mother of Troezen, Thyrus, Clymenus, and Molaeor, and of two daughters, Gorgo and Deinomene. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10, 8. § 1.) Alphonseus, according to that same, Meleager was regarded as the fruit of her intercourse with Ares, and that she was mother of Deinomen by Dionysus. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 129, 171, 174.) Althaea is especially celebrated in ancient story on account of the tragic fate of her son Meleager, who also became the cause of her death. Some say that she hung herself, others that she killed herself with a dagger. (Apollod. i. 3. § 3; Or. Met. viii. 445, &c.) [L. S.]

ALTHEMENES or ALTHEAEMENES (Ἀλθημενῆς or Ἀλθηαμενῆς), a son of Catreus, king of Crete. In consequence of an oracle, that Catreus would lose his life by one of his children, Althemenes quitted Crete together with his sister Anemosyne, in order to avoid becoming the instrument of his future death. He landed in Rhodes at a place which he called Cretonia, and in remembrance of the god of his own native island, he erected on mount Atabyrus an altar to Zeus Atabyrinos. His sister was seduced in Rhodes by Hermes, but Althemenes, disbelieving her account, killed her by kicking her with his foot. When Catreus had become advanced in years, he had an invincible desire to see his only son once more, and to place his crown in his hands. He accordingly sailed to Rhodes. On his landing there, he and his companions were attacked by shepherds, who mistook them for pirates. During the ensuing struggle, Althemenes came to the protection of his subjects, and shot his own father dead. When he became aware of what he had done, he prayed and fasted, and was swallowed up by the earth. This is the account of Apollodorus (ii. 2. § 1, &c.), with which Diodorus (v. 59) agrees in the main points, except that he represents Althemenes as wandering about after the murder, and at last dying with grief. He adds, that the Rhodians subsequently worshipped him as a hero. [L. S.]

ALTHYPES (Ἀλθήπια), a son of Poseidon and Leîs, a daughter of Orus, king of Troezen. The territory of Troezen was called after him Altheipa. In his reign Pallas and Poseidon disputed the possession of the country with each other. (Paus. ii. 30. § 6.) [L. S.]

ALYATTES (Ἀλιᾶττης), king of Lydia, succeeded his father Sadyattes, n. c. 618. Sadyattes during the last six years of his reign had been engaged in a war with Miletus, which was continued by his son Croesus. In the last of these years Alyattes burnt a temple of Athena, and falling sick shortly afterwards, he sent to Delphi for advice; but the oracle refused to give him an answer till he had rebuilt the temple. This he did, and recovered in consequence, and made peace with Miletus. He subsequently carried on war with Cyaxares, king of Media, drove the Cimmerians out of Asia, took Smyrna, and attacked Chazomenes. The war with Cyaxares, which lasted for five years, from n. c. 580 to 575, arose in consequence of Alyattes receiving under his protection some Sycthians who had fled to him after injuring Cyaxares. An eclipse of the sun, which happened while the armies of the two kings were fighting, led to a peace between them, and this was cemented by the marriage of Alyattes to the daughter of Cyaxares with Araxias, the daughter of Alyattes. Alyattes died, n. c. 561 or 560, after a reign of fifty-seven years, and was succeeded by his son Croesus, who appears to have been previously associated with his father in the government. (Herod. i. 16-22, 25, 78, 74.) The tomb (εἰκόμα) of Alyattes is mentioned by Herodotus (i. 93) as one of the wonders of Lydia. It was north of Sardis, near the lake Gygeon, and consisted of a large mound of earth, raised upon a foundation of great stones. It was erected by the tradespeople, mechanics, and courtesans, and on the top of it there were five pilars, which Herodotus saw, and on which were mentioned the different portions raised by each; from this it appeared that the courtesans did the greater part. It measured six plethra and two stadia in circumference, and thirteen plethra in breadth. According to some writers, it was called the "tomb of the courtesan," and was erected by a mistress of Gyges. (Clearch. op. Athen. xiii. p. 573, a.) This mound still exists. Mr. Hamilton says (Researches in Asia Minor, vol. i. p. 4.) that it took him about ten minutes to ride round its base, which would give it a circumference of nearly a mile; and he also states, that towards the north it consists of the natural rock—a white, horizontally stratified earthy limestone, cut away so as to appear part of the structure. The upper portion, he adds, is sand and gravel, apparently brought from the bed of the Hermus. He found on the top the remains of a foundation nearly eighteen feet square, on the north of which was a huge circular stone ten feet in diameter, with a flat bottom and a raised edge or lip, evidently placed there as an ornament on the apex of the temple.

ALYPIUS (Ἀλυπίος), the author of a Greek musical treatise entitled εἰκατωγύρος μουτορ. There are no tolerably sure grounds for identifying him with any one of the various persons who bore the name in the times of the later emperors, and of whose history anything is known. According to the most plausible conjecture, he was that Alypius whom Eunapius, in his Life of Iamblichus, celebrates for his acute intellect (διάλεκτος του Ἀλυπίου) and diminutive stature, and who, being a friend of Iamblichus, probably flourished under Julian and his immediate successors. This Alypius was a native of Alexandria, and died there at an advanced age, and therefore can hardly have been the person called by Ammianus Marcellinus Alypius Antiochenus, who was first prefect of Britian, and afterwards employed by Julian in his attempt to rebuild the Jewish temple. Julian addresses two epistles (29 and 30) to Alypius (Ἰωάννης Ἀλυπίου ὁ Ἐλεφρος Κακαρρος), in one of which he thanks him for a geographical treatise or chart; it would seem more likely that this was the Antiochian than that he was the Alexandrian Alypius as Meursius supposes, if indeed he was either one or the other. Iamblichus wrote a life, not now extant, of the Alexandrian.

The work of Alypius consists wholly, with the exception of a short introduction, of lists of the symbols used (both for voices and instrument) to denote all the sounds in the forty-five scales produced by taking each of the fifteen modes in the three genera. (Distonic, Chromatic, Enharmonic.) It treats, therefore, in fact, of only one (the fifth, namely) of the seven branches into which the subject is, as usual, divided in the introduction; and may possibly be merely a fragment of a larger work. It would have been most valuable if any considerable number of examples had been left us of the actual use of the system of notation described in it; unfortunately very few remain (see Burney, Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 83), and they seem to belong to an earlier stage of the science. However, the work serves to throw some light on the obscure history of the modes. (See Baehöck, de Metr. Pind. c. 8. p. 283, c. 9. 12.) The text, which seemed hopelessly corrupt to Meursius, its first editor, was restored, apparently with success, by the labour of the learned and indefatigable Mebonius. (Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, ed. Marc. Mbonium, Amstel. 1652; Aristoxenus, Nicomachus, Alypius, ed. Joh. Maurit. Lugd. Bat. 1616.) Alypius (Ἀλυπίος), priest of the great church at Constantinople, flourished A.D. 430. There is extant an epistle from him to St. Cyril (in Greek), exhorting him to a vigorous resistance against the heresy of Nestorius. (See Opusculum Novae Collectio, a Manu, vol. v. p. 1463.) [A. J. C.]

ALYPIUS (Ἀλυπίος), a statuary, a native of Sicyon. He studied under Naucides, the Argive. His age may be fixed from his having executed bronze statues of some Lacedaemonians who shared in the victory of Lyons at Aegosopotami. (I. c. 405.) Pausanias also mentions some statues of Olympic victors made by him. (VI. 1. § 2, x. § 9, 4; VI. 1. § 2, 3.) [C. P. M.]

APOLLO (Ἀπόλλων), a son of Ioucas and brother of Penelope and Loucas. After his father's death, he reigned in conjunction with his brother over Acorania, and is said to have founded the town of Alyzeia there. (Suid. x. p. 452; Steph. Byz. s. v. "Ἀλυπίος." [L. S.]

AMADOCUS (Ἀμαδόκως) or ME'DOCUS (Μηδόκος), a common name among the Thracians. It was also, according to Ptolemy, the name of a people and mountains in Thrace. Pausanias (I. 4. § 4) speaks of an Amadocus who came from the Hyperboreas.

1. King of the Odryae in Thrace, was a friend of Alcibiades, and is mentioned at the time of the battle of Aegospotami, B. C. 405. (Diod. xiii. 103.) He and Sthenes were the most powerful princes in Thrace when Xenophon visited the country in B. C. 400. They were, however, frequently at variance, but were reconciled to one another by Thrasybulus, the Athenian commander, in B. C. 390, and induced by him to become the allies of Athens. (Xen. Anab. vii. 2. § 32, 3. § 10, 7. § 3, &c.; Hdt. iv. 8. § 26; Diod. xiv. 94.) This Amadocus may perhaps be the same as the one mentioned by Aristotle, who, says, he was attacked by his general Sthenes, a Thracian. (Pol. viii. 8. p. 182, ed. Götting.)

2. A Ruler in Thrace, who inherited in conjunction with Berisades and Cesrobleptes the dominions of Cotys, on the death of the latter in B. C. 358. Amadocus was probably a son of Cotys and a brother of the other two princes, though this is not stated by Demosthenes. (Dem. in Aristoc. p. 628, &c.) [Cesrobleptes.] Amadocus seems to have had a son of the same name. (Iseroc. Philipp. p. 63, d. compared with Harpo- crat. s. v. "Ἀμαδόκως."

3. One of the princes of Thrace, who was defeated and taken prisoner by Philip, king of Macedonia, B. C. 184. (Livy xxxix. 35.)

AMAEASIA SENTIA is mentioned by Valerius Maximus (viii. 3. § 1) as an instance of a female who pleased her own cause before the praetor. (About B. C. 77.) She was called Androgyne, from having a man's spirit with a female form. Compare AFRANIA and HORTENSSIA.
AMALTHEIA.

C. AMAFA'NIUS or AMAFI'NIUS was one of the earliest Roman writers in favour of the Epicurean philosophy. He wrote several works, which are censured by Cicero as deficient in arrangement and style. He is mentioned by no other writer but Cicero. (Apollo. l. i. § 6; Tact. iv. 3.)

AMALTHEIA (Ἀμαλθεία). 1. The nurse of the infant Zeus after his birth in Crete. The ancients themselves appear to have been as uncertain about the etymology of the name as about the real nature of Amalthea. Hyæcides derives it from the verb ἄμαλθεσθαι, to nourish or to enrich; others from ἄμαλθος, i. e. firm or hard; and others again from ἄμαλξις and ἐμα, according to which it would signify the divine goat, or the tender goddess. The common derivation is from ἄμαλς, to milk, or suck. According to some traditions Amalthea is the goat which suckled the infant Jove (Hygin. Post. Astr. ii. 13; Amt. Phæn. 163; Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 49), and who was afterwards rewarded for this service by being placed among the stars. (Comp. Apollod. l. i. § 6.)

[AGMA.] According to another set of traditions Amalthea was a nymph, and daughter of Oceanus, Helios, Haemonius, or of the Cretan king Meliscusus (Schol. ad Hom. II. xxi. 194; Eratost. Catast. 13; Apollod. ii. 7. § 5; Lactant. Inst. i. 23; Hygin. l. c., and Fab. 139, where it is said to have fed Zeus with the milk of a goat. When this goat once broke off one of her horns, the nymph Amalthea filled it with fresh herbs and fruit and gave it to Zeus, who transplanted it together with the goat among the stars. (Ovid. Fast. v. 115, &c.) According to other accounts Zeus himself broke off one of the horns of the goat Amalthea, gave it to the daughters of Meliscus, and endowed it with such powers that whenever the possessor wished, it would instantaneously become filled with whatever might be desired. (Apollod. l. c.; Schol. ad Callim. l. c.) This is the story about the origin of the celebrated horn of Amalthea, commonly called the horn of plenty or cornucopia, which plays such a prominent part in the stories of Greece, and which was used in later times as the symbol of plenty in general. (Strab. x. p. 456, iii. p. 151; Diod. iv. 35.) [ACHELOUS.] Diodorus (iii. 60) gives an account of Amalthea, which differs from all the other traditions. According to him the nymph Ammon married Amalthea, a maiden of extraordinary beauty, and gave her a very fertile tract of land which had the form of a bull's horn, and received from its queen the name of the horn of Amalthea. This account, however, is only one of the many specimens of a rationalistic interpretation of the ancient myths. The horn appears to be one of the most ancient and simplest vessels for drinking, and thus we find the story of Amalthea giving Zeus to drink from a horn represented in an ancient work of art still extant. (Galerus Giustinius, ii. p. 61.) The horn of plenty was frequently given as an attribute to the representations of Tyche or Fortuna. (Paus. iv. 20. § 4; vi. 26. § 3; comp. Böttiger, Amaltheia, oder der Cretische Zeus als Sohling; Welcker, Über eine Cretische Cabele in Theten, p. 6.)

2. One of the Sibyls (Tibull. ii. 5. 67), whom Lauckianus (l. c. 6) identifies with the Cusanus Sibyl, who is said to have sold to king Tarquinius the celebrated Sibylline books. The same is stated by Servius (ad Aen. vi. 72) and by Lydus (de Mens. iv. 34); comp. Klauser, Aeneus und die Tonaalen, p. 299, &c.

AMARANTUS (Ἀμαράντος), of Alexandria, wrote a commentary upon one of Theocritus' Idyls (Eurykol. M. p. 273. 40, ed. Syll.), and a work entitled ἡ πηλής. Respecting his time, we only know that he lived subsequently to Juba, king of Mauretania. (Athen. viii. p. 344, c. x. p. 414, 1.)

AMARYNECUS (Ἀμαρύνεκος), a chief of the Elyans, and son of Onesimus or of Acator. (Hygin. Fab. 97; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 303.) According to Hyginus, Amaryneus himself joined the expedition against Troy with nineteen ships. Homer, on the other hand, only mentions his son Diotes (Amaryneus) as partaking in the Trojan war. (II. ii. 622, iv. 512.) When Amaryneus died, his sons celebrated funeral games in his honour, in which Nestor, as he himself relates (II. xxiii. 629, &c.) took part. According to Pausanias (iv. l. c. § 8) Amaryneus had been of great service to Augus against Hercules, in return for which Augus shared his throne with him. (LS.)

AMARYNTHEUS (Ἀμαρύνθος), a hunter of Artemis, from whom the town of Amarynthus in Euboea (Steph. Byz. says Euboea itself) was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. x. p. 443.) From this hero, or rather from the town of Amarynthus, Artemis derived the surname Amarynthia or Amarysia, under which she was worshipped there and also in Attica. (Paus. i. 21. § 3; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ἀμαρύνθος.) (LS.)

AMAS'IS (Ἀμας). 1. King of Egypt in early times, according to Diodorus (i. 60), in whose reign Egypt was conquered by Actiænes, king of Ethiopia. (Actiænes.)

2. King of Egypt, succeeded Apries, the last king of the line of Psammetichus, in n. c. 569. He was of comparatively low origin (Herodotus, ii. 172, calls him ἄρετος), and was born at Siuph, a town in the Sibite nome. When the Egyptians revolted against Apries, Amasis was sent to quell the insurrection, but went over to the side of the rebels, and was proclaimed king by them. He defeated Apries in a battle near Memphis, and took him prisoner. He seemed disposed to treat his captive with great mildness, but was induced to deliver him up into the hands of the Egyptians, who put him to death. It was probably to strengthen himself against a powerful party formed against him amongst the warrior- caste, that he cultivated the friendship of the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to them, and allowed them to build temples to their own deities. He contracted an alliance with the Greeks of Cyrene, and himself married Ladies, a Cyrenean lady. (Herod. ii. 181.) He removed the Ionians and Carians, who were settled on the Pelasgic mouth of the Nile, to Memphis, and formed them into a body-guard for himself (ii. 154.) He also entered into alliance with Croesus (177) and with Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos (iii. 30, 1), who is said to have introduced Pythagoras to him by his wife (Diog. Laert. viii. 3.) Amasis also sent presents to several of the Greek cities. (Herod. ii. 182.) Solomon in the course of his travels visited him.
AMAZONIANS.

in b. c. 306, who left her guardian of their children, Clearchus, Oxyrhynus, and Amazia, she married Lyssimachus, b. c. 302. Lyssimachus, however, abandoned her shortly afterwards, and married Aranoe, the daughter of Proteley Philadelphus; whereupon Amazia retired to Heracleis, which she governed in her own right. She also founded a city, called after her own name, on the sea-coast of Paphлагонia. She was drowned by her two sons about b. c. 288. (Memmon, c. 4, 5; Diod. xx. 109.) The head figured below probably represents Amazia; the woman on the reverse holds a small figure of victory in her hand. (Eckhel, ii. p. 421.)

AMANTA, the wife of king Latinus and mother of Lavinia, who, when Aeneas sued for the hand of the latter, opposed him, because he had already promised Lavinia to Turnus. At the same time she was instigated by Alecto, who acted according to the request of Juno, to stir up the war with Turnus. This story fills the greater part of the seventh book of Virgil's Aeneid. When Amanta was informed that Turnus had fallen in battle, she hung herself. (Virg. Aen. xii. 600; Dionys. i. 64.)

AMATIES (Ἀματίας), a son of Heracles, from whom the town of Amathus in Cyprus was believed to have derived its name. According to some traditions, however, its name was derived from Amathus, the mother of Cinyras. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αμαθίας.)

AMATHUSIA or AMATHU'NTIA (Ἀμαθοῦσια or Ἀμαθοῦντια), a surname of Aphrodite, which is derived from the town of Amathus in Cyprus, one of the most ancient seats of her worship. (Theol. Annal. iii. 69; Ov. Amor. iii. 15. 15; Virg. Ger. 242; Catull. ixvi. 51.)

AMATIUS, surnamed Pseudomaria, a person of low origin, who pretended to be either the son or grandson of the great Marius. On the death of Julius Caesar b. c. 44, he came forward as a popular leader, and erected an altar to Caesar on the spot where his body had been burnt. He was, however, shortly afterwards seized by the consul Antony and put to death without a trial. This illegal act was approved of by the senate in consequence of the advantages they derived from it. Valerius Maximus (ix. 15. § 2) says, that his name was Herophilus. (Appian, B. C. iii. 23; Liv. Epit. 116; Cic. ad Att. xii. 49. xiv. 6—8, Philostr. i. 2; Nicolaus Damascus, Vit. Aug. c. 14. p. 268, ed. Correa.)

AMAZONES (Ἀμαζόνες), a warlike race of females, who act a prominent part in several of the adventures of Greek mythology. All accounts of them agree in the statement, that they came from the country about the Cucans, and that their principal seats were on the river Thermodon, in the neighbourhood of the modern Trebizond. From thence they are said to have at different times invaded Thrace, Asia Minor, the islands of the Aegean, Greece, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya. The country about the Thesmophoria was inhabited only by the Amazons, who were governed by a queen. The Gargareans, a race of men, were separated from them by a mountain, but once every year the Amazons met the Gargareans in the mountains for the purpose of propagating their race, and then returned to their own country. Their children, when of the female sex, were brought up by the Amazon mothers, and trained in their customary pursuits of war, riding, hunting, and cultivating the land; but each girl who had right breast cut off: their male children, on the other hand, were sent to the Gargareans, or put to death. (Strab. xi. p. 503, &c.; Dio. ii. 45, &c., iii. 52, &c.; Justin, ii. 4.) The principal gods they worshipped were Ares and Artemis Terepolos. The foundation of several towns in Asia Minor and in the islands of the Aegean is ascribed to them, e. g. of Ephesus, Smyrna, Cyme, Myrina, and Paphos. Strabo doubts the existence of such a race of females, while Ovidius attempts to give an account of them, which assumes all the appearance of history. That the Amazons were regarded as a real historical race down to a late period, is evident from the tradition, that, when Alexander the Great approached the country of the Amazons, their queen Thalestris hastened to him, in order to become mother by the conqueror of Asia. (Plut. Alex. 46.)

But we confine ourselves here to noticing some of the mythical adventures with which the Amazons are connected. They are said to have invaded Lycia in the reign of Lobates, but were destroyed by Bellerophon, who happened to be staying at the king's court. (Hom. II. vi. 186, &c.; Schol. ad Ipysh. 17.) Bellerophon, Laomedon. At the time when Priam was yet a young man, they invaded Phrygia, and fought with the Phrygians and Trojans. (Hom. II. iii. 189, &c.) The ninth among the labours imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus, was to take from Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle, the ensign of her kingly power, which she had received as a present from Ares. (Apollod. ii. 5, § 9; Dio. iv. 16; Hygin. Fab. 30; Quint. Smyrn. xi. 244.) [HERACLES.] In the reign of Theseus they invaded Attica. (Paus. i. 1. 6; Istein. ii. 1.) Thes. 31, 32.] [ Theseus.] Towards the end of the Trojan war, the Amazons, under their queen Penthesileia, came to the assistance of Priam; but the queen was killed by Achilles. (Quint. Smyrn. i. 669; Paus. v. 1. § 2; Philoscor. Her. xii. 19.) [PENTHESELEIA.] The question as to what the Amazons really were, or rather, what gave rise to the belief that there was such a race of women, has been much discussed by ancient as well as modern writers. Herodotus (iv. 110) says, that in the Sythian language their name was Oierrata, which he translates by ἄνδροκτόνα. The Greek name Amazons is usually derived from ἀμαζός, the breast, and is supposed to mean "breastless," or "not brought up by the breast." Ἀμαζός was either a strong breastless" or "without breast." (Philoscor. i. c.; Aristot. ad Hom. p. 492.) Others derive it from the Cusanian word μαζα, said to signify the moon, or from Emneveth, which, according to a Cusanian tradition, is said to have been their original name. (Sprengel, Apologia des Hippocrates, ii. p. 597; Klapproth, Reise nach dem Caucasus, i. p. 655.) Among the various ways in which it has been attempted to account for the origin of the story about the Amazons, two deserve to be mentioned. One opinion is, that the peculiar way in which the women of some of the Caucasian districts lived, and performed the duties which in other countries devolved upon men, together with the many instances of female bravery and courage which are noticed as remarkable even by modern travellers, were conveyed to the inhabitants of western Asia and the Greeks in vague and obscure reports, and thus gave rise to the belief in the existence of such a warlike race of women, and that these rumours and reports were subsequently worked out and embellished by popular tradition and poetry. Others think that the Amazons were originally priestesses of Artemis (the moon), whose worship was widely spread in Asia, and which they are said to have established in various parts. It is further inferred, from the name Amazons, that these priestesses mutilated their bodies by cutting off their breasts in a manner similar to that in which the Galli and other priests mutilated their bodies, and that thus the Amazons represented the man ideal in the female sex, just as the Galli represented the female ideal in the male sex. But it would be difficult, in the first place, to prove the existence of such priestesses, and in the second, to show how they could have occasioned the belief in a whole female race of this kind. Neither the poetical nor historical traditions about the Amazons contain anything to render this opinion very plausible; and, in the absence of any positive evidence, the first opinion has thus much more to recommend it. (Comp. Müller, Orcliol. p. 356, &c.)

The representation of these warlike women occupied the Greek artists very extensively, and we still possess a large series of the most beautiful works of art, such as paintings on vases and walls, bronzes, reliefs, and gems, in which the Amazons and their battles with men are represented. The most celebrated works of this kind in antiquity were the battle of the Amazons with the Athenians in the Poelloc at Athens, by Nicon (Paus. i. 15, § 2), on the shield of Athena, and on the foot-stool of the Olympian Zeus, by Phidias, (l. 17, § 2.) Amazons were also represented by Alcamenes in the pediment of the temple of Zeus at Olympia. (v. 10, § 2.) Respecting the extent of the representations of Amazons and their costumes, see Müller, Handb. d. Archäol. §§ 365, 417. [L. S.]

AMAZONIUS (Ἀμαζονίους), a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped, and had a temple at Pyrrhus in Iaconia. The name was derived either from the belief that the Amazons had penetrated into Peloponnesus as far as Pyrrhus, or that they had founded the temple there. (Paus. iii. 25, § 3.) [L. S.]

AMBIGATUS, king of the Celts in Gaul in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus. He belonged to the Bituriges, the most powerful of the Celtic people. When Ambigatus was advanced in years, he sent out Belloconus and Sigevocus, the sons of his sister, with large swarms of his people to seek new settlements, in consequence of the great number of the population. Belloconus and Sigevocus drew lots as to the course they should take; the latter in consequence went to the Hercynian forest and the former into Italy. (Liv. v. 34.)

AMBIORIX, a chief of the Eburones, a Gallic people between the Meuse and the Rhine, who were formerly tributary to the Aquatici, but were delivered by Caesar from the payment of this tribute. In B.c. 54, Caesar placed a legion and five cohorts, under the command of Q. Titurius Sabinus and L. Annius Cotta, in the territories of the Eburones for the purpose of passing the winter there. But fifteen days after they had been stationed in their territories, the Eburones revolted at the instigation of Ambiorix and Catiocles, another chief, besieged the Roman camp, and destroyed almost all the Roman troops, after they had been induced by Ambiorix to leave their camp under promise of a safe-conduct. After their destruction Ambiorix hastened to the Adunici and Nervii, and induced them, in conjunction with the Eburones, to attack the camp of Q. Cicero, who was stationed for the winter among the Nervii. The firmness of Cicero, and the defeat of the Gauls on the arrival of Caesar, compelled Ambiorix to raise the siege.

In the following year Ambiorix continued to prosecute the war against Caesar, but though all his plans were thwarted, and the different troops he raised were defeated by Caesar, he always escaped falling into the hands of the conqueror. (Cass. B. G. v. 24, 26—51, vi. 5, 29—43, viii. 24, &c.; Dion Cass. xii. 5—10, 31, &c.; Liv. Epit. 106.) According to Florus (iii. 10. § 8) he escaped the vengeance of the Romans by fleeing beyond the Rhine.

L. AMBIORIX TURPIO. [TURPIO.

AMBLOPOEIA (Ἀμβλοποιεία), from ἀμπλο-πόος, "delaying old age," as a surname of Aphodite, who had a statue at Sparta under this name. (Paul. iii. 10. § 1; Plat. Symposium.)

AMBRA CIIA (Ἀμμήρια), a daughter of Antigonus, from whom the town of AmbraTech derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 492.) Other traditions represent her as a grand-daughter of Apollo, and a daughter of Melanippe, king of the Dryopes. (Anton. Lib. 4.) A third account derived the name of the town from Ambra, a son of Theothropus and grandson of Xenon. (Steph. Byz. l. c.) [L. S.]

AMBROSIIUS (Ἀμβρωσιασ) ALEXANDRIUS, a nobleman and curier (S. Epiph. adv. Taur. 64. [44] § 3) flourished A.D. 280. At first a Valentinian (Euseb. H. E. vi. 18) and Marcionist, he was won to the faith by Origen, whose constant fellow-student he became (Origen, Ep. ad Africam. vol. i. p. 29), and was ordained deacon. S. Hier. Vit. Isaur. 20.) He sided with Origen on questions, and urged him to write his Commentaries (Ὑπερεκθεχείς), supplying him with subscribers in abundance. He shone as a Conessor during the persecution of Julius Maximinus (Euseb. vi. 18) A.D. 326, and died between A.D. 47 and 253. His letters to Origen (praised by t. Jerome) are lost; part of one exists ap. Origen, d. de Orat. c. 5. p. 203, a. b. (See Routh's teivaiours Sac. ii. p. 367.) Origen dedicated to him his Exhortation to Martyrs; Books against Ulemas: Commentary on St. John's Gospel; and On Prayer.

AMBROSIIUS, ST., bishop of Milan, was probably at Augusta Trevirorum (Tresses), which was the seat of government for the province "Graecia," which his father was prefect. His biographers differ as to whether the date of his birth was 333 or 340 A.D., but the latter is probably the true date. Circumstances occurred in his infancy which were understood to portend his future greatness. His father having died, Ambrose, then a boy, accompanied his mother to Rome, where he received the education of an advocate under Anicius Probus and Symmachus. He began pleading causes at Milan, then the imperial residence, and soon gained a high reputation for forensic eloquence. This success, together with the influence of his family, led to his appointment (about 370 A.D., or a little later) as consular prefect of the provinces of Liguria and Aemilia, whose seat of government was Milan.

The struggle between the Catholics and Arians was now at its height in the Western Church, and upon the death of Aunarius, bishop of Milan, in 374, the question of the appointment of his successor led to an open conflict between the two parties. Ambrose exerted his influence to restore peace, and addressed the people in a conciliatory speech, at the conclusion of which a child in the further part of the crowd cried out "Ambrosius episcopus." The words were received as an oracle from heaven, and Ambrose was elected bishop by the acclamation of the whole multitude, the bishops of both parties uniting in his election. It was in vain that he adopted the strangest devices to alter the determination of the people; nothing could make them change their mind. (Paulin. Vit. Ambrosi. pp. 2, 3; in vain did he flee from Milan in the night; he mistook his way, and found himself the next morning before the gate of the city. At length he yielded to the express command of the emperor (Valentinian I.), and was consecrated on the eighth day after his baptism, for at the time of his election he was only a catechumen.

Immediately after his election he gave all his property to the church and the poor, and adopted an ascetic mode of life, while the public administration of his office was most firm and skilful. He was a great patron of monasticism; about two years after his consecration he wrote his three books "De Virginibus," and dedicated them to his sister Marcellina. In the Arian controversy he espoused the orthodox side at his very entrance on his bishopric by demanding that his baptism should be performed by an orthodox bishop. He applied himself most diligently to the study of theology under Simplician, a presbyter of Rome, who afterwards became his successor in the bishopric. His influence soon became very great, both with the people and with the emperor Valentinian and his brother Gratian, for whose instruction he composed his treatises "De Fide," and "De Spiritu Sancto." In the year 377, in consequence of an invasion of Italy by the northern barbarians, Ambrose fled to Illyricum, and afterwards (in Cave's opinion) visited Rome. After his return to Milan, he was employed by the court on important political affairs. When Maximus, after the death of Gratian (383), threatened Italy, Justina, the mother of the young emperor Valentinian II., sent Ambrose on an embassy to the usurper, whose advance the bishop succeeded in delaying. At a later period (387), Ambrose went again to Treses on a like mission; but his conduct on this occasion gave such offence to Maximus, that he was compelled to return to Italy in haste.
AMBRYON.

Her contest with Ambrose began in the year 380, when she appointed an Arian bishop to the vacant see of Sirmium; upon which Ambrose went to Sirmium, and, a miraculous judgment on an Arian who insulted him having struck terror into his opponents, he consecrated Anemnusius, who was of the orthodox party, as bishop of Sirmium, and then returned to Milan, where Justina set on foot several intrigues against him, but without effect. In the year 382, Palladius and Secundianus, two Arian bishops, petitioned Gratian for a general council to decide the Arian controversy; but, through the influence of Ambrose, instead of a general council, a synod of Italian, Illyrian and Gallic bishops was assembled at Aquileia, over which Ambrose presided, and by which Palladius and Secundianus were deposed.

At length, in the years 385 and 386, Ambrose and Justina came to open conflict. Justina, in the name of the emperor, demanded of Ambrose the use of at least one of the churches in Milan, for the performance of divine worship by Arian ecclesiastics. Ambrose refused, and the people rose up to take his part. At Easter (385) an attempt was made by Justina to take forcible possession of the basilica, but the show of resistance was so great, that the attempt was abandoned, and the court was even obliged to apply to Ambrose to quell the tumult. He answered, that he had not stirred up the people, and that God alone could still them. The people now kept guard about the bishop's residence and the basilica, which the imperial forces hesitated to attack. In fact, the people were almost wholly on the side of Ambrose, the Arian party consisting of few beyond the court and the Gothic troops. Auxentius, an Arian bishop, who was Justina's chief adviser in these proceedings, now challenged Ambrose to a public disputation in the emperor's palace; but Ambrose refused, saying that a council of the church was the only proper place for such a discussion. He was next commanded to leave the city, which he at once refused to do, and in this refusal the people still supported him. In order to keep up the spirits of the people, he introduced into the church where they kept watch the regular performance of antiphonal hymns, which had been long practised in the Eastern Church, but not hitherto introduced into the West. At length, the contest was decided about a year after its commencement by the miracles which are reported to have attended the discovery of the relics of two hitherto unknown martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius. A blind man was said to have been restored to sight, and several demons dispossessed. These events are recorded by Ambrose himself, in his works形成了, and by his disciple Augustine, who was in Milan at the time; but a particular discussion of the truth of these miracles would be out of place here. They were denied by the Arians and discredited by the court, but the impression made by them upon the people in general was such, that Justina thought it prudent to desist from her attempt. (Ambros. Epist. xxii., xxii.; Paulin. Vit. Ambros. § 14-17, p. 4; Augustin. Confess. ix. 7. § 14-16, De Civ. Dei. xxxii. 8. § 2; Serm. 318, 296.)

An imperial rescript was however issued in the same year for the toleration of all sects of Christians, any offence against which was made high treason (Cod. Theodos. IV. De Fide Catholica); but we have no evidence that its execution was attempted; and the state of the parties was quite altered by the death of Justina in the next year (387), when Valentinian became a Catholic, and still more completely by the victory of Theodosius over Maximus (388). This event put the whole power of the empire into the hands of a prince who was a firm Catholic, and over whom Ambrose speedily acquired such influence, that, after the massacre at Thessalonica in 388, he received Theodosius admission into the church of Milan for a period of eight months, and only restored him after he had performed a public penance, and had confessed that he had learnt the difference between an emperor and a priest.

Ambrose was an active opponent not only of the Arians, but also of the Macedonians, Apollinarians, and Novatians, and of Jovinian. It was probably about the year 384 that he successfully resisted the petition of Symmachus and the heathen senators of Rome for the restoration of the altar of Victory. He was the principal instructor of Augustine in the Christian faith. (Augustin.)

The later years of his life, with the exception of a short absence from Milan during the usurpation of Eugenius (392), were devoted to the care of his bishopric. He died on the 4th of April April. A. D. 397.

As a writer, Ambrose cannot be ranked high notwithstanding his great eloquence. His theological knowledge scarcely extended beyond a faint acquaintance with the works of the Greek fathers from whom he borrowed much. His works bear also the marks of haste. He was rather a man of action than of letters.

His works are very numerous, though several of them have been lost. They consist of Letters, Sermons, and Orationes, Commentaries on Scripture, Treatises in commendation of celibacy and monasticism, and other treatises, of which the most important are: "Hexaemeron," an account of the creation; "De Officis Ministrorum," which is generally considered his best work; "De Mysteriis; "De Sacramentis;" "De Poomententia;" and the above-mentioned works, "De Fide," and "De Spiritu Sancto," which are both upon the Trinity. The well-known hymn, "Te Deum laudamus," has been ascribed to him, but its date is at least a century later. There are other hymns ascribed to him, but upon doubtful authority. He is believed to have settled the order of public worship in the churches of Milan in the form which it had till the eighth century under the names of "Officium An broshammon" and "Missa Ambrosiana."

The best edition of his works is that of the Benedicentines, 2 vols. fol., Paris, 1866 and 1867 with an Appendix containing a life of Ambrose by his secretary Paulinus, and an appendix which is anonymous, and is chiefly copied from Theodosian Ecclesiastical History, and a third by the Benedicentines. Two works of Ambrose, Epistolas. Symboli ad initiantes, and Epistula de Fide, have been discovered by Angelo Mai, and are published by him in the seventh volume of his Scriptores Veterum Nova Collectio. [P. S.]

AMBROSIUS, a lover of Didymus, at Alexandria, lived A. D. 392, and was the author of Commentaries on Job, and a book in verse against Apollinaris of Laodicea. Neither is extant. (Hieron. de Vit. Illust. § 126.) [A. J. C.]

AMBRYON ('Ambyron') wrote a work name Theoricius the Chian, from which Diogenes Lae AMBUSTUS, (v. 11) quotes an epigram of Theocritus against Aristode.

AMBRYSUS (Ἀμέφρυςος), the mythical founder of the town of Ambryuss or Amphiyrus in Phocis. (Paus. x. 36. § 2. [L. S.].)

AMBULIA, AMBULI, and AMBULIUS (Ἀμβύλια, Ἀμβύλιος, and Ἀμβυλιος), surnames under which the Spartans worshipped Athena, the Dioscuri, and Zeus. (Paus. iii. 13. § 4.) The meaning of the name is uncertain, but it has been supposed to be derived from ἀνάμβλας, and to designate those divinities as the delayers of death.

AMBUSTUS, the name of a family of the patrician fabii gens. The first member of the Fabii gens, who acquired this cognomen, was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul in b.c. 412, who appears to have been a son of N. Fabius Vibulanus, consul in b.c. 421. From this time the name Vibulanus was dropped, and that of Ambustus took its place. The latter was in its turn supplanted by that of Maximus, which was first acquired by Q. Fabius, son of N. Fabius Vibulanus, and was handed down by him to his descendants.

1. Q. FABRIS M. P. Q. N. VIBULANVS AMBUSTUS, consul in b.c. 412. (Liv. iv. 52.)

2. M. FABRIS AMBUSTUS, Pontifex Maximus in the year that Rome was taken by the Gauls, b.c. 390. His three sons [see Nos. 3, 4, and 5] were sent as ambassadors to the Gauls, when the latter were besieging Clusium, and took part in a sally of the besieged against the Gauls. The Gauls demanded that the Fabii should be surrendered to them for violating the law of nations; and upon the senate refusing to give up the guilty executives, they marched against Rome. The three sons were in the same year elected consular tribunes. (Liv. v. 35, 36, 41; Plut. Cim. 17.)

3. K. FABRIS M. Q. N. AMBUSTUS, son of No. 2 and brother to Nos. 4 and 5, was quaestor in b.c. 409, with three plebeians as his colleagues, which was the first time that quaestors were chosen from the plebs. (Liv. iv. 54.) He was consular tribune for the first time in 404 (iv. 61), gain in 401 (v. 10), a third time in 395 (v. 24), and a fourth time in 390. [See No. 2.]

4. N. FABRIS M. Q. N. AMBUSTUS, son of No. 2 and brother to Nos. 3 and 5, was consular tribune in b.c. 406 (Liv. iv. 59), and again in 390. [See No. 2.]

5. Q. FABRIS M. P. Q. N. AMBUSTUS, son of No. 2 and brother to Nos. 3 and 4, was consular tribune in b.c. 390. [See No. 2.]

6. M. FABRIS K. R. M. N. AMBUSTUS, son, as appears, of No. 3, was consular tribune in b.c. 390, and killed in battle. [See 2.]

7. M. FABRIS N. P. M. N. AMBUSTUS, son, as appears, of No. 4, was consul in b.c. 360, and died on the war against the Herulien, whom he captured, and obtained an ovation in consequence. (Liv. vii. 11; Fast. Triumph.) He was consul a second time in 356, and carried on the war against the Palai and Turquipliesmes, whom he also conquered. As he was absent from Rome when the time came for holding the comitia, the senate, which did not like to entrust him to his colleague, who had appointed a plebeian dictator, and still less to the dictator himself, nominated interreges for the purpose. The object of the patricians was to secure both places in the consulsiply for their own order again, which was effected by Ambustus, who seems to have returned to Rome meantime. He was appointed the eleventh interrex, and declared two patricians consuls in violation of the licetian law. (Liv. vii. 17.) He was consul a third time in 354, when he conquered the Tiburrus and obtained a triumph in consequence. (vii. 18, 19; Fast. Triumph.) In 351 he was appointed dictator merely to frustrate the Licetian law again at the comitia, but did not succeed in his object. (Liv. vii. 22.) He was alive in 325, when his son, Q. Fubius Maximus Rullius, was master of the horse to Papirius and Seece Rome to import protection from the vengeance of the dictator. He interceded on his son's behalf both with the senate and the people. (viii. 33.)

8. C. FABRIS (C. F. M. N.) AMBUSTUS, consul in b.c. 353, in which year a dictator was appointed through fear of the Gauls. (Liv. vii. 12.)

9. M. FABRIS M. P. N. N. AMBUSTUS, son apparently of No. 7, and brother to the great Q. Fabius Maximus Rullius, was master of the horse in b.c. 332. (Liv. viii. 36.)

10. Q. FABRIS (Q. F. Q. N.) AMBUSTUS, dictator in b.c. 323, but immediately resigned through some fault in the election. (Liv. ix. 7.)

11. C. FABRIS M. F. N. N. AMBUSTUS, son apparently of No. 7, and brother to No. 9, was appointed master of the horse in b.c. 315 in place of Q. Annius, who fell in battle. (Liv. ix. 28.)

AMEMPIAS. [ARMBUSTUS.]

AMEINYAS (Ἀμεινιας), a younger brother of Aeschylos, of the Attic demes of Pallene according to Herodotus (viii. 34, 93), or of that of Deceles according to Pintarch (Them. 14), distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis (b.c. 480) by making the first attack upon the Persian ships, and also by his pursuit of Artameas. He and Eumenes were judged to have been the bravest on this occasion among all the Athenians. (Herod. Plat. ii. cc.; Dion. xii. 27.) Aelian mentions (V. H. v. 19), that Aenomeas prevented the condemnation of his brother Aeschylus by the Areiopagus. (Aeschylus, p. 41, a.)

AMEINOCLES (Ἀμεινοκλῆς), a Corinthian shipbuilder, who built four merchant ships for the Samians. (Thuc. i. 13.) Pliny (H. N. vii. 56) says, that Thucydides mentioned Ameinocles as the inventor of the trireme; but this is a mistake, for Thucydides merely states that triremes were first built at Corinth in Greece, without ascribing their invention to Ameinocles. According to Synesius (p. 212, c), triremes were first built at Athens by Ameinocles.

AMEIPSIAS (Ἀμειπσιας), a comic poet of Athens, contemporary with Aristophanes, whom he twice conquered in the dramatic contests, gaining the second prize with his Κόσμος when Aristophanes was third with the "Clouds" (425 B.C.), and the first prize with his Καισαρος, when Aristophanes gained the second with the "Birds." (414 B.C.) Argum. in Aristoph. Nat. et Aes. The Kôous appears to have had the same subject and aim as the "Clouds." It is at least certain that Socrates appeared in the play, and that the Chorus consisted of Φροντίσται. (Diog. Laert. ii. 28; Athen. v. p. 218.) Aristophanes alludes to Ameipsia in the "Frogs" (v. 12—14), and we are told in the anonymous life of Aristophanes, that when Aristophanes first exhibited his plays, in the names of other poets, Ameipsia applied to him the proverb τετράδα γεγονός, which means "a person who labours for others," in allusion to Heracles, who was born on the fourth of the month.

Ameipsias wrote many comedies, out of which there remain only a few fragments of the following:—Ασκοτευμένοις, Κατ' οδοειδίαν (donful), Κῶους, Μοίχε, Ἐσπίνδων, and of some the names of which are unknown. Most of his plays were of the old comedy, but some, in all probability, were of the middle. (Meineke, Frag. Com. i. p. 199, ii. p. 701.)

[PS. S.]

AMÉLEŚAGORAS (Ἀμελέςαγορᾶς) or MELEŚAGORAS (Μελέςαγορᾶς), as he is called by others, of Chaldæon, one of the early Greek historians, from whom Gorgias and Euripides of Naxos borrowed. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 628, a; Schol. ad Eurip. p. 2; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3, where Heyne has substituted Μελέαγρος for Μελέαγορας.) Maximus Tyrius (Serm. 38. § 6) speaks of a Melesagoras, a native of Eleusis, and Antigonis of Carystus (Hist. Mirab. c. 12) of an Ameleasoras of Athens, the latter of whom wrote an account of Attica; these persons are probably the same, and perhaps also the same as Ameliesagoras of Chaldæon. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. ap. 32, ed. Westmorm.)

AMÉLIUS (Ἀμέλιος), a native of Apeamone according to Suidas (ἐν ἄπεμλιος), but a Tuscan according to Porphyry (vul. Plotin.), belonged to the new Platonic school, and was the pupil of Plotinus and master of Porphyry. He quoted the opinion of St. John about the Ἀγας without mentioning the name of the Apostle; this extract has been preserved by Eusebius. (Procop. Epit. xi. 19.) See Suid. Porphy. ll. cc; Syriam. xii. Metaph. p. 47, a 61, b. 69, a. 88, a; Bentley, Remarka on Free-Thinking, p. 183, &c, Lond. 1743; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 160.

AMENÉTES (Ἄμενήτης), an ancient Greek surgeon, mentioned by Oden as the inventor of some ingenious bandages. (De Facis, c. 50, 61, 69, vol. xii. pp. 495, 497, 493, ed. Chart.) Some fragments of the works of a surgeon named Amynos (of which name Amenet is very possibly a corruption) still exist in the manuscript Collection of Surgical Writers by Nicetas (Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vol. xii. p. 778, ed. vet.), and one extract is preserved by Orbeusianus (Coll. Med. xivii. 30) in the fourth volume of Cardinal Mal's Collection of Classic Astures & Vaticani Codicis, p. 99, Rom. 1831, 8vo. His date is unknown, except that he must have lived in or before the second century after Christ. He may perhaps be the same person who is said to be the Scholiast on Theocritus (Adelph. vii. 126) to have been put to death by Ptolomy Philadelphus, about c. 264, for plotting against his life. [W. A. G.]

AMÉRIAS (Ἀμήρειας), of Macedonias, a grammarian, who wrote a work entitled Πραξικοπῆς, which gave an account of the meaning of words, and another called Προγενομένως. (Athen. iv. p. 176, c. e. xv. p. 681, &c; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 384, 1284; Kuster, ad Hesych. a. c. Aμήρειας.)

AMÉRISTUS (Ἀμήρειτος), the brother of the poet Steichos, is mentioned by Pausanias (ad Eurid. ii. p. 19) as one of the early Greek geometers. He lived in the latter part of the seventh century B.C.

AMÉSTRIS. [AMASTRIS.]

AMÍA'NUS, whom Cicero mentions in a letter to Atticus (vi. 1. § 13), written b. c. 50, was probably a debitor of Atticus in Cicia.

AMISO'DARUS (Ἀμισοδάρος), a king of Ilycian, who was said to have brought up the monster Chi- naera. (Hom. Í. xvi. 328; Bystath. ad Hom. p. 1092; Apollod. ii. 3. § 1; Aelian, H. A. i. 23.) His sons Atymnius and Marns were slain at Troy by the sons of Nestor. (H. i. 317, &c.) [L. S.]

AMITÓN (Ἀμιτώς), of Eleuchernus in Crete, is said to have been the first person who sung to the lyre the amatory poems. His descendants were called Αμιτορές (Ἀμιτόρες). (Athen. xiv. p. 430, &c.) There seems some corruption in the text of Athenaeus, as the two names Αμίτον and Αμιτών do not correspond. Instead of the former we ought perhaps to read Αμιτόν. (Comp. Etym. M. p. 83, 15, ed. Sylburg.; Hesych. e. v. Αμιτορίς.)

AMMIÁNUS (Ἀμμιάνος), a Greek epigrammatist, but probably a Roman by birth. The Greek Anthology contains 27 epigrams by him (Jacobs, iii. pp. 93—90), to which must be added another contained in the Vatican MS. (Jacobs xii. p. 693), and another, which is placed among the anonymous epigrams, but which some MSS assign to Ammianus. (Jacobs, iv. p. 127, No. 23.) They are all of a facetious character. In the Planudean MS. he is called Abbainus, which Wernsford supposes to be a Greek form of Aviana or Avienus. (Poet. Lat. Min. v. p. ii. 675.)

The time at which he lived may be gathered with tolerable certainty, from his epigrams. He was a contemporary of the epigrammatist Lucilius, who lived under Nero, has been inferred from the circumstance that both attack an outour name Flaccus. (Ammian. Ep. 2; Lucil. Ep. 85, aq Jacobs.) One of his epigrams (13) is identical with the last two lines of one of Martinus' (ix. 30) who is supposed by some to have translated these lines from Ammianus, and therefore to have live after him. But the fact is equally well explain in the supposition that the poets were contemporary. From two other epigrams of Ammianus (Jacobs, vol. iv. p. 127, No. 42; and vol. xii. p. 123), we find that he was contemporary with the sophist Antonius Polemo, who flourished under Trajan and Hadrian. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. xx. pp. 312, 313, xiii. p. 840.)

AMMIÁNUS MARCELLI'NUS, "the last subject of Rome who composed a profuse historian in the Latin language," was by birth a Greek, as he himself frequently declares (xxxi. sub fin. xxi. 8. § 33, xxxii. 6. § 24, &c.), and a native of Syrian Antioch, as we infer from a letter address to him by Libanius. (See Vales. proof. in Ammianus Marcellin.) At an early age he embraced the profession of arms, and was admitted among the protectores domestici, which proves that he belonged to a distinguished family, since none were enrolled in that corps except young men of noble blood, officers whose valour and fidelity had been proved in long service. Of his subsequent promotion nothing is known. He was attached to the court of Ursicinus, one of the most able among the generals of Constantius, and accompanied him to the East in 350. He returned with his commander to Italy four years afterwards, from thence passed over into Gaul, and assisted in the enterprise against Sylvanus, again followed Ursicinus when despatched for a second time to the East, and appears to have never quitted him until the period of his final disgrace in 360. Ammianus subsequently attended the emperor Julian in his campaign against the Persians, was present at Antioch in 371, when the plot of Theodorus was detected in the reign of Valens, and witnessed the tortures inflicted upon the conspirators. (xxix. i. § 24.) Eventually he established himself at Rome, where he composed his history, and during the progress of the task read several portions publicly, which were received with great applause. (Liban. Epist. xxxviceetxxii. p. 60, ed. Wolf.) The precise date of his death is not recorded, but it must have happened later than 390, since a reference occurs to his consularship of Nectarius, which belongs to that year.

The work of Ammianus extended from the accession of Nerva, A. D. 96, the point at which the histories of Tacitus and the biographies of Suecius terminated, to the death of Valens, A. D. 378, comprising a period of 282 years. It was divided into thirty-one books, of which the first thirteen were lost. The remaining eighteen embrace the acts of Constantius from A. D. 333, the seventeenth year of his reign, together with the whole career of Gallus, Julianus, Jovinus, Valentinianus, and Valens. The portion preserved includes the transactions of twenty-five years only, which proves that the earlier books must have presented a very condensed abridgment of the events contained in his long space over which they stretched; and once we may feel satisfied, that what has been availed is much more valuable than what has perished.

Gibbon (cap. xxvi.) pays a well deserved tribute to the accuracy, fidelity, and impartiality of Ammianus. We are indebted to him for a knowledge of many important facts not elsewhere recorded, and for much valuable insight into the modes of thought and the general tone of public opinion prevalent in his day. His history must not, however, be regarded as a complete chronicle of that age; those proceedings only are brought forward prominently in which he himself was engaged, and early all the statements admitted appear to be founded upon his own observations, or upon the information derived from trustworthy eye-witnesses. A considerable number of the characteristics of nations are introduced, many of them highly interesting and valuable. Such are his notices of the institutions and manners of the Sarmatians (xiv. 4), the Scythians and Sarmatians (xvi. 12), of the Iuns and Alani (xxvi. 2), of the Egyptians and their coin (xxvi. 6, 14—16), and his geographical discussions upon Gaul (xv. 9), the Pontus (xxii. 8), and Thrace (xxvii. 4), although the accuracy of many of his details has been called in question by D'Anville. Less legitimate and less diluting are his geological speculations upon earthquakes (xvii. 7), his astronomical inquiries into eclipses (xx. 3), comets (xxv. 10), and the regulation of the calendar (xxvi. 1), his medical researches into the origin of epidemics (xix. 4), his oological theory on the destruction of lions by mosquitoes (xviii. 7), and his horticultural essay on the improvement of palms (xviii. 8). But in addition to the most rigid and honest of purpose, he was gifted with a large measure of strong common sense which enabled him in many points to rise superior to the prejudice of his day, and with a clear-sighted independence of spirit which prevented him from being dazzled or overawed by the brilliancy and the terrors which enveloped the imperial throne. The wretched vanity, weakness, and debauchery of Constantius, rendering him an easy prey to the designs of the profligate minions by whom he was surrounded, the female intrigues which ruled the court of Gallus, and the conflicting elements of vice and virtue which were so strongly combined in the character of Valentinian, are all sketched with boldness, vigour, and truth. But although sufficiently acute in detecting and exposing the follies of others, and especially in ridiculing the absurdities of popular superstition, Ammianus did not entirely escape the contagion. The general and despoiled belief in magic spells, omens, prodigies, and oracles, which appears to have gained additional strength upon the first introduction of Christianity, evidently exercised no small influence over his mind. The old legends and doctrines of the Pagan creed and the subtle mysticism which philosophers pretended to discover lurking below, when mixed up with the pure and simple but startling tenets of the new faith, formed a confused mass which few intellects, except those of the very highest class, could reduce to order and harmony.

A keen controversy has been maintained with regard to the religious creed of our author. (See Bayle.) There is nothing in his writings which can entitle us to decide the question positively. In several passages he speaks with marked respect of Christianity and its professors (xxi. sub fin., xxii. 11, xxvii. 5; compare xxii. 12, xxv. 4); but even his strongest expressions, which are all attributed by Gibbon "to the incomparable pliancy of a polytheist," afford no conclusive evidence that he was himself a disciple of the cross. On the other hand he does not scruple to stigmatize with the utmost severity the savage fury of the contending sects (xxi. 5), nor fail to reprobrate the bloody violence of Damasus and Ursinus in the contest for the see of Rome (xxvii. 3); the absence of all censure on the upstart of Julian, and the terms which he employs with regard to Nemesis (xiv. 11, xxii. 3), the Genius (xxiv. 14), Marcius (xxv. 4, xxvii. 4), and other deities, are by many considered as dispositive of the fact that he was a pagan. He justly remarks, many of the writers of this epoch seem purposely to avoid committing themselves. Being probably devoid of strong religious principles, they felt unwilling to hazard any declaration which might one day expose them to persecution and prevent them from adopting the various forms which the faith of the court might from time to time assume.

Little can be said in praise of the style of Ammianus. The melodic flow and simple dignity of the purer models of composition had long ceased to be relished, and we too often detect the harsh diction and involved periods of an imperfectly educated foreign soldier, relieved occasionally by the pompous inflation and flashy glitter of the rhetorical schools. His phraseology as it regards the signification, grammatical inflexions, and syntactical
AMMON.

The Edito Princeps of Amminius Marcellinus, edited by Angelus Sabinius, was printed at Rome, in folio, by George Sachsel and Barth. Golsch in the year 1474. It is very incorrect, and contains 13 books only, from the 14th to the 26th, both inclusive. The remaining five were first published by Accorsi, who, in his edition printed in folio at Augsburg in 1552, boasts that he had corrected five thousand errors.

The most useful modern editions are those of Gronovius, 4to., Lugd. Bat. 1693; of Ernesti, 8vo. Lips., 1775; but above all, that which was committed by Wiegner, compiled after his death by Erardi, and published at Lutepse, in 3 vols. 8vo. 1808. [W. R.]

AMMON (Ἀμμων), originally an Aethiopian or Libyan divinity, whose worship subsequently spread all over Egypt, a part of the northern coast of Africa, and many parts of Greece. The real Egyptian name was Amun or Ammon (Herod. ii. 42; Plut. de Is. et Os. 9); the Greeks called him Zeus Ammon, the Romans Jupiter Ammon, and the Hebrews Amon. (Jerem. xlvii. 28.) That in the countries where his worship was first established he was revered in certain respects as the supreme divinity, is clear from the fact, that the Greeks recognised in him their own Zeus, although the identity of the two gods in later times rests upon philosophical speculations, made at a period when the original character of Ammon was almost lost sight of, and a more spiritual view of him substituted in its place.

The most ancient seat of his worship appears to have been Meroe, where he had a much revered oracle (Herod. ii. 29); thence it was introduced into Egypt, where the worship took the firmest root at Thebes in Upper Egypt, which was therefore frequently called by the Greeks Diospolis, or the city of Zeus. (Herod. ii. 42; Diod. i. 15.) Another famous seat of the god, with a celebrated oracle, was in the oasis of Ammonium (Sibah) in the Libyan desert; the worship was also established in Cyrenaica. (Plut. x. 13, § 3.) The god was represented either in the form of a ram, or as a human being with the head of a ram (Herod. ii. 8; Sibah xiv. p. 812); but there are some representations in which he appears altogether as a human being with only the horns of a ram. Territullian (de Pult. 3) calls him diœs ophiæ. If we take all these circumstances into consideration, it seems clear that the original idea of Ammon was that of a protector and leader of the flocks. The Aethiopians were a nomadic people, flocks of sheep constituted their principal wealth; and it is perfectly in accordance with the notions of the Aethiopians as well as Egyptians to worship the animal which is the leader and protector of the flock. This view is supported by various stories about Ammon. Hyginus (Poet. Astr. i. 20) whose account is only a rationalistic interpretation of the origin of the god's worship, relates that some African of the name of Ammon brought to Libei, who was then in possession of Egypt, a large quantity of cattle. In return for this, Libei gave him a piece of land near Thebes, and in commemoration of the benefits he had conferred upon the god, he was represented as a human being with horns. What Pausanias (iv. 23, § 5) and Eustathius (ad Dionys. Perip. 219) remark, as well as one of the many cymologies of the name of Ammon from the Egyptian word Amnâi, which signifies a shepherd, or to feed, likewise accord with the opinion that Ammon was originally the leader and protector of flocks. Herodotus relates a story to account for the ram's head (ii. 42): Heracles wanted to see Zeus, but the latter wished to avoid the interview; when, however, Heracles at last had recourse to entreaties, Zeus contrived the following expedient: he cut off the head of a ram, and holding this before his own head, and having covered the remaining part of his body with the skin of the ram, he appeared before Heraclès. Hence, Herodotus adds, the Thlemans never sacrifice a ram, but only a bull. In case occasion they kill and slay a ram, and with its skin they dress the statue of Zeus (Ammon); by the side of this statue they then place that of Hermes. A similar account mentioned by Servius (ad Aen. iv. 196) may serve as a commentary upon Herodotus. When Bacchus, or according to others, Hermes went to India and led his army through the desert of Libya, he was at last quite exhausted with thirst, and invoked his father, Jupiter. Hereupon a ram appeared, which led Heracles to a place where it opened a spring in the sand by spouting with its foot. For this reason, says Servius, Jupiter Ammon, whose name is derived from ἄμως (sand), is represented with the horns of a ram. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 158, Pov. Astr. i. 20 Lucan, Pharsal. i. 51.) There are several other traditions, with various modifications arising from the time and place of their origin; but all agree in representing the ram as the guide and deliverer of the wandering herdsmen and herdswomen in the deserts either in a direct way, or by giving oracles. Ammon, therefore, who is identical with the ram, is the guide and protector of man and of all his possessions; he stands in the same relation to man kind as the common ram to his flock.

The introduction of the worship of Ammon from Aethiopia into Egypt was symbolically represented in a ceremony which was performed at Thebes once in every year. On a certain day, the image of the god was carried across the river Nile into Libya, and after some days it was brought back, a if the god had arrived from Aethiopia. (Diod. i. 97. The same account is given by Eustathius (ad Hor. iv. v. p. 128), though in a somewhat different form for he relates, that according to some, the Aethiopians used to fetch the images of Zeus and other gods from the great temple of Zeus at Thebes; with these images they went about, at a certain period, in Libya, celebrated a splendid festival for twelve days—for this, he adds, is the number of the gods they worship. This number twelve contains an allusion to the number of signs in the zodiac, of which the ram (capræ) is one. Thus we arrive at the second plaus in the character of Ammon, who is here conceived as the ram in the sign of Capræ. (Zeus disguised in the skin of a ram. See Hygin. Fab. 133, Pov. Astr. i. 20; Macro. Sat. i. 21, 18; Aelian. V. H. x. 18.) This astro-nomical character of Ammon is of later origin, and perhaps not older than the sixth century before Christ. The speculating Greeks of still later times assigned the ram to a more spiritual meaning. The Diodorus, though in a passage (iii. 68, &c.) makes Ammon a king of Libya, describes him (11, &c.) as the spirit pervading the universe, an

as the author of all life in nature. (Comp. Plut. de Is. et Os. 9, 21.) The new Platonists perceived in Ammon their demiurges, that is, the creator and preserver of the world. As this subject belongs more especially to the mythology of Egypt, we cannot here enter into a detailed discussion about the nature and character which the later Greeks assigned to him, or his connexion with Dionysus and Heracles. Respecting these points and the various opinions of modern critics, as well as the different representations of Ammon still extant, the reader may consult Jebbison, Panticapaeum Egypt.; Bohien, Das alte Juden, mit besonderer Rucksicht auf Egypten, ii. c. 2; S. The worship of Ammon was introduced into Greece at an early period, probably through the medium of the Greek colony in Cyrene, which must have formed a connexion with the great oracle of Ammon in the Oasis soon after its establishment. Ammon had a temple and a statue, the gift of Pindar, at Thebes (Paus. ix. 16, § 1), and another at Sparta, the inhabitants of which, as Pausanias (iii. 18, § 2) says, consulted the oracle of Ammon in Libya from early times more than the other Greeks. At Abydos, Ammon was worshipped, from the time of Lyaeus, as zealously as in Ammonium. Pindar the poet honoured the god with a hymn. At Megalopolis the god was represented with the Phœnician ram (Paus. viii. 32, § 1), and the Greeks of Cynocephales dedicated at Delphi a chortos with a statue of Ammon. (x. 13, § 3.) The heagone which Alexander paid to the god in the Oasis is well known. [L. S.]

AMMON ('Ammon'), a geometer, who made a waivable of the walls of Rome, about the time of the first invasion of the Goths, and found them to be 21 miles in circuit. (Olympiodorus, ap. Phot. Cod. 80, p. 63, ed. Bekker.) [P. S.]

AMMON ('Ammon'). 1. Bishop of Hadriamople, a. d. 400, wrote (in Greek) On the Resurrection against Origenism (not extant). A fragment of Ammon, from this work possibly, may be found ap. S. Cyril. Alex. Lib. de Recta Fide. (Vol. v. pt. 2, ad fin. p. 50, ed. Paris. 1628.) He was present at the Council of Constantinople a. d. 381, held on occasion of the dedication of Rufinus's church, near Chalecon. (Sac. Hist. Eccl. viii. 3, 3; Mansi, Concilia, vol. iii. p. 531.)

AMMONAS ('Ammonas') or AMOUN ('Ammon'), founder of one of the most celebrated monastic communities in Egypt. Obligated by his relations to marry, he persuaded his bride to perpetual continence (Synom. Hist. Eccl. 1.14) by the authority of St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians (Soc. Hist. Eccl. iv. 23.) They lived together thus for 18 years, when at her wish, for greater perfection, they parted, and he retired to Scetis and Mt. Nitria, to the south of Lake Marisoticus, where he lived 22 years, visiting his sister-wife twice in the year. (Ibid. and Pallad. Hist. Laos. c. 7; Ruffin. Vit. Patr. c. 29.) He died before St. Antony (from whom there is an epistle to him, S. Athan. Opp. vol. i. pt. 2, p. 959, ed. Bened.). i. e. before a. d. 365, for the latter asserted that he beheld the soul of Ammon borne by angels to heaven (Vit. S. Antonii a. S. Athanas. c. 60), and as St. Athanasius's history of St. Antony preserves the order of time, he died perhaps about a. d. 320. There are seventeen or nineteen Rules of Asceticism (κυράκες) ascribed to him; the Greek original exists in MS. (Lambecius, Biblioth. Vindol. lib. iv. cod. 156, No. 6); they are published in the Latin version of Gerhard Vossius in the Biblioth. P. Ascetica, vol. ii, p. 484, Paris. 1631. On the Structure of the Semitic Ammon, or one bearing the same name, exist also in MS. (Lambec. L. Cod. 155, No. 2.) [A. C.]

AMMONIA ('Ammonia'), a surname of Herus, under which she was worshipped in Elys. The inhabitants of Elys had from the earliest times been in the habit of consulting the oracle of Zeus Ammon in Libya. (Paus. v. 15, § 7.) [L. S.]

AMMONIANTUS ('Ammoniantus'), a Greek grammarian, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He was a relation and a friend of the philosopher Simmacus, and devoted his attention to the study of the Greek poets. It is recorded of him that he had an ass, which became so fond of poetry from listening to its master, that it neglected its food. (Damasius, op. Phot. p. 392, ed. Bekker; Suid. s. a. 'Ammoniantus' de 666 'Apa.)

AMMONIUS, a favourite of Alexander Balas, king of Syria, to whom Alexander entrusted the entire management of public affairs. Ammonius was ambitious and cruel; he put to death numerous friends of the king, the queen Laodice, and Antigonus, the son of Demetrius. Being detected in plotting against the life of Ptolemy Philometor, about a. d. 147, the latter required Alexander to surrender Ammonius to him; but though Alexander refused to do this, Ammonius was put to death by the inhabitants of Antioch, whom Ptolemy had induced to execute his cause. (Liv. Eq. 50; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 4, 5; Diod. Exc. 29, p. 628, ed. Weis.)

AMMONIUS ('Ammonius') of Alexandria, a son of Ammonius, was a pupil of Alexander, and one of the chief lecturers of the Coptic school founded by Arianschus. (Suid. s. a. 'Ammonius') He wrote commentaries upon Homer, Pindar, and Aristophanes, none of which are extant. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 712; Matter, Essais historiques sur l'école d'Alexandrie, i. pp. 179, 233.)

AMMONIUS ('Ammonius') of Alexandria, Presbyter and Oeconomus of the Church in that city, and an Egyptian by birth, a. d. 458. He subscribed the Epistle sent by the clergy of Egypt to the emperor Leo, in behalf of the Council of Chalecon. (Concilia, ed. Labbe, vol. iv. p. 697, b.) He wrote (in Greek) On the Difference between Nature and Person, against the Monophysite heresy of Eutyches and Dioscorus (not extant); an Exposition of the Book of Acts (ap. Catena Grecor. Patr. in Act. SS. Apostolarum, vol. 80, Oxon. 1839, ed. Cranmer); a Commentary on the Psalms (used by Nicetas in his Catena; see Cod. 139, Biblioth. Cotelini., ed. Montfaucon, p. 244); On the Hexameron (no remains); On St. John's Gospel, which exists in the Catena Gregoriana Patrum in S. Ioan. ed. Codorsi, fol.

AMMONIUS.

AMMONIUS. Antw. 1630. He is quoted in the Catena on the History of Susannah and on Daniel. (Novo Collect. Scrip. Vel. ab Angelo Maio, p. 166, &c. vol. i. A. D. 1825.) [A. J. C.]

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμώνιος) GRAMMATICUS, professor of grammar at Alexandria, with Heliodorus, at the close of the 4th century. He was also priest of the Egyptian Ape. On the vigorous overthrow of idolatry in Egypt by the bishop Theophilus A. D. 389-391, Ammonius and Heliodorus lied to Constantine and then resumed their profession. (Socr. Hist. Ecl. v. 16.) Ammonius wrote, in Greek, On the Differences of Words of the Signification (ἐπίλεξις ἐπὶ ὕφελμνατα μεταφρασθέντα), which was appended to many lexicons, &c., to that of Scalpa. It was edited by Valckemener, 4to, Lugd. Bat. 1739, and with further notes by Chr. Frid. Ammon, 8vo, Erlang. 1787. There is another work by this Ammonius, περὶ διευκρισεως, which has not yet been printed. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 715.) The historian Socrates was a pupil of Ammonius. (Hist. Ecl. v. 16.) [A. J. C.]

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμώνιος), son of HERMAN, studied with his brother Heliodorus at Athens under Proclus (who died A. D. 484), and was the master of Simplicius, Asclepius Triallianus, John Philoponus, and Damascius. His Commentaries (in Greek) on Plato and Ptolemy are lost, as well as many on Aristotle. His extensive works on Commentaries on the Isagoge of Porphyry, or the Five Predicatives, first published at Venice in 1500, and On the Categories of Aristotle, and De Interpretatione, first published at Venice in 1503. See too ap. Alexand. Aphrod. De Fato, p. 180, 8vo. Lond. 1658. The above-named Commentaries on Aristotle are also published in the Schoiia in Arist. ed. Brandis. In MS. are his Commentaries on Aristotle's Topics and Metaphysics, and his Melanesi commentarii Astrologiae. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 707.) [A. J. C.]

AMMONIUS, of Lamprea, a village of Attica, a Peripatetic philosopher, who lived in the first century of the Christian era. He was the instructor of Plutarch, who praises his great learning (Symp. iii. 1), and introduces him discussing on religion and sacred rites. (Iv. 15.) Cercoli endeavours to show (de vita Plutarchi, p. 6), that he was a contemporary of Ammonius, and that he is the person mentioned by Athenaeus under Ammonius the Egyptian worship which he has shown in his treatise on Isis and Osiris.

Ammonius of Lamprea is mentioned by Ammius, the author of the work De Differentibus Verborum, under the word Αἰνίας, as having written a treatise Περὶ ἐνομισμάτων, or as the fuller title is given by Athenaeus, Περὶ μεθέλιων καὶ θεωρίων. (Iv. p. 470, 6.) Whether the same Ammonius was the author of another work, Περὶ τῶν Ἀνθρώπων Αἰνίας, mentioned by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 507, 2), is uncertain. [B. J.]

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμώνιος) LITHOTOMUS, an eminent surgeon of Alexandria, mentioned by Celsus (De Med. vii. Praef. p. 137), whose exact date is not known, but who probably lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadephus, n. c. 283-247, as his name occurs in Celsus together with those of several other surgeons who lived at that time. He is chiefly celebrated for having been the first person who thought of breaking a stone within the bladder when too large for extraction entirely, on which account he received the cognomen of Λιθοτομος. An account of his mode of practice, as described by Celsus (De Med. vii. 26, p. 161), is given in the Dict. of Aut. p. 220. Some medical premonations used by a physician of the same name occur also in Aetius and Paulus Aeginita, but whether they all belong to the same person is uncertain. [W. A. G.]

AMMONIUS, the Monk, flourished A. D. 572. He was one of the Four Great Brothers (so called from their height), disciples of Pambo, the monk of Mt. Nitria (Vita Pamii, ii. 28). Palaest. Hist. Leg. c. 12, ed. Roselli, 1773, does not mention him by name. He is, however, mentioned in several places in the writings of his contemporaries, and in the Historia in the Bible by heart, and carefully studied Didymus, Origen, and the other ecclesiastical authors. In A. D. 333-341 he accompanied St. Athanasius to Rome. In A. D. 571-3, Peter II succeeded the latter, and when he fled to Rome from his Arian persecutors, Ammonius retired from Canopus into Palestine. He witnessed the cruelties of the Saracens against the monks of Mount Sinai A. D. 377, and received intelligence of the sufferings of others near the Red Sea. On his return to Egypt, he took up his abode at Memphis, and described these distresses in a book which he wrote in Egyptian. This being found at Naucratit by a priest, named John, was by him translated into Greek, and in that form is extant, in Christi Martyramus Electi triumphi (p. 88, ed. Combesia, 8vo, Pnc. 1660). Ammonius is said to have cut off an ear to avoid promotion to the episcopate. (Secr. iv. 23; Pallad. Hist. Lat. c. 12.) [A. J. C.]

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμώνιος) the Periarteteric, who wrote only a few poems and declamations. He was a different person from Ammonius, the teacher of Plotinus. (Longin. Op. Porphyri. in Plotin. vitv. c. 20; Philosth. ii. 27; Ruhnken, Diss. de Longino.)

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμώνιος), a Greek poet, who lived in the reign of the emperor Theodosius II. He wrote an epic poem on the inscription of the Gods under Gauss (A. D. 400), which he called Taistor, and is said to have read in A. D. 436 to the emperor, who received it with great approbation (Socr. Hist. Ecl. vi. 6; Nicephor. xii. 6). Who this Ammonius was, and whether he is the one quoted in the Etymologium Magnum (κ.κ. Μισαρίς) from one Ammonius, and the two epigrams in the Anthologia Graeca (iii. 3, p. 841, ed. Jacobs) which bear the same name, belong to him, is uncertain. [L. S.]

AMMONIUS or HAMMONIUS, an ambasador of Ptolemaeus Auletes, who was sent to Rome n. c. 56 to seek assistance against the Alexandrines, who had opposed the king. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 1.) He is perhaps the same person as the Ammonius who is spoken of as one of the agents of Cleopatra in n. c. 44. (Ad Att. xx. 15.)

AMMONIUS, called SACCAS (Ἀμμώνιος Σάκκας, i.e. Σάκακορου), or sack-carrier, because his official employment was carrying the corn, lande at Alexandria, as a public porter (saccarii, or Godfeth ad Cod. Theod. 14, th. 22), was her of Christian parents. Phrygian armor (lib. i. adv. Christian. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 19). Eusebii (l. c.) and St. Jerome (Vit. ill. § 55) deny, he apostatized from the faith. At any rate he combined the study of philosophy with Christianity and is regarded by those who maintain his apostasy as the founder of the later Platonic School.
AMOR.

Among his disciples are mentioned Longinus, Hermannus, Plotinus (Amm. Marcell. xxii.), both Origen, and St. Hierocles. He died a. d. 243, at the age of more than 80 years. A life of Aristotle, prefixed to the Commentary of his nameakes on the Categories, has been ascribed to him, but it is probably the work of John Philoponus. The Pagan disciples of Ammonius held a kind of philosophical theology. Faith was derived by inward perception; God was threefold in essence, intelligence, (viz. in knowledge of himself) and power (viz. in activity), the two latter notions being inferior to the first; the care of the world was entrusted to gods of an inferior race, below the gods who were daemons, good and bad; ad ascetic life and theory led to the knowledge of the Infinite, who was worshipped by the vulgar, only in their national deities. The Alexandrian physics and psychology were in accordance with these principles. If we are to consider him a Christian, he was, besides his philosophy (which would, of course, be represented by Origen, and not by the pagan Alexandrian school as above described) noted for his writings (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19), especially on the Scriptures. (Euschk. Epist. ad Cyprian, à Gallandus Bibl. Patr. vol. ii.) He composed a Diairesis, or Harmony of the Gospels, which exists in the Latin version of Victor, bishop of Capua (in the 6th century, who hardly ascribed it to Tatian) and of Luscinus. (See Monumenta Patr. Orthodoxographi, i. pt. 2, per Grynauem, pp. 661-747, fol., Basle, 1569; E Graeco versu per Ottomar. Luscinum. Aug. Vind. 4to., 1523; and in German, Augsb., 8vo., 1524; the version of Victor, Mogunt., 8vo., 1524; Colon., 8vo., 1552; in Reg-Imp. et Consist. Monast. B. M. V. de Salem, 8vo., 1774; Biblioth. Patr. à Galland, vol. ii. p. 531, Venet., 1766; where vid. Prologem.) Besides the Harmony, Ammonius wrote De Consensu Moysis et Iesu (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19), which is praised by St. Jerome (Vit. Illustr. § 55), but is lost.

[ A. J. C.]

AMNISI'ADES (Ἀμνισιάδες or Ἀμνισάδες), the nymphs of the river Amnisus in Crete, who are mentioned in connexion with the worship of Artemis there. (Callim. Hymn. tō Deian. 15, 162; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 381.)

AMOMETUS (Ἀμομέτος), a Greek writer of uncertain date, who wrote a work on the people called Attaci (Pln. H. N. vi. 17, s. 20), and another entitled Ἀμομέτος εἰς Μερσύρους. (Antigom. Caryst. Hist. Mitr. c. 164; comp. Adimn. V. H. xvii. 6.) We ought probably to read Ἀμομέτος instead of Ἀρμόμετος in Schol. ad Apoll. iii. 179, and Eudoc. Vot. p. 248.

AMOPHIA'RETUS (Ἀμοφιάρετος), commander of the Pitanian lochus in the Spartan army, who refused to march previously to the battle of Platea (a. d. 479) to a part of the plain near the city, as Pausanias ordered, because he thought that such a movement was equivalent to a flight. He at length changed his mind when he had been left by the other part, who were set out to join Pausanias. He fell in the battle which followed, after distinguishing himself by his bravery, and was buried among the Irones. (Herod. ix. 53-57, 71, 85; Plut. Aristich. 17.) As to the meaning of the last word see Dict. of Ant. e. v. Elphy, and Titrwhit. Hist. of Greece, ii. p. 350.

AMOR, the god of love and harmony. He had no place in the religion of the Romans, who knew and speak of him only from what they had heard from the Greeks, and translate the Greek name Eros into Amor. [Eros.] [L. S.]

AMORAEUS (Ἀμοραῖος), king of the Dercians, in a war against whom, according to Ctesias (Persic. c. 6, ed. Lioni), Cyrus, the first king of Persia, fell.

AMORGES (Ἀμοργῆς). 1. A king of the Sacae, according to Ctesias, whom Cyrus, King of Persia, conquered in battle, but afterwards released, when he himself was vanquished and taken prisoner by Saporithia, the wife of Amorges. Ctesias represents Amorges as subsequently one of the two princes of the allies of Cyrus. (Persic. cc. 5, 4, 7, 8, ed. Lioni.)

2. A Persian commander, killed in Caria, in the revolt of the province, b. c. 498. (Hord. v. 121.)

3. The bastard son of Pisistratus, who revolted in Caria about b. c. 413. The Peloponnesians assisted Tissaphernes in putting down this revolt, and took Iasus, b. c. 412, which was held by Amorges. The latter fell into their hands on the capture of the place, and was surrendered to them by Tissaphernes. (Thuc. viii. 5, 19, 20, 54.)

AMPHELIIUS. We possess a short tract bearing the title Lecti Ampelii Liber Memorialis. It was first made known by Suidiusus, in 1638, from a MS. in the library of Juretus, and subsequent editors make frequent mention of an Ampelius, who enjoyed the high dignities of magister officiorum, proconsul and praefectus urbi under Valentinian and his immediate successors, and the name occurs in connexion with thirteen laws of the Theodosian code. Sidonius Apollinaris also (ix. 301) commemorates the learning of an Ampelius, but we nowhere find any allusion which would enable us to establish a connexion between the person or persons spoken of by these writers and the compiler of the Liber Memorialis. On the contrary Glaser has adduced reasons (in Rerum Italicarum Rerumque Italicarum ex spectat. p. 145), which render it probable that the author of the Liber Memorialis lived at an earlier time than the above-mentioned persons. It is stated in c. 18 of this book, "Sulla — primus invasit imperium, solusque depetravit." Now as Eusebius and Maximianus resigned the government in a. d. 305, and this event is spoken of by all the historians who treat of that period, the Liber Memorialis would seem to have been composed at least before that year.

This work, which is dedicated to a certain Marcius or Marius, equally unknown with the author himself, is a sort of common-place-book, containing within a short compass a condensed and miscellaneous summary, collected from various sources, of the most striking objects and phenomena of the material universe and the most remarkable events in the history of the world, the whole classified systematically under proper heads, and divided into fifty chapters. It is of little value in any point of view. Nearly all the facts recorded are to be found elsewhere in a more detailed and satisfactory form, and truth is so blended with false-

hood, and the blunders committed so numerous, that it cannot be used with safety for reference. The style, where it is not a mere catalogue of names, is simple and unaffected, but both in the construction of the sentences and in the use of particular words, we can detect many traces of corrupted latinity. The commentaries and criticisms of Salminius, Muretus, Freinsheim, Hein- sius, Petzianus and other scholars will be found in the edition of Duker at the end of his Florus. (Lug. Bat. 1722—1744, and reprinted at Leips. 1832.) Amphilus was first published in a separate form, with very useful prolegomena, by Zschacke (Leips. 1793), and subsequently by Pockwitz (Lünebr. 1823), and F. A. Beck. (Leips. 1826.) [W. R.]

AMPHIPANAX (Ἀμπίπαναξ), a king of Lydia. When Procris was expelled from Argos by his twin-brother Acrisius, Amphipanax received him at his court, gave him his daughter Antea (some call her Stenbeos) in marriage, and afterwards led him back to Argos, where his share in the government and Tyrins were restored to him. Some traditions called this Lycian king Iobates. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1; Hom. II. vi. 157, &c.) [L. S.]

AMPHIAR'ADES, a patronymic from Amph- iar, by which Ovid (Fast. ii. 43) calls his son Alcmene. [L. S.]

AMPHIAR'US (Ἀμφιάραος), a son of Oicles and Hypermestra, the daughter of Thesius. (Hom. Od. xv. 244; Apollod. i. 6. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 73; Paus. ii. 91. § 3.) On his father's side he descended from the famous hero Melampus. (Paus. vi. 17. § 4.) Some traditions represented him as a son of Apollo by Hypermestra, which, however, is merely a poetical expression to describe him as a seer and prophet. (Hygin. Fab. 70.) Amphiarus is renowned in ancient story as a brave hero: he is mentioned among the hunters of the Calydonian boar, which he is said to have deprived of one eye, and also as one of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2, 9. § 16.) For a time he reigned at Argo in common with Adrastus; but, in a feud which broke out between them, Adrastus took to flight. Afterwards, however, he became reconciled with Amphiarus, and gave him his sister Eriphyle in marriage [ADRASTES], by whom Amphiarus became the father of Alcmene, Amphilochus, Eurydice, and Demanassa. On marrying Eriphyle, Amphiarus had sworn, that he would abide by the decision of Eriphyle on any point in which she should differ in opinion from A drastus. When, therefore, the latter called upon him to join the expedition of the Seven against Thebes, Amphiarus, although he foresaw its unfortunate issue and at first refused to take any part in it, was nevertheless persuaded by his wife to join his friends, for Eriphyle had been consulted to induce her husband by the necklace of Harmonia which Polyneices had given her. Amphiarus on leaving Argo enjoined his sons to avenge his death on their heartless mother. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 73; Diod. iv. 65; Hom. Od. xv. 247, &c.) On their way to Thebes the heroes instituted the Nemean games, and Amphiarus was slain in the chariot-race and died in the midst of the discus. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 4.) During the war against Thebes, Amphiarus fought bravely (Pind. Ol. vi. 26, &c.), but still he could not suppress his anger at the whole undertaking, and when Tydeus, whom he regarded as the originator of the expedition, was severely wounded by Melanippus, and Athena was listenning to render him immortal, Amphiarus cut off the head of Melanippus, who had in the mean time been slain, and gave Tydeus his brains to drink, and Athena, struck with horror at the sight, withdrew. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8.) When Adrastus and Amphiarus were the only heroes who survived, the latter was pursued by Perkelmenus, and fled towards the river Isemus. Here the river opened before he was overtaken by his enemy, and swallowed up Amphiarus together with his chariot, but Zeus made him immortal. (Pind. Nem. lv. 37, Ol. vi. 24, &c.) Parcae (loc. cit.) Henceforth Amphiarus was worshipped as a hero, first at Oropus and afterwards in all Greece. (Paus. i. 34. § 2; Liv. xlv. 27.) He had a sanctuary at Argos (Paus. ii. 23. § 2), a statue at Athens (i. 8. § 3), and a heroon at Sparta. (Müller, Orkomn. pp. 146, 486.) The departure of Amphiarus from his home when he went to Thebes, was represented on the chest of Cyprus. (Paus. v. 17. § 4.) Respecting some extant works of art, of which Amphiarus is the subject, see Grünfeld, Die alt griechische Bronze des Tetrarchen Kabinets in Tübingen, Stuttgart, and Tübingen, 1834.

The prophetic power, which Amphiarus was believed to possess, was accounted for by his descent from Melampus or Apollo, though there was also a local tradition at Philus, according to which he had acquired them in a night which he spent in the prophetic house (sores uarens) of Philus. (Paus. ii. 13. § 6; comp. i. 34. § 3.) He was, like all seers, a favourite of Zeus and Apollo. (Hom. Od. xv. 245.) Respecting the oracle of Amphiarus see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Oraculum. It should be remarked here, that Virgil (Aen. viii. 671) mentions three Greek heroes as contemporaries of Aeneas, viz. Tiburtus, Catillus, and Corsus, the first of whom was believed to be the founder of Tibur, and is described by Pliny (H. N. xvi. 87) as a son of Amphiarus. [L. S.]

AMPHICLEIA (Ἀμφικλεία), the daughter of Ariston, and the wife of the son of Iamblichus, received instruction in philosophy from Plotinus. (Porphyry. v. Plotin. c. 9.)

AMPHICRATES (Ἀμφικράτης), king of Sa- mos in ancient times, in whose reign the Samians invaded Aeaea. (Herod. i. 58.)

AMPHICRATES (Ἀμφικράτης), a Greek sophist and rhetorician of Athens. He was a contemporary of Tigranes (c. 70), and being exiled (we know not for what reason) from Athens, he went to Seleuceia on the Tigris. The inhabitants of this place requested him to teach rhetoric in their city, but he haughtily refused, saying, that the vessel was too small to contain a dolphin. He then went to Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, who was married to Tigranes, and who seems to have become attached to him. Amphicrates soon drew suspicions upon himself, and was forbidden to have any intercourse with the Greeks, whereupon he starved himself to death. (Philo. Lucull. 32.) Longinus (de Subitiis, p. 54, ed. Toup) mentions him along with Hegesias and Matrius, and censures him for his affectation of sublimity. Whether he is the same person as the Amphicrates who wrote a work on celebrated men (σερί ἱστοριῶν)
AMPHIDAMAS. aepoivos, Athen. xiii. p. 576; Diog. Laert. ii. 101), is uncertain. [L. S.]

AMPHICRATES, a Greek sculptor probably of Athens, since he was the maker of a statue which the Athenians erected in honour of a courtezan, who having learnt from Harmodius and Aristogiton their conspiracy against Hippicus and Hipparchus, was tortured to death by the tyrants, without disclosing the secret. Her name was Leana (a lion); and the Athenians, unwilling openly to honour a courtezan, had the statue made in the form of a lion; and, to point out the act which it was meant to commemorate, the animal's tongue was omitted. We know nothing of the sculptor's age, unless we may infer from the narrative that the statue was made soon after the expulsion of the Peisistratids. (s. c. 510.) In the passage of Pliny, which is our sole authority (xxiv. 18, § 12), there is a manifest corruption of the text, and the reading Amphicrates is only a conjecture, though a most probable one, by Sillig. (Com. in Plin. i. 15.)

AMPHICTYON (Ἀμφικτύων), a son of Eumolpus and Pyrrha (Apollod. i. 7, § 2), or according to others an autokratos, who after having married Callatis, the daughter of Croesus, king of Lydia, expelled his father-in-law from his kingdom and usurped his throne. He ruled for twelve years, and was then in turn expelled by Erythmonius (Apollod. iii. 14. § 5, &c.; Paus. i. 2. § 5). According to Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 277), he was married to Chthonopatras, by whom he had a son, Phyleus, the father of Leuctra. According to Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Φυλε) , however, Aeolus was a son and Phyleus a grandson of Amphicyton. He was believed to have been the first who introduced the custom of mixing wine with water, and to have dedicated two altars to Dionysus Orthos and the nymphs. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1815.) Dionysus of Halicarnassus (iv. 25), who calls him a son of Helen, Pausanias (x. 8. § 1), and others, regard Amphicyton as the founder of the amphictyony of Thermopylae, and in consequence of this belief a sanctuary of Amphicyton was built in the village of Anthela on the Asopus, which was the most ancient place of meeting of this amphictyony. (Herod. viii. 200.) But this belief is without any foundation, and arose from the ancient assigning the establishment of their institutions to some mythical hero. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Amphicyton.) [L. S.]

AMPHIGYTONIS (Ἄμφιγιτωνις), a surname of Demeter, derived from Anthela, where she was worshipped under this name, because it was the place of meeting for the amphictyons of Thermopylae, and because sacrifices were offered to her at the opening of every meeting. (Herod. vii. 200; Strab. ix. p. 429.) [L. S.]

AMPHIDAMAS (Ἀμφιδάμας). 1. A son of Lycurus and Cleopha, and father of Antimachus, who married EurythAEA. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 2.) According to Pausanias (viii. 4. § 6) and Apollonius Rhodius (i. 163) he was a son of Alcides, and consequently a brother of Lycurus, Cepheus, and Ange, and took part in the expedition of the Argonauts. (Hygin. Fab. 14.)

2. A king of Chalkis in Eubea, after whose death his sons celebrated funeral games, in which Hesiod won the prize in a poetical contest. It consisted of a golden tripod, which he dedicated to the Muse of Hellen. (Hes. Op. of D. 554, &c.)

3. The father of Cleonymus, whom Patroclus killed when yet a child. (Hom. Il. xxiii. 87; Apollod. iii. 15, § 8.) Other mythical passages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 5. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 14; Hom. Il. x. 266, &c. [L. S.]

AMPHIDAMAS or AMPHIDAMUS (Ἀμφίδαμος, Ἀμφίδαμος), general of the Eleusinians in 261. was taken prisoner by Philip, king of Macedonia, and carried to Olympia, but was set at liberty on his undertaking to bring over his countrymen to Philip's side. But not succeeding in his attempt, he went back to Philip, and is spoken of as defending Antus against the charges of Apelles. (Polib. iv. 75, 84, 86.)

AMPHICURTUS (Ἀμφικύρτως), a Thelian who, in the war of the Seven against his native city, slew Parthenopaeus. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 4.) According to Euripides (Phoen. 1155), however, it was Pericles who killed Parthenopaeus. Pausanias (ix. 10. § 4) calls him Amphicurtus, whence some critics wish to introduce the name Pausanias as a corruption of Pericles. [L. S.]

AMPHICHETES or AMPHICTERUS (Ἀμφιχετής), a surname of Dionysus. (Orph. Hymn. 52.1, 51.10.) It is believed that at Athens, where the Dionysiac festivals were held annually, the name signified yearly, while at Thebes, where they were celebrated every third year, it was interpreted to be synonymous with τριπερής. [L. S.]

AMPHIHYPERIS (Ἀμφιὑπερής), lame or limping on both feet, a surname of Hephaestus, given him because Zeus threw him from Olympus upon the earth for having wished to support Hera. (Hom. Il. i. 599; comp. Apoll. i. 8. § 5.) [HEPHAESTUS].

AMPHILaurus (Ἀμφίλαυρος), a son of Amphimachus and Erphyle, and brother of Alemmachus. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 21; Hom. Od. xxiv. 246.) When his father went against Thebes, Amphilaurus was, according to Pausanias (v. 17. § 46), yet an infant, although ten years afterwards he is mentioned as one of the Epigoni, and according to some traditions assisted his brother in the murder of his mother. [ALCMON.] He is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen, and as having taken part in the Trojan war. On the return from this expedition he together with Mopsus, who was like himself a seer, founded the town of Mallos in Cilicia. Hence he proceeded to his native place, Argos, but as he was not satisfied with the state of affairs there, he returned to Mallos. When Mopsus refused to allow him any share in the government of their common colony, the two seemed to have fought a single combat in which both were killed, and the place that was described by some as having arisen out of a dispute about their prophetic powers. Their tombs, which were placed in such a manner that the one could not be seen from the other, existed as late as the time of Strabo, near mount Margasa, not far from Pyramus. (Strab. iv. p. 675; Lycophron, 439, with the Schol.) According to other traditions (Strab. iv. p. 642), Amphilectus and Calchas, on their return from Troy, went on foot to the celebrated grove of the Clarion Apollo near Colophon. In some accounts he was said to have been killed by Apollo. (Hes. op. Strab. iv. p. 673.) According to Theocritus (ii. 68) Amphilectus returned from Troy to Argos, but being dissatisfied there, he emigrated and founded Argos Amphilectum on the Ambracian gulf. Other accounts, however, AMPHICROUS, of Athens, a writer on agriculture mentioned by Varro (R.R. i. 1) and Columella (i. 1). Pliny also speaks of a work of his "De Medicis et Cytisus." (II. N. xviii. 16. a. 43.)

AMPHICROUS (Ἀμπίχροος), metropolitan of Cyzicus in the middle of the ninth century, to whom Photius, the patriarch of Constantinople, wrote several letters, and whose answers are still extant in manuscript. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. viii. p. 392.)

AMPHICROUS, ST., bishop of Iconium, the friend of St. Basil and St. Gregory of Nazianzus, was born at Caesarea, and began life as a pleader. (Basmag, Annot. Politic. Eccl. iii. p. 145, A.; and Gallandii Biblioth. Patr. vol. vi. Prolegom.; Epist. S. Greg. Naz. 9 (159). Paris, 1640.) He lived in retirement with his father at Oza in Cappadocia, till he was summoned to preside over the see of Iconium in Symnion, or Pisidia 25th of June 373-4. St. Basil's Congratulatory Epistle on the occasion is extant. (Ep. 393, al. 161, vol. iii. p. 251, ed. Beud.) He soon after paid St. Basil a visit, and persuaded him to undertake his work "On the Holy Ghost" (vol. iii. p. 1), which he finished in A.D. 375-6. St. Basil's Canonicall Epistles are addressed to St. Amphicrous (i.e. pp. 263, 290, 324, written A.D. 374, 375). The latter had received St. Basil's promised book on the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, when in A.D. 377 he sent a synodical letter (extant, ap. Mansi's Concilia, vol. iii. p. 505) to certain bishops, probably of Lycaia, infected with, or in danger of, Macedonianism. The Arian persecution of the church ceased on the death of Valens (A.D. 378), and in 381, Amphicrous was present at the Oecumenical Council of Constantinople. While there, he signed, as a witness, St. Gregory Nazianzus's will (Opp. S. Greg. p. 204, A.B.), and he was nominated with Optimus of Antioch in Pisidia as the centre of catholic communion in the diocese of Asia. In A.D. 383, he obtained from Theodosius a prohibition of Arian assemblies, practically exhibiting the slight otherwise put on the Son of God by a contemptuous treatment of the young Arcadius. (Flurey's Eccl. Hist. xviii. c. 27.) This same year he called a council at Side in Pamphylia, and condemned the Massalian heretics, who made the whole of religion consist in prayer. (Theodot. Hærer. Fæb. iv. 11.) In A.D. 394 he was at the Council of Constantinople [see Ammon of Hippo], which confirmed Bogadius in the see of Bostia. This is the last we hear of him. He died before the persecution of St. Chrysostom, probably in A.D. 395, and he is commemorated on Nov. 23rd. His remains (in Greek) have been edited by Combeis, with those of Methodius of Patsa and Andreas of Crete, fol. Pat. 1644. Of Eight Homilies ascribed to him, some at least are suppositions (Galland gives few among his works, vol. vi. Biblioth. Patr.), as is the Life of St. Basil. There is attributed to him an imitative poem of 333 verses (in reference to the Trinity) addressed to Seleucus, nephew of St. Olympias (who had herself been brought up by Theodosia, sister to St. Amphicrous) and grandson of the general Trajan, who perished with his master, Valens, at Hadrianople, A.D. 378. Gallandi adds the testimony of Cosmas Indicopleustes (6th cent.) to that of John Damascene, Zonaras, and Balshamon, in favour of the authenticity of this poem. Combeis has collected his fragments (i.e. pp. 138-154), and Gallandi has added to them (i.e. pp. 497., & c., and Proleg. p. 12). His work on the Holy Ghost is lost. (St. Jerome, de Script. Ecc. c. 133; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 375-381.) St. Gregory Nazianzus states, that "by prayers, adoration of the Trinity, and sacrifices, he subdued the pain of diseases." (Carm. ad Vitas. vol. ii. p. 1030, v. 244.) The 9th, 25th-28th, 63rd, 171st, and 184th Epistles of St. Gregory are addressed to him.

[ A. J. C. ]

AMPHIOCHIUS, bishop of Sinn in Pamphylia, who was present at the council of Ephesus, in which Nestorius was condemned, A.D. 421, and who was probably the author of some homilies that go under the name of Amphicrouus of Iconium. (Plut. Cod. 52, p. 13, n. Cod. 230, p. 263, a., ed. Bekk.; Labbeus, de Script. Ecc. vol. i. p. 63.)

AMPHILYCUS (Ἀμφιλύκος), a celebrated see of Ancyra in Lycaonia. Herodotus (i. 69) calls him an Ancyrenian, but Plato (Theo. p. 124, d.) and Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 339) speak of him as an Athenian. He may have been originally an Ancyrenian, and perhaps received the franchise at Athens from Peisistratus. This supposition removes the necessity of Velleken's emendation. (Ad Herod. l.c.)

AMPHIMACHUS (Ἀμφιμᾶχος). 1. A son of Cteatus and Therone, and grandson of Actor or of Poseidon. He is mentioned among the suitors of Helen, and was one of the four chiefs who led the Epelii against Troy. (Apollod. iii. 10. 8; Paus. v. 3. § 4; Hom. II. ii. 620.) He was slain by Hector. (II. xiii. 183, &c.)

2. A son of Nonius, who together with his brother Nastes led a host of Carinians to the assistance of the Trojans. He went to battle richly adorned with gold, but was thrown by Achilles into the Scamander. (Hom. II. ii. 870, &c.) Conon (Nar. 6) calls him a king of the Lycurii. Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, and Paus. v. 3. § 4. [L.S.]

AMPHI' MACHUS (Ἀμφιμάχος), obtained the supremacy of Mesopotamia, together with Arbelaith, in the division of the provinces by Antipater in B.C. 321. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71, b. 26, ed. Bekker; Diod. xviii. 39.)

AMPHI' MEDON (Ἀμφίμεδων), a son of Melaneus of Ithaca, with whom Agamemon had been staying when he came to call upon Odysseus to join the Greeks against Troy, and whom he afterwards recognised in Menelaus. (Hom. Od. xxv. 103, &c.) He was one of the suitors of Penelope and was slain by Telemachus. (Od. xiii. 204.) Another mythical personage of this name occurs in Ovid. (Met. v. 75.)
AMPHION.

AMPHI'NONE (Ἀμφίνοη), the wife of Aeson and mother of Jason. When her husband and her son Promachus had been slain by Pelias, and she too was on the point of sharing their fate, she fled to the hearth of Peleas, that his crime might be aggravated by murdering her on that sacred spot. She then wounded the murderer of her relatives, and plunged a sword into her own breast. (Diod. iv. 50; Apollon. Rhod. i. 45.) Two other mythical personages of this name are mentioned in Diod. iv. 53, and in the Hidat, xxiv. 44. [L. S.]

AMPH'ION (Ἀμφίων). 1. A son of Zeus and Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus of Thebes, and twin-brother of Zethus. (Ov. Met. vi. 110, &c.; Apollod. iii. 6. § 5.) When Antiope was with child by the child of the gods, fear of her own father induced her to flee to Epopeus at Sicyon, whom she married. Nycteus killed himself in despair, but charged his brother Lycaeus to avenge him on Epopeus and Antiope. Lycaeus accordingly marched against Sicyon, took the town, slew Epopeus, and carried Antiope with him to Eleutherus in Boeotia. During her imprisonment there she gave birth to two sons, Epopeus and Antiopeus, who were brought up by shepherds. (Apollod. l. c.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 7), Antiope was the wife of Lycaeus, and was seduced by Epopeus. Hereupon she was repudiated by her husband, and it was not until after this event that she was visited by Zeus. Dirce, the second wife of Lycaeus, was jealous of Antiope, and had her put in chains; but Zeus helped her in escaping to Mount Cithaeron, where she gave birth to her two sons. According to Apollodorus, she remained in captivity for a long time after the birth of her sons, who grew up among the shepherds, and did not know their descent. Herms (according to others, Apollo, or the Muses) gave Amphion a lyre, who henceforth practised song and music, while his brother spent his time in hunting and tending the flocks. (Horat. Epist. i. 18. 41, &c.) The two brothers, who Euphides (Phos. 699) calls "the Dioscuri with white horses," fortified the town of Thebes near Thespiae, and settled there. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) Antiope, who had in the meantime been very ill-treated by Lycaeus and Dirce, escaped from her prison, her chains having miraculously been loosened; and her sons, on recognising their mother, went to Thebes, killed Lycaeus, tied Dirce to a bull, and had her dragged about till she too was killed, and then threw her body into a well, which was from this time called the well of Dirce. After having taken possession of Thebes, the two brothers fortified the town by a wall, the reasons for which are differently stated. It is said, that when Amphion played his lyre, the stones not only moved of their own accord to the place where they were wanted, but fitted themselves together so as to form the wall. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 740, 755, with the Schol.; Syncell. p. 125, &c.; Hom. ad Phos. 394, &c.) Amphion afterwards married Menoe, who bore him many sons and daughters, all of whom were killed by Apollo. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Galli, xx. 7; Hygin. Fab. 7, 8; Hom. Od. xi. 260, &c.; Paus. ix. 5. § 4, comp. Nibobe.) As regards the death of Amphion, Ovid (Met. vi. 271) relates, that he killed himself with a sword from grief at the loss of his children. According to others, he was killed by Apollo because he made an assault on the Pythian temple of the god. (Hygin. Fab. 9.) Amphion was buried together with his brother at Thebes (or, according to Stephanus Byzantius, n. s. Thesprotiae, at Thesprotia), and the Thesprotians believed, that they could make their own fields more fruitful by taking, at a certain time of the year, from Amphion's grave a piece of earth, and putting it on the grave of Antiope. For this reason the Thebans watched the grave of Amphion at that particular season. (Paus. ix. 17. § 8, &c.) In Hades Amphion was punished for his conduct towards Leto. (ix. § 4.) The following passages may also be compared: Paus. ii. 6. § 2, vi. 20. § 8; Propert. iii. 13. 29. The punishment inflicted by Amphion and his brother upon Dirce is represented in one of the finest works of art still extant—the celebrated Farnese bull, the work of Apollonius and Taurusica, which was discovered in 1546, and placed in the palace Farnese at Rome. (Pliny, H. N. xxxvi. 4; Heyne, Antiquar. Anstufa, p. 162, &c.; comp. Müller, Orat. com. p. 227, &c.) 2. A son of Jason and husband of Persephone, by whom he became the father of Chloris. (Hom. Od. xi. 261, &c.) In Homer, this Amphion is said to have come from Arcadia. His distance from Amphion, the husband of Niobe, but in earlier traditions they seem to have been regarded as the same person. (Eucl. ad Hom. p. 1684; Müller, Orat. com. pp. 231, 370.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name, one a leader of the Epeians against Troy (Hom. H. xiii. 692), the second one of the Argonauts (Apollon. Rhod. i. 176; Orph. Arg. 214; Hygin. Fab. 14), and the third one of the sons of Niobe. [Niobe.]

AMPHION (Ἀμφίων). 1. A sculptor, son of Acetos, pupil of Polykles of Coryne, and teacher of Piso of Callaureia, was a native of Cnosus, and flourished about n. a. 483 or 482. He executed a group in which Battus, the colonizer of Cyrene, was represented in a chariot, with Libya crowning him, and Cyrene as the charioteer. This group was dedicated at Delphi by the people of Cyrene. (Paus. vi. 3. § 2, x. 15. § 4.)

2. A Greek painter, was contemporary with Apelles (n. a. 352), who yielded to him in arrangement or grouping (celebat Amphionis dispositione, Plin. xxx. 36. § 10: but the rendering Amphionis is doubtful: Maletho in Brotier's conjecture; MELANTHIUS). [F. S.]

AMPHIS (Ἀμφίς), an Athenian comic poet, of the middle comedy, contemporary with the philosopher Plato. A reference to Phrynus, the Thespian, in one of his plays (Athen. xiii. p. 591, d.), proves that he was alive in n. a. 332. We have the titles of twenty-six of his plays, and a few fragments of them. (Suidas, s. v.; Pollux. i. 285; Diod. Laert. iii. 57; Athen. xiii. p. 507, with Steineke. i. 409, n. 601.)

AMPHISSA (Ἀμφίσσα), a daughter of Macareus and grand-daughter of Aeolus, was beloved by Apollo, and is said to have given the name to the town of Amphissa in Phocis, where her memory was perpetuated by a splendid monument. (Paus. x. 36. § 2, &c.)

AMPHISSUS (Ἀμφῖσσος), a son of Apollo and Dryope, is said to have been of extraordinary strength, and to have built the town of Oeta on the mountain of the same name. Here he also founded two temples, one of Apollo and the other of the Nymphs. At the latter, games were celebrated down to a late period. (Anton. Lib. 32.) [L. S.]
AMPHITRITE.

AMPHITRATUS (Ἀμφιτράτος) and his brother Rhode were the charioteers of Discury. They were believed to have taken part in the expedition of Jason to Colchis, and to have occupied a part of that country which was called after them Heniochia, as ἕνιοχος signifies a charioteer. (Strab. xi. p. 495; Justin. xiii. 3.) Pliny (L. N. vi. 5) calls them Amphis and Thelchius. (Comp. Meis, i. 19. § 110; Isidor. Orig. xv. 1; Ammian, Marcellin. xxii. 8.) [L. S.]

AMPHITRATES (Ἀμφιτράτης), a Greek sculptor, flourished about the middle of the 2nd century B.C., as is shown by Pliny (xxvii. 4. 10) and Tation (Orat. in corn. 52, p. 114, Worth.), it is supposed that most of his statues were cast in bronze, and that many of them were likenesses. [P. S.]

AMPHITHEMIS (Ἀμφιθέμης), a son of Apollo and Acacallis, who became the father of Nasamon and Caphaurus, or Cephalus, by the nymph Tritonius. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1494.) [L. S.]

AMPHITRITE (Ἀμφιτρίτη), according to Hesiod (Theog. 243) and Apollodorus (i. 2. § 7) a Nereid, though in other places Apollodorus (i. 2. § 2, i. 4. § 6) calls her an Oceanid. She is represented as the wife of Poseidon and the goddess of the sea (the Mediterranean), and she is therefore a kind of female Poseidon. In the Homeric poems she does not occur as a goddess, and Amphitrite is merely the name of the sea. The most ancient passages in which she occurs as a real goddess is that of Hesiod above referred to and the Homeric hymn on the Delian Apollo (94), where she is represented as having been present at the birth of Apollo. When Poseidon sued for her hand, she fled to Atlas, but her lover sent spies after her, and among them one Delphius, who brought about the marriage between her and Poseidon, and the grateful god rewarded his service by placing him among the stars. (Eratost. Catast. 31; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 17.) When afterwards Poseidon shewed some attachment to Seylla, Amphitrite's jealousy was excited to such a degree, that she threw some mixture into the well in which Seylla used to bathe, and thereby changed her rival into a monster with six heads and twelve feet. (Tzetza, ad Lyogph. 45, 649.) She became by Poseidon the mother of Triton, Rhode, or Rhodos, and Benthesicyme. (Hesiod. Theog. 330, &c.; Apollod. i. 4. § 6; iii. 15. § 4.) Later poets regard Amphitrite as the goddess of the sea in general, or the ocean. (Enry. Cyc. 703; Or. Met. 1. 14.) Amphitrite was frequently represented in ancient works of art; her figure resembled that of Aphrodite, but she was usually distinguished from her by a sort of net which kept her hair together, and by the claws of a crab on her forehead. She was sometimes represented as riding on machine animals, and sometimes as drawn by them. The temple of Poseidon on the Corinthian isthmus contained a statue of Amphitrite (Paus. ii. 1. § 7), and her figure appeared among the relief ornaments of the temple of Apollo at Amyclae (iii. 19. § 4), on the throne of the Olympian Zeus, and in other places. (v. 2. § 3, comp. i. 17. § 3, v. 26. § 2.) We still possess a considerable number of representations of Amphitrite. A colossal statue of her exists in the Villa Albani, and she frequently appears on coins of Syracuse. The most beautiful specimen extant is that on the arch of Augustus at Rimini. (Wineckmann, Alt. Denkmäler, i. 36; Hirt, Mythol. Bildersch. ii. p. 169.) [L. S.]

AMPHITRYON or AMPHITRIOU (Ἀμφίτριος), a son of Alcea, king of Troezen, by Hipponome, the daughter of Menoeceus. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 3.) Pausanias (viii. 14. § 2) calls his mother Lamone. While Electryon, the brother of Alcea, was reigning at Mycenae, the sons of Pterelaus together with the Taphians invaded his territory, demanded the surrender of the kingdom, and drove away his oxen. The sons of Electryon entered upon a contest with the sons of Pterelaus, but the combatants on both sides fell, so that Electryon had only one son, Lyciumus, left, and Pterelaus likewise only one, Exerus. The Taphians, however, escaped with the oxen, which they entrusted to Polyxenus, king of the Eleans. Thence they were afterwards brought back to Mycenae by Amphitryon after he had paid a ransom. Electryon now resolved upon avenging the death of his sons, and to make war upon the Taphians. During his absence he entrusted his kingdom and his daughter Alceme to Amphitryon, on condition that he should not marry her till after his return from the war. Amphitryon now restored to Electryon the oxen he had brought back to Mycenae; one of them turned wild, and as Amphitryon attempted to strike it with his club, he accidentally hit the head of Electryon and killed him on the spot. Sthenelus, the brother of Electryon, availed himself of this opportunity for the purpose of expelling Amphitryon, who together with Alceme and Lyciumus went to Thbes. Here he was purified by Creon, his uncle. In order to win the hand of Alceme, Amphitryon prepared to avenge the death of Alceme's brothers on the Taphians (Teleboans), and requested Creon to assist him in his enterprise, which the latter promised on condition that Amphitryon should deliver the Cadmean country from a wild fox which was making great havoc there. But as it was decreed by fate that this fox should not be overtaken by any one, Amphitryon went to the country of Athens, who possessed a famous dog, which, according to another decree of fate, overtook every animal it pursued. Cephalus was induced to lend Amphitryon his dog on condition that he should receive a part of the spoils of the expedition against the Taphians. Now when the dog was hunting the fox, Fute got out of its dilemma by Zeus changing the two animals into stone. Assisted by Cephalus, Panopeus, Helius, and Creon, Amphitryon now attacked and ravaged the islands of the Taphians, but could not subdue them so long as Pterelaus lived. This chief had on his head one golden hair, the gift of Poseidon, which rendered him immortal. His daughter Comaetha, who was in love with Amphitryon, cut off this hair, and after Pterelaus had died in consequence, Amphitryon took possession of the islands, and having put to death Comaetha, and given the head of her daughter to Cephalus and Helius, he returned to Thbes with his spoils, out of which he dedicated a tripod to Apollo Ismenius. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6, 7; Paus. iv. 10. § 4; Horod. v. 9.) Respecting the amour of Zeus with Alceme during the absence of Amphitryon see ALCEME. Amphitryon fell in a war against Erginus, king of the Minyans, in which he and Hercules delivered Thbes from the tribute which the city had to pay to Erginus as an atome-
AMENT for the murder of Clymenus. (Apollod. ii. 4, § 8, &c.) His tomb was shown at Thebes in the time of Pausanias. (i. 41. § 1; compare Hom. Od. xi. 266, &c.; Hes. Sent. Hie. init.; Dion. iv. 5, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 29, 244; Müller, Orchom. p. 207, &c.) Asclepius and Sophocles wrote each a tragedy of the name of Ampyrtus, which are now lost. We still possess a comedy of Phaestus, the "Ampyrteus," the subject of which is a ludicrous representation of the visit of Zeus to Alcmene in the disguise of her lover Ampyrtus. [L. S.]

AMPHYTROYNIADES or AMPHYTROYNIDES (Ἀμφυτρωνίδης), a patronymic from Ampyrtus, by which Heircon is sometimes designated, because his mother was married to Ampyrtus. (Ov. Met. i. 140, xv. 49; Pind. O. iii. 19, Id. vi. 56.) [L. S.]

AMPHIUS (Ἀμφίοος), a son of Mopsus and brother of Alcestis. These two brothers took part in the Trojan war against their father's advice, and were slain by Diomedes. (Hom. Il. ii. 826, &c., xi. 326, &c.) Another hero of this name, who was an ally of the Trojans, occurs in I. vi. 612. [L. S.]

AMPHITHEUS (Ἀμφιθέος), a son of Alcmene by Callirhoe, and brother of Alcmeon. [ACRMN.] A Trojan of this name occurs Hom. II. xvi. 415. [L. S.]

AMPHITHEUS (Ἀμφιθέος), the brother of Craterus, was appointed by Alexander the Great commander of the fleet in the Hellespont, B.C. 333. Amphodus subdues the islands between Greece and Asia which did not acknowledge Alexander; cleared Crete of the Persians and pirates, and sub- stituted a Hellenic people instead, for a nation according to the Macedonian power. (Arr. i. 25, iii. 6; Curt. iii. 1, iv. 5, 8.)

T. AMPIUS BALBUS. [BALBUS.]

T. AMPIUS FLAVIA'NUS. [FLAVIANUS.]

AMPYCIDE (Ἀμπυκίδα), a patronymic of Ampicus or Ampykius, applied to Mopsus. (Ov. Met. vi. 316, xii. 350, xiv. 524; Apollon. Rhod. i. 1083; comp. Orph. Arg. 721.) [L. S.]

AMPYCUS (Ἀμπύκος). 1. A son of Pelias, husband of Chloris, and father of the famous seer Mopsus. (Hygin. Fab. 14, 128; Apollon. Rhod. i. 1083; Ov. Met. xii. 456.) Pausanias (v. 17. § 4, vii. 18. § 4) calls him Ampykius.

2. A son of Japetus, a bard and priest of Ceres, killed by Petalus at the marriage of Persus. (Ov. Met. v. 110, &c.) Another personage of this name occurs in Orph. Arg. 721. [L. S.]

AMPYX (Ἀμπύξ). 1. [AMPYCUS.] 2. There are two other mythical personages of this name. Ov. Met. v. 184, xii. 450. [L. S.]

AMULIUS. [ROMULUS.]

AMULIUS, a Roman painter, who was chiefly employed in decorating the Golden House of Nero, one of his works was a picture of Minerva, which always looked at the spectator, whatever point of view he chose. Pliny calls him "gravis et severus, demque floridus," and adds, that he only painted a few hours in the day, and that with such a regard for his own dignity, that he would not lay side his toga, even when employed in the midst of scaffolding and machinery. (Plin. xxxv. 57.)

ross, in an emendation of this passage, among the ingredients, substitutes Fabulus for Ampyx, its reading, is adopted by Januus and Silius; but here seems to be no sufficient ground to reject the Id reading.) [P. S.]

AMYCLAEUS (Ἀμύκλαεας), a surname of Apollo, derived from the town of Amyclae in Laconia, where he had a celebrated sanctuary. His colossal statue there is estimated by Pausanias (iii. 19. § 2) at thirty cubits in height. It appears to have been very ancient, for, with the exception of the head, hands, and foot, the whole resembled more a brazen pillar than a statue. This figure of the god wore a helmet, and in his hands he held a spear and a bow. The women of Amyclae made every year a new ἄρω for the god, and the place where they made it was also called the Chiton. (Paus. iii. 16. § 2.) The sanctuary of Apollo contained the throne of Amycne, a work of Bathyis of Magnesia, which Pausanias saw. (iii. 10. § 6, &c., comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für Gesch. der alt. Kunst, i. 2, p. 390, &c.)

AMYCLAEUS (Ἀμύκλαος), a Corinthian sculptor, who, in conjunction with Dicylus, executed the bronze group which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi, after their victory over the Thes- salians at the beginning of the Persian war, B.C. 480. (Paus. x. 1. § 4, 13. § 5; Herod. viii. 27.) The subject of this piece of sculpture was the contest of Hercules with Apollo for the sacred tripod. Hercules and Apollo were represented as both having hold of the tripod, while Leto and Artemis supported Apollo, and Hercules was encircled by Athene. The legend to which the group referred is related by Pausanias (x. 13. § 4); the reason for such a subject being chosen by the Phocians on this occasion, seems to be their own connection with Apollo as guardian of the Delphic oracle, and, on the other hand, because the Thes- salian chiefs were Heroeideae, and their war-cry "Athene Ionia." (Müller, Archäol. der Kunst, § 89, an. 3.) The attempt of Hercules to carry off the tripod seems to have been a favourite subject with the Greek artists: two or three representations of it are still extant. (Winkelmann, Werke, i. p. 256, ed. 1825; Silius, s.e., compare Dicyl. Chion.) [P. S.]

AMYCLAS (Ἀμύκλας), a son of Leucan- mon and Sparta, and father of Hyacinthus by Diomedes, the daughter of Lapithus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. x. 9. § 3, viii. 18. § 4.) He was king of Laconia, and was regarded as the founder of the town of Amyclas. (Paus. i. 3. § 3.) Two other mythical personages of this name occur in the Hes. Erg. 15, and Apollon. iii. 9. § 1, l. c. [L. S.]

AMYCLIDES (Ἀμύκληδες), a patronymic from Amycles, by which Ovid (Met. x. 192) designates Hyacinthius, who, according to some traditions, was a son of Amycles. [L. S.]

AMYCLUS (Ἀμύκλος), or AMYCLAS (Ἀμύκλας) of Hermelae, one of Plato's disciples. (Diog. Laert. iii. 46; Aelian, V. H. iii. 19.)

AMYCUS (Ἀμύκος). 1. A son of Poseidon by Bithynia, or by the Bithynian nymph Melith. He was ruler of the country of the Bebryces, and when the Argonauts landed on the coast of his dominions, he challenged the bravest of them to a boxing match. Polydectes, who accepted the challenge, killed him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 20; Hygin. Fab. 17; Apollon. Rhod. ii. init.) The Scholast on Apollonius (ii. 66) relates, that Polydectes bound Amycus. Pyramid, with the aid of the river god Amycus had had a feud with Lycur, king of Myasn, who was supported by He- racles, and in it Mydon, the brother of Amycus, fell by the hands of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; Appolon. Rhod. ii. 754.) Pliny (H. N. xvi. 80) relates, that upon the tomb of Amyntas there grew a species of laurel (laureum incensum), which had the effect that, when a branch of it was taken on board a vessel, the crew began to quarrel, and did not cease until the branch was thrown overboard. Three other mythical personages of this name occur in Ov. Met. xii. 215; Virg. Aen. x. 705, compared with Hom. II. vi. 209; Virg. Aen. xii. 509, compared with v. 297. [L. S.]
AMYNTAS.

AMYMON (Αμυμόν), one of the daughters of Danues and Elephas. When Danues arrived in Argos, the country, according to the wish of Poseidon, was divided into two equal parts, in one of which Poseidon was suffering from a drought, and Danues sent out Amy- mone to fetch water. Meeting a stag, she shot at it, but hit a sleeping satyr, who rose and pursued her. Poseidon appeared, and rescued the maiden from the satyr, but appropriated her to himself, and then showed her the wells at Lerna. (Appollod. ii. 1 § 4.) According to another form of the tradition, Amymone fell asleep on her expedition in search of water, and was surprised by a satyr. She invoked Poseidon, who appeared and cast his trident at the satyr, which however struck into a rock, so that the Satyr escaped. Poseidon, after ravishing the maiden, bade her draw the trident from the rock, from which a threefold spring gushed forth immediately, which was called after her the well of Amymone. Her son by Poseidon was called Nauplius. (Hygin. P. h. 169; Lucian. Dial. Mariae. 6; Paus. ii. 37. § 1.) The story of Amy- mone was the subject of one of the satyric dramas of Aeschylus, and is represented upon a vase which was discovered at Naples in 1790. (Böttiger, Amaltheu, ii. p. 275.)

AMYANDER (Αμαντέρ), king of the Atymanes, first appearance in history as mediator between Philip of Macedonia and the Aetolians. (B.C. 208.) When the Romans were about to wage war on Philius, they sent ambassadors to Amyander to inform him of their intention. On the commencement of the war he came to the camp of the Romans and promised them assistance: the task of bringing over the Aetolians to an alliance with the Romans was assigned to him. In B.C. 195 he took the towns of Phocis and Compli, and ravaged Thessaly. He was present at the conference between Flamininus and Philip, and during the short truce was sent by the former to Rome. He was again present at the conference held with Philip after the battle of Cynoscephalae. On the conclusion of peace he was allowed to retain all the fortresses which he had taken from Philip. In the war which the Romans, supported by Philip, waged with Antiochus III. Amyander was induced by his brother-in-law, Philip of Megalopolis, to side with Antiochus, to whom he rendered active service. But in B.C. 191 he was driven from his kingdom by Philip, and fled with his wife and children to Ambacia. The Romans required that he should be delivered up, but their demand was not complied with, and with the assistance of the Aetolians he recovered his king- dom. He sent ambassadors to Rome and to the Scipios in Asia, to treat for peace, which was granted him. (B.C. 189.) He afterwards induced the Ancyritae to surrender to the Romans.

He married Aponia, the daughter of a Megalopolitan named Alexander. Respecting his death we have no accounts. (Livy. xxvii. 30, xxix. 12, xxxi. 28, xxxii. 14, xxxiii. 3, 34, xxxv. 47, xxxvi. 7—10, 14, 28, 32, xxxviii. 1, 3, 9; Polyb. xvi. 27, xvii. 1, 10, xviii. 19, 30, xx. 10, xxi. 8, 12; Appian. Syr. 17.)

AMYNO/MAICUS (Αμυνόμαχος), the son of Philocrates, was, together with Timocrates, the heir of Epicurus. (Diog. Laert. ix. 16, 17; Cic. de Fin. ii. 31.)

AMYNTAS (Αμίντας) I, king of Macedonia, son of Aegeus, and fifth in descent from Pericles, the founder of the dynasty. (Herod. viii. 139; comp. Thucyd. ii. 100; Just. vii. 1, xxxii. 2; Paus. ix. 46.) In 337 B.C. before him that Macedonia became tributary to the Persians. Megabazus, whom Darius on his return from his Scythian expedition had left at the head of 80,000 men in Europe (Herod. iv. 143), sent after the conquest of Persia to require earth and water of Amyntas, who immediately complied with his demand. The Persian envoy on this occasion behaved with much insolence at the banquet to which Amyntas invited them, and were murdered by his son Alexander. (See p. 113, b.) After this we find nothing recorded of Amyntas, except his offer to the Pelis- tratidse of Antheus in Chalcedes, when Hippias had just been disappointed in his hope of a restoration to Athens by the power of the Spartan confederacy. (Herod. v. 94; MüLL. Dem. Anh. ii. § 16; Wasse, ad Thuc. ii. 99.) Amyntas died about 498 B.C. leaving the kingdom to Alexander. Herodotus (viii. 136) speaks of a son of Babuas and Gygaca, called Amyntas after his grandfather.

2. II. king of Macedonia, was son of Philip, the brother of Pericles II. (Thuc. ii. 95.) He succeeded his father in his appanage in Upper Macedonia, of which Pericles seems to have wished to deprive him, as he had before endeavoured to wrest it from Philip, but had been hindered by the Athenians. (Thuc. i. 57.)

In the year 429 B.C. Amyntas, aided by Sittakes, king of the Odrysian Thracians, stood forward to contest with Pericles the throne of Macedonia itself; but the latter contrived to obtain peace through the mediation of Suthus, the nephew of the Thracian king (Thuc. ii. 101), and Amyntas was thus obliged to content himself with his hereditary principality. In the thirty-fifth year, however, after this, B.C. 394, he obtained the crown by the murder of Pausias, son of the usurper Aëropus. (Diod. xiv. 89.) It was nevertheless contested with him by Argeus, the son of Pausias, who was supported by Badyila, the Illyrian chief: the result was, that Amyntas was driven from Macedonia, but found a refuge among the Thessalians, and was enabled by their aid to recover his kingdom. (Diod. xiv. 92; Isocr. Archid. p. 125, b. c.; comp. Diod. xvi. 4; Cic. de Off. ii. 11.) But before his flight, when hard pressed by Argeus and the Illyrians, he had given up to the Olymphonians a large tract of territory bordering upon their own,—despairing as it would seem, of a restoration to the throne, and willing to cede the land in question to Olym- thus rather than to his rival. (Diod. xiv. 92, xvi. 19.) On his return he claimed back what he professed to have entrusted to them as a deposit, and as they refused to restore it, he applied to Sparta for aid. (Diod. xvi. 19.) A similar application was also made, n. c. 382, by the towns of Acrinthus and Apollonia, which had been threatened by Olynthus for declining to join her confederacy. (Xen. Hell. v. 2 § 11, &c.) With the consent of the allies of Sparta, the requested succour was given, under the command successively of Eumidas (with whom his brother Phocibidas was associated), Teleutas, Aegesopolis, and Polyblades, by the last of whom Olynthus was reduced, n. c. 379. (Diod. xv. 19—23; Xen. Hell. v. 2, 3.) Throughout the war, the Spartans were vigorously seconded by Amyntas, and by Dardas, his kinsman, prince of Elymaia. Besides this alliance with Sparta, which he appears to have preserved without interupting to his death, Amyntas united himself also with Jason of Pherae (Diod. xv. 60), and carefully cultivated the friendship of Athens, with which state he would have a bond of union in their common jealousy of Olynthus and probably also of Thebes. Of his friendship towards the Athenians he gave proof, 1st, by advancing their claims to the possession of Amphipolis (Aesch. Hip. Ant. p. 32); and, 2ndly, by adopting Iphicrates as his son. (Id. p. 32.)

It appears to have been in the reign of Amyntas, as is perhaps implied by Strabo (Ecc. vii. p. 330), that the seat of the Macedonian government was removed from Aegea or Edessa to Pella, though the former still continued to be the burying-place of the kings.

Justin (vi. 4) relates, that a plot was laid for his assassination by his wife Eurydice, who wished to place her son-in-law and paramour, Ptolemy of Aburus, on the throne, but that the design was discovered to Amyntas by her daughter. Diidorus (xv. 71) calls Ptolemy of Aburus the son of Amyntas; but see Wesseling's note ad loc., and Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 162. Amyntas died in an advanced age, n. c. 370, leaving three legitimate sons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and the famous Philip. (Just. L. c.; Diod. xv. 60.)

COINS OF AMYNTHAS II.

3. Grandson of Amyntas II., was left an infant in nominal possession of the throne of Macedonia, when his father Perdiccas III. fell in battle against the Illyrians, n. c. 360. (Diod. xvi. 2.) He was quietly excluded from the kingly power by his uncle Philip, n. c. 359, who had at first acted merely as regent (Just. vii. 5), and who felt himself so safe in his usurpation, that he brought up Amyntas at his court, and gave him one of his daughters in marriage. In the first year of the reign of Alexander the Great, n. c. 336, Amyntas was executed for a plot against the king's life. Thirlw. Gr. Hist. vol. v. pp. 165, 166, 177, vol. i. p. 99, and the authorities to which he refers; ust. xii. 6, and Freyholm, ad Curt. vi. 9, 17.)

4. A Macedonian officer in Alexander's army, son of Amyntas. (Diod. xvii. 45; Curt. v. 1. § 40; Arrian, ili. p. 72, f, ed. Steph.) After the battle of the Granicus, n. c. 334, when the garrison of Sardis was quietly surrendered to Alexander, Amyntas was the officer sent forward to receive it from the commander, Mithridates. (Arr. i. p. 17, c.; Freyholm, ad Curt. vi. 6. § 12.) Two years later, n. c. 332, we again hear of him as being sent into Macedonia to collect levies, while Alexander after the siege of Gaza advanced to Egypt; and he returned with them in the ensuing year, when the king was in possession of Susa. (Arr. iii. p. 64, c.; Curt. iv. 6. § 30, v. 1. § 40, vii. 1. § 38.) After the execution of Philotas on a charge of treason, n. c. 330, Amyntas and two other sons of Amyntas (Attalus and Simmias) were arrested on suspicion of having been engaged in the plot. The suspicion was strengthened by their known intimacy with Philotas, and by the fact that their brother Polemo had fled from the camp when the latter was apprehended (Arr. iii. pp. 72, 1, 73, a.), or according to Curtius (vii. 1. § 10), when he was given up to the torture. (Curt. vii. 1. § 18, c.) And his innocence being further established by Polemo's re-appearance (Curt. vii. 2. § 1, &c.; Arr. iii. p. 73, a.), they were acquitted. Some little time after, Amyntas was killed by an arrow at the siege of a village. (Arr. iii. L. c.) It is doubtful whether the son of Amyntas is the Amyntas mentioned by Curtius (iii. 9. § 7) as commander of a portion of the Macedonian troops at the battle of Issus, n. c. 333; or again, the person spoken of as leading a brigade at the forcing of the "Persian Gates," n. c. 331. (Curt. v. 4. § 20.) But "Amyntas" appears to have been a common name among the Macedonians. (See Curt. iv. 13, § 26, v. 2. § 5, vii. 2. § 14, 16, vi. 7. § 15, vi. 9. § 28.)

5. The Macedonian tugitive and traitor, son of Antioco, Arrian (p. 17, f) ascribes his Perdiccas' flight to his hatred and fear of Alexander the Great; the ground of these feelings is not stated, but Mitford (ch. 44. sect. 1) connects him with the plot of Pausanias and the murder of Philip. He took refuge in Ephesus under Persian protection; whence, however, after the battle of the Granicus, fearing the approach of Alexander, he escaped with the Greek mercenaries who garrisoned the place, and fled to the court of Dareius. (Arr. L. c.) In the winter of the same year, n. c. 333, while Alexander was at Phasis in Lydia, discovery was made of a plot against his life, in which Amyntas was implicated. He appears to have acted as the channel through whom Dareius had been negotiating with Alexander the Lyncestian, and had promised to murder him in motors. (Arr. ii. p. 40. 2.) Thus Arrian's account is on condition of his assassinating his master. The design was discovered through the confession of Asias, a Persian, whom Dareius had dispatched on a secret mission to the Lyncestian, and was apprehended by Parmenio in Phrygia. (Arr. i. pp. 24, c, 25, b.)

At the battle of Issus we hear again of Amyntas as a commander of Greek mercenaries in the Persian service (Curt. iii. 11. § 18; comp. Arr. ii. p. 40, b.), and Plutarch and Arrian mention his advice, given some time after to Dareius shortly before, to await Alexander's approach in the large open plains to the westward of Gileon. (Plut. Alex. p. 678, b, Arr. ii. p. 35, c, 84, a.)
AMYTAS.

On the defeat of the Persians at the battle of Issus, Amyntas fled with a large body of Greeks to Tripolis in Phocisemia. There he seized some ships, with which he passed over to Cyprus, and thence to Egypt, of the sovereignty of which—a double traitor he designed to possess himself. The gates of Pelusium were opened to him on his pretending that he came with authority from Darius; thence he pressed on to Memphis, and being joined by a large number of Egyptians, defeated in a battle the Persian garrison under Mazaces. But this victory made his troops over-confident and incautious, and, while they were dispersed for plunder, Mazaces sallied forth upon them, and Amyntas himself was killed with the greater part of his men. (Diod. xvii. 48; Arr. ii. p. 40, c; Curt. iv. l. § 27, &c. iv. 7. § 1, 2.)

6. A king of Galatia and several of the adjacent countries, mentioned by Strabo (xii. p. 560) as contemporary with himself. He seems to have first possessed Lycocoria, where he maintained more than 300 flocks. (Strab. xii. p. 586.) To this he added the territory of Derbe by the murder of its prince, Antipater, the friend of Cleomedes (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 73), and Isaura and Capadocia by Roman favour. Plutarch, who enumerates him among the adherents of Antony at Actium (Ant. p. 944, c.), speaks probably by anticipation in calling him king of Galatia, for he did not succeed to that till the death of Deiotarus (Strab. xii. p. 567); and the latter is mentioned by Plutarch himself (Ant. p. 945, b.) as deserting to Octavius, just before the battle, together with Amyntas.

While pursuing his schemes of aggrandizement, and endeavouring to reduce the refractory highlanders around him, Amyntas made himself master of Honomada (Strab. xii. p. 569), or Hemonia (Plin. H. N. v. 27), and slew the prince of that place; but his death was avenged by his widow, and Amyntas fell a victim to an ambush which she laid for him. (Strab. l.c.)

AMYTAS.

AMYTAS (Ἀμύτας), a Greek writer of a work entitled Συγκεχαλο, which was probably an account of the different halting-places of Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition. He perhaps accompanied Alexander. (Nikae, Cicerius, p. 205.) From the references that are made to it, it seems to have contained a good deal of historical information. (Athen. ii. p. 67, a, x. p. 442, b, xi. p. 500, d, xii. pp. 514, f, 529, e; Adrian, H. N. v. 14, xvii. 17.)

AMYTAS, surgeon. [AMENITES.]

AMYTIA'NUS (Ἀμυτιανός), the author of a work on Alexander the Great, dedicated to the emperor M. Antoninus; the style of which Plutarch blames. He also wrote the life of Olympias, the mother of Alexander, and a few other biographies. (Phot. Cod. 131, p. 97, a ed. Bekker.) The Scholiast on Pindar (ad Ol. iii. 52) refers to a work of Amytianus on elephants.

AMYTINOR (Ἀμυτινόρ), according to Homer (H. x. 266), a son of Ormenus of Thecen in Thessaly, where Autolycus broke into his house and stole the beautiful helmet, which afterwards came into the hands of Meriones, who wore it during the war against Troy. Amyntor was the father of Crantor, Eusemen, Astydameia, and Phoenix, the last of these was cursed and expelled by Amyntor for having entertained, at the instigation of his mother Cleobule or Hippodameia, an unlawful intercourse with his father's mistress. (Hom. H. ii. 484, &c.; Lycol. 417.) According to Apollodorus (ii. 7. § 7, iii. 13. § 7), who states, that Amyntor blinded his son Phoenix, he was a grandson of Atreus, and was slain by Heracles, to whom he refused a passage through his dominions, and the hand of his daughter Astydameia. (Comp. Diod. iv. 37.) According to Ovid (Met. viii. 307, xii. 364, &c.), Amyntor took part in the Calydonian hunt, and was king of the Dolopes, and when conquered in a war by Pelus, he gave him his son Crantor as a hostage. [L. S.]

AMYRIS (Ἀμύρης), of Sybaris in Italy, surmounted "the Wise," whose son was one of the authors of Agarista, at the beginning of the sixth century, b. c. Amyris was sent by his fellow-citizens to consult the Delphic oracle. His reputation for wisdom gave rise to the proverb, "Αμύρης ἀνεύρετος, "the wise man is mad." (Herod. vi. 120; Athen. xii. p. 520, a; Suidas, s. v.; Budech. ad H. ii. p. 290; Zenobius, Paroem. iv. 27.)

AMYRTAES (Ἀμύρταιος). 1. The name, according to Ctesias (ap. Phot. Cod. 72, p. 37, Bekker), of the king of Egypt who was conquered by Cambyses. [PAEAMNITATU.]

2. A Satyr, who, having been invested with the title of king of Egypt, was joined with Inaras the Libyan in the command of the Egyptians when they rebelled against Artaxerxes Longimanus (b. c. 460). After the first success of the Egyptians, b. c. 456 [ACHIARMEXES], Artaxerxes sent a second immense army against them, by which they were totally defeated. Amyrtaeus escaped to the island of Euboia, and maintained himself as king in the marshy districts of Lower Egypt till about the year 414 b. c., when the Egyptians expelled the Persians, and Amyrtaeus reigned six years, being the only king of the 28th dynasty. His name on the monuments is thought to be Amonhore. Eusebius calls him Amyrites and Amyrtratus (Ἀμύρτανος). (Herod. ii. 140, iii. 15; Thuc. i. 110; Diod. xi. 74, 75; Ctesias, ap. Phot. pp. 27, 32, 40, Bekker; Budech. Chron. Armon. pp. 106, 342, ed. Zohrab and Mai; Wilkinson's Ant. Egypt. i. p. 205.)

P. S.]

AMYRUS (Ἀμύρος), a son of Poseidon, from whom the town and river Amyrus in Thessaly were believed to have derived their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Val. Phoc. ii. 11.)

AMYTHA'ON (Ἀμυθα'ων), a son of Cretheus and Tyro (Hom. Od. xi. 285, &c.), and brother of Aecon and Pheres. (Hom. Od. xi. 285.) He dwelt at Pyles in Messenia, and by Homer became the father of Dias, Melampus, and Aeolia. (Apollod. i. 9. § 11, 7, 8.) According to Pindar (Poth. iv. 220, &c.), he and several other members of his family went to Iolcos to intercede with Pelias on behalf of Jason. Pausanias (v. 8. § 1) mentions him among those to whom the restoration of the Olympic games was ascribed. [L. S.]

AMYTHAO'NIUS, a patronymic from Amythaon, by which his son, the seer Melampus, is sometimes designated. (Virg. Georg. iii. 550; Columell. x. 348.) The descendants of Amythaon in general are called by the Greeks Amytho'midai. (Strab. viii. p. 372.) [L. S.]

'AMYTIS ('Avmet). 1. The daughter of Asytrages, the wife of Cyrus, and the mother of Cambyses, according to Ctesias. (Per. c. 2, 10, &c.; Lib. vii. 6.)

2. The daughter of Xerxes, the wife of Megerbyzus, and the mother of Acharnæus, who perished in Egypt, according to Ctesias. (Per. c. 20, 22, 28, 30, 36, 39, &c.)

'ANACIES. [ANAX, No. 2.]

ANACHARSIS ('Anagyrov), a Scythian of princely rank, according to Herodotus (iv. 76), the son of Gnaurus, and brother of Saulius, king of Thrace; according to Lucian (Skeith) the son of Dacetas. He left his native country to travel in pursuit of knowledge, and came to Athens just at the time that Solon was occupied with his legislative measures. He became acquainted with Solon, and by the simplicity of his way of living, his talents, and his acute observations on the institutions and usages of the Greeks, he excelled general attention and admiration. The flame of his wisdom was such, that he was even reckoned by some among the seven sages. Some writers affirmed, that after having been honored with the Athenian franchise, he was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries. According to the account in Herodotus, on his return to Thrace, he was killed by his brother Saulius, while celebrating the orgies of Cybèle at Hydcan. Diogenes Laertius gives a somewhat different version—that he was killed by his brother while hunting. He is said to have written a metrical work on legislation and the art of war. Xerxes (Tusc. Dis. v. 32) quotes from one of his oracles, by which several, though of doubtful authenticity, are still extant. Various sayings of his are preserved by Diogenes and Athenaeus. Herod. iv. 46, 76, 77; Plat. Sol. 5, Conv. Sept. Scipion.; Diog. Laert. i. 101, &c.; Strab. vii. 303; Lucian, Skeiths and Acharnæus; Athen. v. p. 150, x. pp. 428, 437, xiv. p. 613; Adlen, V. R. v. 7.) [C. P. M.]

ANACREON ('Anacreon), one of the principal Greek lyric poets, was a native of the Ionian city of Teos, in Asia Minor. The accounts of his life are meagre and confused, but he seems to have spent his youth at his native city, and to have removed, with the great body of its inhabitants, to Abdera, in Thrace, when Teos was taken by Harsagius, the general of Cyrus (about b. c. 540; Strab. iv. p. 644). The early part of his middle life was spent at Samos, under the patronage of Polymetes, in whose praise Anacreon wrote many songs. (Strab. xiv. p. 638; Herod. iii. 121.) He rejoiced very high favour with the tyrant, and is said to have softened his temper by the charms of music. (M. Fr. iv. 160.) On the death of Polymetes (b. c. 522), he went to Athens at the invitation of the tyrant Hipparchus, who sent a galley of fifty oars to fetch him. (Plut. Hipparch. p. 228.) At Athens he became acquainted with Simonides and other poets, whose taste of Hipparchus had collected round him, and he was admitted to intimacy by other noble families besides the Peisistratids, among whom he especially celebrated the beauty of Critias, the son of Drodizes. (Plut. Charm. p. 157; Bergh's Anacreon, fr. 55.) He died at the age of 85, probably about b. c. 478. (Lucian, Macrob. c. 26.) Simonides wrote two epitaphs upon him (Anth. Pal. vii. 24, 25), the Athenians set up his statue in the Acropolis (Paus. i. 25. § 1), and the Teians struck his portrait on their coins. (Visconti, Icon. Græcor., pl. iii. 6.) The place of his death, however, is uncertain. The second epitaph of Simonides appears to say clearly that he was buried at Teos, whether he is supposed to have returned after the death of Hipparchus (b. c. 514); but there is also a tradition that, after his return to Teos, he died a second time at Abdera, in consequence of the revolt of Histaenus. (b. c. 495; Suidas, s. v. Ἀνάκρεων and Τέος.) This tradition has, however, very probably arisen from a confusion with the original emigration of the Teians to Abdera.

The universal tradition of antiquity represents Anacreon as a most consummate voluptuary; and his poems prove the truth of the tradition. Though Histaenus (x. p. 429) thought that their drunken tone was affected, arguing that the poet must have been tolerably sober while in the act of writing, it is plain that Anacreon sings of love and wine with hearty good will, and that his songs in honour of Polymetes came less from the heart than the expressions of his love for the beautiful youths whom the tyrant had gathered round him. (Anth. Pal. vii. 25; Maxim. Tyr. Diss. xv. i. 1.) We see in him the luxury of the Ionian inflamed by the fervour of the poet. The tale that he loved Sopho is very improbable. (Athen. xiii. p. 589.) His death was worthy of his life, if we may believe the account, which looks, however, too like a poetical fiction, that he was choked by a grape-stone. (Plin. vii. 5; Val. Max. ix. 12. § 8.) The idea formed of Anacreon by nearly all ancient writers, as a grey-haired old man, seems to have been derived from his later poems, in forgetfulness of the fact that when his fame was at its height, at the court of Polymetes, he was a very young man; the delusion being aided by the unabated warmth of his poetry to the very last. In the time of Suidas five books of Anacreon's poems were extant, but of these only a few genuine fragments have come down to us. The "Odes" attributed to him are now universally admitted to be spurious. All of them are later than the time of Anacreon. Though some of them are very graceful, others are very deficient in poetical feeling; and all are wanting in the tone of earnestness which the poetry of Anacreon always breathed. The usual metre in these Odes is the Iambic Dimeter Catalectic, which occurs only once in the genuine fragments of Anacreon. His favourite metres are the Chorianic and the Ionie a Minore.

The editions of Anacreon are very numerous. The best are those of Brunnck, Strab. 1706; Fischer, Lips. 1719; Philhorm, Glogau, 1820, and Bergk, Lips. 1834. [P. J.]

ANACYNDARAXES (Ἀνακύνδαραξ), the father of Sardanapalus, king of Assyria. (Arrian, ANASTASIIUS

The invention of the satyrical iambic verse called Seazon is ascribed to him as well as to Hipponax. (Hephaest. p. 30, 11, Gaisk.) Some fragments of Anastius are preserved by Athenaeus (pp. 78, 262, 370), and all that is known of him has been collected by Welcker in 'Hephaest. de Ananii Iambico-grammaticis Fragmenta, p. 109, &c.') [P. S.]

ANAPHAS ('Aραφας), was said to have been one of the seven who slew the Magi in b. c. 521, and to have been lineally descended from Atossa, the sister of Cambyses, who was the father of the great Cyrus. The Cappadocian kings traced their origin to Anaphas, who received the government of Cappadocia, free from taxes. Anaphas was succeeded by his son of the same name, and the latter by Datames. (Diol. xxxi. Ed. 3.)

ANASTASIA, a noble Roman lady, who suffered martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution. (A. D. 303.) Two letters written by her in prison are extant in Suidas, a, χρυσόφωνος. [P. S.]

ANASTASIUS ('Αναστάσιος), the author of a Latin epigram of eighteen lines addressed to a certain Arnatus, "De Ratione Victus Salutaris post Remissionem Emissam Sanguinem," which is to be found in several editions of the Regimen Sanitatis Salutis, (p. Antheus, 1557, 12mo.) The life and date of the author are quite unknown, but he was probably a late writer, and is therefore not to be confounded with a Greek physician of the same name, whose remedy for the gout, which was to be taken during a whole year, is quoted with approbation by Attius (tetrab. iii. serm. iv. 47, p. 609), and who must therefore have lived some time during or before the fifth century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ANASTASIIUS I., II., patriarchs of Antioch. [ANASTASIIUS SINATA.]

ANASTASIIUS I. ('Αναστάσιος), emperor of Constantinople, surnamed Dicurus ('Δικορ) on account of the different colour of his eye-balls, was born about 430 a. d., at Dyrrachium in Epirus. He was descended from an unknown family, and we are acquainted with only a few circumstances concerning his life previously to his accession. We know, however, that he was a zealous Eutychian, that he was no married, and that he served in the imperial life guard of the Silentiarii, which was the cause of his being generally called Anastasius Silentiarius. The emperor Zeno, the Iurian, having died in 497 without male issue, it was generally believed that his brother Longinus would succeed him; but in consequence of an intrigue carried on during some time, as it seems, between Anastasius and the empress Ariadne, Anastasius was proclaimed emperor shortly afterwards he married Ariadne, but he appears not to have had an adulterous interest in her welfare. When Anastasius ascended the throne of the Eastern empire he was a man of at least sixty, but though, notwithstanding his advanced age, he evinced uncommon energy, his reign is one of the most deplorable periods of Byzantine history, disturbed as it was by foreign and intestine wars an by the still greater calamity of religious trouble. Immediately after his accession, Longinus, the brother of Zeno, Longinus Magister Officerum and Longinus Selinus, rose against him, an being all natives of Isauria, where they had great influence, they made this province the centre of their operations against the imperial troops. Th war, which is known in history under the name of the Isaurian war, lasted till 497, and partly till 498, when it was finished to the advantage of the emperor by the captivity and death of the ring-leaders of the rebellion. John the Scythian, John the Humbacked, and under them Justinus, who became afterwards emperor, distinguished themselves greatly as commanders of the armies of Anastasius. The following years were signalized by a sedition in Constantinople occasioned by disturbances between the factions of the Blue and the Green, by religious troubles which the emperor was able to quell only by his own humiliation, by wars with the Arabs and the Bulgarians, and by earthquakes, famine, and plague. (A.D. 500.) Anastasius tried to relieve his people by abolishing the agyrgyry, a heavy poll-tax which was paid indifferently for men and for domestic animals. Immediately after these calamities, Anastasius was involved in a war with Cabadis, the king of Persia, who destroyed the Byzantine army commanded by Hypcicius and Patricius Phrygios, and ravaged Mesopotamia in a dreadful manner. Anastasius purchased peace in 505 by paying 11,000 pounds of gold to the Persians, who, being threatened with an invasion of the Huns, restored to the emperor the provinces which they had overrun. From Asia Anastasius sent his generals to the banks of the Danube, where they fought an unsuccessful but not inglorious campaign against the East-Goths of Italy, and tried, but in vain, to defend the passage of the Danube against the Bulgarians. These indefatigable warriors crossed that river in great numbers, and ravaging the greater part of Thrace, appeared in Thrace, which was the scene of the war of Anastasius, and no other means were left to the emperor to secure the immediate neighbourhood of his capital but by constructing a fortified wall across the isthmus of Constantinople from the coast of the Propontis to that of the Pontus Euxinus. (A.D. 507.) Some parts of this wall, which in a later period proved useful against the Turks, are still existing. Clovis, king of the Franks, was created consul by Anastasius.

The end of the reign of Anastasius cannot well be understood without a short notice of the state of religion during this time, a more circumstantial account of which the reader will find in Evagrius and Theophanes cited below. As early as 468, Anastasius, then only a Silenarius, had been active in promoting the Eutychian Peladus to the see of Antioch. This act was made a subject of reproach against him by the orthodox patriarch of Constantinople, Euphemius, who, upon Anastasius succeeding Zeno on the throne, persuaded or compelled him to sign a convention of faith according to the orthodox principles laid down in the council of Chalcedon. Notwithstanding this confession, Anastasius continued an adherent to the dogmatism of Eutychius; and in he had his enemy, Euphemius, deposed and replaced. It is said, that at this time Anastasius gave great propensities to the sect of the Acephali. The successor of Euphemius was Macedioius, who often thwarted the measures of the emperor, and who but a few years afterwards was driven from his see, which Anastasius gave to the uchiyan Timotheus, who opposed the orthodox many matters. Upon this, Anastasius was anathematized by pope Symmachus, whose successor, Hormidas, sent deputies to Constantinople the purpose of restoring peace to the Church of the East. However, the religious motives of these disturbances were either so intimately connected with political motives, or the hatred between the parties was so great, that the deputies did not succeed. In 514, Vitalianus, a Gothic prince in the service of the emperor, put himself at the head of a powerful army, and laid siege to Constantinople, under the pretense of compelling Anastasius to put an end to the vexations of the orthodox church. In order to get rid of such an enemy, Anastasius promised to assemble a general council, which was to be presided over by the pope, and he appointed Vitalianus his commander-in-chief in Thrace. But no sooner was the army of Vitalianus disbanded, than Anastasius once more eluded his promises, and the predominance of the Eutychians over the orthodox lasted till the death of the emperor. Anastasius died in 518, at the age of between eighty-eight and ninety-one years. Evagrius states, that after his death his name was erased from the sacred "Diptycha" or tables.

Religious hatred having more or less guided modern writers as well as those whom we must consider as the sources with regard to Anastasius, the character of this emperor has been described in a very different manner. The reader will find these opinions carefully collected and weighed with prudence and criticism in Tillemont's "Histoire des Empereurs." Whatever were his vices, and however avaricious and faithless he was, Anastasius was far from being a common man. Tillemont, though he is often misled by bigotry, does not blame him for many actions, and praises him for many others for which he has been frequently reproached. The famous author of the "Histoire du Bas Empire," does not condemn him; and Gibbon commands him, although principally for his economy. (Evagrius, iii. 29, seq.; Codennus, pp. 354-365, ed. Paris; Theophanes, pp. 115-141, ed. Paris; Gregor. Turon. ii. 38.) [W. P.]

ANASTASIUS II., emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE. The original name of this emperor was Artemius, and he was one of the ministers (Protonomarch) of the emperor Philippius, who had his eyes put out by the traitor Rufus, in the month of June A.D. 713. Artemius, universally esteemed for his character and his qualities, was chosen in his stead, and, although his reign was short and disturbed by troubles, he gave sufficient proofs of being worthy to reign. After having punished Rufus and his accomplices, he appointed the Isaurian Leo, who became afterwards emperor, his general in chief against the Lazes and other Caucasian nations, and himself made vigorous preparations against the Arabs, by whom the southern provinces of the empire were then continually harassed. He formed the bold plan of burning the naval stores of the enemy on the coast of Syriis, stores necessary for the construction of a large fleet, with which the Arabs intended to lay siege to Constantinople. The commander of the Byzantine fleet was John, who combined the three dignities of grand treasurer of the empire, admiral, and dean of St. Sophia, and who left Constantinople in 715. But the expedition failed, and a mutiny broke out on board the ships, in consequence of which John was massacred, and Theodosius, once a renegade, was proclaimed emperor. It is probable that the rebel had many adherents in the Asiatic provinces; for while he sailed with his fleet to Constantinople, ANASTASIUS.

Anastasius, after having left a strong garrison for the defence of his capital, went to Nicaea for the purpose of preventing all danger from that side. After an obstinate resistance during six months, Constantinople was taken by surprise in the month of January 716, and Anastasius, besieged in Nicaea, surrendered on condition of having his life preserved. This was granted to him by the victorious rebel, who ascended the throne under the name of Theodosius III. Anastasius retired to a convent at Theodosiopolis. In the third year of the reign of Leo III. Isaurius (721), Anastasius conspired against this emperor at the instigation of Nicetas Xylophonus. They hoped to be supported by Tarsus or Tripoli, but the enterprise proved abortive, and the two conspirators were put to death by order of Leo. (Theophanes, pp. 321, &c., 335, ed. Paris; Zonaras, xiv. 26, &c.; Codræus, p. 449, ed. Paris.)

[W. P.]

ANASTASIA, a Graeco-Roman jurist, who interpreted the Digest. He is cited in the Basilicon (ed. Heyne, p. 10; ed. Fabrot. i. p. 791, viii. p. 258), in which, on one occasion, his opinion is quoted in opposition to that of Stephanus. Beyond this circumstance, we can discover in his fragments no very strong reason for supposing him to have been contemporary with Justinian; Reitz, however, considered it certain that he was so, and accordingly marked his name with an asterisk in the list of jurists subjoined to his edition of Theophilus. (Loc. cit. xx. p. 1234.) The name is so common, that it would be rash to identify the jurist with contemporary Anastasius; but it may be stated, that among more than forty persons of the name, Fabricius mentions one who was consul A.D. 517.

Procopius (de Bell. Pers. ii. 4, 5) relates, that Anastasius, who had quelled an attempt to usurp imperial power in his native city Dura, and had acquired a high reputation for intelligence, was sent on an embassy to Chosroes, A.D. 540. This Anastasius was at first detained against his will by Chosroes, but was sent back to Justinian, after Chosroes had destroyed the city of Sumn. [J. T. G.]

ANASTASIA, metropolitan bishop of Nice (about 520—556 A.D.), wrote or dictated, in Greek, a work on the Psalms, which is still extant. (Bibl. Codex, p. 389.)

[P. S.]

ANASTASII I, bishop of Rome, from 388 to his death in 402, took the side of Jerome in his controversy with Rufinus respecting Origen. He excommunicated Rufinus and condemned the works of Origen, confessing, however, that he had never heard Origen's name before the translation of one of his works by Rufinus. (Constant., Epist. Pontif. Rom. p. 718.) Jerome praises him in the highest terms. (Epist. 160.) [P. S.]

ANASTASII II, bishop of Rome from 406 to his death in 438, made an unsuccessful attempt to compose the quarrel between the Greek and Latin Churches, which had been excited by Acacius. There are extant two letters which he wrote to the emperor Anastasius on this occasion, and one which he wrote to Clovis, king of the Franks, in Balanuia, Nov. Collect. Concil. p. 1457. [P. S.]

ANATOLIUS.

ANASTASII SINAITA ( "Anastárdos Zevatos"). Three persons of this name are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers, and often confounded with one another.

1. Anastasius I., made patriarch of Antioch A.D. 559 or 561, took a prominent part in the controversy with the Aphilhoreoikoi, who thought that the body of Christ before the resurrection was incorruptible. He opposed the edict which Justinian issued in favour of this opinion, and was afterwards banished by the younger Justin. (570.) In 583 he was restored to his bishopric at Antioch, and died in 590.

2. Anastasius II., succeeded Anastasius I. in the bishopric of Antioch, A.D. 590. He translated into Greek the work of Gregory the Great, "de Curia Pastorali," and was killed by the Jews in a tumult, 600 A.D.

3. Anastasius, a presbyter and monk of Mt. Sinai, called by later Greek writers "the New Moses" (Μωυσῆς νέος), lived towards the end of 7th century, as is clear from the contents of his "Hodegas." There is some doubt whether the two patriarchs of Antioch were monks of Sinai, and whether the application of the epithet "Sinaita" to them has not arisen from their being confounded with the third Anastasius. The "Hodegas" (ὅδειγμας), or "Guide," above mentioned, a work against the Aphilhoreoikoi, and other heretics who recognized only one nature in the person of Christ, is ascribed by Nicephorus and other writers to Anastasius I., patriarch of Antioch; but events are mentioned in it which occurred long after his death. Others have thought that he was the author of the work originally, but that it has been greatly interpolated. It was, however, most probably the production of the third Anastasius. It was published by Gretzer in Greek and Latin, Ingolstadt, 1606, 4to. It is a loose, illogical, and effort, without any grace of style, and very inaccurate as to facts.

An account of the other writings ascribed to these three Anastasii, and discussions respecting their authorship, will be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Groce. x. p. 571), and Cave. (Hist. Lit.) [P. S.]

ANATOLIUS, of Berytus, afterwards P. P. (profectus provinciarum) of Illyricum, received a legal education in the distinguished law-school of his country, and soon acquired great reputation in his profession of jurisconsult. Not content, however, with forensic eminence, from Berytus he proceeded to Rome, and gained admission to the palace of the emperor. Here he rapidly obtained favour, was respected even by his enemies, and was successively promoted to various honours. He became consularis of Galatia, and we find his name figured among the Messii of Asia under Constantius, A.D. 339 (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 30. s. 19.) A constitution of the same year is addressed to him, according to the vulgar reading, with the title viciores Africum; but the opinion of Godet, that here also the true reading is Asias, has met with the approbation of the learned. (Cod. Th. 12. tit. 1. s. 20.) He appears with the title P. P. in the years 346 and 349, but without mention of his district. (Cod. Th. 12. tit. 1. s. 33. s. 39.) He is, however, distinctly mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus: P. P. of Illyricum, A.D. 359 (Amm. Marc. xii. 11. § 2), and his death in that office is recorded in the same author, A.D. 361. (xxx. 6. § 5.) Whether he was at first prefect of some other district, or whether he held the same office continuously fro.
A.D. 346 to A.D. 361, cannot now be determined. His administration is mentioned by Marcellinus as an era of unusual improvement, and is also recorded by Aurelius Victor (Trigvis) as a bright but solitary instance of reform, which checked the downward progress occasioned by the anarchy and oppression of provincial governors. He is often spoken of in the letters of Libanius; and several letters of Libanius are extant directed directly to Anatolius, and, for the most part, asking favours or recommending friends. We would refer especially to the letters 18, 466, 587, as illustrating the character of Anatolius. When he received from Constantius his appointment to the praefecture of Illyricum, he said to the emperor, "Henceforth, prince, no one will be able to say that henceforth, no one who violates the laws, however high may be his judicial or military rank, shall be allowed to depart with impunity." It appears that he acted up to his virtues resolution.

He was not only an excellent governor, but extremely clever, of very various abilities, eloquent, indefatigable, and ambitious. Part of a panegyric upon Anatolius composed by the sophist Himerius, has been preserved by Photius, but little if anything illustrative of the real character of Anatolius is to be collected from the remains of this panegyric. (Wernsdorff, ad Himerianum, xxxii. and 287.) If we would learn something of the private history of the man, we must look into the letters of Libanius and the life of Paschasius by Eunapius. In the 18th letter of Libanius, which is partly written in a tone of sigh and peregrination, it is difficult to say bow far the censure and the praise are ironic. Libanius seems to insinuate, that his powerful acquaintance was stunted and ill-favoured in person; did not scruple to enrich himself by accepting presents voluntarily offered; was partial to the Syrians, his own countrymen, in the distribution of patronage; and was apt, in his prosperity, to lock down upon old friends.

Among his accomplishments it may be mentioned that he was fond of poetry, and so much adored the poetic effusions of Milesius of Smyrna, that he called him Milesius the Muse. Anatolius himself received from those who wished to detract from his reputation the nickname 'Agripnios, a word which has puzzled the whole tribe of commentators and lexicographers, including Father Ducange, and Toup. It is probably connected in some way with the stage, as Eunapius refers for its explanation to the κακοδιάμοι τῶν θυμων χρόνως. He was a heathen, and clung to his religion at a time when heathenism was unfashionable, and when the tide of opinion had begun to set strongly towards Christianity. It is recorded, that, upon his arrival in Athens, he rather ostentatiously performed sacrifices, and visited the temples of the gods.

An error of importance concerning Anatolius occurs in a work of immense learning and deservedly high authority. Juc. Godofry states, in the Prosopographia attached to his edition of the Theodosian Code, that 16 letters of St. Basil the Great (viz. letters 391-406) are addressed to Anatolius. This error, which we have no doubt originated from the accidental descent of a sentence that belonged to the preceding article on Apollodorus, has been overlooked in the revision of Ritter.

The Anatolius who was P. P. of Illyricum is believed by some to have been skilled in agriculture and medicine as well as in law. It is possible that he was identical with the Anatolius who is often cited in the Geoponika by one or other of the three names, Anatolius, Vindianus, (or Vindianius,) Berytius. These names have sometimes been erroneously supposed to designate three different individuals. (Nicias, Prolegom. ad Geopon. p. xxvi.) The work on Agriculture written by this Anatolius, Photius (Cod. 163) thought the best work on the subject, though containing some marvellous and incredible things. Our Anatolius may also be identical with the author of a treatise concerning Sympathies and Antipathies (περὶ Μυαλωματων καὶ Αντιμελειας), the remains of which may be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 29); but we are rather disposed to attribute this work to Anatolius the philosopher, who was the biographer of Iamblichus (Brucker, Hist. Phil. vol. ii. p. 260), and to whom Porphyry addressed Homeric Questions. Other contemporaries of the same name are mentioned by Libanius, and errors have frequently been committed from the great number of Anatoli who held office under the Roman emperors. Thus our Anatolius has been confounded with the magister officiorum who fell in the battle against the Persians at Marama, A.D. 263, in which Julian was slain. (Am. Marcell. xx. 8, xxv. 6, § 5.) [J. T. G.] ANATO/LIUS, professor of law at Berytus. In the second preface to the Digest (Const. Tantula, § 9), he is mentioned by Justinian, with the words, "tronici, magister, among those who were employed in compiling that great work, and is complimented as a person descended from an ancient legal stock, since both his father Leontius and his grandfather Eudoxius "optimum sae memoriā in legibus relinquuerunt." He wrote notes on the Digest, and a very concise commentary on Justinian's Code. Both of these works are cited in the Basilica. Matthaeus Blastares (in Præf. Syntag.) states, that the "professor (druckverp.)" Thaleleuses edited the Code at length; Theodorus Hermopolites briefly; Anatolius still more briefly; Isidorus more succinctly than Thaleleuses. but more diffusely than the other two." It is possibly from some misunderstanding or some misquotation of this passage, that Terrasson (Histoire de la Jurispr. Rom. p. 358) speaks of an Anatolius different from the contemporary of Justinian, and says that this younger Anatolius was employed by the emperor Theodosius jointly with Theodorus Hermopolites and Isidorus, to translate Justinian's Code into Greek. This statement, for which we have been able to find no authority, seems to be intrinsically improbable. The Constitutio, Ommen (one of the prefaces of the Digest), bears date A.D. 553, and is addressed, among others, to Theodorus, Isidorus, and Anatolius. Now, it is very unlikely that three jurists of similar name should be employed conjointly by the emperor Phocas, who reigned A.D. 602-610. There was probably some confusion in the mind of Terrasson between the emperor Phocas and a jurist of the same name, who was contemporary with Justinian, and commented upon the Code.

Anatolius held several offices of importance. He was advocatus facti, and Comb one of the magistri juridici nominated by Justinian in Nov. 82, c. 1. Finally, he filled the office of consul, and was appointed curatrix divinae domus et vir principinis. In the exercise of his official functions he became unpopular, by appropriating to himself, under colour of confiscations to the emperor, the effects of deceased persons, to the exclusion of their rightful heirs. He perished in A.D. 557, in an earthquake at Byzantium, whither he had removed his residence from Berytus. (Agath. Hist. v. 3.) [J. T. G.] ANATOLIUS (Ἀνατόλιος), Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE (A. D. 449), presided at a synod at Constantinople (A. D. 450) which condemned Eutyches and his followers, and was present at the general council of Chalcedon (A. D. 451), out of the twenty-eighth decree of which a contest sprang up between Anatolius and Leo, bishop of Rome, respecting the relative rank of their two sees. A letter from Anatolius to Leo, written upon this subject in A.D. 457, is still extant. (Cave, Hist. Lit. A.D. 449.) [P. S.] ANATOLIUS (Ἀνατόλιος), Bishop of LAODICEA (A.D. 270), was an Alexandrian by birth. Eusebius ranks him first among the men of his age, in literature, philosophy, and sciences, and states, that the Alexandrians urged him to open a school of Aristotelian philosophy. (H. E. vii. 23.) He was of great service to the Alexandrians when they were besieged by the Romans, A. D. 262. From Alexandria he went into Syria. At Caesarea he was ordained by Theodotus, who destined him to be his successor in the bishopric, the duties of which he discharged for a short time as the vicar of Theodotus. Afterwards, while proceeding to attend a council at Antioch, he was detained by the people of Laodicea, and became their bishop. Of his subsequent life nothing is known; but by some he is said to have suffered martyrdom. He wrote a work on the chronology of Eusebius, a large fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius. (A.D.) The work exists in a Latin translation, which some ascribe to Rufinus, under the title of "Volumen de Paschate," or "Canonem Paschale," and which was published by Aquedus Becherius in his Doctrina Temporum, Antwerp, 1634. He also wrote a treatise on Arithmetic, in ten books (Hieron. de Viv. Hist. c. 78), of which some fragments are preserved in the Θεολογικαί τῆς Αριστοτεικῆς. Some fragments of his mathematical works are printed in Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 492. [P. S.] ANAX (Ἀναξ). 1. A giant, son of Uranus and Gaia, and father of Asterius. The legends of Miletus, which for two generations bore the name of Anaxia, described Anax as king of Anactoria; but in the reign of his son the town and territory were conquered by the Cretan Miletus, who changed the name Anactoria into Miletus. (Paus. i. 55. § 6, vii. 2. § 2.) 2. A surname or epithet of the gods in general, characterizing them as the rulers of the world; but the plural forms, "Ἀνάκες, or Ἄνακτες, or Ἀνάκτες παῖδες," were used to designate the Dioscuri. (Paus. ii. 29. § 7, x. 38. § 3; Cie. de Nat. Deor. iii. 31; Aeliam, V. H. v. 4; Plut. Them. 23.) In the second of the passages of Pausanias here referred to, in which he speaks of a temple of the Ἀνάκτες παῖδες at Amphissa, he states, that it was a doubtful point whether they were the Dioscuri, the Curetes, or the Cabeiri; and from this circumstance a connexion between Amphissa and Samothrace has been inferred. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 152, 1598.) Some critics identify the Anaces with the Eumak of the Hebrews. [L. S.] ANAXAGORAS (Ἀναξαγόρας), a Greek philosopher, was born in Ionia about the year B.C. 499. His father, Hegesibulus, left him in the possession of considerable property, but as he intended to devote his life to higher ends, he gave it up to his relatives as something which ought not to engage his attention. He is said to have gone to Athens at the age of twenty, during the contest of the Greeks with Persia, and to have lived and taught in that city for a period of thirty years. He became here the intimate friend and teacher of the most eminent men of the time, such as Euripides and Pericles; but while he thus gained the friendship and admiration of the most enlightened Athenians, the majority, meneey at being disturbed in their hereditary superstitions, soon found reasons for complaint. The principal cause of hostility towards him must, however, be looked for in the following circumstance. As he was a friend of Pericles, the party which was dissatisfied with his administration sailed upon the disposition of the people towards the philosopher as a favourable opportunity for striking a blow at the great statesman. Anaxagoras, therefore, was accused of impiety. His trial and its results are matters of the greatest uncertainty on account of the different statements of the ancients themselves. (Diog. Laert. ii. 12, &c.; Plut. Peric. 32, Nicias, 23.) It seems probable, however, that Anaxagoras was accused twice, once on the ground of impiety, and a second time on that of partiality to Persia. In the first case it was only owing to the influence and eloquence of Pericles that he was not put to death; but he was sentenced to pay a fine of five talents and to quit Athens. The philosopher now went to Lampascus, and it seems to have been during his absence that the second charge of impiety was brought against him, in consequence of which he was condemned to death. He is said to have received the intelligence of his sentence with a smile, and to have died at Lampascus at the age of seventy-two. The inhabitants of this place honoured Anaxagoras not only during his lifetime, but after his death also. (Diog. Laert. ii. 3; Dict. of Ant. a. v. Αναξαγόρας.) Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and other writers, call Anaxagoras a disciple of Anaximenes; but this statement is not only connected with some chronological difficulties, but is not quite in accordance with the accounts of other writers. Thus much, however, is certain, that Anaxagoras struck into a new path, and was dissatisfied with the systems of his predecessors, the Ionic philosophers. It is he who laid the foundation of the Attic philosophy, and who stated the problem which his successors laboured to solve. The Ionic philosophers had endeavoured to explain nature and its various phenomena by regarding matter in its different forms and modifications as the cause of all things. Anaxagoras, on the other hand, conceived the necessity of seeking a higher cause, independent of matter, and this cause he considered to be νοῦς, that is, mind, thought, or intelligence. This νοῦς, however, is not the creator of the world, but merely that which originally arranged the world and gave motion to it; for, according to the axiom that out of nothing nothing can come, he supposed the existence of matter from all eternity, though before the νοῦς was exercised upon it, it was in a chaotic confusion. In this original chaos there was an infinite number of homogeneous parts (ζωομορφίς) as well as heterogeneous ones. This νοῦς then, it is said, separated the heterogeneous from what was homogeneous, and out of this process arose the things we see in this world. Thi union and separation, however, were made in such a manner, that each thing contains in itself parts of other things or heterogeneous elements, and is what it is, only on account of the preponderance of certain homogeneous parts which constitute its character. The void, which thus regulated and formed the material world, is itself also cogent, and consequently the principle of all cognition: it alone can see truth and the essence of things, while our senses are imperfect and often lead us into error. Anaxagoras explained his dualistic system in a work which is now lost, and we know it only from such fragments as are quoted from it by later writers, as Plato, Aristotle, Plutarch, Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and others.

For a full account of Anaxagoras, see the works of Ritter, Geerdes, Fontelius, Ph. p. 203, &c.; Brünich, Rhein. Mus. i. p. 117, &c., Handb. der Gesch. der Philos., i. p. 292, &c.; J. T. Hensen, Anaxagoras Clazomenen, sive de Vita eius a quo Philosophia, Göttlingen, 1821, 8vo.; Breier, Die Philosophie des Anaxagoras von Klázomenai nach Aristoteles, Berlin, 1840. The fragments of Anaxagoras have been collected by Schaubach: Anaxagoras Fragmenta collegiata, &c., Leipzig, 1827, 8vo., and much better by Schorn, Anaxagoras fragmenta disposit. et illustr., Bonn, 1829, 8vo. [L. S.]

ANAXAGORAS (Ἀναξάγορας), of Aegina, a sculptor, flourished about B.C. 400, and executed the statue of Jupiter in bronze set up at Olympia by the states which had united in repelling the invasion of Xerxes. (Paus. v. 23. § 5.) He is supposed to have been the same person as the sculptor mentioned in an epigram by Anacreon (Αναχρόνου), i. p. 55, No. 6, Jacobst.), but not the same as the writer on silicopainting mentioned by Vitruvius. [Agatharchus.] [P. S.]

ANAXANDER (Ἀνάξανδρος), king of Sparta, 12th of the Agids, son of Euryclates, is named by Pausanias as commanding against Aристomenes, and to the end of the second Messenian war, b. c. 668; but probably on mere conjecture from the statement of Tyrtaeus (given by Strabo, viii. p. 362), that the grandsons fought in the first, the grandsons in the second. (Paus. iii. 3, 4, 14, 4, iv. 15. § 1, 16. § 5, 23. § 5; Plut. Apophth. Lac.) [A. H. C.]

ANAXANDRA (Ἀνάξανδρα) and her sister Eudocia, twin daughters of Thersander, Heracleid king of Clazomenae, are said to have been married to the twin-born sons of Sparta, Eurysthenes and Podes; Anaxandarida, it would seem, to Podes. An altar sacred to them remained in the time of Pausanias. (iii. 16. § 5.) [A. H. C.]

ANAXANDRA, the daughter of the painter Naxiales, was herself a painter about B.C. 228. (Didymus, ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 523, b., Synb.) [P. S.]

ANAXANDRIDS (Ἀνάξανδριδες) 1. Son of Theopompus, the 9th Eurypontid king of Sparta; himself never reigned, but by the accession of Leotychides became from the seventh generation the father of the kings of Sparta of that branch. (See for his descendants in the interval Clinton's Past. ii. p. 204, and Herod. viii. 131.)

2. King of Sparta, 15th of the Agids, son of Leon, reigned from about 560 to 520 B.C. At the time when Creon sent his Gallic mercenaries to the aid of Theron with the phrase "the might of the Greeks," i.e. about 554, the war with Tegesa, which in the late reigns went against them, had now been decided in the Spartans' favour, under Anaxandrides and Ariston. Under them, too, was mainly carried on the suppression of the tyrannies, and with it the establishment of the Spartan hegemony.

Having a barren wife whom he would not divorce, the ephors, we are told, made him take with her a second. By her he had Cleomenes; and after this, by his first wife Dorias, Leonidas, and Cleombrotus. (Herod. i. 65–69, v. 39–41; Paus. iii. 5.) Several sayings are ascribed to him in Plut. Apophth. Lac. (where the old reading is Anaxandrides). With the reign of Anaxandrides and Ariston commences the period of certain dates, the chronology of their predecessors being doubtful and the accounts in many ways suspicious; the only certain point being the coincidence of Polydorus and Theopompus with the first Messenian war, which itself cannot be fixed with certainty. (See for all this period Clinton's Past. i. app. 2 and 6, ii. p. 265, and Müller's Doriens, bk. i. c. 7.) [A. H. C.]

ANAXANDRIDES (Ἀνάξανδριδες), of Delphi, a Greek writer, probably the same as Anaxandrides. [A. X. D.]

ANAXARCHUS (Ἀνάξαρχος), an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, was the son of Anaxander, a native of Cameiros in Rhodes. He began to exhibit comedies in B.C. 370 (Merr. Par. Ep. 54), and 29 years later he was present, and probably exhibited, at the Olympic games celebrated by Philip at Dium. Aristophanes held him in high esteem. (B. i. ii. 10–12; Dith. Eud. vi. 10; N. v. vii. 10.) He is said to have been the first poet who made love intrigues a prominent part of comedy. He gained ten prizes, the whole number of his comedies being sixty-five. Though he is said to have destroyed several of his plays in anger at their rejection, we still have the titles of thirty-three.

Anaxandrides was also a dithyrambic poet, but we have no remains of his dithyrambs. (Suidas, s. v.; Athen. ix. 374; Meineke; Bode.) [P. S.]

ANAXARCHUS (Ἀνάξαρχος), a philosopher of Aldera, of the school of Democritus, flourished about 340 B.C. and onwards. (Diog. Laert. ix. 56, 667, Steph.) He accompanied Alexander into Asia, and gained his favour by flattery and wit. From the gaiety of his temper and his love of pleasure he obtained the appellation of  ἐγκαρπωμένος. When Alexander had killed Cleitus, Anaxarchus consoled him with the maxim "a king can do no wrong." After the death of Alexander, Anaxarchus was thrown by shipwreck into the power of Nicanor, king of Cyprus, to whom he had given mortal offence, and who had him pounded to death in a stone mortar. The philosopher endured his sufferings with the utmost fortitude. Cicero (Tusc. ii. 21, de Nat. Deor. iii. 33) is the earliest authority for this tale. Of the philosophy of Anaxarchus we know nothing. Some writers understand his title ἐγκαρπώμενος as meaning, that he was the teacher of a philosophy which made the end of life to be ἐγκαρπών, and they made him the founder of a sect called ἐγκαρπωμοτοῖ, of which, however, he himself is the only person mentioned. Strabo (p. 354) ascribes to Anaxarchus and Callisthenes the recension of Homer, which Alexander kept in Darius's perfume-casket, and which is generally attributed to Aristotle (V. 2, 23; Athen. iv. 19; Plut. Alex. 55; Plin. vii. 23; Adami, V. 37; Bruce, Hist. Philos. i. p. 1207; Duthie, Proleg. de Anaxarchus, Lips. 1782.) [P. S.] ANAXA'RITE (Ἀναχαρίτης), a maiden of the island of Cyprus, who belonged to the ancient family of Teucer. She remained unmoved by the professions of love and lamentations of Iphis, who, at last, in despair, hung himself at the door of her residence. When the unfortunate youth was going to be buried, she looked with indifference from her window at the funeral procession; but Venus punished her by changing her into a stone statue, which was preserved at Salamis in Cyprus, in the temple of Venus Propiociens. (Ov. Met. xiv. 698, &c.)

Antonius Libanius (39), who relates the same story, calls the maiden Arainoe, and her lover Arcophus. [L. S.]

ANAX'IAS or ANAXIS (Ἀναξίας or Ἀναξί), a son of Castor and Alcaea or Hilaea, and brother of Mnaisius, with whom he is usually mentioned. The temple of the Dioscuri at Argos contained also the statues of these two sons of Castor (Paus. ii. 22. § 6), and on the throne of Amyclae both were represented riding on horseback. (iii. 18. § 7.) [L. S.]

ANAX'IBIA (Ἀναξίβια). 1. A daughter of Bias and wife of Pelias, by whom she became the mother of Aeacus, Peleus, Polyoë, Hippodectes, and Alcestis. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16.)

2. A daughter of Creiatus, and second wife of Nestor. (Apollod. i. 9. § 9.)

3. A daughter of Pleisthenes, and sister of Agamemnon, married Strophius and became the mother of Pythades. (Paus. i. 29. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 764, 1235.) Hyginus (Fab. 117) calls the wife of Strophius Astyochea. Eustathius (ad II. ii. 296) confounds Agamemnon's sister with the daughter of Creiatus, saying that the second wife of Nestor was a sister of Agamemnon. There is another Anaxibia in Plut. de Plat. 4. [L. S.]

ANAXIBIUS (Ἀναξίβιος), was the Spartan admiral stationed at Byzantium, to whom the Cyprian Greeks, on their arrival at Trapaon on the Euxine, sent Chereisophus, one of their generals, at his own proposal, to obtain a sufficient number of ships to transport them to Europe. (n. c. 408. Xen. Hell. ii. 1. § 1.) Anaxibius having met them again at Sinope, he brought back nothing from Anaxibius but civil words and a promise of employment and pay as soon as they came out of the Euxine. (Anab. vi. 1. § 16.) On their arrival at Chryseolis, on the Asiatic shore of the Bosporus, Anaxibius, being bribed by Pharnabazus with great promises to withdraw them from their satrapy, again engaged to furnish them with pay, and brought them over to Byzantium. Here he attempted to get rid of them, and to send them forward on their march without fulfilling his agreement. A tumult ensued, in which Anaxibius was compelled to fly for refuge to the Aeropolis, and which was quelled only by the remonstrances of Xenophon. (Anab. vii. 1. § 1-32.) Soon after this the Greeks left the town under the command of the adventurer Coereias, and Anaxibius forthwith issued a proclamation, subsequently acted on by Aristarchus the Harroum, that all Cyprian soldiers found in Byzantium should be sold for slaves. (Anab. vii. 1. § 36, 2. § 6.) Being however soon after superseded in the command, and finding himself neglected by Pharnabazus, he attempted to revenge himself by persuading Xenophon to lead the army to invade the country of the satrap; but the enterprise was stopped by the prohibition and threats of Aristarchus. (Anab. vii. 2. § 5-14.) In the year 389, Anaxibius was sent out from Sparta to supersede Dercylidas in the command at Abydus, and to check the rising fortunes of Athens in the Hellespont. Here he met at first with some successes, till at length Iphicrates, who had been sent against him by the Athenians, contrived to intercept him on his return from Antandrus, which had promised to revolt to him, and of which he had gone to take possession. Anaxibius, coming the Athenian ambassee, and foreseeing the certainty of his own defeat, desired his men to save themselves by flight. His own duty, he said, required him to die there; and, with a small body of comrades, he remained on the spot, fighting till he fell, b. c. 383. (Xen. Hell. iv. b. § 32-39.) [E. E.]

ANAXI'CREATES (Ἀναξικρατής), a Greek writer of uncertain date, one of whose statements is compared with one of Cleitodemus. He wrote a work on Argolis. (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 19, ad Androm. 222.)

ANAXIDAMUS (Ἀναξιδάμος), king of Sparta, 11th of the Euryponids, son of Zeuxidamus, contemporary with Anaximander, and lived to the conclusion of the second Messenian war, b. c. 466. (Paus. iii. 7. § 5.)

ANAXIDAMUS (Ἀναξιδάμος), an Achaean ambassador, sent to Rome in b. c. 164, and again in b. c. 155. (Polyb. xxxi. 6, 8, xxxiii. 2.)

ANAXILAS or ANAXILAUS (Ἀναξίλας, Ἀναξιλαος), an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, contemporary with Plato and Demosthenes, the former of whom he attacked in one of his plays. (Diog. Laert. iii. 28.) We have a few fragments and the titles of nineteen of his comedies, eight of which are on mythological subjects. (Polux. ii. 29, 34; x. 199; Athen. pp. 99, 171, 374, 416, 633; Meineke; Bode.) [P. S.]

ANAXILAUS (Ἀναξιλαος), a Greek historian, of uncertain date. (Diors. Ant. Rom. i. 1; Diog. Laert. i. 107.)

ANAXILAUS (Ἀναξιλαος), of Byzantium, one of the parties who surrendered Byzantium to the Athenians in b. c. 408. He was afterwards brought to trial at Sparta for this surrender, but was acquitted, inasmuch as the inhabitants were almost starving at the time. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. § 19; Plut. Alex. pp. 208, d. 209, a.; comp. Diod. xiii. 67, and Wesseling's note; Polyaen. i. 47. § 2.)

ANAXILAUS (Ἀναξιλαος) or ANAXILAUS (Ἀναξιλαος), tyrant of Rhegium, was the son of Cretines, and of Messenian origin. He was master of Rhegium in b. c. 494, when the Samians and other Ionian fugitives seized upon Zande. Shortly afterwards he drove them out of this town, peoples it with fresh inhabitants, and changed its name into Messece. (Herod. vi. 22, 23; Thuc. iv. 4; comp. Aristot. Pol. v. 10. § 4.) In 480 he obtained the assistance of the Carthaginians for his father-in-law, Terillus of Himera, against Theron. (Herod. vii. 163.) The daughter of Anaxilas was married to Hiero. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 112.) Anaxilas died in 476, leaving Micythus guardian of his children, who obtained possession of their inheritance in 467, but was soon afterwards deprived of the sovereignty by the people. (Diod. xi. 48, 66, 75.) The chronology of Anaxilas has been discussed by Bentley (Dios. on Phalaris. p. 105, &c., ed. of 1777), who has shown that the Anaxilas of Pauniass (iv. 33. § 8) is the same as the one mentioned above.
ANAXIMANDER.

ANAXILAS (Ἀναξιλάς), a physician and Pythagorean philosopher, was born at Larissa, but at which city of that name is not certain. He was banished by the Emperor Augustus from Rome and Italy, B.C. 28, on account of his being accused of being a magician (Euseb. Chron. ad Olymp. cxxviii.), which charge, it appears, originated in his possessing superior skill in natural philosophy, and thus performing by natural means certain wonderful things, which by the ignorant and credulous were ascribed to magic. These tricks are mentioned by St. Ireneaeus (I. 13. § 1, p. 60, ed. Paris, 1710) and St. Ephraimius (Adv. Haeres. lib. i. tom. iii. Haer. 14, vol. i. p. 292, ed. Camb. 1801), and several speculations are given by Pliny (U. N. Hist. v. 56, xxvi. 46, 47, xxvii. 52, xxxv. 50), which, however, need not be here mentioned, as some are quite incredible, and the others may be easily explained. (Cagnat, Variae Observation. iii. 10, p. 213, &c., ed. Rom. 1587.) [W. A. G.]

ANAXILIDES (Ἀναξιλίδης), a Greek writer, of uncertain date, the author of a work upon philosophers. (Diog. Laert. iii. 2; Hieron. c. Jos. i.)

ANAXIMANDER (Ἀναξιμάνδρος) of Miletus, the son of Praxiades, born B.C. 610 (Apollod. op. Diog. Laert. ii. 1, 2), was one of the earliest philosophers of the Ionian school, and is commonly said to have been instructed by his friend and countryman Thales, its first founder. ( Civic. Acad. ii. 37; Simplic. in Arist. Phys. lib. i. fol. 6, a, ed. Ald.)

He was the first author of a philosophical treatise in Greek prose, unless Pherecydes of Syros was an exception. (Themist. Orat. xxvi.) His work consisted, according to Diogenes, of summary statements of his opinions (πεπείγεται καταλογικά τὴν ἐκθέσιν), and was accidentally found by Apollodorus. Suidas gives the titles of several treatises supposed to have been written by him; but they are evidently either invented, or derived from a misunderstanding of the expressions of earlier writers.

The early Ionian philosophy did not advance beyond the contemplation of the sensible world. But it was not in any proper sense experimental; nor did it retain under the successors of Thales the mathematical character which seems to have belonged to him individually, and which so remarkably distinguished the Ionian or Pythagorean school. (Comp. Cousin, Hist. de la Phil. Lec. vii.) The physiology of Anaximander consisted chiefly of speculations concerning the generation of the existing universe. He first used the word ἄρχω to denote the origin of things, or rather the material out of which they were formed: he held that this ἄρχω was the infinite (τὸ ἁπάντος), everlasting, and divine (Arist. Phys. iii. 4), though not attributing to it a spiritual or intelligent nature; and that it was the substance into which all things were resolved on their dissolution. (Simplic. l. c.)

We have several more particular accounts of his opinions on this point, but they differ materially from each other.

According to some, the ἄρχω was a single determinate substance, having a middle place between water and air; so that Anaximander's theory would hold a middle place between those of Thales and Anaximenes, who deduced everything from the two latter elements respectively; and the three systems would exhibit a gradual progress from the contemplation of the sensible towards that of the intelligible (compare the doctrine of Anaximenes concerning air, Plut. de Plac. Phil. i. 3), the last step of which was afterwards to be taken by Anaxagoras in the introduction of νοῦς. But this opinion cannot be distinctly traced in any author earlier than Alexander of Aphrodisias (ap. Simpl. Phys. fol. 32, a.), though Aristotle seems to allude to it (see Cic. de Nat. ii. 5). Other accounts represent Anaximander as leaving the nature of the ἄρχω indeterminate. (Diog. Laert. l. c.; Simplic. Phys. fol. 6, a; Plut. Plac. Phil. i. 3.) But Aristotle in another place (Metaph. xi. 9), and Theophrastus (ap. Simpl. Phys. fol. 6, b, 33, a.), who speaks very definitely and seems to refer to Anaximander's own words, describe him as resembling Anaxagoras in making the ἄρχω consist of a mixture of simple unchangeable elements (the ἀποτομημένη of Anaxagoras). Out of this material all things were organized, not by any change in its nature, but by the concurrence of homogeneous particles already existing in it; a process which, according to Anaxagoras, was effected by the agency of intelligence (νοῦς), whilst Anaximander referred it to the conflict between heat and cold, and to the affinities of the particles. (Plut. ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. i. 8.) Thus the doctrines of both philosophers would resemble the atomic theory, and so he opposed to the opinions of Thales, Anaximenes, and Diogenes of Apollonia, who derived all substances from a single but changeable principle. And on the elemental water of Thales corresponded to the seas, from which Homer makes all things to have sprung, so the ἄρχω of Anaximander, including all in a confused unorganized state, would be the philosophical expression of the Chaos of Hesiod. (Ritter, art. Anaximander, in Ersch and Gruber's Encycl.)

In developing the consequences of his fundamental hypothesis, whatever that may really have been, Anaximander did not escape the extravagances into which a merely speculative system of physics is sure to fall. He held, that the earth was of a cylindrical form, suspended in the middle of the universe, and surrounded by water, air, and fire, like the coats of an onion; but that the exterior stratum of fire was broken up and collected into masses; whence the sun, moon, and stars; which, moreover, were carried round by the three spheres in which they were respectively fixed. (Euseb. l. c.; Plut. de Plac. ii. 15, 16; Arist. de Coel. i. 13.)

According to Diogenes, he thought that the moon borrowed its light from the sun, and that the latter body consisted of pure fire and was not less than the earth; but the statements of Plutarch (de Plac. ii. 20, 25) and Stobaeus (Ed. l. 36, 27) are more worthy of credit; namely, that he made the moon 19 and the sun 28 times as large as the earth, and thought that the light of the sun issued through an orifice as large as the earth; that the moon possessed an intrinsic splendour, and that its phases were caused by a motion of rotation.

For his theory of the original production of animals, including man, in water, and their gradual progress to the condition of land animals, see Plut. de Plac. v. 19; Euseb. l. c.; Plut. Syllogos, viii. 8; Orig. Phil. c. 6; and compare Diod. l. 7. He held a plurality of worlds, and of gods; but in what sense is not clear. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 10; Plut. de Plac. l. 7.)

The use of the Gnomon was first introduced into Greece by Anaximander or his contemporaries. (Favorin. op. Diog. l. c.; Plin. hi. 9.; Herod. ii. 109. The assertion of Diogenes that he succeeded this instrument, and also geographical maps, cannot be taken to prove more than the extent of his reputation. On the subject of the Gnemon, see Salmas. Plin. Exercit. p. 445, b. 9, ed. Urecht, 1889, and Schachtan, Gesch. d. Griech. Astronomie, p. 119, &c.) It probably consisted of a style on a horizontal plane, and its first use would be to determine the time of noon and the position of the meridian by its shortest shadow during the day; the time of the solstices, by its shortest and longest meridian shadows; and of the equinoxes, by the rectilinear motion of the extremity of its shadow: to the latter two purposes Anaximander is said to have applied it; but since there is little evidence that the ecliptic and equinoctial circles were known in Greece at this period, it must be doubted whether the equinox was determined otherwise than by a rough observation of the equality of day and night. (Schachtan, p. 140, &c.) Anaximander flourished in the time of Polycrates of Samos, and died soon after the completion of his 64th year, in Ol. viii. 2 (a. c. 547), according to Apollodorus. (op. Diog. l. c.) But since Polycrates began to reign b. c. 532, there must be some mistake in the time of Anaximander's death, unless the elder Polycrates (mentioned by Suidas, s. v. Πολυκράτης) be meant. (Clinon, Fast. Hecat.) For the ancient sources of information see Priller, Hist. Philos. Graec. Romanae ex fontibus locis contexta. [W. F. D.]

ANAXIMENES (Ἀναξιμένης), who is usually placed third in the series of Ionian thinkers, who stand at the Atlas, like Thales and Anaximander, with both of whom he had personal intercourse: for besides the common tradition which makes him a disciple of the latter, Diogenes Laertius quotes at length two letters said to have been written to Pythagoras by Anaximenes; in one of which he gives an account of the death of Thales, speaking of him with reverence, as the first of philosophers, and as having been his own teacher. In the other, he congratulates Pythagoras on his removal to Crotona from Samos, while he was himself at the mercy of the tyrants of Miletus, and was looking forward with fear to the approaching war with the Persians, in which he foresaw that the Ionians must be subdued. (Diog. Laert. ii. 3, &c.)

There is no safe testimony as to the exact periods of the birth and death of Anaximenes: but since there is sufficient evidence that he was the teacher of Anaxagoras, b. c. 480, and he was in repute in b. c. 544, he must have lived to a great age. (Strab. xiv. p. 645; Cie. de Nat. Doctr. i. 11; Origen, vol. iv. p. 238.) The question is discussed by Clinton in the Philological Museum. (Vol. i. p. 86, &c.)

Like the other early Greek philosophers, he employed himself in speculating upon the origin, and accounting for the phenomena, of the universe: and as Thales held water to be the material cause out of which the world was made, so Anaximenes considered air to be the first cause of all things, the primary form, as it were, of matter, into which the other elements of the universe were resolvable. (Aristot. Phys. i. 3.) For both philosophers seems to have thought it possible to simplify physical science by tracing all material things up to a single element: while Anaximander, on the contrary, regarded the substance out of which the universe was formed as a mixture of all elements equally disposed. Endorsed by him, according to Diogenes, finite things were formed from the infinite air, that was of compression and rarefaction produced by motion which had existed from all eternity: thus the earth was created out of air made dense, and from the earth the air and the other heavenly bodies. (Plut. op. Enseb. Pret. Evang. i. 8.) According to the same theory, heat and cold were produced by different degrees of density of the primal element: the clouds were formed by the thickening of the air; and the earth was kept in its place by the support of the air beneath it and by the flatness of its shape. (Plut. de Fr. Frig. i, de Plac. Ph. i. 4; Aristot. Metaph. ii. 19.)

Hence it appears that Anaximenes, like his predecessors, held the eternity of matter; nor indeed does he seem to have believed in the existence of anything immaterial; for even the human soul, according to his theory, is, like the body, formed of air (Plut. de Plac. Ph. i. 3); and he saw no necessity for supposing an Agent in the work of creation, since he held that motion was a natural and necessary law of the universe. It is therefore not unreasonable in Plutarch to blame him, as well as Anaximander, for assigning only the material, and no efficient, cause of the world in his philosophical system. (Plut. l. c.) [C. E. P.]

ANAXIMENES (Ἀναξιμένης) of LAMPHACUS, son of Aristocles, and pupil of ZALUS and Diogenes the Cynic. He was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, whom he is said to have instructed, and whom he accompanied on his Asiatic expedition. (Paus. vii. 15; comp. Plut. Alex. 10; Diod. xvi. 76.) A pretty anecdote is related by Pausanias (vi. 18. § 2) and Suidas, about the manner in which he saved his native town from the wrath of Alexander for having espoused the cause of the Persians. His grateful fellow-citizens rewarded him with a statue at Olympia. Anaximenes wrote three historical works: 1. A History of Philip of Macedon, which consisted at least of eight books. (Harpocrat. s. v. Κάθοδος, Ἀναξιμένης; Eustathius ad Aristot. Eth. iii. 8.) 2. A history of Alexander the Great. (Diog. Laert. ii. 3; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἀλκαίος, who quotes the 2nd book of it.) 3. A history of Greece, which Pausanias (vi. 10. § 22) calls τὰ ἐν Ἑλληνὶ δρᾶμα, which, however, is more commonly called ἔρωτικα ἤρωτικα ποιήσεως ἡ τέχνη τῆς Παυσανία. (Athln. vi. p. 221; Diod. xvi. 89.) It comprised in twelve books the history of Greece from the earliest mythical ages down to the battle of Marathon and the death of Epiammonides. He was a very skilful rhetorician, and wrote a work culminating the three great cities of Greece, Sparta, Athens, and Thebes, which he published under the name of Theopompus, his personal enemy, and in which he imitated the style of the latter so perfectly, that every one thought it to be really his work. This production Anaximenes sent to those cities, and thus created exasperation against his enemy in all Greece. (Paus. vi. 8; § 3; Suid. l. c.) The histories of Anaximenes, of which only very few fragments are now extant, are censured by Plutarch (Prose. Pol. 6) for the numerous prolix and rhetorical speeches he introduced in them. (Comp. Dionys. Hal. De Ier. 19. 15. adas. et dic. Demosth. 8.) The fact that we possess so little of his histories, shews that the ancient did not ANCæUS. think highly of them, and that they were more of a rhetorical than an historical character. He enjoyed some reputation as a teacher of rhetoric and as an orator, both in the assembly of the people and in the courts of justice (Dionys. Hal. l.c.; Paus. l.c.), and also wrote speeches for others, such as the one which Euthus delivered against Phrynœ. (Athen. xiii. p. 591; comp. Harpes: s. c. Edils.)

There have been critics, such as Casaubon (ad Dion. Laer. ii. 2), who thought that the rhetorician and the historian Ancæimenes were two distinct persons; but their identity has been proved by very satisfactory arguments. What renders him a person of the highest importance in the history of Greek literature, is the following fact, which has been firmly established by the critical investigations of our own age. He is the only rhetorician previous to the time of Aristotle whose scientific treatise on rhetoric is now extant. This is the so-called Ἀριστεία τῶν Ἀθζημενῶν, which is usually printed among the works of Aristotle, to whom, however, it cannot belong, as all critics agree. The opinion that it is a work of Ancæimenes was first expressed by P. Victorius in his preface to Aristotle's Rhetoric, and has been firmly established as a fact by Spengel in his Ανεξιμηνοὺς τεχνικοὺς. "Sive Artium Scriptores ab initio usque ad editos Aristotelis de rhetoricis libros," Stuttgard, 1828, p. 182. (Comp. Quintil. iii. 4. § 9 with the notes of Gesner and Spalding.) This Rhetoric is preceded by a letter which is manifestly of later origin, and was probably intended as an introduction to the study of the Rhetoric of Aristotle. The work itself is much interpolated, but it is at any rate clear that Ancæimenes extended his subject beyond the limits adopted by his predecessors, with whose works he was well acquainted. He divides eloquence into forensic and deliberative, but also suggests that a third kind, the epideictic, should be separated from them. As regards the place and structure of the work, it is evident that its author was not a philosopher: the whole is a series of practical suggestions how to do this or that subject should be treated under various circumstances, as far as argumentation, expression, and the arrangement of the parts of a speech are concerned. (Vossius, de Histor. Graec. p. 93, &c., ed. Westermann; Ruhrken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. p. 86; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamk. § 69.) [L. S.]

ANAXIPPUS (Ἀνάξιππος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, was contemporary with Antigonus and Demetrius Poliorcetes, and flourished about B.c. 303. (Suidas, s. v.) We have the titles of four of his plays, and perhaps of one more. (Athen. i. p. 469-70.) [P. S.]

ANAXIS (Ἀναξίς), a Boeotian, wrote a history of Greece, which was carried down to B.C. 360, the year before the accession of Philip to the kingdom of Macedon. (Diod. xv. 95.)

ANAKAO (Ἀνακάο), 1. [ALCIMENE.] 2. A woman of Troezen, whom Theseus was said to have carried off. After slaying her sons, he violated her daughters. (Plut. These. 29.) [L. S.]

ANCÆUS (Ἀγκάεας). 1. A son of the Arcadian Lycurgus and Creophile or Eurynome, and father of Agapenor. (Apollod. ii. 3, § 2, ii. 9, § 2, 10, § 6; Hygin. Fab. 173; Hom. H. II. 608.) He was one of the Argonauts and partook in the Calydonian hunt, in which he was killed by the boar. (Apollod. i. 9, §§ 16 and 23; comp. Paus. viii. 5, § 2, 45, § 2; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 894; Ov. Met. viii. 400.)

2. A son of Poseidon and Asystalanca or Alca, king of the Leleges in Samos, and husband of Samia, the daughter of the river-god Maeander, by whom he became the father of Perillus, Eudesos, Samos, Althorches, and E_DACMERES. (Paus. vi. 4.) Callim. Hymn. in Del. 50.) This hero seems to have been confounded by some mythographers with Ancæus, the son of Lycurgus; for, according to Hyginus (Fab. 14), Ancæus, the son of Poseidon was one of the Argonauts, but not the other; and Apollonius Rhodius (ii. 867, &c.) relates, that after the death of Tiphys, Ancæus, the son of Poseidon, became the helmsman of the ship Argo, which is just what Apollonius relates of Ancæus, the son of Lycurgus. Lycophron (449), moreover, in speaking of the death of the son of Lycurgus by the Calydonian boar, mentions a proverb, which, according to the Scholiast on Apollonius (l. 163), originated with Ancæus, the son of Poseidon. The story of the proverb runs thus: Ancæus was fond of agricultural occupations, and planted many vines. A Sleeper said to him that he would not live to taste the wine of his vineyard. When Ancæus afterwards was on the point of putting a cup of wine, the growth of his own vineyard, to his mouth, he scorned the Sleeper, who, however, answered, πολλά μετάφη καλάτω λαυ καὶ κελέλων ἀκρών, "There is many a slip between the cup and the lip." At the same instant a tumult arose, and Ancæus was informed that a wild boar was near. He put down his cup, went out against the animal, and was killed by it. Hence this Greek phrase was used as a proverb, to indicate any unforeseen occurrence by which a man's plans might be thwarted. (See Thirlwall in Philolog. Museum, vol. i. p. 106, &c.) A third Ancæus occurs in H. xxi. 635. [L. S.]

Q. ANCHALIUS. 1. A senator, and of praetorian rank, was killed by Marius on the return of the latter from Africa to Rome in B.C. 87 (Appian, B. c. i. 78.)

2. Tribune of the plebs in the consulship of Caesar and Bibulus, B.C. 59. He took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of Caesar, and in consequence of his services to the aristocratic party obtained the praetorship in B.C. 56. He succeeded L. Piso in the province of Macedonia in the following year. (Cic. pro Sest. 53, in Pison. 36; Schol. Bot. pro Sest. p. 304, in Vatin. p. 517, ed. Orelli.) One of Cicero's letters is written to him (ad Fam. xiii. 40.)

ANCHIALUS PRISCUS. [PRISCUS.]

ANCHIALUS (Ἀγκάεας), a synonym of Zeus derived from the hill Anchaleus in Attica, on which, as on several Attic hills, there was a statue of the god. (Paus. i. 32, § 2.) [L. S.]

ANCHIALUS (Ἀγκάεας), a daughter of Japeius and mother of Cydnus, who was believed to have founded the town of Anchialae in Cilicia. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) Another personage of this name occurs in Apollon, Rhod. i. 1130. [L. S.]

ANCHIALUS, MICHAEL (Ἀγκάεας), patriarch of Constantinople from 1167 to 1185 A.D., was a warm opponent of the union of the Greek and Roman churches, and an eminent Aristotelian philosopher. His extant works are, 1. Five synodal decrees, published in Greek and Latin in the Jes. Gr. Rom. (iii. p. 227), and 2. A dialogue with the emperor Manuel Comnenus concerning the claims of the Roman pontiff. Of the latter work only some extracts have been published, by Leo Alliatis. (Do Ecles. Occident. atque Orient. perpet. Comm.) [P.S.]

ANCHIINO. [Achinoe].

ANCHIIONIUS (Ἀχίχιονιος), the son of Aster, was at the head of the first expedition sent by the Spartans to drive the Pisidianatae out of Athens; but he was defeated and killed, about a. c. 511, and was buried at Alopeca in Attica. (Herod. v. 63.)

ANCHIISI (Ἀχιησίς), a son of Capys and Themis, the daughter of Ilus. His descent is traced by Aeneas, his son (Hom. Tir. xx. 208, &c.), from Zeus himself. (Comp. Apollod. iii. 1. 2. § 2; Tzetza, ad吕ciph. 1232.) Hyginus (P. 94) makes him a son of Assaracus and grandson of Capys. Anchises was related to the royal house of Troy and king of Daradum on mount Ida. In beauty he equaled the immortal gods, and was beloved by Aphrodite, by whom he became the father of Aeneas. (Hom. Ili. iii. 230; Hes. Tho. 1000; Apollod. Hygin.uter.) According to the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite (45, &c.), the goddess had visited him in the disguise of a daughter of the Phrygian king Oreus. On parting from him, she made herself known, and announced to him that he would be the father of a son, Aeneas, but she commanded him to give out that the child was a son of a nymph, and added the threat that Zeus would destroy him with a flash of lightning if he should ever betray the real mother. When, therefore, on one occasion Anchises lost control over his tongue and boasted of his intercourse with the goddess, he was struck by a flash of lightning, which according to some traditions killed, but according to others only blinded or lamed him. (Hygin. l.c.; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 648.) Virgil in his Aeneid makes Anchises survive the capture of Troy, and Aeneas carries his father on his shoulders from the burning city, that he might be assisted by his wise counsel during the voyage, for Virgil, after the example of Ennius, attributes prophetic powers to Anchises. (Aen. ii. 687, with Serv. note.) According to Virgil, Anchises died soon after the first arrival of Aeneas in Sicily, and was buried on mount Eryx. (Aen. iii. 710, v. 759, &c.) This tradition seems to have been firmly believed in Sicily, and not to have been merely an invention of the poet, for Diomysius of Halicarnassus (i. 53) states, that Anchisus had a sanctuary at Egistus, and the funereal games celebrated in Sicily in honour of Anchises seem to have continued down to a late period. (Ov. Fast. iii. 543.) According to other traditions Anchises died and was buried in Italy. (Dionys. i. 64; Strob. v. p. 229; Aurel. Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 10, &c.) A tradition preserved in Pausanias (viii. 12. § 5) states, that Anchisus died in Arcadia, and was buried there at the foot of a hill, which received from him the name of Anchisus. There were, however, some other places besides which boasted of possessing the tomb of Anchises; for some said, that he was buried on mount Ida, in accordance with the tradition that he was killed there by Zeus (Ennius. ad Hom. p. 694), and others, that he was interred in a place on the gulf of Thermus near the Hellespont. (Conon. 46.) According to Apollodorus (iii. 12, 2) Anchises had by Aphrodite a second son, Lyurus or Lyurus, and Homer (II. xii. 429) calls Hippodameia the eldest of the daughters of Anchises, but does not mention her mother's name. An Anchises of Sicyon occurs in II. xxii. 296. [L.S.]

ANCHIUSADES (Ἀχίουσάδες), a patera from Anchises, used to designate his son Aeneas (Hom. Ili. xvii. 754; Virg. Aen. vi. 348), and Echepolus, the son of Anchises of Sicyon. (Hom. Ili. xxii. 296.) [L.S.]

ANCHU'RUS (Ἀχυροῦσ), a son of the Phrygian king Midas, in whose reign the earth opened in the neighbourhood of the town of Cehennae in Phrygia. Midas consulted the oracle in what manner the opening might be closed, and he was commanded to throw into it the most precious thing he possessed. He accordingly threw into it a great quantity of gold and silver, but when the chasm still did not close, his son Anchurus, thinking that life was the most precious of all things, mounted his horse and leapt into the chasm, which closed immediately. (Plut. Pariel. S.) [L.S.]

ANCHUROIDES (Ἀχυροῦδης), a son of Atreus, was said to have reigned twenty-three or twenty-four years, from about a. c. 638 to 614. According to tradition he was the son of Numa's daughter, and sought to tread in the footsteps of his grandfather by reestablishing the religious ceremonies which had fallen into neglect. But a war with the Latins called him from the pursuits of peace. He conquered the Latins, took many Latin towns, transported the inhabitants to Rome, and gave them the Aventine to dwell on. These conquered Latins, according to Niebuhr's views, formed the original Plebs. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Plebs.) It is related further of Aeneus, that he founded a colony at Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber; built a fortress on the Janiculum as a protection against Etruria, and united it with the city by a bridge across the Tiber; and the river of the Quinques, as it was called, which was a defence for the open ground between the Caetian and the Palatine; and built a prison to restrain offenders, who were increasing (Liv. i. 32, 33; Dionys. iii. 36—45; Cic. de Rep. ii. 18; Plut. Num. 22; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, p. 352, &c.; Arnold, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 19.)

ANDOBALES. [Indibales.]

ANDOCIDES (Ἀνδόκιδης), one of the ten Attic orators, whose works were contained in the Alexandrine Canon, was the son of Leogoras, and was born at Athens in a. c. 467. He belonged to the ancient eunaprid family of the Cerycoves, who traced their pedigree up to Odysseus and the god Hermes. (Plut. Vit. X. Ort. p. 934, b., Ateius 21 comp. Andoc. de Redit. p. 38; de Myster. p. 141. Becaule, he of course joined the oligarchic party at Athens, and through their influence obtained, in a. c. 436, together with Glaucon, a command of a fleet of twenty sail, which was t provided by the Cerycoves against the Corinthians (Thuc. i. 51; Plut. Vit. X. Ort. l. c.) After this he seems to have been employed on various occasions as ambassador to Tessaly, Macedonion, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Sicily (Andoc. e. Aet. cib. 41); and, although he was frequently attacked for his political opinions (e. Aetel. 8), he yet maintained his ground, until in a. c. 415, when he became involved in the charge brought against Aelides for having profaned the mysteries an mutated the Hermæs. It appeared the more likely that Andocides was an accomplice in the latter of these crimes, which was believed to be a preliminary step towards overthrowing the democratic constitution, since the Hermæs standing close to his house in the phyle Aegaeis was among the very few which had not been injured. (Plut. l. c.; Nepos, Ael. c. 3.; Sluiter, Lyc. Andoc. c. 3.)

Andocides was accordingly seized and thrown into prison, but after some time recovered his liberty by a promise that he would reveal the names of the real perpetrators of the crime; and on the suggestion of one Charmides or Timoas (De Myst. 49; K. an. Tych. 2, comp. c. 2, 39, 40; Comp. Pict. l. c.; Phryn. Ibid. p. 488, ed. Bekker; Tzet. Chel. vi. 373, &c.) in n. c. 411, Andocides returned to Athens on the establishment of the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred, hoping that a certain service he had rendered the Athenian ships at Samos would secure him a welcome reception. (De Myst. §§ 11, 12.) But no sooner were the oligarchs informed of the return of Andocides, than their leader Peisander had him seized, and accused him of having supported the party opposed to them at Samos. During his trial, Andocides, who perceived the exasperation prevailing against him, leaped to the altar which stood in the court, and there assumed the attitude of a suppliant. This saved his life, but he was imprisoned. Soon afterwards, however, he was set free, or escaped from prison. (De Myst. § 15; Plut. l. c.; Lysias, c. Andoc. § 20.)

Andocides now went to Cyprus, where for a time he enjoyed the friendship of Evagoras; but, by some circumstance or other, he exasperated his friend, and was consigned to prison. Here again he escaped, and after the victory of the democratic party at Athens and the abolition of the Four Hundred, he ventured once more to return to Athens; but as he was still suffering under the sentence of civil disfranchisement, he endeavoured by means of bribes to persuade the prytanes to allow him to attend the assembly of the people. The latter, however, expelled him from the city. (Lys. c. Andoc. § 29.) It was on this occasion, r. c. 411, that Andocides delivered the speech still extant "on his Return," which he petitioned for permission to reside at Athens, but in vain. In this his third exile, Andocides went to reside in Elia (Plut. Vit. X. Ovrat. c. 383, &c.; Phot. l. c.), and during the time of his absence from his native city, his house there was occupied by Cleophon, a manufacturer of lyres, who had placed himself at the head of the democratic party. (De Myst. § 146.)

Andocides remained in exile till the year b. c. 03, after the overthrow of the tyranny of the Thirty by Thrasybulus, when the general amnesty then proclaimed made him hope that its benefit would be extended to him also. He himself says (De Myst. § 132), that he returned to Athens from Cyprus, from which we may infer, that although he was settled in Elia, he had gone from thence to Cyprus for commercial or other purposes; for it appears that he had become reconciled to the princes of that island, as he had great influence and considerable landed property there. (De Myst. § 20, De Myst. § 4.) In consequence of the general amnesty, he was allowed to remain at Athens, enjoyed peace for the next three years, and soon became very rich. According to Lysias (c. Andoc. § 83, comp. § 11), it was scarcely ten days after his return that he brought an accusation against Archippus or Aristippus, which, however, he dropped on receiving a sum of money. During this period Andocides became a member of the senate, in which he appears to have possessed great influence, as well as in the popular assembly. He was gymnasiarch at the Hephaistias, was sent as architeuthus to the Isthmian and Olympic games, and was at last even entrusted with the office of keeper of the sacred treasury. But these distinctions appear to have excited the envy and hatred of his former enemies; during his absence here in Rome, he was assassinated by Cephisnas, Agrybbus, Meletus, and Epichares, urged the necessity of preventing Andocides from attending the assembly, as he had never been formally freed from the civil disfranchisement. But as Callias had but little hope in this case, he brought against him the charge of having profaned the mysteries and violated the laws respecting the temple at Elenissia. (De Myst. § 110, &c.) The orator pleaded his case in the oration still extant, "on the Mysteries" (περὶ τῶν μυστήρων), and was acquitted. After this attempt to crush him, he again enjoyed peace and occupied his former position in the republic for upwards of six years, at the end of which, in b. c. 394, he was sent as ambassador to Sparta respecting the peace to be concluded in consequence of Conon's victory off Cnidus. On his return he was accused of illegal conduct during his embassy (επιρρήματι). The speech "On the peace with Lacedæmon" (περὶ τῆς πρὸς Λακεδαίμονας εἰρήνης), which is still extant, refers to this affair. It was spoken in b. c. 393. (Clinton places it in 391.) Andocides was found guilty, and sent into exile for the fourth time. He never returned afterwards, and seems to have died soon after this blow.

Andocides appears to have left no issue, since at the age of seventy he had no children (De Myst. §§ 146, 148), though the scholiast on Aristophanes (Fest. 1263) mentions Antiphon as a son of Andocides. This was probably owing to his wandering and unsettled life, as well as to his dissolute character. (De Myst. § 106.) The large fortune which he had inherited from his father, or acquired in his commercial undertakings, was greatly diminished in the latter years of his life. (De Myst. § 144; Lys. c. Andoc. § 31.) Andocides has no claims to the esteem of posterity, either as a man or as a citizen. Besides the three orations already mentioned, which are undoubtedly genuine, there is a fourth against Akibrades (κατὰ Ακίβαδον), said to have been delivered by Andocides in b. c. 415; but it is in all probability spurious, though it appears to contain genuine historical matter.
ANDRAEUS.

ANDRANO'DO'RUS, the son-in-law of Hiera, was appointed guardian of Hieronymus, the grandson of Hiero, after the death of the latter. He advised Hieronymus to break off the alliance with the Romans, and connect himself with Hannibal. After the assassination of Hieronymus, Andranodorus seized upon the island and the citadel with the intention of usurping the royal power; but finding difficulties in the way, he judged it more prudent to surrender them to the Syracusans, and was elected in consequence one of their generals. But the suspicions of the people becoming excited against him, he was killed shortly afterwards, b. c. 214. (Liv. xxiv. 4—7, 21—25.)

ANDRÉAS ('Andrēas'), of uncertain date, wrote a work on the cities of Sicily, of which the thirty-third book is referred to by Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 634, a.)

ANDRÉAS ('Andrēas'), of Argos, a sculptor, whose time is not known. He made a statue of Lysippus, the Elean, victor in the boys' wrestling. (Paus. vi. 16. § 5.)

ANDRÉAS ('Andrēas'), the name of several Greek physicians, whom it is difficult to distinguish from each other. The Andreas Comes, quoted several times by Suidas (which title means Comes or 'Protector'), was certainly the latest of all, and probably lived shortly before Suidas himself (that is, in the fourth or fifth century after Christ), as the title was only introduced under the Roman emperors. (Dict. of Aut. s. v. Architōr.) If, for want of any positive data, all the other passages where the name Andreas occurs be supposed to refer to the same person (which may possibly be the case), he was a native of Carysium in Euboea (Cassius Iatros. Problem. Phys. § 58), the son of Chrysar or Chrysaros (οὗ τοῦ Χρυσαροῦ οὗ Χρυσάρων), if the name be not corrupt (Galien, Excerpt. Vocum Hippocr. s. v. Ἰρσυκοῦ, vol. xix. p. 105), and one of the followers of Herophilus. (Cels. De Med. v. Praef. p. 81; Soran. De Arte Osteol. c. 49. p. 101.) He was physician to Ptolemy Philopator, King of Egypt, and was killed by Philopator himself before the battle of Raphia (n. c. 217), by Theodotus the Aetolian, who had secretly entered the tent with the intent to murder the king. (Polyb. v. 31.) He wrote several medical works, of which nothing remains but the titles, and a few extracts preserved by different ancient authors. He was probably the first person who wrote a treatise on hydrophobia, which he called Κυβελιαροσ. (Cassius Iatros. De morb. auti. iii. 9, 218.) One of his works Περὶ τῆς Κυβελιαροσ Γενεαλεία was said by Sornius, in his life of Hippocrates (Hippocr. Opera, vol. i. p. 351), to have given a false and scandalous account of that great physician, saying that he had been obliged to leave his native country on account of his having set fire to the library at Alexandria; and a story which, though universally considered to be totally unfounded, was repeated with some variations by Varro (in Pliny, H. N. xxix. 2) and John Tzetzes (Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabrici Biblioth. Graeca, vol. xii. p. 681, ed. vol.), and which much embellished in the middle ages. (See Hist. of the Seven Wise Masters, in Stephani Specimens Early English Metrical Romances, vol. iii. p. 4.) Eratosthenes is said to have accused Andreas plagiarism, and to have called him Βιβλιογραφ ος or Αθάνατος or Αθάνατος of Books. (Elyn.
ANDRODIUS. [Ἀνδρόδιος.] 1. A man of low origin, who pretended to be a natural son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, was seized by Demetrius, king of Syria, and sent to Rome. He escaped, however, from Rome, and finding many partisans, assumed the name of Philip and obtained possession of Macedonia. His reign, which was marked by acts of cruelty, did not last much more than a year. He defeated the praetor Justinian, but was conquered by Scipio Africanus, and compelled to Rome in chains to adorn the triumph of the latter, n. c. 148. (Liv. Epit. 49, 50, 52; Diod. Exc. xxxii. p. 590, &c., ed. Wess.; Polyb. xxxvii. Exc. Vatic. ed. Mai; Flor. ii. 14; Vell. i. 11; Paus. vii. 13. § 1.)

2. A writer of uncertain date, the author of a work upon Naxos. (Ath. iii. p. 78, c.; Parthen. c. 9, 19.)

ANDRO. [Ἀνδρό.] ANDROBJUS, a painter, whose time and country are unknown. He painted Scyllus, the diver, cutting away the anchors of the Persian fleet. (Plin. xxxiv. 40. § 32.)

ANDROBULUS, a sculptor, celebrated for a group of statues of philosophers. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 26.)

ANDROCLEIDES (Ἀνδρόκλειδης), a Theban, who was bribed by Timocrates, the emissary of Tissaphernes in n. c. 355, in order to induce the delegates of the party opposed to Phoebidas, who had seized the citadel. (Xen. Hell. ii. 5. § 1; Plut. Lyg. 27; Paus. iii. 9. § 4.) Androcles is mentioned in n. c. 382 as one of the leaders of the party opposed to Phoebidas, who had seized the citadel. (Xen. Hell. v. 2. § 31.)

ANDROCLICES (Ἀνδρόκλης), an Athenian demagogue and orator. He was a contemporary and enemy of Alcibiades, against whom he brought forward witnesses, and spoke very vehemently in the affair concerning the mutilation of the Hermne, n. c. 415. (Plut. Alc. 19; Andoc. de myster. § 27.) It was chiefly owing to his exertions that Alcibiades was exiled. After this event, Androcles was for a time at the head of the democratic party; but during the revolution of n. c. 411, in which the democracy was overthrown, and the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred was established, Androcles was put to death. (Thuc. viii. 65.) Aristotle (Phila. ii. 23) has preserved a sentence from one of Androcles' speeches, in which he used an incorrect figure.

ANDROCLUS, the slave of a Roman consul of whom the following story is related by Aulus Gellius (v. 14) on the authority of Appian Plutonices, who lived in the reigns of Tiburtius and Caligula, and who affirmed that he himself had been a witness of the scene.—Androclus was sentenced to be exposed to the wild beasts in the circus; but, as the bear was let loose upon him, instead of springing upon his victim, exhibited signs of recognition, and began licking him. Upon inquiry it appeared that Androclus had been compelled by the severity of his master, while in Africa, to run away from him. Having one day taken refuge in a cave from the heat of the sun, a lion entered, apparently in great pain, and seeing him, went up to him and held out his paw. A-dreaded Greek painter, a contemporary and rival of Zeuxis, flourished from 400 to 377 B.C. (Plin. xxxiv. 36. § 3.) He painted, partly on the spot and partly in Thebes, a skirmish of horse which took place near Plataneae shortly before the battle of Leuctra (Plut. Pelop. 25), and a picture of Scylla surrounded by fishes. The latter picture was much praised for the beauty of the fishes, on which the artist was supposed to have bestowed more pains, on account of his being fond of fish. (Plut. Quaest. Conv. iv. 4. § 2; Polien, op. Athen. viii. p. 341, a.)

ANDROCYDES (Ἀνδρόκυδης), a Greek physician, who lived in the reign of Alexander the Great, B.C. 336—323. There is a story told of him by Pliny (H. N. xiv. 7), that he wrote a letter to that prince cautioning him against the immoderate use of wine, which he called "the blood of the earth." It is mentioned also by the same author (xviii. 37. § 10), that he ordered his patients to eat a radish as a preservative against intoxication, from having observed (it is said) that the vine always turned away from a radish if growing near it. It is very possible that this Androcydes may be the same person who is mentioned by Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. iv. 10 [Fal. 20] 20), and also by Athenaeus (v. p. 539, b.) [W. A. G.]

ANDROETAS (Ἀνδρόετας), of Tenea, the author of a Περὶ Χορόπων τῆς Περιφρονίδος. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 159.)

ANDROGEUS (Ἀνδρόγευς), a son of Minos and Pasiphae, or Crete, who is said to have conquered all his opponents in the games of the Panathenaei at Athens. This extraordinary good luck, however, became the cause of his destruction, though the mode of his death is related differently. According to some accounts Aegeus sent the man he dreaded to fight against the Marathonian bull; he killed him; according to others, he was assassinated by his defeated rivals on his road to Thebes, whether he was going to take part in a solemn contest. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2, 15. § 7; Paus. i. 27. § 8.) According to Diodorus (iv. 60) it was Aegeus himself who had him murdered near Oenae, on the road to Thebes, because he feared lest Androgeus should support the sons of Pallas against him. Hyginus (Fab. 41) makes him fall in a battle during the war of his father Minos against the Athenians. (See some different accounts in Plut. Theol. 15; Serv. ad Ach. vi. 14.) But the common tradition is, that Minos made war on the Athenians in consequence of the death of his son. Propertius (ii. 1. 64) relates that Androgeus was restored to life by Asclepius. He was worshiped in Attica as a hero, an altar was erected to him in the port of Phalerus (Paus. i. 1. § 4), and games, ἀνθρώπεον, were celebrated in his honour every year in the Ceramicus. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. ἀνθρώπεον.) He was also worshiped under the name Ἀδρών, i.e. he who ploughs or possesses extensive fields, whence it has been inferred that originally Androgeus was worshipped as the introducer of agriculture into Attica. [L. S.]

ANDROMACHE (Ἀνδρόμαχη), a daughter of Eteocles, king of the Thebans, and one of the noblest and most amiable female characters in the Iliad. Her father and her seven brothers were slain by Achilles at the taking of Thebes, and her mother, who had purchased her freedom by a large ransom, was killed by Artemis. She was married to Hector, by whom she had a son, Scamandrus (Astyanax), and for whom she entertained the most tender love. (Apollod. iii. 11. § 6.) See the beautiful passage in Homer, II. vi. 890—502 where she takes leave of Hector when he is going to battle, and her lamentations about his fall, xxii. 460, &c.; xiv. 723, &c. On the taking of Troy her son was hurt from the wall of the city, and she herself fell to the share of Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus), the son of Achilles, who took her t Epireus, and to whom she bore three sons, Molossus, Pius, and Pergamus. Here she was found by them, and they were present when Epeius, at the moment she was offering up a sacrifice at the tomb of her beloved Hector. (Verg. Aen. iii. 295, &c. comp. Paus. i. 11. § 1; Pind. Nem. iv. 82, vili. 50.) After the death of Neoptolemus, or according to some others, after his marriage with Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus and Helen, Andromache became the wife of Helenus, a brother of her first husband, Hector, who is described as a king of Chaonia, a part of Epireus, and by whom she became the mother of Cestrinus. (Verg. i. 22. § 1; Paus. ii. 23. § 6.) After the death of Helenus, who left his kingdom to Molossus, Andromache followed her son Pergamus to Asia. She was supposed to have died at Pergamus, where in a little while a heroism was erected to her memory. (Paus. i. 11. § 2; comp. Dictys Cret. vi. 7, &c.; Euri. Andromache.) Andromache and her son Sammata were painted in the Lesche at Delphi 1 Polygnotus. (Paus. x. 25, in fin.) [L. S.]

ANDROMACHUS (Ἀνδρόμαχος). 1. Commander of the Eleans in B.C. 364, was defeated by the Arcadians and killed himself in consequence (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 19.)

2. Ruler of Tauromenium in the middle of the fourth century B.C., and the father of the historic Timaeus, is said to have been by far the most brutal of the rulers of Sicily at that time. He assisted Timoleon in his expedition against Dionysius, B.C. 344. (Diod. xvi. 7, 63; Plut. Timot. 10.) Reporting the statement of Diodorus that he found Tauromenium, see Wesseling, ad Diod. xiv. 59.

3. The commander of the Persian fleet at the siege of Tyre by Alexander, B.C. 332. (Arr. Anab. ii. 20.) He may have been the same Andromachus who was shortly afterwards appointed governor of Coele-Syria, and was burnt to death by the Samaritans. (Curt. iv. 5, 8.)

4. The father of Achaemenes [see p. 8, a.], and t brother of Laodice, who married Seleucus Callinus, was detained as a prisoner by Ptolemy Alexander, but was liberated about B.C. 320 the intercession of the Rhodians. (Polib. iv. 1 vii. 22.)

5. Of Aspendus, one of Ptolemy Philopator commanders at the battle of Raphia, in which Antigonus the Great was defeated, B.C. 2. After the battle Ptolemy left Andromachus command of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. (Polib. v. 64, 63, 85, 57.)
ANDROMEDA.

6. An ambassador of Ptolemy Philomath, sent Rome in c. 154. (Polyb. xxxii. 5.)

8. A Greek rhetorician, who taught at Niceomedia in the reign of Domitian. (Eudoc. p. 58; uid. s. v. Σπίρτος.)

ANDROMACHUS (Ἀνδρομάχος). 1. Commonly called "the Elder," to distinguish him from his son of the same name, who was born in Crete, and was physician to Nero, s. d. 54—68. He is principally celebrated for having been the first person on whom title of "Architect" is known to have been conferred (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Architect), and also for having been the inventor of a very famous compound medicine and antidote, which was called by his name "Thericiaca Andromachia," which enjoyed a great reputation, and which retains a place in some foreign Pharmacopoeias to the present day. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Thericiaca.)

Andromachus has left us the directions for making its strange mixture in a Greek elegiac poem, consisting of one hundred and seventy-four lines, and dedicated to Nero. Galen has inserted it entire in two of his works (De Antid. i. 6, and De Ther. 1 Pis. c. 6. vol. xiv. pp. 38—42), and says, that Andromachus chose this form for his receipt as being more easily remembered than prose, and less likely to be altered. The poem has been published in a separate form by Frang. ideouca, Tigrigius, 1607, 4to, with two Latin translations, one in prose and the other in verse; id again by J. S. Leinker, Novimab. 1754, fol. is also inserted in the first volume of Idele's Lysic et Medicis Graeci Minores, Berol. 8vo. 1841, here is a German translation in E. W. Weber's Topische Dichter der Heiligen, Frankfurt, 1826, q. Some persons suppose him to be the author of a work on pharmacy, but this is generally attributed to his son, Andromachus the Younger.

2. The Younger, so called to distinguish him from his father of the same name, was the son of the preceding, and is supposed to have been also physician to Nero, s. d. 54—68. Nothing is known of the events of his life, but he is generally supposed to have been the author of a work on pharmacy in verse books (Galen, De Compos. Medicinae, sec. ii. vol. iii. p. 463), which is quoted very frequently and with approbation by Galen, but of which only a few fragments remain. [W. A. G.]

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρονίκος), a daughter of the Athenian king Cepheus and Cassiopeia. Her mother boasted of her beauty, and said that she passed the Nereids. The latter prevailed on seidion to visit the country by an inundation, 1 a sea-monster was sent into the land. The jealous Ammon promised that the people should deliver them from these calamities, if Andronica was given up to the monster; and Cepheus, being urged to yield to the wishes of his people, chain Andromeda to a rock. Here she was found by Perseus, who slew the monster and aided her as his wife. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5; s. d. Pompeii 64; Σαλ. iv. 663, &c.). Andronica had previously been promised to Phineus by his call Jagenor), and this gave rise to famous fable of Phineus and Perseus at the dding, in which the former and all his associates were slain. (Or. Met. v. 1, &c.) [Perseus.] Andromeda thus became the wife of Perseus, and bore him many children. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.)

Athena placed her among the stars, in the form of a maiden with her arms stretched out and chained to a rock, to commemorate her delivery by Perseus. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 10, &c.; Eratosthu. Catull. 17; Arat. Phaen. 193.) Conon (Narrat. 40) gives a wretched attempt at an historical interpretation of this myth. The scene where Andromeda was fastened to the rock is placed by some of the ancients in the neighbourhood of Iope in Phoenicia, while others assign it to a place of the same name in Aethiopia. The tragic poets often made the story of Andromeda the subject of dramas, which are now lost. The movement in which she is relieved from the rock by Perseus is represented in an amphhly still extant. (Les plus beaux Monuments de Rome, No. 63.)

ANDRON (Ἀνδρός). 1. Of Alexandria, whose work entitled Σπουδαία is referred to by Athenaeus. (iv. p. 184, b.)

2. Of Ephesus, who wrote a work on the Seven Sages of Greece, which seems to have been entitled Σπουδαίων. (Diog. Laert. i. 30, 119; Schol. ad Priam. l. 17; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 332, b.; Suid. and Phot. s. v. Σπουδαίος: Basile. Prog. Eec. x. 3.)

3. Of Halicarnassus, a Greek historian, who is mentioned by Plutarch (Thea. c. 25) in conjunction with Helianthus. (Comp. Tact. ad Lucif. 934, 1238; Schol. ad Aesch. Pers. 186.)

4. Of Theos, the author of a Σπουδαίων (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 384), who is probably the same person as the one referred to by Strabo (iv. pp. 392, 456, 475), Stephanus of Byzantium, and others. He may also have been the same as the author of the Περὶ Συγγενείαν. (Harpocrat. s. v. Φοῖβος: Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 946.) Comp. Vossius, De Histor. Graec. p. 285, ed. Westermann.

ANDRON (Ἀνδρός), a sculptor, whose age and country are unknown, made a statue of Harmonia, the daughter of Mars and Venus. (Tatian, Orat. in Graec. 55, p. 119, Worsch.) [P. S.]

ANDRON (Ἀνδρός), a Greek physician, who is supposed to be the author of a work on pharmacy in verse books (Galen, De Compos. Medicinae, sec. ii. vol. iii. p. 463), which is quoted very frequently and with approbation by Galen, but of which only a few fragments remain. [W. A. G.]

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρονίκος), ambassador of Attalus, sent to Rome in c. 156, to inform the Senate that Prusias had attacked the territories of ANDRONICUS.

Attalus. (Polyb. xxxii. 26.) Andronicus was again sent to Rome in A.D. 149, and assisted Nicomedes in conspiring against his father Prusias. (Appian, Mithr. 4, &c.)

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), an Aetolian, the son of Andronicus, was put to death by the Romans in B.C. 167, because he had borne arms with his father against the Romans. (Liv. xiv. 31.)

ANDRONICUS I. COMENIUS (Ἀνδρόνικος Κομηνυς), emperor of Constantinople, son of Isaac, grandson of Alexius I. and first-cousin of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, was born in the beginning of the twelfth century after Christ. The life of this highly gifted man, who deserves the name of the Byzantine Alcibiades, presents a series of adventures of so extraordinary a description, as to appear more like a romance than a history. Nature had lavished upon him her choicest gifts. His manly beauty was unparalleled, and the vigour of his body was animated by an enterprising mind and an undaunted spirit. Endowed with great capacities, he received a careful education, and the persevering power of his eloquence was so great, that he was equally dangerous to kings and states. His love of peace was never proof against his conscience. For love and war were his predominant passions, but they both degenerated into luxury and cruelty. In every deed or mischief, says Gibbon (ch. 48), he had a heart to resolve, a head to contrive, and a hand to execute.

In 1141 he was made prisoner by the Turks-Seljuks, and remained during a year in their captivity. After being released, he received the command in Cilicia, and he went there accompanied by Eudoxia Comnena, the niece of the emperor Manuel, who lived on a similar footing with her sister Theodore. At the close of this war he received the government of Naisus, Brambiza, and Castoria; but the emperor soon afterwards ordered him to be imprisoned in Constantinople. He escaped from captivity after having been confined twenty years, and fled to living预制 of Russia, and at Kiev obtained the pardon of his offended sovereign. He contrived an alliance between Manuel and Jaroslav against Hungary, and at the head of a Russian army distinguished himself in the siege of Somlin. Still suspected by Manuel, he was again sent to Cilicia. He said some time at Antioch, and there seduced Philippa, the daughter of Raymond of Poitou, prince of Antioch, and the sister-in-law of the emperor Manuel, who had married her sister Maria. To escape the resentment of the emperor, he fled to Jerusalem, and there eloped with Theodora, the widow of Baldwin III. king of Jerusalem, a Convenient princess whom he coveted for her beauty. They first took refuge at the court of Nur-ad-din, sultan of Damascus; thence they went to Baghdad and Persia, and at length settled among the Turks. He then proceeded to make war upon the emperor of Constantinople, and invaded the province of Trebizond, but the governor of this town succeeded in taking queen Theodora and the two children she had borne to Andronicus, and sent them to Constantinople. To regain them Andronicus imolated the mercy of his sovereign, and after prosтратting himself laden with chains to the foot of the emperor's throne, he retired to Oenoe, now Unieh, a town on the Black Sea in the present eyalet of Trebizond. There he lived quietly till the death of the emperor Manuel in 1180.

MANUEL was succeeded by Alexius II., whom Andronicus put to death in the month of October 1183, and thereupon he ascended the throne. [ALEXIS II.] Agnes or Anna, the widow of Alexius, and daughter of Louis VII. king of France, a child of eleven years, was compelled to marry Andronicus, who was then advanced in years. His reign was short. He was hated by the nobles numbering of whom he put to death, but was beloved by the people. His administration was wise; and he remedied several abuses in civil and ecclesi-sical matters. William II., the Good, king of Sicily, whom the fugitive Greek nobles had per-signed to invade Greece, was compelled by Andronicus to desist from his attack on Constanti-

e and to withdraw to his country, after he had destroyed Thessalonica. Thus Andronicus though himself quite sure on the throne, when the im-

as of his lieutenant, the superstition Hagiochristophorites, suddenly caused a dreadful rebellion. This officer resolved to put to death Isaac Angelus, a noble but not a dangerous man; the people of Constantinople, however, moved to pity and took arms for the rescue of their prince. When Andronicus was seized, an Isaac abandoned him to the revenge of his most inaceous enemies. After having been carried through the streets of the city, he was hanged by the feet be-between the statues of a sow and a wolf, and in the position was put to death by the mob. (12th September, 1183.) (Nicetas, Manuel Comnenus i. 1, iii. iv. 1—5; Alexios Manuciai Cosm. Fl. 2, 9, &c.; Andronicus Comnenus; Guillelmus T. rellini, xxii. 13.) [W. P.]

ANDRONICUS II. PALAEOLOGUS, &c.

Elder (Ἀνδρόνικος Παλαιολόγος), emperor of Co-stantinople, the eldest son of the emperor Michael Palaeologus, was born a. d. 1260. at the age of fifteen he was associated with his father in the government, and he ascended the throne in 1282. Michael had consulted to unite the two large churchs of the Greek and Latin churches the second general council at Lyon, but Andronicus was opposed to this measure, and was at long excommunicated by pope Clement V. in 1334. During this the Greek armies were beaten by the Turks, the founder of the Turkish empire, w gradually conquered all the Byzantine possess in Asia. In this extremity Andronicus engaged the army and the fleet of the Catalans, a number of warlike adventurers, to assist him against the Turks. Roger de Flor, or de Floris, the s of a German noble at the court of the empe-

Frederic II., the commander of these adventure accordingly went to Constantinople with a v erous fleet and an army of 8000 men. The emperor appointed him admiral of the empire, a conferred upon him the title of Caesar. An famous captain defeated the Turks in several s gagements, but his troops ravaged the country.

their allies with as much rapacity as that of the common enemies, and in order to get rid of the emperor caused Roger to be assassinated Adrianople. But the Catalans now turned their arms against the Greeks, and after having de ented Thrace and Macedonia, they retired to Peloponnesus, where they conquered several e tries in which they maintained themselves. Michael, the son of Andronicus, was associ-with his father in the throne. Michael had sons, Andronicus and Manuel. Both loved some woman without knowing that they were rivals, and by an unhappy mistake Mannel was slain by the hand of his brother. Their father, Michael, died of grief, and the emperor, exasperated against his grandson, showed some intention to exclude him from the throne. Thus a dreadful civil war, or rather three wars, arose between the emperor and his grandson, which lasted from 1321 till 1328, when at last the emperor was obliged to abdicate in favour of the latter. Andronicus the elder retired to a convent at Drama in Thessaly, where he lived as monk under the name of Antonius. He died in 1332, and his body was buried in Constantinople. (Pachymeres, Andronicus Palaeologus; Nicephorus Gregorius, lib. vi.—x.; Cantacuzenus, i. 1, &c.)

ANDRONICUS III. PALAEOLOGUS, the Younger (Andronikos Palaiologos), emperor of Constantinople, was born in 1296, and succeeded his grandfather in 1328, as has been related in the preceding article. He was unsuccessful in his wars with the Turks; he lost the battle of Philacrolone against Sultan Urkhan and his brother Alâ-èd-din, who had just organized the body of the Janissaries, by whom Thrace was avenged as far as the Haemus. Equally unsuccessful against the Catalans in Greece, he was more fortunate against the Bulgarians, the Tartars of Kipachts, and the Servians.

He was twice married, first to Agnes or Irene, daughter of Henry, duke of Brunswick, and after her death to Anna, countess of Savoy, by whom he had two sons, John and Emanuel. At his death, in 1341, he left them under the guardianship of John Cantacuzenus, who desired to reign in his own name. (Nicephorus Gregorius, lib. ix.—xi.; Cantacuzenus, i. 58, &c., ii. 1—40; Phrantzes, i. 10—13; comp. Pachymeres, Andronicus Palaeologus.)

ANDRONICUS CYRHRHESTES (so called on his native place, Cyniga), was the builder of the octagonal tower at Athens, vulgarly called the tower of the winds;* Vitruvius (i. 6. § 4), *after stating, that some make the number of the winds to be four, but that those who have examined the subject more carefully distinguished ght, adds, "Especially Andronicus Cyrhrestes, in his work of ethnography, he also set up at Athens, as a representation (exemplum), an octagonal tower of marble, on the several sides of the octagon he made uplifted images of the several winds, each image skimming towards the wind it represented," (that the figure of the north wind was sculptured on the north side of the building, and so with the st), "and above this tower he set up a marble lar (metem), and on the top he placed a Triton bronze, holding out a wand in his right hand; this figure was so contrived as to be driven and by the wind, and always to stand opposite the blowing wind, and to hold the wand an index above the image of that wind." This calls the building "horologium." (I. R. 5. § 17, Schm.) It formed a measure of time in two ways. On the outer walls were lines which the gnomons above them, formed a series of points, and in the building was a clepsydra, filled from the spring called Clepsydra, on which water was poured over a vertical vessel, ich still stands, has been described by Stuart and others. The plain walls are surmounted by entablature, on the frieze of which are the figures of the winds in bas-relief. The entrance, of which there are two, on the north-east and the north-west, have distyle porticoes of the Corinthian order. Within, the remains of the clepsydra are still visible, as are the dial lines on the outer walls.

The date of the building is uncertain, but the style of the sculpture and architecture is thought to belong to the period after Alexander the Great. The clepsydra also was probably of that improved kind which was invented by Ctesibius, about 155 B.C. (Dict. of Ant. s. e. Horologium.) Müller places Andronicus at 100 B.C. (Attika, in Ersh and Graber’s Encyclop. vi. p. 239.)

From the words of Vitruvius it seems probable that Andronicus was an astronomer. The mechanical arrangements of his "horologium," no doubt of his work, but whether he was properly the architect of the building we have nothing to determine, except the absence of any statement to the contrary.

ANDRONICUS LI’VIUS, the earliest Roman poet, as far as poetical literature is concerned; for whatever popular poetry there may have existed at Rome, its poetical literature begins with this writer. (Quintil. x. 2. § 7.) He was a Greek and probably a native of Tarentum, and was made prisoner by the Romans during their wars in southern Italy. He then became the slave of M. Livius Salinator, perhaps the same who was consul in B.C. 219, and again in B.C. 207. Andronicus instructed the children of his master, but was afterwards restored to freedom, and received from his patron the Roman name Livius. (Hieron, in Diess. Chron. ed. Ol. 118.) During his stay at Rome, Andronicus made himself a perfect master of the Latin language, and appears to have exerted himself chiefly in creating a taste for regular dramatic representations. His first drama was acted in B.C. 240, in the consilium of C. Claudius and M. Tullianus (Cic. Brut. 18, comp. Tusc. Quaest. i. 1; de Senect. 14; Liv. vii. 2; Gallius, xvi. 21); but whether it was a tragedy or a comedy is uncertain. That he wrote comedies as well as tragedies, is attested beyond all doubt. (Diomedes, i. p. 486; Valerius Flaccus, Numerus, 13; the author of the work de Consuet. Et Terr.) The number of his dramas was considerable, and we still possess the titles and fragments of at least fourteen. The subjects of them were all Greek, and they were little more than translations or imitations of Greek dramas. (Suet. de Iul. Grammat. i. 1; Diodor. l.c.) Andronicus is said to have died in B.C. 221, and cannot have lived beyond B.C. 214. (Osann, Annt. Crit. p. 28.) As to the poetical merit of these compositions we are unable to form an accurate idea, since the extant fragments are few and short. The language in them appears yet in a rude and undeveloped form, but it has nevertheless a solid basis for further development. Cicero (Brut. 18) says, that in his time they were no longer worth reading, and that the 600 mules in the Clytemnestra and the 8000 cranes in the Equus Trojanus could not afford any pleasure upon the stage. (ad Famil. vii. 1.) In the time of Horace, the poems of Andronicus were read and explained in schools; and Horace, although not an admirer of early Greek poetry, says, that he should not like to see the works of Andronicus destroyed. (Horat. Epist. ii. 1. 62.)

Besides his dramas, Livius Andronicus wrote:
ANDRONICUS.

1. A Latin Odyssey in the Saturnian verse (Cic. Brut. 10), but it is uncertain whether the poem was an imitation or a mere translation of the Homer. poem. 2. Theon of Smyrna (Liv. viii. 37; Fest. s. v. Seres), of which no fragments are extant. The statement of some writers, that he wrote versified Annals, is founded upon a confusion of Livius Andronicus and Ennius. (Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 827.)

The fragments of Livius Andronicus are contained in the collections of the fragments of the Roman dramatists mentioned under Accius. The fragments of the Odyssean Latina are collected in H. Dünzter and L. Lersch, De Versu quem vocant Saturnino, pp. 40-48; all the fragments are contained in Dünzter's Livii Andronicorum Fragmenta collecta et illustrata, &c. Berlin, 1838, 8vo.; comp. Osann, Analecta Critica, c. 1. [L. S.]

ANDRONICUS ('Androivos), a Macedonian, is first mentioned in the war against Antiochus, b.c. 190, as the governor of Ephesus. (Livy. xxvii. 13.) He is spoken of in b.c. 169 as one of the generals of Perseus, king of Macedon, and was sent by him to burn the dock-yards at Thessalonica, which he delayed doing, wishing to gratify the Romans, according to Diodorus, or thinking that the king would repent of his purpose, as Livy states. He was shortly afterwards put to death by Perseus. (Livy. xiv. 10; Dion. Hal. p. 579, Wess.; Appian, de Rebus Mar. 14.)

ANDRONICUS ('Androivos), of Olynthus, who is probably the same as the son of Agathes mentioned by Arrian (Anab. iii. 28), was one of the four generals appointed by Antigonus to form the military council of the young Demetrius, in b.c. 314. He commanded the right wing of Demetrius' army at the battle of Gaza in 312, and after the loss of the battle, and the subsequent retreat of Demetrius, was left in command of Tyre. He refused to surrender the city to Ptolemy, who, however, obtained possession of it, but spared the life of Andronicus, who fell into his hands. (Diod. xix. 69, 66.)

ANDRONICUS ('Androivos), a Greek physician, mentioned by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vii. 6, vol. xiii. p. 114) and Theodorus Priscianus (Rer. Med. i. 18, ii. 1, 6, pp. 18, 37, ed. Argent.), who must therefore have lived some time before the second century after Christ. No other particulars are known respecting him; but it may be remarked, that the Andronicus quoted several times by Galen with the epithet Periaptetec or Rhiostos, is probably quite another person. He is called by Tiraquellus (De Nolitulato, c. 31), and after him by Fabricius (H. Gr. vol. xiv. p. 68, ed. Blume), representing a former Tiraquellus, but this is a mistake, as Andronicians and Titanius appear to have been two different persons. [W. A. G.]

ANDRONICUS ('Androivos), a Greek poet and contemporary of the emperor Constantinus, about a. d. 360. Libanius (Epist. 75; comp. De Vita Sui, p. 68) says, that the sweetness of his poetry gained him the favour of all the towns (probably of Egypt) as far as the Ethiopians, but that the full development of his talents was checked by the death of his mother and the misfortune of his native town (Hermopoli?). If he is the same as the Andronicus mentioned by Photius (Cod. 279, p. 538, a. Bekk.) as the author of dramas and various other poems, he was a native of Hermopoli in Egypt, of which town he was decurio. Themistius (Orat. xix. p. 418, &c.), who speaks of a young poet in Egypt as the author of a tragedy, epic poems, and dithyrambs, appears likewise to allude to Andronicus. In a. d. 399, Andronicus, with several other artisans in the east and in Egypt, incurred the suspicion of indulging in pagan practices. He was tried by Paulus, whom the emperor had despatched for the purpose, but he was found innocent and acquitted. (Amian. Marcellinn. xix. 12.) No fragments of his works are extant, with the exception of an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 181.) [L. S.]

ANDRONICUS ('Androivos), of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher, who is reckoned as the tenth of Aristotle's successors, was at the head of the Peripatetic school at Rome, about a. d. 88, and was the teacher of Boethus of Sidon, with whom Strabo studied. (Strab. iv. pp. 655, 777; Ammian, in Aristot. Categ. p. 8, a., ed. Ald.) We know little more of the life of Andronicus, but he is of special interest in the history of philosophy, from the statement of Plutarch (Sull. c. 26), that he published a new edition of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, which formerly belonged to the library of Apollonius, and were brought to Rome by Sulla with the rest of Apollonius' library in b.c. 84. Tyrannio commenced this task, but apparently did not do much towards it. (Comp. Porphyry, Vie Plt. in c. 24; Boethius, ad Aristot. de Interpret. p. 292 ed. Basil. 1570.) The arrangement which Andronicus made of Aristotle's writings seems to be the one which forms the basis of our present editions and we are probably indebted to him for the preservation of a large number of Aristotle's works.

Andronicus wrote a work upon Aristotle, the fifth book of which contained a complete list of the philosopher's writings, and he also wrote commentaries upon the Physics, Ethics, and Meteorology. None of these works is extant, for the paraphrase of the Nicomachean Ethics, which is ascribed to Andronicus of Rhodes, was written by some one or else, and may have been the work of Andronicus of Callistus of Thessalonica, who was professor at Rome, Bologna, Florence, and Paris, in the last half of the fifteenth century. Andronicus Callistus was the author of the work Πελαθων, which also ascribed to Andronicus of Rhodes. The Πελαθων was first published by Hesper, Ang. Vi del. 1594, and the Paraphrase by Heinsius, as anonymous work, Lugd. Bat. 1607, and afterwar by Heinsius as the work of Andronicus of Rhod. Lugd. Bat. 1617, with the Πελαθων attached it. The two works were printed at Cantab. 1617 and Oxon. 1609. (Stahr, Aristoteles, II. p. 123.)

ANDRONICUS ('Androivos), was with Cleander one of the Roman partisans among the Achaeans. In b.c. 146, he was sent by Metellus to Deceass, the commander of the Achaeans, offer peace; but the peace was rejected, and dourionds seized by Deceass, who however relea him upon the payment of a talent. (Polyb. xix. 30, xii. 4, 5.)

ANDROSTHENES ('Androsthenes). 1. Thasus, one of Alexander's admirals, sailed to Nearchus, and was also sent by Alexander to plove the coast of the Persian gulf. (Stab. p. 766; Arrian, Anab. viii. 20.) He wrote account of this voyage, and also a Syra Παιδειασ, (Athen. iii. p. 538, b.) Compare N. cian. Hercu. p. 63, Hest.: Theophr. de Caus. Pl. ii. 5; Vossius, de Histor. Graec. p. 93, ed. Wes mann.
ANEMOTIS, a Greek writer on agriculture, who lived before the time of Theophrastus, (Theophr. Hist. Plant. ii. 8, de Caus. lact. iii. 15; Athen. iii. pp. 75, d., 82, c.; Varr. R. ii. 1.; Colum. i. 1; Plin. Enarr. lixiv., &c.)

ANDRUS, Julius Modestus (ap. Macrobr. l.c.) and Festus (s. v. Angeronae doce) give an historical origin to the worship of this divinity, for they say, that at one time men and beasts were visited by a disease called angia, which disappeared as soon as sacrifices were vowed to Angeron. (Comp. Orelli, Inscript. p. 87. No. 116.)

ANGERONA. 177

2. Of Cysicus, left by Antiochus the Great in India, to convey the treasures promised him by the Indian king Sophaganesus. (Polyb. xi. 31.)

3. Of Corinth, who defended Corinth against the Romans in b.c. 198, and was defeated in the following year by the Achaenians. (Liv. xxxii. 23; xxxiii. 14, 15.)

4. Of Thessaly, called as Caesar the praeceptor of the country (by which he means merely the military commander), shut the gates of Gomphi against Caesar in b.c. 48, in consequence of the defeat of Dyrrhachium. (Caes. B. C. iii. 80.)

ANDROSTHENES (Ἀνδρόσθηνης), an Athenian sculptor, the disciple of Baudamus, completed the Temple of Olympian Zeus at Athens, (Comp. Orelli, Inscript. p. 87. No. 116.)

ANDROTON, the son of Andron, a pupil of Ictocrates, and a contemporary of Demosthenes. (Suid. s. v.)

To which of the political parties of the time he belonged is uncertain; but Ulpian (ad Demosth. c. Androt. p. 594) states, that he was one of the leading demagogues of his time. He seems to have been a particularly skilful and elegant speaker. (Scler. ad Hermogen. p. 401.) Among the orations of Demosthenes there is one against our Androtion, which Demosthenes delivered at the age of twenty-seven (Gellius, xv. 28; Plut. Dem. 15), and in which he imitated the elegant style of Ictocrates and Androtion. The subject of the speech is this: Androtion had induced the people to make a peace, in a manner contrary to law or custom; Attemon and Diodorus came forward to accuse him, and proposed that he should be disfranchised, not for having proposed the illegal peace, but for his conduct in other respects. Demosthenes wrote the oration against Androtion or Diodorus, one of the accusers, who delivered it. Lilius Argum. ad Demosth. Androt. The issue of the contest is not known. The orations of Androtion have perished, with the exception of a fragment which is preserved and praised by Aristotile. Rhet. iii. 4.) Some modern critics, such as Wesling (ad Dict. i. 29), Coeles (ad Ictoret. ii. p. 9), and Orelli (ad Ictoret. de Androt. 248), ascribe to Androtion the Erotes which is usually ranted among the orations of Demosthenes; but their arguments are not satisfactory. (Westermann, in Fast. Demosth. ii. p. 81.) There is an Androtion, an author of an Attis, whom some regard as the same person as the orator. (Zosin. Vitr. Isocr. p. ed. Dind.)

ANIANUS (Ἀνιανός), the author of an aethiopica, or a work on the history of Africa, which frequently referred to by ancient writers. (Paus. i. 7 § 2, x. 8 § 1; Marcellin. Vitr. Thuc. ix. 28; lux. Solon. c. 15, &c.) The fragments of this work have been published with those of Philorus, by Siebelis, Lips. 1811. (Vossius, de Hist. auct. 386, ed. Westermann.)

ANION, a name of Athena under which she was worshipped and had a temple at Mothone in Messenia. It was believed to have been built by Diomedes, because in consequence of his prayers the goddess had subdued the storms which did injury to the country. (Paus. iv. 35. § 5.)

ANCISTUS (Ἀνκίστος), the son of Sperthias, a Lacedaemonian ambassador, who was sent at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, b.c. 430, to solicit the aid of the king of Persia. He was surrendered by the Athenians, together with the other ambassadors who accompanied him, by Sadocbus, son of Sitalces, king of Thrace, taken to Athens, and there put to death. (Herod. vii. 137; Thuc. ii. 67.) The grandfather of Aneistus had the town of Aneides (Ἀνείδης) on the bank of the river Aesopus. (Polyb. ii. 22, 28, &c. 51; comp. Euseb. Hist. viii. § 3; Oros. iv. 5; Zon. v. 26.)

ANEBOIDES, or ANEBODITES (Ἀνεβοίδης, Ἀνεβοῖδητα), the king of the Gaeacii, a Gallio people between the Alps and the Rhone, who was induced by the Boii and the Insurbes to make war upon the Romans. He accordingly invaded Italy in b.c. 225, defeated the Romans near Fausulae, but in his return home was intercepted by the consul C. Attilius, who had come from Corsica. A battle ensued near Placa, in which the Gauls were defeated with immense slaughter, but Attilius was killed. Aneobesus, in despair, put an end to his own life. (Polyb. ii. 22, 28, &c. 51; comp. Euseb. Hist. viii. § 3; Oros. iv. 5; Zon. v. 26.)

ANEIDESORA (Ἀνείδοδορα), the spender of gifts, a surname, given to Gaea and to Demeter the latter of whom had a temple under this name at Phlius in Attica. (Paus. i. 31. § 2; Hesych. s. v.; Plut. Syrpos. p. 745.)

ANGERION, sculptor. [TETRAS.]

ANGELO (Ἀγγέλος). 1. A surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at Sycnaca, and according to some accounts the original name of Hecate. (Hesych. s. v.; Schol. ad Theocr. ii. 12.)

2. A son of Poseidon, whom, together with Melas, he beget by a nymph in Chios. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6.)

ANGERONA or ANGERONIA, a Roman divinity, of whom it is difficult to form a distinct idea, on account of the contradictory statements about her. According to one class of passages she is the goddess of anguish and fear; that is, the goddess who not only produces this state of mind, but also relieves men from it. (Verius Plac. ap. Macrobr. Sat. i. 10.) Her statue stood in the temple of Volupia, near the porta Romana, close by the Forum, and she was represented with her mouth bound and sealed up (as obligatam et signatum,Macrobr. l.c.; Plin. H. N. iii. 9), which according to Massarini Sabinus (ap. Macrobr. l.c.) indicated that those who concealed their anxiety in patience would by this means attain the greatest happiness. Hartung (Die Relig. d. Rom. ii. p. 247) interprets this as a symbolical suppression of cries of anguish, because such cries were always unlucky omens. He also thinks that the statue of the goddess of anguish was placed in the temple of the goddess of delight, to indicate that the latter should exercise her influence upon the former, and change sorrow into joy. (Comp. Orelli, Inscript. p. 87. No. 116.)
Other accounts state that An Era was the goddess of silence, and that her worship was introduced at Rome to prevent the secret and sacred name of Rome being made known, or that An Era was herself the protecting divinity of Rome, who by laying her finger on her mouth enjoined men not to divulge the secret name of Rome. (Plin. L. c.; Macrobi. Sat. iii. 9.) A festival, An Era, was celebrated at Rome in honour of An Era, every year on the 12th of December, on which day the pontiffs offered sacrifices to her in the temple of Vulcain, and in the curia Aeculeum. (Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 23; Plin. and Macrobi. L. c.) [L. S.]

ANGITIA or ANQUITIA, a goddess worshipped by the Marsians and Marrubians, who lived about the shores of the lake Fucini. She was believed to have been once a being who actually lived in that neighbourhood, taught the people remedies against the poison of serpents, and had derived her name from being able to kill serpents by her magic arts. (Serv. ad Aen. v. 750.) According to the account given by Servius, the goddess was of Greek origin, for Angitia, says he, was the name given by the Marrubians to Medea, who after having left Colchis came to Italy with Jason and taught the people the above mentioned remedies. Silius Italicus (viii. 496, &c.) identifies herself completely with Medea. Her name occurs in several inscriptions (Orelli, p. 97, No. 116; p. 835, No. 1346), in one of which she is mentioned along with An Era, and in another her name appears in the plural form. From a third inscription (Orelli, p. 97, No. 115) it seems that she had a temple and a treasury belonging to it. The Silvia Angitia between Alba and lake Fucini derived its name from her. (Solin. c. 2.) [L. S.]

ANIA'NUS, the referendarius (Dufresne, Glos. s. a.) of Alaric the second, king of the Visigoths, and employed in that capacity to authenticate with his subscription the official copies of the Breviary. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Breviariun.) He also subscribed a part of the Breviary in the year 495. (Ibid. c. 1.)

ANIA'NUS, the referendarius (Dufresne, Glos. s. a.) of Alaric the second, king of the Visigoths, and employed in that capacity to authenticate with his subscription the official copies of the Breviary. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Breviariun.) In his subscription he used the words Anianus, eor spectabilis subscripti et addita, and it is probable that, from a misunderstanding of the word addita, proceeded the common notion that he was the author of the Roman-Gothic code, which has thence sometimes been called Breviary Anian. The subscription took place at Aire (Aduia) in Gascony, A. D. 506. (Silbernagl, ad Heinecke. Hist. Jur. Germ. § 13.) Sigebert (de ecclesiastic scriptoribus, c. 70, cited by Juc. Geofredi, Prolegomena in Cod. Theod. § 5) says, that Anianus translated from Greek into Latin the work of Cyril, Serv. ad Aen. v. upon St. Matthew; but respecting this, see the following article, No. 2. [J. T. G.]

ANIA'NUS (Awards). 1. An Egyptian monk, who lived at the beginning of the 5th century after Christ, and wrote a chronography, in which, according to Syncellus, he generally followed Eusebius, but sometimes corrected errors made by that writer. It is, however, very doubtful whether Anianus, on the whole, surpassed Eusebius in accuracy. Syncellus frequently finds fault with him. (Syncell. Chronog. pp. 7, 16, 17, 34—36.)

2. Deacon of Caled, in Italy, at the beginning of the 5th century, a native of Campania, was the amanuensis of Pelagius, and himself a worm Pelagian. He was present at the synod of Diocletian (A. D. 415), and wrote on the Pelagian controversy against Jerome. (Hieron. Epist. 91.) He also translated into Latin the homilies of Chrysostom on the Gospel of Matthew and on the Apostle Paul, and Chrysostom's Letters to Neophytes. Of all his works there are only extant the translations of the first eight of Chrysostom's homilies on Matthew, which are printed in Montfaucon's edition of Chrysostom. The rest of those homilies were translated by Gregory (or Georgius) Traceantius, but Fabricius regards all up to the 26th as the work of Anianus, but interpolated by Gregory. (Bibl. Graece. viii. p. 552, note.) Sigebert and other writers attribute the translation of Chrysostom to the jurist Anianus, who lived under Alaric; but this is a manifest error, since the preface to the work is addressed to Oronthus, who was condemned for Pelagianism in the council of Episcopia. (A. D. 431.) [P. S.]

ANICETUS. 1. A freedman of Nero, and formerly his tutor, commanded the fleet at Misenum in A. D. 69, and was employed by the emperor to murder Galba. He was subsequently induced by Nero to confess having committed adultery with Octavia, but in consequence of his conduct in this affair he was banished to Sardinia, where he died. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 3, 7, 8, 62; Dion Cass. lxi. 13; Suet. Ner. 35.)

2. A freedman of Polemo, who espoused the party of Vitellius, and excited an insurrection against Vespasian in Pontus, A. D. 70. It was however put down in the same year, and Anicetus, who had taken refuge at the mouth of the river Cobibus, was surrendered by the king of the Sodobezeli to the lieutenant of Vespasian, and put to death. (Tac. Hist. iii. 47, 48.)

3. A Greek grammarian, who appears to have written a glossary. (Aschen. x. p. 783, c.; comp. Alechrist. i. 26, with Berger's note.)

ANICIA GEN. Persons of the name anicius are mentioned first in the beginning of the second century a. c. Their cognomen was Gallus. Those whose cognomen is not mentioned are given under Anicius.

ANICIUS. 1. CN. ANICIUS, a legate of Paullus in the Macedonian war, B. C. 168. (Liv. xiv. 46.)

2. T. ANICIUS, who said that Q. Cicero has given him a commission to purchase a place in the suburbs for him, B. C. 54. (Cic. ad Qa. Fr. iii. 1. 57.)

3. C. ANICIUS, a senator and a friend of Cicero whose villa was near that of the latter. Cicero gave him a letter of introduction to Q. Corneli Scipio in Africa, when Anicius was going there to the privilege of a legatio libera (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Legatus, c. 2. 44. (Cic. ad Qa. Fr. ii. 19, ad Fam. vi. 26, 7.)

ANIGRIDES (Aigriades), the nymphs of the river Anigros in Elis. On the east of Elis, not far from the mouth of the river, there was a grove sacred to them, which was visited by persons afflicted with cutaneous diseases. They were cured here by prayers and sacrifices to the nymphs, or by bathing in the river. (Paus. v. 5. 6, 6; Strabo. viii. p. 346; Euthyd. ad Hom. p. 830.) [L. S.]

ANIANUS (Amos), a son of Apollo by Ceres or according to others by Rheo, the daughter of Staphylus, who when her pregnancy began was exposed by her angry father in a cave on the waves of the sea. The child landed Deios, and when Rheo was delivered of a boy's conscripted him to the service of Apollo, who doomed him with prophetic powers. (Diod. v. 6}
Anna Comnena had by Dryope three daughters, Oeno, Sperma, and Elais, to whom Dionysia gave the power of producing at will any quantity of wine, corn, and oil—whence they were called Oenotropes. When the Greeks on their expedition to Troy landed in Delos, Annaus endeavoured to persuade them to stay with him for nine years, as it was decreed by fate that they should not take Troy until the tenth year, and he promised with the help of his three daughters to supply them with all they wanted during that period. (Pherecyd. ap. Tzetzes ad Leqoph. 569; Ov. Met. xiii. 623, &c.; comp. Dictys Cret. i. 23.) After the fall of Troy, when Aeacea arrived in Delos, he was kindly received by Annaus (Ov. Aen. iii. 80, with Servius), and a Greek tradition stated that Aeacea married a daughter of Annaus, of the name of Lavina, who was, like her father, endowed with prophetic powers, followed Aeaces to Italy, and died at Lavinia. (Dionys. Hal. i. 59; Aurel. Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 9; comp. Hirtung, Die Reizg. d. Rom. L p. 67.) Two other mythical personages, one a son of Aeaces by Lavina, and the other an offspring of Euryclus, from whom the river Anio derived its name, appear in Serv. ad Aen. iii. 80, and Plut. Parall. 40. [L. S.]

Anna. [Anna Perenna.]

Anna Comnena (Anna Komnena), the daughter of Alexius I. Komnenus, and the empress Irene, was born in A.D. 1083. She was destined to marry Constantine Ducas, but he died while she was still a child; and she was subsequently married to Nicephorus Bryennius, a Greek nobleman distinguished by birth, talents, and learning. Anna, gifted by nature with beauty and rare talents, was instructed in every branch of science, and she tells us in the preface to her Alexias, that she was thoroughly acquainted with Aristotle and Plato. The vanity of a female philosopher was flattened by the homages she received from the Greek scholars and artists, and during a long period hers and her husband’s house was the centre of the arts and sciences of Constantinople. Her love for her husband was sincere and founded upon real esteem, and she and the empress tried, although in vain, to persuade the dying Alexius to appoint Bryennius his successor. The throne was inherited by John, the son of Alexius. (A. D. 1118.) During his reign Anna persuaded Bryennius to seize the crown; but the conspiracy failed at the moment of its execution, and Anna and Bryennius were punished with exile and the confiscation of the greater part of their property. Bryennius died some time afterwards, and Anna regretted her loss with deep and sincere affliction. During her retirement from the world she composed her "Alexias" ("Alexiaσα") This celebrated work is a biography of her father, the emperor Alexius I. It is divided into fifteen books. In the first nine she relates with great prolixity the youth of Alexius, his exploits against the Turks, Seljuks, and the Greek rebels in Asia and Epirus, his accession, and his wars against the Normans in Epirus. The tenth book is remarkably interesting, containing the relation of the transactions between Alexius and the Western princes which led to the first crusade, and the arrival of the Crusaders at Constantinople. The following three contain the relations of Alexius with the Crusaders who had then advanced into Asia, and his last contest with the Norman Bo

To write the life of a man like Alexius I. was a difficult task for his daughter, and this difficulty did not escape her sagacity. "If I praise Alexius," she says in the preface, "the world will accuse me of having paid greater attention to his glory than to truth; and whenever I shall be obliged to blame some of his actions, I shall run the risk of being accused of impious injustice." However, this self defence is mere mockery. Anna knew very well what she would write, and far from deserving the reproach of "impious injustice," she only deserts that of "vicious injustice." The Alexias is history in the form of a romance,—embellished with truth with two purports: to glorify Alexius, his father, and his daughter as the Minerva of the Byzantines. Anna did not invent facts, but in painting her portraits she always dips her pencil in the colour of vanity. This vanity is threefold,—personal, domestic, and national. Thus Alexius is spotless; Anna becomes an oracle; the Greeks are the first of all the nations, and the Latins are wicked barbarians. Bohemond alone is worthy of all her praise; but it is said that she was admired by, and that she admired in her turn, the gallant prince of the Normans.

The style of the author is often affected and loaded with false erudition; unimportant details are constantly treated with as much as and even more attention than facts of high importance. These are the defects of the work, but whoever will take the trouble to discover and discard them, will find the Alexias the most interesting and one of the most valuable historical productions of the Byzantine literature.

The edict princes of the Alexias was published by Hoechelrein, Augsburg, 1610, 4to. This is only an abridgment containing the fifteen books reduced to eight. The next is by Possinus, with a Latin translation, Paris, 1651, fol. Du Cange has written some valuable notes to the Alexias, which are contained in the Paris edition of Cimnannus. (1670, fol.) The best edition is by Schoppen (2 vols. 8vo.), with a new Latin translation, Bonn. 1839. The translation of Possinus is very bad. The work was translated into French by Cousin (le président), and a German translation is contained in the first volume of the "Historic Memoren" edited by Pevn von Schmidt. [W. P.]

Anna Perennna, a Roman divinity, the legends about whom are related by Ovid (Fast. iii. 553, &c.) and Virgil. (Aen. iv.) According to them she was a daughter of Belus and sister of Dido. After the death of the latter, she fled from Carthage to Italy, where she was kindly received by Aeaces. Here her jealousy of Lavinia was roused, and being warned in a dream by the spirit of Dido, she fled and threw herself into the river Numicius. Henceforth she was worshipped as the nymph of that river under the name of Perenna, for previously her name had simply been Ann. A second story related by Ovid states, that when the plebs had acceded to the mons sacrar et ANNALIS, a cognomen of the Villia gens, which was first acquired by L. Villius, tribune of the plebs, in n. c. 179, because he introduced a law fixing the year (annus) at which it was allowable for a person to be candidate for the public offices. (Liv. x1. 44.) The other persons of this name are:

1. Sex. Villius (Annalis), a friend of Milo's (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 6), probably the same as the Sex. Annalis, of whom Quintilian speaks. (vi. 3. § 86.)

2. L. Villius Annalis, praetor in n. c. 48, was proscribed by the triumvirs, and betrayed to death by his son. He is probably the same as the L. Villius L. F. Annalis mentioned in a letter of Caecilius to Cicero, n. c. 51. (ad Fam. viii. 3.) His son was killed shortly afterwards in a drunken brawl by the same soldiers who had killed his father. (Appian, B. G. iv. 17; Val. Max. iv. 11. § 6.)

M. Annlius, legate of M. Cicerio during his government in Cilicia, n. c. 51. Annius appears to have had some pecuniary dealings with the inhabitants of Sardis, and Cicerio gave him a letter of introduction to the praetor Thurinus, that the latter might assist him in the matter. In Cicerio's campaign against the Parthians in n. c. 50, Annius commanded part of the Roman troops. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 55, 57, xv. 4.)

Anna: 1. The wife of L. C. Cnina, who died n. c. 84, in his fourth consulate. She afterwards married M. Piso Calpurnius, whom Sulla compelled to divorce her, on account of her previous connexion with his enemy Cnina. (Vell. Patr. ii. 41.)

2. The wife of C. P. Cneus, and the mother of Milo, the contemporary of Cicerio. (Milo.)

Annia gens, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity. The first person of this name whom Livy mentions, is the Latin praetor L. Annius of a woman, and on the reverse Victory drawn by a quadriga, with the inscriptions C, ANNU, T. F.

T. N. PROCOES. Ex. S. C. and L. Fab. L. F. H}(sp), is supposed to refer to C. Annius, who fought against Sertorius in Spain. (Annuius, No. 7.) It is imagined that L. Fabius may have been the quaestor of Annius, but nothing is known for certain.

T. Annius / Nus, a Roman poet, lived in the time of Trajan and Hadrian, and was a friend of A. Gelius, who says that he was acquainted with ancient literature. Among other things, he appears to have written a commentary on the works of Virgil. (Gell. vii. 7. ex. 10. xx. 8.)

Annibal. [Annibal]

Anniciles (Annicius), a Cyrenian philosopher (Aristippus), of whom the ancients have left us very vague and contradictory accounts. He is said to have ransomed Plato for 20 minae from Dionysius of Syracuse (Diog. Laert. ii. 88); but we read, on the other hand, that he was a disciple of Parmenides, whose succession from Aristippus in the order of discipleship was as follows:—Aristippus, Ariste, Aristippus the younger, Antipater, Epictetus, Parthenes. Plato, however, was contemporary with the first Aristippus, and therefore one of the above accounts of Annicius must be false. Hence Menage on Laercius (c. c.) and Kuster on Suidas (v. n.) have supposed that there were two philosophers of the name of Annicius, the one contemporary with Plato, the other with Alexander the Great. If so, the latter is the one of whose system some notices have reached us, and who forms a link between the Cyrenian and Epicurean schools. He was opposed to Epicurus in two points: (1) he denied that pleasure was merely the absence of pain, for if so death would be a pleasure; and (2) he attributed to every separate act a distinct object, maintaining that there was no general end of human life. In both these statements he reasserted the principle of Aristippus. But he differed from Aristippus, inasmuch as he allowed that friendship, patriotism, and similar virtues, were good in themselves; saying that the wise man will derive pleasure from such qualities, even though they cause him occasional trouble, and that a friend should be chosen not only for our own need, but for kindness and natural affection. Again he denied that reason (sd B y) alone can secure us from error, maintaining that habi (dvoqii|qciDus) was also necessary (Suidas and Diog. Laert. c. c.; Clem. Alex. Strom ii. p. 417; Brucker, Hist. Civit. Phil. ii. 3; Ritter Geschichte der Phil. vii. 3.) Adrian (V. H. ii. 27

says, that Annia, (probably the elder of the two) was distinguished for his skill as a charioteer. [G. E. L. C.]

ANNIUS. 1. L. Annius, of Setia, a Roman colony, was praetor of the Latins, b. c. 340, at the time of the great Latin war. He was sent as ambassador to Rome to demand for the Latins perfect equality with the Romans. According to the Roman story, he dared to say, in the capitol, that he defied the Roman Jupiter; and as he hurried down the steps of the temple, he fell from the top to the bottom, and was taken up dead. (Liv. viii. 3-6.)

2. Annius, a freedman, the father of Cn. Plavius, who was curule aedile in b. c. 304. (Cass. vi. 9; Liv. ix. 46.)

3. T. Annius, a triumvir for founding colonies in Cisalpine Gaul, was obliged by a sudden rising of the Boii to take refuge in Mutina, b. c. 218. (Liv. xxi. 25.)

4. Annius, a Campanian, who is said to have been sent as ambassador to Rome after the battle of Cannae, b. c. 216, to demand that one of the consuls should henceforth be a Campanian. (Val. Max. vi. 4. § 1; Liv. xxiii. 6, 22.)

5. L. Annius, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 110, attempted with P. Licinius to continue in office the next year, but was resisted by his other colleagues. (Sall. Juv. 37.)

6. P. Annius, tribune of the soldiers, was the murderer of M. Antonius, the orator, in b. c. 67, and brought his head to Marius. (Val. Max. ix. 2. § 2; Appian, B. C. i. 72.)

7. C. Annius, sent into Spain by Sulla after b. c. 82 against Sertorius, whom he compelled to retreat near Cartagho. (Plut. Sertor. 7.)

8. Q. Annius, a senator, one of Catiline's co-conspirators, b. c. 63. He was not taken with Cethegus and the others, and we do not know his future fate. (Sall. Cat. 17, 50; comp. Q. C. de Pet. C. 3.)

ANNIUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]

ANNIUS FAUSTUS. [Faustus.]

ANNIUS GALLUS. [Gallus.]

ANNIUS POLLIO. [Pollio.]

ANSER, a friend of the triumvir M. Antonius, and one of the detractors of Virgil. Ovid calls him procuir. (Virg. Eccl. vi. 56; Serv. ad loc. et ad Ecli. vii. 21; Prop. ii. 23, 84; Ov. Trist. ii. 435; Cic. Philop. xiii. 5; Weichert, Postcar. Lat. Reliqu., p. 160, &c., Libra, 1830.]

ANTAEA (Antae), a surname of Demeter, Rhea, and Cybele, probably signifies a goddess whom man may approach in prayers. (Orph. Hymn. 40.; Apollon. i. 141; Hyginus, a. 1.) [L. S.]

ANTEUS (Anteas), i. A son of Poseidon and Ge, a mighty giant and wrestler in Libya, whose strength was invincible so long as he remained in contact with his mother earth. The strangers who came to his country were compelled to wrestle with him; the conquered were slain, and out of their skulls he built a house to Poseidon. Hercules discovered the source of his strength, lifted him up from the earth, and crushed him in the air. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Hygin. Fab. 31; Diod. iv. 17; Pind. Isthm. iv. 67, &c.; Lucan, Pharsal. iv. 890, &c.; Juv. iii. 89; Ov. Ib. 397.)

The tomb of Anteus (Anteas colius), which formed a moderate hill in the shape of a man stretched out at full length, was shewn near the town of Tingis in Mauretania down to a late period (Strab. xix. p. 829; P. Mela, iii. 10. § 85, &c.), and it was believed that whenever a portion of the earth covering it was taken away, it rained until the hole was filled up again. Sertorius is said to have opened the grave, but when he found the skeleton of sixty cubits in length, he was struck with horror and had it covered again immediately. (Strab. l. c.; Plut. Sertor. 9.)

2. A king of Ithaca, a town in the territory of Cyrene, who was sometimes identified by the ancients with the giant Antaeus. He had a daughter Alexia or Baro, whom he promised to him who should conquer in the foot race. The prize was won by Alexidamas. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 183, &c.; with the Schol.) A third personage of this name occurs in Virg. Aen. x. 561. [L. S.]

ANTAGORIAS (Antagoras), of Rhodes, a Greek epic poet who flourished about the year b. c. 270. He was a friend of Antigonus Gonatas and a contemporary of Antius. (Paus. l. c. 2. § 3; Plut. Aplem. p. 182, &c.; Sympos. iv. p. 608, &c.) He is said to have been very fond of good living, respecting which Plutarch and Athenaeus (viii. p. 340, &c.) relate some facetious anecdotes. Antagoras wrote an epic poem entitled Theibaeis, (Onfalis, Vira Artis, pp. 444, 446, ed. Buhele.) This poem he is said to have read to the Boeotians, to whom it appeared so tedious that they could not abstain from yawning. (Apostol. Proverb. Cent. v. 82; Maxim. Confess. ii. p. 590, ed. Comenius.) He also composed some epigrams of which specimens are still extant. (Diog. Laert. iv. 26; Anthol. Grice. x. 147.) [L. S.]

ANTALCIDAS (Antalidias), the Spartan, appears to have been one of the ablest politicians ever called forth by the emergencies of his country, an apt pupil of the school of Lycurgus, to which he devotedly versed in the arts of courtly diplomacy. His father's name, as we learn from Plutarch (Artax. p. 1022, a.), was Leon—the same, possibly, who is recorded by Xenophon (Hed. ii. § 10) as Euphor eorouinos in the fourteenth year of the Peloponnesian war. At one of the most critical periods for Sparta, when, in addition to a strong confederacy against her of Greek states assisted by Persian money, the successes of Pharnabazus and Conon and the restoration of the long walls of Athens appeared to threaten the re-establishment of Athenian dominion, Antalcidas was selected as ambassador to Tiribazus, satrap of western Asia, to negotiate through him a peace for Sparta with the Persian king, b. c. 493. (Hed. iv. 8. § 12.) Such a measure would of course deprive Athens and the hostile league of their chief resources, and, under the pretext of general peace and independence, might leave Sparta at liberty to consolidate her precarious supremacy among the Greeks of Europe. The Athenians, alarmed at this step, also despatched an embassy, with Conon at its head, to counteract the efforts of Antalcidas, and deputies for the same purpose accompanied them from Thesles, Argos, and Corinth. In consequence of the strong opposition made by these states, Tiribazus did not venture to close with Sparta without authority from Artaxerxes, but he secretly furnished Antalcidas with money for a navy, to harass the Athenians and their allies, and drive them into wishing for the peace. Moreover, he seized Conon, on the pretext that he had unadvisedly used the king's forces for the extension of Athenian dominion, and threw him into prison. [Conon.] Tiribazus was detained at court by the king, to whom he had gone to give a report of his measures, and wassuperseded for a time in his satrapy by Struthus, a warm friend of Athens. The war therefore continued for some years; but in B.C. 388 the state of affairs appeared to give promise of success if a fresh negotiation with Persia were attempted. Tiribazus had returned to his former government, Hermazodas, the opponent of Spartan interests, had gone up to the capital to marry Apama, the king's daughter, and had entrusted his government to Aristocharzanes, with whom Antalcidas had a connexion of hospitality (ετροκαὶ παραχωρό). Under these circumstances, Antalcidas was once more sent to Asia both as envoy of the fleet and a representative of the council (Heli-and (Heli. v. 1, § 6, 23). On his arrival at Ephesus, he gave the charge of the squadron to Nicoclus, as his lieutenant (εσταλκολείς), and sent him to aid Abydus and keep Iphionetas in check, while he himself went to Tiribazus, and possibly proceeded with him * to the court of Artaxerxes on the more important business of his mission. In this he was completely successful, having prevailed on the king to aid Sparta in forcing, if necessary, the Athenians and their allies to accede to peace on the terms which Persia, acting under Spartan influence, should dictate. On his return however to the seacoast, he received intelligence that Nicoclus was licked to the harbour of Abydus by Iphionetas and Dioxias. He accordingly proceeded by land to Abydus, whence he sailed out with the squadron by night, having spread a report that the Chalecedonians had sent him to aid. Sailing northward, he stopped at Perice, and when the Athenians had passed that place in fanned pursuit of him, he returned to Abydus, where he hoped to be strengthened by a reinforcement of twenty ships from Syrauce and Italy. But hearing that Thrasylusus (of Colytus, not the hero of Phyle) was advancing from Thrace with eight ships to join the Athenian fleet, he put out to sea, and succeeded by a stratagem in capturing the whole squadron. (Heli. v. 1, § 25-27; Poly. i, l. 4, and Schneider in loc. Xen.) He was soon after joined by the expected ships from Sicily and Italy, by the fleet of all the Ionian towns of which Tiribazus was master, and even by some which Aristocharzanes furnished from the satrapy of Hermazodas. Antalcidas now engaged a river-fleet of 600, and together with the annoyance to which Athens was exposed from Aegina (Heli. v. 1, § 24), the Athenians desist of peace. The same wish being also strongly felt by Sparta and Argos (see the several reasons in Xen. Heli. v. 1, § 29), the summons of Tiribazus for a congress of deputies from such states as might be willing to listen to the terms proposed by the king, was gladly obeyed by all, and the sumpt then read them the royal decree. This famous document, drawn up with a sufficient assumption of imperial majesty, ran thus: * Artaxerxes the king thinks it just that the cities in Asia should belong to himself, as well as the is land Clasionmen and Cyprus; but that the other Greek cities, both small and great, he should leave independent, except Lemnos and Imbros and Scyros; and that these, as of old, should belong to the Athenians. But whichever party receives not this peace, against them will I war, with such as accede to these terms, both by land and by sea, both with ships and with money.* (Heli. v. 1, § 31.) To these terms all the parties concerned readily acceded, if we except a brief and ineffectual delay on the part of Thespis and the united government of Argos and Corinth (Heli. v. 1, § 32-34); and thus was concluded, B.C. 387, the famous peace of Antalcidas, so called as being the fruit of his mastery diplomacy. That the peace effectually provided for the interests of Sparta, is beyond a doubt (Heli. v. 1, § 36); that it was cordially churlished by most of the other Eropean states as a sort of bucolic and charter of freedom, is no less certain. (Heli. vi. 3, §§ 9, 12, 18, vi. 5, § 2; Paus. ix. 1.) On the subject of the peace, see Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. iv. p. 445; Milford, ch. 25. sec. 2, ch. 27. sec. 2.

Our notices of the rest of the life of Antalcidas are scattered and doubtful. From a passing allusion in the speech of Callistratus the Athenian (Heli. vi. 3. § 12), we learn that he was then (B.C. 371) absent on another mission to Persia. Might this have been with a view to the negotiation of a peace in Greece (see Heli. vii. 3), and likewise have been connected with some alarm at the probable interest of Timotheus, son of Conon, at the Persian courts? (See Diod. xv. 59; Dem. c. Timoth. p. 119; Thirlwall, vol. v. p. 583.) Plutarch again (Aeg. p. 613, c.) mentions, as a statement of some persons, that at the time of the invasion of Laconia by Eumenes, A.D. 369, Antalcidas was one of the ephors, and that, fearing the capture of Sparta, he conveyed his children for safety to Cythera. The same author informs us (Aeg. 1022, d.), that Antalcidas was sent to Persia for supplies after the defeat at Lestra, B.C. 371, and was coldly and superciliously received by the king. If, considering the general looseness of statement which pervades this portion of Plutarch, it were allowable to set the date of this mission after the invasion of 369, we might possibly connect it with the attempt at pacification on the side of Persia in 368. (Heli. vii. i. § 27; Diod. xv. 70.) This would seem indeed to be inconsistent with Plutarch's account of the treatment of Antalcidas by Artaxerxes; but that might perhaps be no adverse mark to the character of freedom, is no less certain, Thirlwall, vol. v. p. 123, and note.) If the embassy in question took place immediately after the battle of Lestra, the anecdote (Aeg. 613, c.) of the ephorship of Antalcidas in 369 of course refutes what Plutarch (Aeg. 1022, d.) would have us infer, that Antalcidas was driven to suicide by his failure in Persia and the ridicule of his enemies. But such a story is on other grounds intrinsically improbable, and savours much of the period at which Plutarch wrote, when the conduct of some later Romans, miscellaneous Stories, had served to give suicide the character of a fashionable resource in cases of distress and perplexity.

* If we may infer as much from the expression which Xenophon afterwards uses (v. 1, 25). 'Ο ὲθελος Ἀνταλκαίδας κατάθηκε μὲν μετὰ Τιμόθεον, πετ, τ. l., ANTENOR.

ANTHEAS. 183

brother's cruelty. (Diod. xiii. 3, xx. 16, 72.)

Antander was the author of an historical work, which Diiodorus quotes. (Euseb. xxi. 12, p. 492, ed. Wess.)

ANTEIA (Ἀντεία), a daughter of the Lyceian king Iobates, and wife of Proetus of Argo, by whom she became the mother of Maera. (Apollod. ii. 13, 1; Hom. Il. xvi. 160; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1608.) The Greek tragedies call the wife of Proetus Sthenoebea. Respecting her love for Bellerophon, see BELLEROPHONTES. [L. S.]

ANTEIAS or ANTIAS (Ἀντείας or Ἀντίας), one of the three sons of Odysseus by Circe, from whom the town of Antia in Italy was believed to have derived its name. (Dionys. Hal. i. 72; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Antia'.) [L. S.]

P. ANTEUS was to have had the province of Syria in A. D. 55, but was detained in the city by Nero. He was hated by Nero on account of his intimacy with Agrippina, and was thus compelled to put an end to his own life in A. D. 57. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23, xvi. 14.)

ANTENOR (Ἀντένωρ), a Trojan, a son of Aescylus and Cleone, and husband of Thersamon, by whom he begot his son Ajax. (H. H. i. 398; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 349.) According to the Homeric account, he was one of the wisest among the elders at Troy, and received Menelaus and Odysseus into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors. (Il. iii. 146, &c. 263, &c.) He also advised his fellow-citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus. (Il. vii. 348, &c.) This is the substance of all that is said about him in the Homeric poems; but the suggestion contained therein, that Antenor entertained a friendly disposition towards the Greeks, has been seized upon and exaggerated by later writers. Before the Trojan war, he is said to have been sent by Priam to Greece to claim the surrender of Hesione, who had been carried off by the Greeks; but this mission was not followed by any favourable result. (Dares Phryg. 5.) When Menelaus and Odysseus entered Troy, they would have been killed by the sons of Priam, had it not been for the protection which Antenor afforded them. (Dict. Curt. i. 11.) Just before the taking of Troy his friendship for the Greeks assumes the character of treachery towards his own country; for when sent to Agamemnon to negotiate peace, he devised with him and Odysseus a plan of delivering the city, and even the paladim, into their hands. (Dict. Curt. iv. 22, v. 3; Serv. ad Aen. i. 246, 651, ii. 15; Tassus, ad Lygiov. 339; Suidas, s. v. Παλαδιν.) When Troy was plundered, the skin of a panther was hung up at the door of Antenor's house, as a sign for the Greeks not to commit any outrage upon it. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. v. 190; Paus. x. 17; Strab. xiii. p. 606.) His history after this event is related differently. Dictys (v. 17; comp. Serv. ad Aen. ix. 264) states, that he founded a new kingdom at Troy upon and out of the remnants of the old one; and according to others, he embarked with Menelaus and Helen, was carried to Libya, and settled at Cyrene (Pind. Pyth. v. 110); or he went with the Heneti to Thrace, and thence to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of several towns is ascribed to him. (Strab. l. c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 1; Liv. i. 1.) Antenor with his family and his house, on which the panther's skin was seen, was painted in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. l. c.) [L. S.]

ANTEIOR (Ἀντέιορ), the son of Euphrainor, an Athenian sculptor, made the first bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which the Athenians set up in the Cemeneus. (A. c. 508.) These statues were carried off to Susa by Xerxes, and their place was supplied by others made either by Callias or by Praxiteles. After the conquest of Persia, Alexander the Great sent the statues back to Athens, where they were again set up in the Cemeneus. (Paus. i. 3, § 5; Arrian. Anab. iii. 16, vii. 19; Phil. xxxiv. 92; 16. 19. § 10; Bickel, Corp. Inscrip. ii. p. 340.) The return of the statues is ascribed by Pausanias (l. c.) to one of the Antiochi, by Valerius Maximus (ii. 10, ext. § 1) to Seleucus; but the account of Arrian, that they were returned by Alexander, is to be preferred. (See also Mauri. Persiciat. 14.) [P. S.]

ANTEOR (Ἀντείωρ), a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work upon the history of Crete, which on account of its excellence was called Δέαρα, inasmuch as, says Ptolemy Hesapeon (ap. Phot. Cod. 190, p. 151, b. Bekk.), the Cretans called that which is good Δάιχρον. (Aelian, H. N. xvii. 53; Plut. de Nat. Haer. c. 52.)

ANTEORIDES (Ἀντείωρος), a patrician and applied to his sons and descendants. (Virg. Aen. vi. 404; Hom. Il. xi. 221.) At Cyrene, where Antenor according to some accounts had settled after the destruction of Troy, the Antenorides enjoyed heroic honours. (Pind. Pyth. v. 108.) [L. S.]

ANTEROS. [Eros.]

ANTEVORTA, also called PORRIMA or PRORSA (Ov. Fast. i. 638; Gell. xvi. 16), together with Postvorta, are described either as the two sisters or companions of the Roman goddess Carmenta. (Ov. l. c.; Macrobi. Sat. i. 7.) It seems to be clear, from the manner in which Macrobius speaks of Antevorta and Postvorta, that originally they were only two attributes of the one goddess Carmenta, the former describing her knowledge of the future and the latter that of the past, malicious to the two-handed one. But that in later times Antevorta and Postvorta were regarded as two distinct beings, companions of Carmenta, or as two Carmentae, is expressly said by Varro (ap. Gell. l. c.), Ovid, and Macrobius. According to Varro, who also says, that they had two altars at Rome, they were invoked by pregnant women, to avert the dangers of child-birth. [L. S.]

ANTHABUS (Ἀνθάβος) or Anteus, a physician, whose ridiculous and superstitious remedy for hydrophobia is mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxviii. 2.) One of his prescriptions is preserved by Galen. (De Compos. Motivm. sec. Locos, iv. 3. vol. xii. p. 764.) Nothing is known of the events of his life, but, as Pliny mentions him, he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ANTHAS (Ἀνθᾶς), a son of Poseidon and Alcyone, the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Teneaen, and believed to have built the town of Anthedon, and according to a Boeotian tradition, the town of Anthemus also. Other accounts stated, that Anthedon derived its name from a nymph Anthedon. (Paus. ii. 30, § 7, &c. ii. 29. § 5.) [L. S.]

ANTHES LYNNIUS (Ἀνθέας), a Greek poet, of Lindus in Rhodes, flourished about B. C. 596. He was one of the earliest eminent composers of phallic songs, which he himself sang at the head of his phallophori. (Athen. x. p. 445.) Hence he is ranked by Athenaeus (l. c.) as a comic poet, but ANTHEMUS, emperor of the West, remarkable for his decisive efforts in the Eastern empire to support the sinking fortunes of the Western. He was the son of Procopius, and son-in-law of the emperor Marcian, and on Ricimer applying to the eastern emperor Leo for a successor to Majorian in the west, he was in A. D. 467 named for the office, in which he was confirmed at Rome. His daughter was married to Ricimer; but a quarrel arising between Anthemius and Ricimer, the latter acknowledged Olybrius as emperor, and laid siege to Rome, which he took by storm in 473. Anthemius perished in the assault. His private life, which seems to have been good, is given in the panegyric upon him by Sidonius Apollinarius, whom he patronized; his public life in Jornandes (de Reb. Got. c. 45), Marcellinus (Chron.), and Theophanes (p. 101). See Gibbon, Decline and Fall c. 36. [A. P. S.]

ANTHEMUS (Ἀνθέμιος), an eminent mathematician and architect, born at Tralles, in Lydia, in the sixth century after Christ. His father's name was Stephanus, who was a physician (Alex. Trall. liv. 1, p. 193); one of his brothers was the celebrated Alexander Trallianus; and Agathias mentions (Hist. v. p. 143), that his three other brothers, Dioscorus, Meteorus, and Olympus, were each eminent in their several professions. He was one of the architects employed by the emperor Justinian in the building of the church of St. Sophia, A. D. 532 (Procop. in Combitis. Manu. Heron C.Pol. p. 284; Agath. Hist. v. p. 149, &c. Du Cange, C.Polis Christ. lib. iii. p. 11; Anselm. Bandur. ad Adiab. C.Pol. p. 772), and to him Eutocius dedicated his Commentary on the Conica of Apollonius. A fragment of one of his mathematical works was published at Paris, 4to. by M. Dupuy, 1777, with the title "Fragment d'un Ouvrage Grec d'Anthemius sur des Paradoxes de Mécanique;" revu et corrigé sur quatre Mss., avec une Traduction Française et des Notes." It is also to be found in the forty-second volume of the Hist. de l'Acad. des Fers. 1768, pp. 72, 932—451. [W. A. G.]

ANTHERMUS, sculptor. [BUTRUSIOS.]

ANTHES (Ἀνθές), probably only another form of Anthas. It occurs in Stephanus Byzantius, who calls him the founder of Anthas in Laconia; and in Plutarch (Quaest. Gr. 19) who says, that the island of Cabaria was originally called, after him, Anthedon. [L. S.]

ANTHEUS (Ἀνθές), the blooming, a surname of Dionysus. (Paus. vii. 21. § 2.) Anthius, a surname which Dionysus bore at Athens, is probably only a different form for Anthus. (Paus. i. 31. § 2.) There are also two famous personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. 157; Virg. Aen. i. 181, 510, xii. 443.) [L. S.]

ANTHEUS, a Greek sculptor of considerable reputation, though not of first-rate excellence, flourished about 180 B. C. (Plin. xxxiv. 19, where Anthus is a corruption for the common reading Anteus.) [P. S.]

ANTHANITUS (Ἀνθανίτος?), FURUS, a Roman jurist, of uncertain date. He was probably not later than Severus Alexander. He wrote a work upon the Edict, which in the Florentine Index to the Digest is entitled μέγας εἴθεντο βιβλία πάντες, but there are only three extracts made from it in the Digest, and all of these are taken from the first book. This has led many to hold that the compilers of the Digest possessed only an imperfect copy of his work. (P. I. Besier, Dis. de Fuvio Anthetino, J. C. ejusque fragmentis, Lug. Bat. 1803.) [J. T. G.]

ANTHIMUS (Ἀνθημός), bishop of Trapani in Pontus, was made patriarch of Constantinople by the influence of the empress Theodora (A. D. 559), and about the same time was drawn over to the Byzantine heresy by Severus. Soon after his election to the patriarchate, Agapesus, the bishop of Rome, came to Constantinople, and obtained from the emperor Justinian a sentence of deposition against Anthimus, which was confirmed by a synod held at Constantinople under Memnus, the successor of Anthimus. (A. D. 539; Novell. 42; Mansi, Nova Collect. Concil. viii. pp. 321, 869, 1149-1158; Labbe, v.; Agapesus.) Some fragments of the debate between Anthimus and Agapesus in the presence of Justinian are preserved in the Acts of the Councils. [P. S.]

ANTHIPIUS (Ἀνθηπίος), a Greek comic poet, a play of whose is cited by Athenaeus (ix. p. 403), where, however, we ought perhaps to read Ἀνθηρήσιος. [A. S.]

ANTHIUS (Ἀνθίος), a son of Antoninus and Hippodameia, who was born to pieces by the horses of his father, and was metamorphosed into a bird which resembled a magpie, and was always fled from the sight of a horse. (Anton. Lib. i. Hist. H. N. x. 57.) [L. S.]

ANTIGEIA GENS, by which the cognomina are Barso and Rastro, seems to have been of considerable antiquity. The only person of this name, who has no cognomen, is SR. ANTIUS.

ANTINEAIREA (Ἀντινεάρεα). 1. The mother of the Argonaut Idmon by Apollo. (Orph. Arg. 187.) The scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 189), however, calls Asteria the mother of Idmon. 2. A daughter of Menelaus, and mother of the Argonauts Euryalus and Echione, whom she bore to Hercules. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 56; Hygin. Fab. 14.) [L. S.]

ANTITAS, a cognomen of the Valeria gens, derived from the Roman colony of Antium. 1. L. Valerius Antius, was sent with five ships in B. C. 215 to convey to Rome the Carthaginian ambassadors, who had been captured by the Romans on their way to Philip of Macedonia. (Liv. xxii. 34.)

2. Q. Valerius Antias, the Roman historian, was either a descendant of the preceding, or derived the surname of Antias from his being a native of Antium, as Pliny states. (H. N. Praef.) He was a contemporary of Quadranginis, Sisenna, and Rutilius (Vell. Pat. ii. 9), and lived in the former half of the first century before Christ. Krause, without mentioning his authority, states that Antias was praetor in A. D. 676, (s. c. 68.) He wrote the history of Rome from the earliest period, relating the stories of Anulina, Rhea Silvia and the like, down to the time of Sulla. The latter period must have been treated at much greater length than has been the case with the compare when T. Gracch us (s. c. 137) as early as in the twelfth book (or according to some readings in the twenty-second), and the work extended to seventy-five books at least. (Gell. vii. 9.)

Valerius Antias is frequently referred to by Livy, who speaks of him as the most llying of all the annalists, and seldom mentions his name without terms of reproach. (Comp. iii. 5, xxi. 49, xxxvi. 38.) Gallus (vi. 8, vii. 19) too mentions cases in which the statements of Antias are opposed to those of all other writers, and there can be little doubt that Livy's judgment is correct. Antias was in no difficulty about any of the particulars of the early history: he fabricated them for the circumstantial narratives, and was particularly distinguished by his exaggerations in numbers. Plutarch seems to have drawn much of his early history from him, and Livy too appears to have derived many of his statements from the same source, though he was aware of the untrustworthiness of his authority. It is rather curious that Cicero never refers to Valerius Antias. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. pp. 237, 501, 525, &c., ii. p. 9, l. 570, iii. pp. 124, 358; Krause, Vite e Fragm. et. Historic. Latini, p. 266, &c.)

ANTICELEIA (Anticleia), a daughter of Antiochus, wife of Laertes, and mother of Odysseus. Homer (Od. xi. 83.) According to Homer she died of grief at the long absence of her son, who met her on the beach where she had gone to speak with her in Hades. (Od. xv. 356, &c., i. 202, &c.) According to other traditions, she sat an end to her own life after she had heard a report of the death of her son. (Hygin. Fab. 243.)

In this (Fab. 201) also must be noted previous to her marrying Laertes, she lived on intimate terms with Sisyphus; whence Eurydice (Iphig. Ant. 524) called Odysseus a son of Sisyphus. (Comp. Sophoc. Oed. 417; Ov. Met. xiii. 82; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 29.)

It is uncertain whether this Anticleia is the same as the one whose son Periphetes was killed by Theseus. Of this Periphetes she was the mother by Hephaestus or by Poseidon. (Apollod. iii. 16. 1; Paus. ii. 1. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 38.) Another mythical personage of this name, who married Iphnoe, the son of Asclepius, is mentioned by aus. iv. 30. § 2. [L. S.]

ANTICELEIDES (Anticleides), of Athens. Athen. xi. p. 365, c), lived after the time of Alexander the Great (Plut. Alex. 490), and is frequently referred to by later writers. He wrote, i. epi Nórron, containing an account of the return of the Greeks from their ancient expeditions. Athen. iv. p. 157, i. ix. p. 384, d, ix. p. 466, c) tis leides' statement about the Pelasgians, which vase (v. p. 221) quotes, is probably taken from e work on the Nórron. 2. Αντικέλα, an account Delos. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1307, 1239.)

3. Εὐγρατέουσα, appears to have been a sort of Dictionary, in which perhaps an explanation of those words and phrases was given which occurred in the ancient stories. (Athen. x. p. 473, b, c.) 4. Πελοπόννησος, of which the second book is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, (viii. 11; comp. Plut. Alex. c.) Whether these works were all written by Anticleides of Athens, cannot be decided with certainty.

ANTICRATES (Antikratês), a Spartan who, according to Diodorus (s. a. 27. 5), killed Euphemondas at the battle of Mantinea. The descendants of Anticrates are said to have been Mayos of the Laedamoneans, on account of his having struck Euphemondas with a μαχαιρά (Plut. c.), but Pausanias (viii. 11. § 4) mentions Machaerion, a Laedamonean or Mantinian, to whom this honour was ascribed by some. Others attribute it to Gryllus, the son of Xenophon. (Grkllus.)

ANTIDAMAS, or ANTIDAMUS, of Hemelica, wrote in Greek a history of Alexander the Great and moral works, which are referred to by Fulgentius. (s. e. Pudiionnes, fabra.)

ANTIDORUS (Antidoros), of Lemnos, des- cended to the Greeks in the battle of Artamision, and was rewarded by the Athenians by a piece of ground in Salamis. (Herod. vii. 173.)

ANTIDOTUS (Antidoros), an Athenian comic poet, of whom we know nothing, except that he was of the middle comedy, which is evident from the fact that a certain play, the Ομωνια is ascribed to both him and to Alexis. (Athen. xiv. p. 642.) We have the titles of two other plays of his, and it is thought that his name ought to be restored in Athenaeus (i. p. 28, a) and Pollux (vi. 99). (See Meineke, i. p. 416.) [P. S.]

ANTIDOTUS, an enigmatic painter, the dis- ciple of Euphranor, and teacher of Nicoces the Athenian. His works were few, but carefully executed, and his colouring was somewhat harsh (sevior). He flourished about B. C. 330. (Plin. xxxiv. 40. §§ 27, 28.)

ANTIGENES (Antigeneis). 1. A general of the Great, also served under Philip, and lost an eye at the siege of Perinthus. (s. e. 340.) Another Alexander, he obtained the satrapy of Susiana. He was one of the commanders of the Arcaspids (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) and espoused with his troops the side of Eumenes. On the defeat of the latter in B. C. 316, Antigens fell into the hands of his enemy Antigonus, and was burnt alive by him. (Plut. Alex. 70; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71, b. Bekk.; Diod. xviii. 62, xii. 12, &c., 44; Plut. Eum. 13.)

2. A Greek historian, who spoke of the Amazon's visit to Alexander. (Plut. Alex. 46.) There was a grammarian of the same name. (Fabric. Bibliol. Grec. iii. p. 34, vi. p. 355.)

ANTIGENES (Antigeneis), the name of at least three Greek physicians.

1. An inhabitant of Chios, mentioned in one of the spurious letters of Eupides (Eup. Epid. 2. vol. ii. p. 500, ed. Heck), who (if he ever really existed) must have lived in the fifth century B. C.

2. One of the followers of Cleophaunus, who must have lived about the middle of the third century B. C., as Mnemon, one of his fellow-pupils, is known to have lived in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, B. C. 247–222. (Cleophaunus; Mnemon.) One of his works is quoted by Caesius ANTIGONE.

Aurelianus (De Morb. Auct. i. 10, p. 46), and he is probably the physician mentioned by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136), together with several others who lived about that time, as being celebrated anatomists.

3. One of Galen's contemporaries at Rome in the second century after Christ, who was a pupil of Quintus and Marinus, and had an extensive and lucidious practice. Galen gives an account (De Prænat. ad Posit. c. 3, vol. xiv. p. 613) of their differing in opinion as to the probable result of the illness of the philosopher Eudemus. (Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 63, ed. vet.; Haller, Biblioth. Medico. Prat. tom. i.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIGENIDAS (Ἀντιγενιδᾶς), a Thban, the son of Satyryos or Dionysius, was a celebrated flute-player, and also a poet. He lived in the time of Alexander the Great. (Suidas and Harpocrat. s. v.; Phiz. de Alex. fort. p. 355, a.; de Music. p. 1138, a.; Cic. Brut. 50; Bode, Gesell. d. lyrisch. Dichkunst d. Hollenm., ii. p. 321, &c.) His two daughters, Melo and Satrya, who followed the profession of their father, are mentioned in an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (v. 296.)

ANTIGNOTUS. [Antigonos, sculptor.]

ANTIGONE (Ἀντιγόνη). 1. A daughter of Oedipus by his mother Jocaste. She had two brothers, Eteocles and Polynices, and a sister Ismene. In the tragic story of Oedipus Antigone appears as a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Oedipus, in despair at the fate which had driven him to murder his father, and commit incest with his mother, had put out his eyes, and was obliged to quit Thebes, he went to Atica guided and accompanied by his attached daughter Antigone. (Apollod. iii. 5, § 8, &c.) She remained with him till he died in Colonus, and then returned to Thebes. Haemon, the son of Creon, had, according to Apollodorus, died before this time; but Sophocles, to suit his own tragic purposes, represents him as alive and falling in love with Antigone. When Polynices, subsequently, who had been expelled by his brother Eteocles, marched against Thebes (in the war of the Seven), and the two brothers had fallen in single combat, Creon, who now succeeded to the throne, issued an edict forbidding, under heavy penalties, the burial of their bodies. While every one else submitted to this impious command, Antigone alone defied the tyrant, and buried the body of Polynices. According to Apollodorus (iii. 7, § 1), Creon had buried his lively in the same tomb with her brother. According to Sophocles, she was shut up in a subterranean cave, where she killed herself; and Haemon, on hearing of her death, killed himself by her side; so that Creon too received his punishment. A different account of Antigone is given by Hyginus. (Fab. 72.) Aeschylos and Sophocles made the story of Antigone the subject of tragedies, and that of the latter, one of the most beautiful of ancient dramas, is still extant. Antigone acts a part in other extant dramas also, as in the Seven against Thebes of Aeschylus, in the Oedipus in Colonus of Sophocles, and in the Phoenix in Euripides.

2. A daughter of Eurytion of Pitha, and wife of Pelens, by whom she became the mother of Polydemos. When Pelens had killed Eurytion during the chase, and fled to Acastus at Ioleus, he drew upon himself the hatred of Astydameia, the wife of Acastus. [Acastus.] In consequence of this, she sent a calumnious message to Antigone, stating, that Pelens was on the point of marrying Sterope, a daughter of Acastus. Hereupon Antigone hung herself in despair. (Apollod. iii. 13, § 1-3.)

3. A daughter of Lomagedon and sister of Priam. She boasted of exceeding Hera in the beauty of her hair, and was punished for her presumptuous vanity by being changed into a stork. (Ov. Met. vi. 53.)

4. A daughter of Pheres, married to Pyrurus or Cometes, by whom she became the mother of the Argonaut Asterion. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 35; Orph. Arg. 101; Hygin. Fab. 14.) [L. S.]

ANTIGONE (Ἀντιγόνη), the daughter o. Casander (the brother of Antipater), was the second wife of Ptolemy Lagus, and the mother o. Berenice, who married first the Macedonian Philip son of Amyntas, and then Ptolemy Soter. (Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachfolger Alexanders, p. 410, &c. and Tab. viii. 2.)

2. The daughter of Berenice by her first husband Philip, and the wife of Pyrrhus. (Phil. Pyrrh. 4.)

ANTIGONDIAE, the descendants of Antigone, king of Asia. The following genealogical table of this family is taken from Droysen's Geschichte der Nachfolger Alexanders.

Antigonus, died b. c. 301. Married Stratonice, daughter of Corhorse.
ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), a Greek writer in the history of Italy. (Fest. s. a. Romam; Dionys. Hal. i. 6.) It has been supposed that the Antigonus mentioned by Plutarch (Romal. 17) is he same as the historian, but the saying there noted belongs to a king Antigonus, and not to the historian. [L.S.]

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), son of Alexander, was sent by Perseus, king of Macedonia, as ambassador into Bocotia, in B.C. 172, and succeeded in inducing the towns of Coronea, Thebes, and Halus to remain faithful to the king. Polyb. xxvii. 5. [L.S.]

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), of Alexandria, grammarian who is referred to by Erothin in his roosemum and his Prowia. He is perhaps the same person as the Antigonus of whom the scholiast on Nicander speaks, and identical with Antinus, the commentator of Hippocrates. (Erothin, 13.) [L.S.]

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), king of Asia, named the One-eyed (Lucian, Macrob. 11; Plut. Pueror. Educ. 14), was the son of Philip of Lynotistis. He was born about B.C. 392, and was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and in a division of the empire after his death (B.C. 323), he received the provinces of the Greater Lydia, Lycia, and Pamphylia. Perdiccas, who had been appointed regent, had formed the plan of attaining the sovereignty of the whole of Alexander's dominions, and therefore resolved upon the ruin of Antigonus, who was likely to stand in the way of his ambitious projects. Perceiving the anger which threatened him, Antigonus fled with his son Demetrius to Antipater in Macedonia (321); t the death of Perdiccas in Egypt in the same year put an end to the apprehensions of Antigonus, Antipater was now declared regent; he restored to stigcbus his former provinces with the addition of Susiana, and gave him the command of cavalry; on the war against Eumenes, who would not submit to the authority of the new regent. In a war Antigonus was completely successful; he defeated Eumenes, and compelled him to take refuge with a small body of troops in Nora, an impregnable fortress on the confines of Lycaonia and Cappadocia; and after leaving this place closely invested, he marched into Phidias, and conquered Ciusa and Attalus, the only generals who still d out against Antipater (B.C. 320). [ALCETAS.]

The death of Antipater in the following year (319) was favourable to the ambitions views of Antigonus, and almost placed within his reach the throne of Asia. Antipater had appointed Polycperchon regent, to the exclusion of his own son Cassander, who was dissatisfied with the arrangement of his father, and claimed the regency for himself. He was supported by Antigonus, and their confederacy was soon afterwards joined by Ptolemy. But they found a formidable rival in Rhamenes, who was appointed by Polycperchon to the command of the troops in Asia. Antigonus commanded the troops of the confederates, and the struggle between him and Rhamenes lasted for two years. The scene of the first campaign (B.C. 318) was Asia Minor and Syria; of the second (B.C. 317) Persia and Media. The contest was at length terminated by a battle in Gabiene at the beginning of B.C. 316, in which Rhamenes was defeated. He was hurried to Antigonus the next day through the treachery of the Amyrgiads, and was put to death by the conqueror.

Antigonus was now by far the most powerful of Alexander's generals, and was by no means disposed to share with his allies the fruits of his victory. He began to dispose of the provinces as he thought fit. He caused Pithon, a general of great influence, to be brought before his council, and sentenced to death on the charge of treachery, and executed several other officers who showed symptoms of discontent. After taking possession of the immense treasures collected at Ecbatana and Susa, he proceeded to Babylon, where he called upon Seleucus to account for the administration of the revenues of this province. Such an account, however, Seleucus refused to give, maintaining that he had received the province as a free gift from Alexander's army; but, admonished by the recent fate of Pithon, he thought it more prudent to get out of the reach of Antigonus, and accordingly left Babylon secretly with a few horsemen, and fled to Egypt.

The ambitious projects and great power of Antigonus now led to a general coalition against him, consisting of Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus. The war began in the year 315, and was carried on with great vehemence and alternate success in Syria, Phoenicia, Asin Minor, and Greece. After four years, all parties became exhausted with the struggle, and peace was accordingly made, in B.C. 311, on condition that the Greek cities should be free, that Cassander should retain his authority in Europe till Alexander Aegus came of age, that Lysimachus and Ptolemy should keep possession of Thrace and Egypt respectively, and that Antigonus should have the government of all Asia. The name of Seleucus, strangely enough, does not appear in the treaty.

This peace, however, did not last more than a year. Ptolemy was the first to break it, under pretence that Antigonus had not restored to liberty the Greek cities in Asia Minor and accordingly had sent a fleet to Cilicia to dislodge the garrisons of Antigonus from the maritime towns. (n. c. 310.) Ptolemy was at first successful, but was soon deprived of all he had gained by the conquests of Demetrius (Poliorketes), the son of Antigonus. Meanwhile, however, the whole of Greece was in the power of Cassander, and Demetrius was therefore sent with a large fleet to effect a diversion in his father's favour. Demetrius met with little opposition; he took possession of Athens in n. c. 307, where he was received with the most extravagant flattering. He also obtained possession of Megara, and would probably have become master of the whole of Greece, if he had not been recalled by his father to oppose Ptolemy, who had gained the island of Cyprus. The fleet of Demetrius met that of Ptolemy off the city of Limassus in Cyprus, and a battle ensued which is one of the most memorable of the naval engagements of antiquity. Ptolemy was entirely defeated (n. c. 306), and Antigonus assumed in consequence the title of king, and the diadem, the symbol of royal power in Persia. He also conferred the same title upon Demetrius, between whom and his father the most cordial friendship and unanimity always prevailed.

The example of Antigonus was followed by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Seleucus, who are from this time designated as kings. The city of Antigonia on the Orontes in Syria was founded by Antigonus in the preceding year (n. c. 307).

Antigonus thought that the time had now come for crushing Ptolemy. He accordingly invaded Egypt with a large force, but his invasion was not successful as Cassander's fleet had, and as he was obliged to retire with great loss. (n. c. 306.) He next sent Demetrius to besiege Rhodes, which had refused to assist him against Ptolemy, and had hitherto remained neutral. Although Demetrius made the most extraordinary efforts to reduce the place, he was completely baffled by the energy and perseverance of the besieged; and was therefore glad, at the end of a year's siege, to make peace with the Rhodians on terms very favourable to the latter. (n. c. 304.) While Demetrius was engaged against Rhodes, Cassander had recovered his former power in Greece, and this was one reason that made Antigonus anxious that his son should make peace with the Rhodians. Demetrius crossed over into Greece, and after gaining possession of the principal cities without much difficulty, collected an assembly of deputies at Corinth (n. c. 303), which conferred upon him the same title that had formerly been bestowed upon Philip and Alexander. He now prepared to march northwards against Cassander, who, alarmed at his dangerous position, sent proposals of peace to Antigonus. The proud answer was, “Cassander must yield to the pleasure of Antigonus.” But Cassander had not sunk so low as this; he sent ambassadors to Seleucus and Ptolemy for assistance, and induced Lysimachus to invade Asia Minor in order to make an immediate diversion in his favour. Antigonus proceeded in person to oppose Lysima-ANTIGONUS. [ANTIGONIDAE.] On the death of Demetrius II., B.C. 229, Antigonus was appointed guardian of his son Philip, whom he was sometimes designated by the surname ‘Entropos.’ (Athen. vi. p. 284. d.; Liv. xli. 54.) He married the widow of Demetrius, and almost immediately afterwards assumed the crown in his own right. At the commencement of his reign he was engaged in wars against the barbarians on the borders of Macedonia, but afterwards took an active part in the affairs of Greece. He supported Artaxus and the Achaean league against Cleomenes, king of Sparta, and the Aetolians, and was completely successful. He defeated Cleomenes, and took Sparta, but was recalled to Macedonia by an invasion of the Illyrians. He defeated the Illyrians, and died in the same year (B.C. 220), after a reign of nine years. Polybius speaks favourably of his character, and commends him for his wisdom and moderation. He was succeeded by Philip V. (Justin, xxviii. 3, 4; Plut. Arat. and Oecum.; Polyb. ii. 45, &c.; 70; Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 232, &c.) [ARATUS; CLEOMENES.]

ANTIGONUS (Antirrōnas), son of Echecnatès, the brother of Antigonus Doson, revealed to Philip V., king of Macedonia, a few months before his death, B.C. 179, the false accusations of his son Perseus against his other son Demetrius, in consequence of which Philip had put the latter to death. Indignant at the conduct of Perseus, Philip appointed Antigonus his successor; but on his death Perseus obtained possession of the throne, and caused Antigonus to be killed. (Liv. xli. 54-58.)

ANTIGONUS GONATAS (Antirrōnas Γορατός), son of Demetrius Polyocrates and Phila (the daughter of Antipater), and grandson of Antigonus, king of Asia. [ANTIGONIDAE.] When his father Demetrius was driven out of Macedonia by Pyrrhus, in B.C. 287, and crossed over into Asia, Antigonus remained in Peloponnesus, but did not assume the title of king of Macedonia till after his father’s death in Asia in B.C. 283. It was some years, however, before he obtained possession of his paternal dominions. Pyrrhus was deprived of the kingdom by Lysimachus (B.C. 286); Lysimachus was succeeded by Seleucus (280), who was murdered by Ptolemy Cærerus. Cærerus shortly after fell in battle against the Gauls, and during the next three years there was a succession of emigrants to the throne. Antigonus at last obtained possession of the kingdom in 277, notwithstanding the opposition of Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, who laid claim to the crown in virtue of his father’s conquests. But he withdrew his aim on the marriage of his half-sister, Phila, with Antigonus. He subsequently defeated the Gauls, and continued in possession of his kingdom till the return of Pyrrhus from Italy in 273. He deprived him of the whole of Macedonia, (with the exception of a few places. He recovered dominions in the following year (272) on the death of Pyrrhus at Argos, but was again deprived of them by Alexander, the son of Pyrrhus. Alexander, however, did not retain possession of the country long, and was compelled to retire from the conquests of Demetrius, the brother or son of Antigonus, who now obtained part of the Peloponnesus in addition to his paternal dominions. He subsequently attempted to prevent the formation of the Achaean league, and died in B.C. 239, at the age of eighty, after a reign of forty-four years. He was succeeded by Demetrias II. (Plut. Demetrius, 51; Justin, xiv. 1. xxv. 1-3; xcv. 2.; Polyb. ii. 43, &c.; Lucian, Maced. e. 11; Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 227, &c.) Antigonus’ surname Gonatas is usually derived from Gonnis or Gounis in Thessaly, which is supposed to have been the place of his birth or education. Niebuhr (l.c.), however, remarks, that Thessaly did not come into his father’s possession till Antigonus had grown up, and he thinks that Gonatas is a Macedonian word, the same as the Roman Gonatas, which signifies an iron plate protecting the knee, and that Antigonus obtained this surname from wearing such a piece of defensive armour.

COIN OF ANTIGONUS GONATAS.

ANTIGONUS (Antirrōnas), king of Judea, the son of Aristobulus II. and the last of the Maccabees who sat on the royal throne. After his father had been put to death by Pompey’s party, Antigonus was driven out of Judea by Antipater and his sons; but was not able to obtain any assistance from Caesar’s party. He was at length restored to the throne by the Parthians in B.C. 40. Herod, the son of Antipater, fled to Rome, and obtained from the Romans the title of king of Judea, through the influence of Antony. Herod now marched against Antigonus, whom he defeated, and took Jerusalem, with the assistance of the Roman general Sosius, after a long and obstinate siege. Antigonus surrendered himself to Sosius, who handed him over to Antony. Antony put him to death at Antioch as a common malefactor in B.C. 37. (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 13-16, B. J. i. 13, 14; Dion Cass. xii. 22. Respecting the difference in chronology between Josephus and Dion Cassius, see Werner, do Fidei Librarm Memph. p. 24, and Ilder, Chronol. ii. p. 389, &c.)

ANTIGONUS (Antirrōnas), a writer on painting, mentioned by Diodorus (viii. 12), is perhaps the same as the sculptor, whom we know to have written on statuary. [P. S.]

ANTIGONUS, a general of Persius in the war with the Romans, was sent to Aegina to guard the coast. (Liv. xiv. 26, 32.)

ANTIGONUS, a Greek sculptor, and an eminent writer upon his art, was one of the artists who represented the battles of Attalus and Eumenes against the Gauls. (Plut. xxxiv. 19. § 24.) He lived, therefore, about 239 B.C., when Attalus I., king of Pergamum, conquered the Gauls. A little further on, Pliny (§ 26) says, “Antigonus et perixyomenon, tymmercidaeque supra dictos,” where one of the best MSS. has “Antigonotus et luctatores, perixyomenon,” &c. [P. S.]

ANTIGONUS (Antirrōnas), a Greek army surgeon, mentioned by Galen, who must therefore have lived in or before the second century after Christ. (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. ii. 1, vol. xii. pp. 557, 560.) Marcellus Empiricus quotes a physician of the same name, who may ANTIMACHUS. Antimachus was a Greek historian who wrote an account of the Greek philosophers from the time of Pythagoras to the death of Epicurus, whose system he himself adopted.

ANTIMEEON (Ἀντίμεηος), a Greek author who wrote a work on chronology (Ἱστορίας), the second book of which is referred to by Diogena Laertius (iv. 38). Whether he is the same person as the Antimachus mentioned by Pollux (ii. 4, 153) is uncertain.

ANTILÓCHUS (Ἀντίλοχος), a son of Nestor, king of Pylos, by Anaxibia (Apollod. i. 9 § 9), or according to the Odyssey (iii. 451), by Eurydice. Hyginus (Fab. 253) states, that, as an infant he was exposed on mount Ida, and suckled by a dog. He is mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. iii. 10 § 3.) According to the Homeric account, he accompanied his father to Troy, but Nestor being advised by an oracle to guard his son against an Ethiopian, gave him Charon as his constant attendant. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1687.) Antilochus appears in the Homeric poems as one of the youngest, handsomest, and bravest among the Greeks, and is beloved by Achilles. (Od. iii. 112; Ili. xxiii. 556, 607, xviii. 16.) He fell at Troy by the hands of Memnon, the Ethiopian. (Od. iv. 186, &c., xi. 522; Pind. Pthl. v. 32, &c.) Hyginus, in one passage (Fab. 112) states that he was slain by Memnon, and in another (Fab. 113) he makes Hector his conqueror. The remains of Antilochus were buried by the side of those of his friends Achilles and Patroclus (Od. xxiv. 78), and in Hades or the island of Lerne he likewise accompanied his friends. (Od. xxiv. 16; Paus. iii. 19 § 11.) Philostratus (Her. ii. 2) gives a different account of his death. When Nestor went to Troy, his son was yet too young to accompany him; but in the course of the war he came to Troy and applied to Achilles to soothe the anger of his father at his unexpected arrival. Achilles was delighted with the beauty and the warlike spirit of the youth, and Nestor too was proud of his son, and took him to Agamemnon. According to Philostratus, Antilochus was not slain by the Ethiopian Memnon, but by a Trojan of that name. Achiles not only avenged his death on Memnon, but celebrated splendid funeral games, and burnt the head and armour of Memnon on the funeral pyre. (Comp. Böckh, ad Pind. p. 299.)

ANTILÓCHUS (Ἀντίλοχος), a Greek historian who wrote an account of the Greek philosophers from the time of Pythagoras to the death of Epicurus, whose system he himself adopted. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 153.) He seems to be the same as the Antilochus mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (De Comp. i. 4, comp. Athen. Deipn. xxxii.) and Arnobius (adv. Gent. vi. 6) refer for the same fact to a writer of the name of Antilochus, there may possibly be an error in Theodor. [L.S.]

ANTIMACHIDES, architect. [ANTISTATES.]

ANTIMACHUS (Ἀντίμαχος), a Trojan, who, when Menelaus and Odysseus came to Troy to ask for the surrender of Helen, advised his countrymen to put the ambassadors to death. (Hom. II. xi. 122, &c., 138, &c.) It was Antimachus who principally insisted upon Helen not being restored to the Greeks. (Ili. xi. 123.) He had three sons, and when two of them, Peisander and Hippolochus, fell into the hands of Menelaus, they were both put to death.

There are three other mythical personages of the name. (Hygin. F fab. 170; Schol. ad Pind. Thesp. iv. 194; Ov. Met. xii. 460.)

ANTIMACHUS (Ἀντίμαχος). 1. Of Claros, a son of Hipparchus, was a Greek epic and elegiac poet. (Cic. Brut. 51; Ov. Trist. i. 61.) He is usually called a Colophonian, probably only because Claros belonged to the dominion of Colophon. He flourished during the latter period of the Peloponnesian war. (Diod. xiii. 106.) The statement of Suidas that he was a disciple of Pausias would make him belong to an earlier date, but the fact that he is mentioned in connexion with Lyons and Plato the philosopher sufficiently indicates the age to which he belonged. (Plut. Lynd. 19; Prols. ad Plut. Tim. i. p. 28.) Platarch relates that at the Lydian festival of the Hermess the Spartans called their great festival of the Hermes, to honour Lydander—Antimachus entered upon a poetical contest with one Nicocrates of Heraclea. The latter obtained the prize from Lydander himself, and Antimachus, disheartened by his failure destroyed his own poem. Plato, then a young man, happened to be present, and consolded the unsuccessful poet by saying, that ignorance, like blindness, was a misfortune to those who laboured under it. The meeting between Antimachus and Plato is related differently by Cicero (i. 32), who also places it manifestly at a different time and probably also at a different place; for, according to him, Antimachus once read to a numerous audience his voluminous poem (Thebas), and his hearers were sowaried with it, that all gradually left the place with the exception of Plato, whomupon the poet said, "I shall nevertheless continue to read for one Plato is worth more than all the thousand of other hearers." Now an anecdote similar to the one related by Cicero is recorded of Antigone the Rhodian (Antigoras), and this repetition of the same occurrence, together with other improbabilities, have led Welcker (Der Epische Cyclus, p. 105, &c.) to reject the two anecdotes altogether as inventions, made either to show the uninteresting character of these epics, or to instigate that, a though they did not suit the taste of the multitude they were duly appreciated by men of learning and intelligence.

The only other circumstance of the life of Antimachus that we know is, his love for Lyde, which was either his mistress or his wife. He followed her to Lydia; but she appears to have died soon after, and the poet returned to Colophon and sought consolation in the composition of an elegy called Lyde, which was very celebrated in antiquity. (Athen. xiii. p. 598; Brucke, Anastol. p. 219.) This elegy, which was very long, consisted of accounts of the misfortunes of all mythical heroes who, like the poet, had been unfortunate through the early death of their beloved. (Plut. Consol. ad Apollon. p. 106, b.) Thus contained vast stores of mythical and curious information, and it was chiefly for this.weakly possible be the same person (Marc. Empir. De Med. c. 8. pp. 266, 267, 274); and Lucian mentions an impudent quack named Antigonus, who among other things said, that one of his patients had been restored to life after having been buried for twenty days. (Luc. Philopseudes, §§ 21, 22, 23, 26, vol. iii. ed. Taeusch.) [W.A. G.]

not for any higher or poetical reason, that Agatharchides made an abridgment of it. (Phot. Bibliot. p. 171, ed. Bekker.)

The renowned poet of Antimachus was his epic poem called Thebeis (Teibáis), which Cicero designates as magnanimum illud volumen. Porphyrus (ad Horat. ad Pison. 146) says, that Antimachus had spun out his poem so much, that in the 24th book (volumen) his Seven Heroes had not yet arrived at Thebes. Now as in the remaining part of the work the poet had not only to describe the war of the Seven, but also probably treated of the war of the Epigoni (Schol. ad Aristoph. Paeon. 268a), the length of the poem must have been immense. It was, like the elegy Lyda, full of mythological lore, and all that had any connexion with the subject of the poem was incorporated in it. It was, of course, difficult to control such a mass, and hence we find it stated by Quintilian (x. i. § 53; comp. Dionys. Hal. De vocb. Compos. 223), that Antimachus was unacquainted in his descriptions of passion, that his work was not copious, and was deficient in arrangement. His style also had not the simple and easy flow of the Homeric poems. He borrowed expressions and phrases from the tragic writers, and frequently introduced Doric forms. (Schol. ad Nisus et Eurydice. 3.) Antimachus was thus one of the forerunners of the poets of the Alexandrine school, who wrote more for the learned and a select number of readers than for the public at large. The Alexandrine grammarians assigned to him the second place among the epic poets, and he emperor Hadrian preferred his works even to those of Homer. (Dion. Cass. lxxi. 4; Spartan. Hadrian. 5.) There are some other works which are ascribed to Antimachus, such as a work entitled Gymnias (Poem. comp. T. Corn. xii. 53), a second called Alera (Athen. vii. p. 300), a third called Ztheq (Etymol. M. a. e. Aodhexpression), and perhaps also a Centauromachia (Natal. Com. viii.) but as in all these cases Antimachus is mentioned without any descriptive epithet, it cannot be ascertained whether he is the Charian poet or there are two other poets of the same name. Suidas says that Antimachus of Claeos was also a grammarian, and there is a tradition that he made a recension of the text of the Homeric poems; at respecting these points see F. A. Wolf, Progym. pp. cxvii. and cxxxii., &c. The numerous fragments of Antimachus have been collected by A. G. Schellenberg, Halle, 1786, 6°. Some additional fragments are contained in H. G. Stoll,imoto, in Antimachi Prögn. Götttingen. 1841. A list of the fragments is given in Hirt's Die Fragmente der Epic. Poet. der Griech. sin auf Alexander, p. 59, &c., comp. with Nachtrag, 36, &c. See N. Bach, Pädelas, Homericanaeat, c. reliquiæ, &c. Epitome der Antimachi Lyda, 240; Blomfield in the Classical Journal, iv. p. 31; Welcker, Der Epiche Cyclopes, p. 102, &c.

2. Of Thebeks, an epic poet. Plutarch (Romel. 2) states, that he is said to have known something about the eclipse which occurred on the day the foundation of Rome. Clemens Alexandrinus Strom. vi. p. 622, § c) quotes an hexameter verse on him, which Agius is said to have imitated; this statement is correct, Antimachus would long to an early period of Greek literature.

3. Of Hieropolis in Egypt, is said by Suidas to have written a poem called Kozmopoikos, that is, the creation of the universe, consisting of 3780 hexameter verses. Tzetzes (ad Lyceph. 245) quotes three lines from Antimachus, but whether they are taken to Antimachus of Hemionus, or to either of the other poets of the same name, cannot be ascertained. (Dümmer, Fragm. der Epic. Poet von Alexander, &c. p. 97.) [L. S.]

ANTIMACHUS, a sculptor, celebrated for his statues of ladies. (Plin. xxxiv. 19, § 26.) [P. S.]

ANTIMÉNÉDAS. [Alcibiades.]

ANTIMÉOROUS (Antipamos), a sophist, was a native of Mende in Thrace, and is mentioned with praise among the disciples of Protagoras. (Plat. Protag. p. 315, a.; Themist. Ovart. xxii. p. 347, d.) [L. S.]

ANTINOÉ (Antinoï), a daughter of Cephalus. At the command of an oracle she led the inhabitants of Mantinea from the spot where the old town stood, to a place where the new town was to be founded. She was guided on her way by a serpent. She had a monument at Mantinea commemorating this event. (Paus. viii. 8. § 3, 9. § 2.) In the latter of these passages she is called Antinoe. Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. 1. 164; Paus. viii. 11. § 2. [L. S.]

ANTINOUSS (Antipuros), a son of Epeithes of Ithaca, and one of the suitors of Penelope, who during the absence of Odysseus even attempted to make himself master of the kingdom and threateneth the life of Telemachus. (Hom. Od. xxii. 48, &c., lv. 630, &c., xvi. 571.) When Odysseus after his return appeared in the disguise of a beggar, Antinous insulted him and threw a foot-stool at him. (Od. xvi. 42, &c.) On this account he was the first of the suitors who fell by the hands of Odysseus. (xxii. § 5, &c.; xvi. 571. L. S.)

ANTINOIUS (Antinu), a chief among the Molossians in Epeirus, who became involved, against his own will, in the war of Perseus, king of Macedonia, against the Romans. His family and that of another chief, Cephalus, were connected with the royal house of Macedon by friendship, and although he was convinced that the war against Rome would be ruinous to Macedonia and therefore had no intention of joining Perseus, yet Chares, a young Epeiroit, who had been educated at Rome and wished to insinuate himself into the favour of the Romans, calumniated Antinous and Cephalus as if they entertained a secret hostility towards Rome. Antinous and his friends at first treated the machinations of Chares with contempt, but when they perceived that some of their friends were arrested and conveyed to Rome, Antinous and Cephalus were compelled, for the sake of their own safety, openly, though unwillingly, to join the Macedonian party, and the Molossians followed their example. After the outbreak of the war Antinous fell fighting, b. c. 168. Polybius does not state clearly whether Antinous fell in battle, or whether he put an end to his own life in despair. (Polyb. xvii. 13, xxx. 7.) [L. S.]

ANTINOUSS, a youth, probably of low origin, born at Bithynium or Claudopolis in Bithynia. On account of his extraordinary beauty he was taken by the emperor Hadrian to be his page, and soon became the object of his extravagant affection. Hadrian took him with him on all his journeys. It was in the course of one of these that he was drowned in the Nile. It is uncertain whether his death was accidental, or whether he threw himself into the river, either from disgust at the life he led, or from a superstitious belief that by so doing he should avert some calamity from the emperor. Dion Cassius favours the latter supposition. The grief of the emperor knew no bounds. He strove to perpetuate the memory of his favourite by monuments of all kinds. He rebuilt the city of Bessus in the Thracians, near which Antinous was drowned, and gave it the name of Antinopolis. He enrolled Antinous amongst the gods, caused temples to be erected to him in Egypt and Greece (at Mantinea), and statues of him to be set up in almost every part of the world. In one of the sanctuaries dedicated to him omens were delivered in his name. Games were also celebrated in his honour. (Dict of Ant. s.n. 'Antœos'.) A star between the eagle and the zodiac, which the courtiers of the emperor pretended had then first made its appearance, and was the soul of Antinous, received his name, which it still bears. A large number of works of art of all kinds were executed in his honour, and many of them are still extant. They have been diffusely discussed and classified by Konrad Levezow in his treatise Uber den Antinous dargestellt in den Kunstkleidern des Alterthums. The death of Antinous, which took place probably in A.D. 123, seems to have formed an era in the history of ancient art. (Dion Cass. Lix. 11; Spartan. Hadrian. 14; Paus. viii. 9. § 4.)
ANTIOCHUS.

[C. P. M.]

There were various medals struck in honour of Antinous in the Greek cities, but none at Rome or in any of the Roman colonies. In the one annexed, which was struck at Bithynium, the birth-place of Hadrian, the inscription is Η ΠΑΤΡΙΣ ΑΝΤΙΝΟΝ ΘΕΟΝ, that is, "His native country (reverences) the god Antinous." The inscription on the reverse is nearly effaced on the medal from which the drawing was made: it was originally ΑΩΡΙΑΝΩΝ ΒΙΩΝΕΙΩΝ. On it Mercury is represented with a bull by his side, which probably has reference to Apis. (Eckhel, vi. p. 528, &c.)

ANTIOCHUS ('Αντίοχος). 1. A sister of Antiochus the Great, married to Xerxes, king of Armenia, a city between the Euphrates and the Tigris. (Polyb. viii. 28.)

2. A daughter of Antiochus the Great, married to Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, born to his husband two daughters and a son named Mithridates. (Diod. xxxi. Eccl. 3; Appian, Syr. 5.)

3. A daughter of Achaeus, married to Attalus, and the mother of Attalus I, king of Pergamum. (Strab. xiii. p. 624.)

ANTIOCHUS ('Αντίοχος). There are three mythical personages of this name, concerning whom nothing of any interest is related. (Diod. iv. 27; Paus. i. 5, § 2, x. 10, § 1; Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, &c.; Ilyam. Fab. 170.)

ANTIOCHUS ('Αντίοχος), of AEGAE in CILICIA, a sophist, or as he himself pretended to be, a Cynic philosopher. He flourished about a. d. 200, during the reign of Severus and Caracalla. He belonged to a distinguished family, some members of which were afterwards raised to the consulate at Rome. He took no part in the political affairs of his native place, but with his large property, which was increased by the liberality of the emperors, he was enabled to support and relieve his fellow-citizens whenever it was needed. He used to spend his nights in the temple of Asclepius, partly on account of the dreams and the communications with the god in them, and partly on account of the conversation of other sophists who likewise spent their nights there without being able to sleep. During the war of Caracalla against the Parthians he was at first of some service to the Roman army by his Cynic mode of life, but afterwards he deserted to the Parthians together with Tiridates.

Antiochus was one of the most distinguished rhetoricians of his time. He was a pupil of Dardanus, the Assyrian, and Dionysius, the Milesian. He used to speak extemporaneously, and his declamations and orations were distinguished for their pathos, their richness in thought, and the precision of their style, which had nothing of the pomp and bombast of other rhetoricians. But he also acquired some reputation as a writer. Philostratus mentions an historical work of his (Irrnax) which is praised for the elegance of its style, but what was the subject of this history is unknown. Phrynichus (p. 32) refers to a work of his called 'Ayose. (Philosr. Vit.Soph. 4. § 4; Dion Cass. Ixxix. 19; Suidas, s.v.; Endoe, p. 58.)

ANTIOCHUS ('Αντίοχος), of ALEXANDRIA, wrote a work on the Greek poets of the middle Attic comedy. (Athen. xi. p. 329.) Fabricius thinks that he is, perhaps, the same man as the mythographer Antiochus, who wrote a work on mythical traditions arranged according to the place where they were current. (Ptolem. Hapheas. 9; Phot. Cod. 190.) Some writers are inclined to consider the mythographer as the same with Antiochus of Aegae or Antiochus of Sicyons; but nothing certain can be said about the matter. (L. S. A.

ANTIOCHUS ('Αντίοχος), another, was the envoy sent by his state to the Persian court in c. 367, when embassies went to Susa from most of the Grecian states. The Arcadians, probably influenced by the Pelopidias, the Thbes ambassador, were treated as of less importance than the Eleans—an affront which Antiochus resented by refusing the presents of the king. (Xen. Heli. vii. 1. § 83, &c.) Xenophon says, that Antiochus had conquered in the panateria; and Pausanias informs us (vi. 3. § 4), that Antiochus the panateria was a native of Lepreum, and that he conquered in this contest once in the Olympic games, twice in the Nemean, and twice in the Isthmian. His statue was made by Nicodamus, Lepreum was claimed by the Arcadians as one of their towns, whence Xenophon calls Antiochus: Arcadian; but it is more usually reckoned as belonging to Elis.

ANTIOCHUS ('Αντίοχος), of AEGALON, a founder, as he is called, of the fifth Academy, a friend of Lucullus the antagonist of Mithridatid and the teacher of Cicero during his studies in Athens (b. c. 79); but he had a school at Alexandria also, as well as in Syria, where he seems to have ended his life. (Plut. Cic. c. 4, Lucull. c. 4 Cic. Acad. i. 19.) He was a philosopher of considerable reputation in his time, for Strabo in scribing Ascalon, mentions his birth there as a mark of distinction for the city (Strab. xiv. p. 769), and Cicero frequently speaks of him in affectionate and respectful terms as the best and wisest of the Academicians, and the most polished and acute philosopher of his age. (Cic. Acad. ii. 35, Brut. 91.)

He studied under the Stoics, Menarchus, but his principal teacher was Philo, who succeeded Plato, Arsesillas, and Carneades, as the founder of the fourth Academy. He is, however, better known as the adversary than the disciple of Philo; and Cicero mentions a treatise called Sosus (Cic. Acad. iv. 4), written by him against his master, in which he refutes the scepticism of the Academicians. Another of his works, called "Canonicus," is quoted by Sextus Empiricus, and appears to have been a treatise on logic. (Sext. Emp. vii. 201, see not in loc.)

The sceptical tendency of the Academic philosoph before Antiochus, probably had its origin in Plato's successful attempts to lead his disciples to abstract reasoning as the right method of discovering the ultimate causes of things and the nature of the senses. Cicero even ranks Plato himself with those philosophers who held, that there was no such thing as certainty in any kind of knowledge (Acad. ii. 23); as if he depredication of the senses as trustworthy organs of perception, and of the kind of knowledge which they convey, invalidated also the conclusions of the reason.

There is, however, no doubt that later philosophers, either by insisting too exclusively on the uncertainty of the senses (in order like Arsesillas to exaggerate by comparison the value of speculative truth), or like Carneades and Philo, by extending the same fallibility to the reason likewise, had gradually fallen into a degree of scepticism that seemed to strike at the root of all truth, theoretical and practical. It was, therefore, the chief object of Antiochus, besides inculcating particular doctrines in moral philosophy, to examine the grounds of our knowledge, and our capacities for discovering truth; though no complete judgment can be formed of his success, as the book in which Cicero gave the fullest representation of his opinions has been lost. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 8.)

He professed to be reviving the doctrines of the old Academy, or of Plato's school, when he maintained, in opposition to Philo and Carneades, that he intellect had in itself a test by which it could distinguish truth from falsehood; or in the language of the Academicians, discern between the mazes arising from actual objects and those conceptions that had no corresponding reality. (Cic. Acad. ii. 13.) For the argument of the skeptics was, that if two notions were so exactly similar as not they could not be distinguished, neither of them could be said to be known with more certainty than the other; and that every true notion is liable to have a false one of this kind attached to it: therefore nothing could be certainly known. (Id. 13.) This reasoning was obviously overthrown by the assertion, that the mind contained within itself the standard of truth and falsehood, and was also met more generally by the argument that at all such reasoning refutes itself, since it proceeds upon principles assumed to be true, and then excludes that there can be no certain ground for any assumption at all. (Id. 34.) In like manner Antiochus seems to have taken the side of the school in defending the senses from the charge of utter fallaciousness brought against them by the Academicians. (Id. 32.)

It is evident that in such discussions the same questions were examined which had formerly been more thoroughly sifted by Plato and Aristotle, in analyzing the nature of science and treating of the different kinds of truth, according as they were objects of pure intellectual apprehension, or only of probable and uncertain knowledge (τὸ εἰσερχόμενον καὶ τὸ δοκιμώμενον): and as the result was an attempt to revive the dialectic art which the Academicians despaired, so the notices extant of Antiochus' moral teaching seem to show, that without yielding to the paradoxes of the Stoics, or the latitudinarianism of the Academicians, he held in the main doctrines nearly coinciding with those of Aristotle: as, that happiness consists essentially in a virtuous life, yet is not independent of external things. (Id. 42, de Fato v. 25, Tuscul. Quest. v. 8.) So he denied the Stoic doctrine, that all crimes were equal (Acad. ii. 43), but agreed with them in holding, that all emotions ought to be suppressed, as they are prejudicial; therefore, though Cicero inclines to rank him among the Stoics (id. 43), it appears that he considered himself an eclectic philosopher, and attempted to unite the doctrines of the Stoics and Peripatetics, so as to revive the old Academy. (Sext. Empir. i. 255.)

ANTIOCHUS (Ἀντίοχος), an Astronomer of uncertain date, whose work "Ἀποκαλυπτικαῖ" still exists in MS. in various libraries, and has not yet been printed. (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 151.) There is an introduction to the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemaeus, of which the original text with a Latin translation by H. Wolf was published at Basel, 1559, fol., as the work of an anonymous writer. T. Gale (ed. Ramb. de Musis. p. 964) claims this introduction as the work of Antiochus, whose name, however, occurs in the work itself. (P. 194.)

ANTIOCHUS (Ἀντίοχος), an Athenian, was left by Alcibiades at Notium in command of the Athenian fleet, n. c. 407, with strict injunctions not to fight with Lysander. Antiochus was the master of Alcibiades' own ship, and his personal friend; he was a skilful seaman, but arrogant and heedless of consequences. His intimacy with Alcibiades had first arisen upon an occasion mentioned by Plutarch (Alcib. 19), who tells us, that Alcibiades in one of his first appearances in the popular assembly allowed a tame quail to escape from under his cloak, which occurrence suspended the business of the assembly, till it was caught by Antiochus and given to Alcibiades. Antiochus gave no heed to the injunctions of Alcibiades, and provoked Lysander to an engagement, in which fifteen Athenian ships were lost, and Antiochus himself was slain. This defeat was one of the main causes that led to the second banishment of Alcibiades. (Xen. Hell. i. 5, § 11, &c.; Diod. xiii. 71; Plut. Alcib. 25.)

ANTIOCHUS I. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Comagene, a small country between the Ephræms and mount Taurus, the capital of which was Samo-sata. It formerly formed part of the Syrian kingdom of the Seleucidæ, but probably became an independent principality during the civil wars of Antiochus Grypus and his brother. It has been supposed by some, that Antiochus Asiaticus, the last king of Syria, is the same as Antiochus, the first king of Comagene; but there are no good reasons for this opinion. (Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 843.) ANTIOCHUS.

This king is first mentioned about B.C. 69, in the campaign of Lucullus against Tigranes. (Dion Cass. Frug. xxxv. 2.)

After Pompey had deposed Antiochus Asiaticus, the king of Syria, B.C. 63, he marched against Antiochus of Commagene, with whom he shortly afterwards concluded a peace. (B.C. 64.) Pompey added to his dominions Seleucia and the conquests he had made in Mesopotamia. (Appian. Mithr. 106, 114.) When Cicero was governor of Cilicia (B.C. 51), he received from Antiochus intelligence of the movements of the Parthians. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 1, 8, 4.) In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey (B.C. 49), Antiochus assisted the latter with troops. (Caesar, B. C. iii. 5; Appian, B. C. ii. 43.) In B.C. 38, Ventidius, the legate of M. Antonius, after conquering the Parthians, marched against Antiochus, attacked by the great treasures which this king possessed; and Antonius, arriving at the army just as the war was commencing, took it into his own hands, and laid siege to Samosata. He was, however, unable to take the place, and was glad to retire after making peace with Antiochus. (Dion Cass. xlix. 20-22; Plut. Ant. 54.) A daughter of Antiochus married Orodas, king of Parthia. (Dion Cass. xli. 23.) We do not know the exact period of the death of Antiochus, but he must have died before B.C. 51, as his successor Mithridates is mentioned as king of Commagene in that year. (Plut. Ant. 61.)

ANTIOCHUS II. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Commagene, succeeded Mithridates I., and was summoned to Rome by Augustus and executed in B.C. 29, because he had caused the assassination of an ambassador, whom his brother had sent to Rome. Augustus gave the kingdom to Mithridates II., who was then a boy, because his father had been murdered by the king. (Dion Cass. iii. 43, liv. 9.)

ANTIOCHUS III. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Commagene, seems to have succeeded Mithridates II. We know nothing more of him than that he died in A.D. 17. (Tac. Ann. ii. 42.) Upon his death, Commagene became a Roman province (Tac., Ann. ii. 56), and remained so till A.D. 38, when Antiochus Epiphanes was appointed king by Caligula.

ANTIOCHUS IV. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Commagene, succeeded EPIPHANES (Ἐπιφάνης), was apparently a son of Antiochus III., and received his paternal dominion from Caligula in A.D. 38, with a part of Cilicia bordering on the sea-coast in addition. Caligula also gave him the whole amount of the revenues of Commagene during the twenty years that it had been a Roman province. (Dion Cass. lix. 3; Suet. Cal. 16.)

He lived on most intimate terms with Caligula, and he and Herod Agrippa are spoken of as the instructors of the emperor in the art of tyranny. (Dion Cass. lix. 24.) This friendship, however, was not of very long continuance, for he was subsequently deposed by Caligula and did not obtain his kingdom again till the accession of Claudius in A.D. 41. (Dion Cass. lix. 6.) In A.D. 43 his son, also called Antiochus Epiphanes, was betrothed to Drusilla, the daughter of Agrippa. (Joseph, Ant. xix. 9. § 1.) In A.D. 63 Antiochus put down an insurrection of some barbarous tribes in Cilicia, called Cilites. (Tac. Ann. xii. 55.)

In A.D. 55 he received orders from Nero to levy troops to make war against the Parthians, and in the year 59 he served under Corbulon against Tithdates, brother of the Parthian king Vologeses. (xiii.

7, 37.) In consequence of his services in this war, he obtained in the year 61 part of Armenia. (xiv. 26.) He espoused the side of Vespasian, when he was proclaimed emperor in A.D. 70; and he is then spoken of as the richest of the tributary kings. (Tac. Hist. ii. 81.) In the same year he sent forces, commanded by his son Antiochus, to assist Titus in the siege of Jerusalem. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. v. 11. § 3; Tac. Hist. v. 1.) Two years afterwards, A.D. 72, he was accused by Petaus, the governor of Syria, of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, and was in consequence deprived of his kingdom, after a reign of thirty-four years from his first appointment by Caligula. He first retired to Lacedaemon, and then to Rome, where he passed the remainder of his life with his sons Antiochus and Callinicus, and was treated with great respect. (Joseph. B. J. vii. 7.) There are several coins of this king extant, from which we learn, that the name of his wife was Iotape.

In the one annexed he is called ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΤΑΚΕ ΤΩΝ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥΣ. On the reverse a scorpion is represented, surrounded with the foliage of the laurel, and inscribed ΚΟΜΜΑΘΩΝ. (Eckel, iii. p. 255, &c.; comp. Clinton, P. H. iii. p. 343, &c.)

ANTIOCHUS (Ἀντίοχος), an EPIGRAMMATIC poet, one of whose epigrams is extant in the Greek Anthology. (xi. 412.)

[LS.]

ANTIOCHUS HIRAX (Ἀντίοχος Ἠραξ), so called from his grasping and ambitious character was the younger son of Antiochus II., king of Syria. On the death of his father in B.C. 246 Antiochus waged war upon his brother Seleucus Callinicus, in order to obtain Asia Minor for himself as an independent kingdom. This war lasted for many years, but Antiochus was at length entirely defeated, chiefly through the efforts of Attalus, king of Pergamum, who drove him out of Asia Minor. Antiochus subsequently fled to Egypt where he was killed by robbers in B.C. 227. He married a daughter of Zelas, king of Bithynia. (Justin. xxvii. 2, 3; Polyb. iv. 17; Plut. Mor. p. 489, a.; Euseb. Chron. Arm. pp. 346, 347 Clinton, P. H. iii. pp. 311, 312, 413.) Apollo i represented on the reverse of the annexed coin (Eckel, iii. p. 219.)

COIN OF ANTONIOCHUS HIRAX.
ANTIOCHUS.

ANTIOCHUS, a Jurist, who was at the head of the commission appointed to compile the Theodosian Code. He was praecox praedicto and consul. In the 33rd Novell of Theodosius the Younger (a. d. 444), he is spoken of as a person deceased, *illastris memorius Antiochus. He is founded by Jac. Godefroi, in the Prolegomena of his edition of the Theodosian Code (c. 1. § 5) with two other persons of the same name; Antiochus, mentioned by Marcellinus as living in the year 449, and Antiochus, the eunuch, who was *praepositus sancti calcedii. This error was pointed out by Ritter in the 6th volume of his edition of the Theodosian Code, p. 6. [J. T. G.]

ANTIOCHUS (A τιοιχοις), of Aδανδρα, a sceptic philosopher, and a disciple of Aristot. He is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, (ix. 106,110.) [L.S.]

ANTIOCHUS (Αντίοχος), a monk of the monastery of St. Saba, near Jerusalem, flourished at the time of the taking of Jerusalem by the Persians. (A. D. 614.) He wrote, besides other works of little importance, one entitled ανδρεὶς της ἀγαθης τιμης, an epitome of the Christian faith, as contained in scripture, in 130 chapters. This work was first published in Latin by Tilman, Paris, 1648, 8vo, reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1579; Colon. 1618; Louv. 1577. The original Greek was first published by Pronto Ducasus, in the Auctorat Bibl. Patr. Paris, 1624, reprinted in Moreel's Bibl. Patr. Paris, 1644. A considerable fragment of it is printed in Fabricius' Bibl. Graec., t. p. 501. [P. S.]

ANTIOCHUS PA'CCHIUS. [PACCHUS AN- TIOCHIUS.]

ANTIOCHUS PHILOMETOR (Φίλωμετορ) is supposed by some persons to have been a physician, or druggist, who must have lived in or before the second century after Christ; he is the inventor of an antidote against poisonous reptiles, &c., of which the prescription is embodied in a short Greek elegiac poem. The poem is inserted by Galen in one of his works (De Anat. ii. 14, 17, vol. xiv. p. 185, 201), but nothing is known of the history of the author. Others suppose that a physician of this name is not the author either of the poem or the antidote, but that they are connected in some way with the histories which Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was in the habit of using, and the prescription for which he dedicated in verse to Asclepius (Plin. H. N. xx. sp. ult.) or Apollo. (Plin. Valer. De Re Med. iv. 18.) (See Cagnati Variae Observat. ii. 25, p. 174, d. Rom. 1587.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIOCHUS (Αντίοχος). 1. A PHYSICIAN, who appears to have lived at Rome in the second century after Christ. Galen gives a precise account of De Sant. Trea. (v. 5, vol. vi. p. 329) of the god he used to eat and the way in which he used, and tells us that, by paying attention to his diet, &c., he was able to dispense with the use of medicines, and when upwards of eighty years old, used to visit his patients on foot. Aetius (tetrab. serm. iii. c. 114. p. 132) and Paulus Aegina (vii. 8, p. 290) quote a prescription which may perhaps belong to this physician, but he is probably not the person mentioned by Galen under the name Antiochus Philometor.

2. The name of two physicians, saints and martyrs, the first of whom was born of an eques- tian family in Mauritiania. After devoting me years to the study of sacred and profane literature, he finally embraced the medical profes- sion, not for the sake of gain, but merely that he might be useful to mankind. He spent some time in Asia Minor, where he exercised his profession gratuitously, and used to endeavour to convert his patients to Christianity. He then went to Sardis during the persecution against the Christians under Hadrian, about a. D. 120, where he is said to have been cruelly tortured, and at last miraculously delivered by being taken up into heaven. His memory is celebrated by the Romish church on the 13th of December.

3. The other was born at Sebastae in Armenia, and was put to death during the persecution under Diodotian, a. D. 306—311. He is said to have been tortured, and thrown to the wild beasts, and when these refused to touch him, at last beheaded; it is added that milk, instead of blood, issued from his neck, upon which the executioner immediately pronounced himself to be a Christian, and accordingly suffered martyrdom with him. His memory is celebrated by the Greek and Rom- ish churches on the 15th of July. (Marigrolio- gium Romanum; Breviarium, Nomenclator Sanctorum, Professio Medicorum; Ado Sanctorum, Jul. 15, vol. iv. p. 25; Clementia, Menologium Graecorum, vol. ii. p. 168; Fabricius, Bibld. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 64, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIOCHUS (Αντίοχος), bishop of Pharsalos in Palestine, was a Syrian by birth. At the beginning of the 5th century after Christ, he went to Constantinople, where his eloquent preaching attracted such attention, that he was called by some another Chrysostom. He afterwards took part warmly with the enemies of Chrysostom, and died not later than 408 a. D. Besides many sermons, he left a large work against Avarice, which is lost. (Genadon. 20; Theodoret. Dial. ii.; Phot. Cod. 288; Act. Concill. Ephes. iii. p. 116, Lubbe; Catal. Cod. Vindobon. p. 1. No. 65.) [P. S.]

ANTIOCHUS (Αντίοχος), an Athenian sculptor, whose name is inscribed on his statue of Athene in the Villa Lapidus at Rome. (Winkelman's Works, iv. 375, vol. ii. ed. 1629.) [P. S.]

ANTIOCHUS (Αντίοχος), the father of SAE- LEUCUS Nicator, the king of Syria, and the grandfather of Antiochus Soter, was one of Philip's generals. (Justin, xiv. 4.) A genealogical table of his descendants is given under SELEUCIDA.

ANTIOCHUS (Αντίοχος), of SYRACUSE, a son of Xenophanes, is called by Dionysius of Hali- carnassus (Ant. Rom. i. 12) a very ancient histori- an. He lived about the year b. c. 423, and was thus a contemporary of Thucydides and the Peloponnesian war. (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 3.) Respecting his life nothing is known, but his historical works were held in very high esteem by the ancients on account of their accuracy. (Dionys. i. 75.) His two works were: 1. A history of Sicily, in nine books, from the reign of king Cœlius, i. e. from the earliest times down to the year a. c. 424 or 425. (Diod. xii. 71.) It is referred to by Pausanias (x. 11, § 3), Clemens of Alexandria (Protrept. p. 22), and Theodoret. (P. 115.)—2. A history of Italy, which is very frequently referred to by Strabo (v. p. 242, vi. pp. 264, 254, 255, 267, 262, 264, 265, 278), by Dionysius (ll. cc., and i. 22, 35; comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Πηρης; Hesych. s. v. Χαερος; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 14, &c.) The fragments of Antiochus are con-
ANTIOCHUS.

ANTIOCHUS I. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed SOTER (Σωτήρ), was the son of Seleucus Nicator and a Persian lady, Apama. The marriage of his father with Apama was one of those marriages which Alexander celebrated at Susa in b. c. 325, when he gave Persian wives to his generals. This would fix the birth of Antiochus about b. c. 324. He was present with his father at the battle of Ipsus in b. c. 301, which secured for Seleucus the government of Asia. It is related of Antiochus, that he fell sick through love of Stratonic, the young wife of his father, and the daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and that when his father learnt the cause of his illness through his physician Erasistratus, he resigned Stratonic to him, and gave him the government of Upper Asia with the title of king. On the murder of his father in Macedonia in b. c. 299, Antiochus succeeded to the whole of his dominions, and prosecuted his claims to the throne of Macedonia against Antigonus Gonas, but eventually allowed the latter to retain possession of Macedonia on his marrying Phila, the daughter of Seleucus and Stratonic. The rest of Antiochus' reign was chiefly occupied in wars with the Gauls, who had invaded Asia Minor. By the help of his elephants he gained a victory over the Gauls, and received in consequence the surname of Soter (Σωτήρ). He was afterwards defeated by Eumenes near Sardis, and was subsequently killed in a second battle with the Gauls (b. c. 261), after a reign of nineteen years. By his wife Stratonic Antiochus had three children: Antiochus Theos, who succeeded him; Apama, married to Magna; and Stratonic, married to Demetrius II. of Macedonia. (Appian, Syr. 59—65; Justin, xvi. 2; Plut. Demetr. 36, 39; Strab. xiii. p. 629; Paus. i. 7; Julian, Miss. gr. p. 436, a. b.; Lucian, Zephyr, 8; Aelian, H. A. vi. 44; Plin. H. N. vii. 42.) Apollo is represented on the reverse of the annexed coin. (Eckhel. iii. p. 213.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS I.

ANTIOCHUS II. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed THEOS (Θεός), a surname which he derived from the Milesians whom he delivered from their tyrant, Timarchus, succeeded his father in b. c. 261. Soon after his accession he became involved in war with Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, which lasted for many years and greatly weakened the Syrian kingdom. Taking advantage of this weakness, Arsaces was able to establish the Parthian empire in b. c. 250; and his example was shortly afterwards followed by Theodotus, the governor of Bactria, who revolted from Antiochus and made Bactria an independent kingdom. The loss of these provinces induced Antiochus to sue for peace, which was granted (b. c. 250) on condition of his putting away his former wife Laodice and marrying Berenice, a daughter of Ptolemy. This connexion between Syria and Egypt is referred to in the book of Daniel (xi. 6), where by the king of the south we are to understand Egypt, and by the king of the north, Syria. On the death of Ptolemy two years afterwards Antiochus recalled Laodice, but she could not forgive the insult that had been shown her, and, still mistrusting Antiochus, caused him to be murdered as well as Berenice and her son. Antiochus was killed in b. c. 246, after a reign of fifteen years. By Laodice he had four children, Seleucus Callinicus, who succeeded him, Antiochus Hircan, a daughter, Stratonic, married to Mithridates, and another daughter married to Ariarathes. Phylarchus related (Athen. x. p. 438), that Antiochus was much given to wine. (Appian, Syr. 65; Athen. ii. p. 45; Justin, xxvi. i.; Polyb. viii. 50; Val. Max. ix. 14, § 1, extern.; Hieronym. ad Dion. c. 11.) On the reverse of the coin annexed, Heracles is represented with his club in his hand. (Eckhel. iii. p. 216.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS II.

ANTIOCHUS III. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed the GREAT (Μέγας), was the son of Seleucus Callinicus, and succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, b. c. 223, when he was only in his fifteenth year. His first cousin Achaeus, who might easily have assumed the royal power, was of great use to Antiochus at the commencement of his reign, and recovered for the Syrian monarchy all the provinces in Asia Minor, which Attalus, king of Pergamus, had appropriated to himself. But Antiochus was not so fortunate in his eastern dominions. Molo and Alexander, two brothers, who had been appointed to the government of Media and Persis respectively, revolted and defeated the armies sent against them. They were, however, put down in a second campaign, conducted by Antiochus in person, who also added to his dominions the province of Media Atropatene. (b. c. 220.)

On his return from his eastern provinces, Antiochus commenced war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, in order to obtain Coele-Syria Phoenicia, and Palestine, which he maintained belonged to the Syrian kingdom. At first he was completely successful. In b. c. 218, he gained possession of the chief towns of Phoenicia, but in the following year (b. c. 217), he was defeated in a great battle fought at Raphia near Gaza, and concluded in consequence a peace with Ptolemy, by which he ceded the provinces in dispute. He was the more anxious to make peace with Ptolemy, as he wished to direct all his forces against Achaeus, who had revolted in Asia Minor. In one campaign he deprived Achaeus of his conquests, and put him to death when he fell into his hands in b. c. 214 with the Gauls. It was also most unfortunate for him, that when the war actually broke out, he did not give Hannibal any share in the command.

It was not till b. c. 192 that Antiochus, at the earnest request of the Aetolians, at length crossed over into Asia. In the following year (b. c. 191) he was entirely defeated by the Roman consul Aedilius Gabrie at Thermopylae, and compelled to return to Asia. The defeat of his fleet in two sea-fights led him to sue for peace; but the conditions upon which the Romans offered it seemed so hard to him, that he resolved to try the fortune of another campaign. He accordingly advanced to meet Scipio, who had crossed over into Asia, but he was defeated at the foot of Mount Sipylos, near Magnesia. (b. c. 190.) He again sued for peace, which was eventually granted in b. c. 186 on condition of his ceding all his dominions west of Mount Taurus, paying 15,000 Bubonic talents within twelve years, giving up his elephants and ships of war, and surrendering the Roman enemies who had taken refuge at his court. He had, moreover, to give twenty hostages for the due fulfilment of the treaty, and among them his son Antiochus (Epiphanes). To these terms he acceded, but allowed Hannibal to escape.

About this time Antiochus lost Armenia, which he gained as an independent kingdom. He found great difficulty in raising money to pay the Romans, and was thus led to plunder a wealthy temple in Elymais; the people, however, rose against him and killed him in his attempt. (b. c. 187.) The defeat of Antiochus by the Romans, and his death in a 6 fort of his own land, are foretold in the book of Daniel. (xi. 10. 19.) Antiochus was killed in the 52nd year of his age and the 37th of his reign. He married Laodice, daughter of Mithridates, king of Pontus, and had several children. His sons were, 1. Antiochus, who died in his father's lifetime. (Liv. xxxvi. 15.) 2. Argyre, 3. Mithridates, both of whom also probably died before their father. (Liv. xxxviii. 10.) 4. Seleucus Philopator, who succeeded his father. 5. Antiochus Epiphanes, who succeeded his brother Seleucus. The daughters of Antiochus were, 1. Laodice, married to her eldest brother Antiochus. (Appian, Syr. 4.) 2. Cleopatra, betrothed to Ptolemy Epiphanes. 3. Antiochus, married to Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia. 4. One whose name is not mentioned, whom her father offered in marriage to Eumenes. (Appian, Syr. 5.) The coins of Antiochus are the first of those of the Seleucidæ which bear a date. There are two coins preserved of the 112th and 117th years of the reign of the Seleucidæ, that is, the 23rd and 28th years of the reign of Antiochus. (Polyb. lib. v. &c.; Appian, Syr.; Liv. lib. xxxi.—xxxvi.; Justinib. lib. xix.—xxiii.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS III.
Joseph, Ant. xii. 3. § 3; Diod. Soc. pp. 573—

675, ed. West; Strab. xvi. p. 744; Fröhlich, Ambaces, p. 39; Eckhel, iii. p. 226, &c.) Apollo is represented on the reverse of the foregoing coin.

ANTIOCHUS IV. (Ἀντίοχος), king of SYRIA, sumnamed EPIPHANES ('Ἐπιφανής), and on coins Theos (Σέλευκος) also, was the son of Antiochus III., and was given as a hostage to the Romans in b. c.
168. He was released from captivity in b. c. 175 through his brother Seleucus Philopator, who gave his own son Demetrius in his stead. While Antiochus was at Athens on his return to Syria in this year, Seleucus was murdered by Heliodorus, who seized upon the crown. Antiochus, however, with the assistance of Attalus easily expelled the usurper, and ascended the throne in the same year. (b. c. 175.) Demetrius remained at Rome.

Seleucus, the sister of Antiochus, who had been betrothed to Ptolemy Epiphanes, was now dead, and Antiochus therefore claimed the provinces of Coele-Syria and Palestine, which had been given as her dowry. As the Romans were at this time engaged in a war with Persia, king of Macedonia, Antiochus thought it a favourable opportunity to prosecute his claims, and accordingly declared war against Egypt. In four campaigns (b. c. 171—168), he not only obtained possession of the countries to which he laid claim, but almost completely the conquest of Egypt, and was preparing to lay siege to Alexandria, when a Roman embassy commanded him to retire from the country. This command he thought it most prudent to obey, but he still retained possession of Coele-Syria and Palestine. The cruelties which Antiochus perpetrated against the Jews during this war, are recorded in the books of the Mace-bbees, and have rendered his name infamous. He took Jerusalem on his return from his second campaign into Egypt (b. c. 170), and again at the end of the fourth campaign (b. c. 168), and endeavoured to root out the Jewish religion and introduce the worship of the Greek divinities; but this attempt led to a rising of the Jewish people, under Mattathias and his heroic sons the Mace-bbees, which Antiochus was unable to put down.
Lysias, who was sent against them with a large army, was defeated; and Antiochus, who was in the eastern provinces at the time, hastened his return in order to avenge the disgrace which had befallen his arms. On his return he attempted to plunder a temple in Elymais, probably the same as his father had attacked, but was repulsed, and shortly afterwards died at Tabor in Persia, in a state of raving madness, which the Jews and Greeks equally attributed to his sacrilegious crimes.
His subjects gave him the name of Epiphanes (Ἐπιφανής) in parody of Epiphanes (Ἐπιφανής).

He died in b. c. 164, after a reign of 11 years.
He left a son, Antiochus Epipator, who succeeded him, and a daughter, Laodice. (Liv. lib. xii.—

xlv.; Polyb. lib. xxxvi.—xxxv.; Justin, xxxiv. 3; Diod. Soc. pp. 579, 583, &c., ed. West; Appian, Syri. 45, 66; Maccab. lib. i. i.; Joseph. Ant. xii.
3; Hieronym, ad Dan. c. 11; Eckhel, iii. p. 222,
&c.) On the reverse of the foregoing coin Jupiter is represented, holding a small figure of Victory in his right hand, and a spear in his left.

ANTIOCHUS V. (Ἀντίοχος), king of SYRIA, sumnamed EUPATOR (Ἐυπατόρ), was nine years old at his father's death, and reigned nominally for two years. (b. c. 164—162.) He continued the guardianship of the young king, though Antiochus IV. had appointed Philip to this office.
Lysias, accompanied by the young king, continued
the war against the Jews, and laid siege to Jerusalem; but hearing that Philip was marching against him from Persia, he concluded a peace with the Jews. He then proceeded against Philip, whom he conquered and put to death. The Romans, availing themselves of the distracted state of Syria, sent an embassy to enforce the terms of the peace which had been concluded with Antiochus
the Great; but an inscription was excited in consequence of these commands, in which Octavian, the chief of the embassy, was slain. About the same time Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who had remained in Rome up to this time [see Antiochus IV.], appeared in Syria and laid claim to the throne. Lysias and the young king fell into his hands, and were immediately put to death by him, b. c. 162. (Polyb. xxxii. 12, 19;
Appian, Syri. 46, 66; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10; 1 Macc. vi. &c.; 2 Maccab. xiii. &c.; Sic. Phil. ix. 2.)
Apollo is represented on the reverse of the annexed coin, as in those of Antiochus I. and III. The inscription at the foot, ΕΤΙΩΑΙΟΠΩΣ, is partly cut off.

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS IV.

ANTIOCHUS VI. (Ἀντίοχος), king of SYRIA, sumnamed THIEOS (Θεός), and on coins Epiphanes Dionysus (Ἐπιφανής Διόνυσος), was the son of Alexander Balas, king of Syria [see p. 114, b.] and remained in Arabia after his father's death in
b. c. 146. Two years afterwards (b. c. 144) while he was still a youth, he was brought forwa-verse of the annexed coin represents the Dioscuri riding on horseback, and has upon it the year O P, that is, the 170th year of the Seleucidae. (Eckhel, iii. p. 231, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIUCHUS VI.

ANTIQUUS VII. (Ἀρτεσίας), king of Syria, surnamed SIDETES (Σιδητής), from Side in Pamphylia, where he was brought up, (and not from a Syriac word signifying a hunter,) and on coins Euergetes (Εὐεργέτης), was the younger son of Demetrius Soter, and obtained possession of the throne in b.c. 137, after conquering Tryphon, who had held the sovereignty since the murder of Antiochus VI. He married Cleopatra, the wife of his elder brother Demetrius Nicatoi, who was a prisoner in the hand of the Parthians. He carried on war against the Jews, and took Jerusalem after almost a year's siege, in b.c. 133. He then granted them a peace on favourable terms, and next directed his arms against the Parthians. At first he met with success, but was afterwards defeated by the Parthian king, and lost his life in the battle, after a reign of nine years. (b.c. 128.) His son Seleucus was taken prisoner in the same battle. Antiochus, like many of his predecessors, was passionately devoted to the pleasures of the table. He had three sons and two daughters, the latter of whom both bore the name of Laodice. His sons were Antiochus, Seleucus, and Antiochus (Cyzicenus), the last of whom subsequently succeeded to the throne. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 8; 1 Macab. xx., &c.; Justin, xxxvi. 1, xxxvii. 10; Diod. xxxiv. 3 Ed. 1; Athen. x. p. 433, xili. p. 540.)

remained in her hands. (a.c. 125.) At this time the greater part of Syria was in the power of the usurper Alexander Zebina [see p. 127, b.]; but Antiochus, with the assistance of Ptolemy Phlysson, the king of Egypt, whose daughter he married, conquered Alexander and became master of the whole of Syria. Cleopatra then became jealous of him and plotted against his life; but her son compelled her to drink the poison she had prepared for him. (b.c. 120.) For the next eight years Antiochus reigned in peace; but at the end of that time his half-brother, Antiochus Cyzicenus, the son of Antiochus Edeites and their common mother Cleopatra, laid claim to the crown, and a civil war ensued. (a.c. 112.) The remaining history of the Seleucidæ till Syria became a Roman province, is hardly anything else but a series of civil wars between the princes of the royal family. In the first year of the struggle (a.c. 112), Antiochus Cyzicenus became master of almost the whole of Syria, but in the next year (a.c. 111), A. Grypus regained a considerable part of his dominions; and it was then agreed that the kingdom should be shared between them, A. Cyzicenus having Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and A. Grypus the remainder of the province. This arrangement lasted, though with frequent wars between the two kings, till the death of Antiochus Grypus, who was assassinated by Heraclean in b.c. 96, after a reign of twenty-nine years. He left five sons, Seleucus, Philip, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Euceraus, and Antiochus Dionysus. (Justin, xxxix. 1—3; Liv. Egot. 69; Appian, Syr. 69; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 13; Athen. xii. p. 540.) Many of the coins of Antiochus Grypus have the head of Antiochus on one side, and that of his mother Cleopatra on the other. The one annexed must have been struck after his mother's death. (Eckhel, iii. p. 238, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIUCHUS VIII.

ANTIQUUS IX. (Ἀρτεσίας), king of Syria surnamed CYZICENUS (Κυζικένος) from Cyzicus, where he was brought up, and on coins Philopator (Φιλοπάτωρ), reigned over Coele-Syria and Phoenicia from b.c. 111 to 96, as is stated in the preceding article. On the death of his brother, Antiochus VIII., he attempted to obtain possession of the whole of Syria; but his claims were resisted by Seleucus, the eldest son of Antiochus VIII, whom he was killed in battle, B. C. 93. He left behind him a son, Antiochus Eudemos, who succeeded to the throne. (Justin, Appian, Joseph. xxi. 86; I. c. 219, &c.) The reverse of the foregoing coin is the same as that of Antiochus VII.

ANTIOCHUS VIII. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed EUSEBES (Εὐσέβης), and on coins. Philopator (Philætor) also, succeeded to the throne on the death of his father Antiochus IX. B. C. 95. He defeated Seleucus, who conquered his father, and compelled him to fly into Cilicia, where he perished; but he then had to contend with the next two brothers of Seleucus, Philip and Antiochus Epiphanes, the latter of whom assumed the title of king, and is known as the eleventh king of Syria of this name. In a battle fought near the Orontes, Antiochus X. defeated Philip and Antiochus XI, and the latter was drowned in the river. The crown was now assumed by Philip, who continued to prosecute the war assisted by his brother, Demetrius Eucerus. The Syrians, worn out with these civil broils, offered the kingdom to Tigranes, king of Armenia, who accordingly took possession of Syria in B. C. 83, and ruled over it still he was defeated by Lucullus in B. C. 69. The time of the death of Antiochus X. is uncertain. He appears, however, to have fallen in battle against the Parthians, before Tigranes obtained possession of Syria. (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 18. § 4.) According to some accounts he survived the reign of Tigranes, and returned to his kingdom after the conquest of the latter by Lucullus (Euseb. p. 192; Justin. xi. 2); but these accounts ascribe to Antiochus X. what belongs to his son Antiochus XIII. (See Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 338, 340.) Jupiter is represented on the reverse of the annexed coin as in that of Antiochus IV.

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS X.

ANTIOCHUS XI. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed EPIPTIANES (Ἐπιπτιανῆς), was the son of Antiochus VIII, and is spoken of under Antiochus X.

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS XI.

ANTIOCHUS XII. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed DIONYSUS (Διόνυσος), and on coins Philopator Callinicus (Πhilætor Callinicus) also, the youngest son of Antiochus VIII, assumed the title of king after his brother Demetrius had been taken prisoner by the Parthians. He fell in battle against Areatus, king of the Arabians. (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 15. § 1; Eckhel, iii. p. 246, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS XII.

ANTIOCHUS XIII, king of Syria, surnamed ASIATICUS (Ἀσιατικός), and on coins Dionysus Philopator Callinicus (Διόνυσος Φιλάτωρ Καλλίνικος), was the son of Antiochus X. and Seleene, an Egyptian princess. He required to Rome during the time that Tigranes had possession of Syria, and passed through Syria on his return during the government of Verres, (B. C. 73-71.) On the defeat of Tigranes in B. C. 69, Lucullus allowed Antiochus Asiaticus to take possession of the kingdom; but he was deprived of it in B. C. 65 by Pompey, who reduced Sicily to a Roman province. In this year the Seleucidae ceased to reign. (Appian, Syr. 49, 70; Cic. in For. iv. 27, 28, 30; Justin. xi. 2.) Some writers suppose, that Antiochus Asiaticus afterwards rejoined as king of Comagene, but there are not sufficient reasons to support this opinion. (Antiochus I, king of Comagene.)

ANTION (Ἀντίον), a son of Periphas and Aristoxene, and husband of Perinna, by whom he became the father of Ixion. (Diod. iv. 69; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 39.)

ANTIOPE (Ἀντίόπη). 1. A daughter of Nycteus and Polyxo (Apollod. iii. 5. § 5, 10. § 1), or of the river god Asopus in Boeotia. (Olyss. xi. 290; Apoll. Rhod. i. 735.) She became by Zeus the mother of Amphion and Zeuus. [ANTION.] Dionysus threw her into a state of madness on account of the vengeance which her sons had taken on Dirce. In this condition she wandered about through Greece, until Phoenus, the grandson of Sisyphus, cured and married her. She was buried with Phoenus in one common tomb (Paus. ix. 17. § 4.)

2. An Amaean, a sister of Hippolyte, who married Theseus. (Paus. i. 3. § 4. 11. § 7.) According to Servius (ad Aen. vi. 661), she was a daughter of Hippolyte. Diodorus (iv. 16) states, that Theseus received her as a present from Hercules.
When subsequently Attica was invaded by the Amazons, Antiope fought with Theseus against them, and died the death of a heroine by his side. (Comp. Dion. iv. 28; Plut. Thea. 26, 27.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 241) Antiope was a daughter of Ares, and was killed by Theseus himself in consequence of an oracle.

3. A daughter of Pylon or Pylion, was married to Eurytus, by whom she became the mother of the Argonauts Iphitus and Clytus. She is also called Antiope. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 68; Hygin. Fab. 14, with Muncker's note.)

4. A daughter of Acadus, by whom Poseidon beget Boeotus and Hellen. (Hygin. Fab. 157; Diod. ii. 65, and 68, who makes her one of these two heroes Ares.) [Azo.]

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 7, § 8, and in Serv. ad Aen. vi. 46, though Servius seems to confound Antiope with Antea, the wife of Proetus. [L.S.]

ANTIPATER, a celebrated chaser of silver. (Plin. xxxiii. 55.)

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), a writer on the interpretation of dreams (Onoeirocritica), mentioned by Artemidorus. (Onoe. iv. 64.)

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), of Acantides, a Greek grammatician of uncertain date (Ptolem. Hep. op. Phot. Cod. 190; Eustath. ad Hom. Od. xi. p. 458), who is probably the same as the one mentioned by the Scholiast on Aristophanes. (An. 1402.) [L.S.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), an Astrolologer or mathematician, who wrote a work upon genealogies, in which he endeavoured to explain man's fate, not from the circumstances under which he was born, but from those under which he had been conceived. (Vitruv. ix. 7.)

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), bishop of Bostra in Arabia, flourished about 460 a. D. His chief work was Αντίφασις, a reply to Paphilus's Apology for Origen, some fragments of which are contained in the Acts of the 2nd council of Nice. He also wrote a homily on John the Baptist, and some other discourses. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. p. 518; xxe, Hist. litt. sæcl. annum 460.) [P.S.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), the father of Anabasianus, an officer in high favour with Philip of Macedon (Just. ix. 4), who after his victory at Cheronae, b. c. 338, selected him to conduct to Athens the bones of the Athenians who ad fallen in the battle. (Just. i. c. Polyb. x. 10.) He joined Parmenio in the ineffectual advice to Alexander the Great to set out on his Asiatic expedition till he had provided for his succession to the throne (Diod. xvii. 16); and, as the king's departure, b. c. 334, he was left in Macedonia. (Diod. xvii. 17; Ar. Aemab. p. 12, n.) In b. c. 331 Antipater suppressed the Thracian rebellion under Memnon (Diod. xvii. 2), and also brought the war with the Spartans under Agis III. to a successful termination. (See 72, b.) It is with reference to this event that the first find any indication of Alexander's jealousy of Antipater—a feeling which was not improbably induced or fostered by the representations of lympias, and perhaps by the known sentiments of Antipater himself. (Curit. v. i. § 17, &c. x. 10. 14; Plut. Ages. p. 604, b., Alex. pp. 586, c., 5b, f.; Perizon, ad Aed. V. H. xii. 16; Thirlw. r. Hist. vol. vii. p. 89; but see Plat. Phoc. p. 9, e.; Ael. V. H. i. 25.) Whether, however, from jealousy or from the necessity of guarding against the evil consequences of the dissensions between Olympias and Antipater, the latter was ordered to lead into Asia the fresh troops required by the king, b. c. 324, while Craterus, under whom the discharged veterans were sent home, was appointed to the regency in Macedonia. (Arr. vii. p. 155; Pseudo-Curt. x. 4, § 9, &c.; Just. xii. 12.) The story which ascribes the death of Alexander, b. c. 323, to poison, and implicates Antipater and even Aristotle in the plot, is perhaps sufficiently refuted by its own intrinsic absurdity, and is set aside as false by Arrhim and Plutarch. (Diod. xvii. 11, 332; Plut. Per. 333; Aemab. xiii. 7; Diod. xiv. 8; Arr. xii. p. 167; Plut. Alex. ad fin.; Liv. vii. 8); Diod. xix. 11; Athen. x. p. 434, c.) On Alexander's death, the regency of Macedonia was assigned to Antipater, and he forthwith found himself engaged in a war with a strong confederacy of Greek states with Athens at their head. At first he was defeated by Leosthenes, and besieged in Lamia, whence he even sent an embassy to Athens with an unsuccessful application for peace. (Diod. xviii. 3, 12, 18; Paus. l. 25; Just. xiii. 5; Plut. Phoc. p. 752, b.; Demosth. p. 850, c.) The approach of Leosthenes obliged the Athenians to raise the siege, and the death of that general, who was defeated by Antipater near Pleuron (Desme- themes), and who was in league against the regent with Olympias, was far more an advantage than a loss to Antipater. (Diod. xviii. 14, 15; Just. xiii. 5; Plut. Eun. p. 584, d. e.) Being joined by Craterus, he defeated the confederates at Crunum, and succeeded in dissolving the league by the prudence and moderation with which he at first used his victory. Athens herself was obliged to purchase peace by the abolition of democracy and the admission of a garrison into Mumychia, the latter of which conditions might surely have enabled Antipater to dispense with the destruction of Demosthenes and the chiefs of his party. (Diod. xviii. 16-18; Plut. Phoc. pp. 753, 754, Demosth. p. 556; Paus. vii. 10; Thirlw. Gr. Hist. vol. vii. p. 187, note 1; Bockh. Publ. Ecol. of Athens, i. 7, iv. 3.) Returning now to Macedonia, he gave his daughter Phila in marriage to Craterus, with whom at the end of the year b. c. 323, he invaded the Aetolians, the only party in the Lamiot war who had not yet submitted. (Diod. xviii. 24.) But the intelligence brought him by Antigonus of the treachery of Perdiccas, and of his intention of putting away Nicerca, Antipater's daughter, to marry Cleopatra, compelled him to pass over to Asia; where, leaving Craterus to act against Rumenes, he himself hastened after Perdiccas, who was marching towards Egypt against Ptolemy. (Diod. xix. 23, 29-33; Plut. Eun. pp. 585, 586; Just. xiii. 6.) On the murder of Perdiccas, the supreme regency devolved on Antipater, who, at Tripædenia in Syria, successfully maintained his power against Eurydeus, the queen. Marching into Lydia, he avoided a battle with Eumenes, and he on his side was dissuaded from attacking Antipater by Cleopatra, who wished to give the regent no cause of complaint. Towards the close of the year 321, he returned into Europe, taking with him the king and queen, and leaving Antigonus to prosecute the war with Eumenes. (Diod. xviii. 39, 40; Plut. Eun. p. 588, a.) It was during the mortal illness of Antipater, b. c. 320, that Demades was sent to him from Athens to endeavour to obtain the removal of the garrison from Mynychia, and was put to death for his treacherous correspondence with Perdiccas. Antipater left the regency to Polyperchon, to the exclusion of his own son Cassander. (Plut. Proc. p. 755, Dom. ad fin.; Arr. ap. Phot. p. 70, a.; Diod. xviii. 48.) [E. E.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντιπατήρ), second son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, by Thessalonica, sister of Alexander the Great. Soon after the death of Cassander (n. c. 296), his eldest son Philip also died of consumption (Paus. ix. 7; Plut. Demetr. 903, f.), and great dissensions ensued between Antipater and his younger brother Alexander for the government. Antipater, believing that Alexander was favoured by his mother, put him to death. The young prince, however, applied for aid at once to Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorcetes. Pyrrhus arrived first, and, exacting from Alexander considerable portion of Macedonia as his reward, obliged Antipater to fly before him. According to Plutarch, Lysimachus, king of Thrace, Antipater's father-in-law, attempted to dissuade Pyrrhus from further hostilities by a forged letter purporting to come from Ptolemy Soter. The forgery was detected, but Pyrrhus seems notwithstanding to have withdrawn after settling matters between the brothers; soon after which Demetrius arrived. Justin, who says nothing of Pyrrhus, tells us, that Lysimachus, fearing the increase of Demetrius, advised a reconciliation between Antipater and Alexander. On the murder of Alexander by Demetrius, the latter appears, according to Plutarch, to have been made king of all Macedonia, to the exclusion at once of Antipater. According to Justin, Lysimachus conciliated Demetrius by putting him in possession of Antipater's portion of the kingdom, and murdered Antipater, who appears to have fled to him for refuge. The murder seems, from Didymus, to have been owing to the instigation of Demetrius. (Plut. Pyrr. p. 386, Demetr. pp. 903, 906; Just. xvi. 1, 2; Diod. Sic. xxi. 80, c. 7.) [E. E.]

ANTIPATER, L. COELIUS, a Roman jurist and historian. Pompianus (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 40) considers him more an orator than a jurist; Cicero, on the other hand, prizes him much as a jurist who was an orator or historian. (De Off. ii. 12; Gell. ii. 2, 1; Brut. vi. 26.) He was a contemporary of C. Gracchus (n. c. 125); L. Crassus, the orator, was his pupil. He was the first who endeavoured to impart to Roman history the ornaments of style, and to make it more than a mere chronicle of events, but his dictation was rather vehement and high-sounding than elegant and polished. He is not to be confounded with Coelius Sabinus, the Coelius of the Digest. None of his juridical writings have been preserved. He wrote a history of the second Punic war, and composed Anales, which were epitomized by Brutus. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6.) The history of the second Punic war was perhaps only a part of the Anales. Antipater followed the Greek history of Silenus Cerasius. (Cic. de Div. i. 24, 48), and occasionally borrowed from the Origines of Catius Censorius. (Gell. x. 24; Macrobr. Saturn. i. 4, extd.) The emperor Hadrian is reported to have preferred him as an historian to Sallust (Spartianus, Hadrian. c. 16); by Valerius Maximus (i. 7) he is designated auctor Romanorum historiarum; and he is occasionally quoted by Livy, who sometimes, with respectful consideration, dissent from his authority. It is manifest, however, from Cicero and Val. Maximus, that he was fond of relating dreams and portents. Orelli (Gnomast. Cic.) refers to the dissertation on Antipater by Euvius Ant. Nauta and G. Groen van Prinsterer, inserted in the Annals of the Academy of Leyden for 1821. His fragments, several of which are preserved in Nonius, are to be found appended to the editions of Sallust by Wasse, Corte, and Havercamp; and also in Krause's Vitae et Fragmenta vir. Hist. Rom. p. 182, &c. [J. T. G.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντιπατήρ), of Cyrene, one of the disciples of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy. (Diog. Laert. ii. 86.) The latter says, of him (whom he knew well), that he was blind, but knew how to console himself by saying that darkness was not without its pleasures. [L. S.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντιπατήρ), tyrant or prince of Derbe. Amyntas, the Lycaonian chieftain, murdered him and seized his principality. [Amyntas, No. 6.] He was a friend of Cicero's, one of whose letters, of uncertain date, is addressed on his behalf to Q. Philippus, proconsul of the province of Asia, who was offended with Antipater and held his sons in his power. (Simp. xii. 392; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 73.) [E. E.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντιπατήρ), father of Heron of the Great, was, according to Josephus, the son of a noble Idumaean of the same name, to whom the government of Idumea had been given by Alexander Jannaeus and his wife Alexandra, and at their court the young Antipater was brought up. The two other accounts which we have of his parentage appear to be false. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. i. § 8; Nicol. Dumas, op. Joseph. l. c. African. ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 6, 7; Phot. Biblioth. n. 76, 238.) In n. c. 65, he persuaded Hyrcanus to take refuge from his brother Aristobulus II. with Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, by whom according to an unsuccessful attempt was made to replace Hyrcanus on the throne. (Ant. xiv. 2, Bell. Jud. i. 6, § 2.) In n. c. 64, Antipater again supported the cause of this prince before Pompey in Cœle-Syria. (Ant. xiv. 3. § 2.) In the ensuing year, Jerusalem was taken by Pompey, and Aristobulus was deposed; and henceforth we find Antipater both zealously adhering to Hyrcanus, and labouring to ingratiate himself with the Romans. His services to the latter, especially against Alexander son of Aristobulus, and in Egypt against Archelaus (n. c. 57 and 56), were favourably regarded by Sannus and Gabinius, the lieutenants of Pompey; his active zeal under Mithridates of Pergamus in the Alexandrian war (n. c. 48) was rewarded by Julius Caesar with the gift of Roman citizenship; and on Caesar's coming into Syria (s. c. 47), Hyrcanus was confirmed by him in the high-priesthood through Antipater's influence, notwithstanding the complaints of Antigonus son of Aristobulus, while Antipater himself was appointed procurator c. Judaœa. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 5, §§ 1, 2, 4; §§ 2-4; Bell. Jud. i. 6, §§ 1, 3, 7, 9; §§ 9-5.) After Caesa had left Syria to go against Pharnaces, Antipate set himself to provide for the quiet settlement of the country under the existing government, an appointed his sons Phasmatus and Herod to governors respectively of Jerusalem and Galile (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, §§ 1, 2, Bell. Jud. i. 10, § 4.) His care for the peace and good order of the province was further shewn in n. c. 46, when he diordered Herod from his purpose of attacking Hyrc made him his private secretary. The emperor had such a high opinion of him, that he raised him to the consular dignity, and afterwards made him praefect of Bithynia. But as Antipater used his sword too freely, he was deprived of his office, and retired to his native place, where he died at the age of 88, it is said of voluntary starvation. Philostratus says that he wrote a life and exploits of the emperor Severus, but not a fragment of it is extant. (Phil. Phil. Soph. iii. 24, 25. 34, 46, 54. 58; Gaius, De Tham. ad Ptolem. ii. p. 468; Eutoc. p. 57.)

ANTIPATER, the name of at least two physicians. I. The author of a work Περὶ Βούγης, "On the Soul," of which the second book is quoted by the Scholiast on Homer (Π. λ. 115. p. 306, ed. Bcker); Cramer, Anecd. Graec. Paris. vol. iii. p. 14), in which he said that the soul increased, diminished, and at last perished with the body; and which may very possibly be the work quoted by Diogenes Laertius (vii. 157), and commonly attributed to Antipater of Tarsus. If he be the physician who is said by Galen (De Med. Polit. iv. 7, vol. x. p. 584) to have belonged to the sect of the Methodi, he must have lived in or after the first century A.D.; and this date will agree very well with the fact of his being quoted by Andromachus (np. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. loc. cii. i. 1, 2. vol. xii. p. 630, vol. xiii. p. 128), Sarbonius Largus (De Compos. Medicam. med. sec. loc. med. c. 167, p. 221), and Caelius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Chron. ii. 13, p. 404.) His prescriptions are frequently quoted with approbation by Galen and Aetius, and the second book of his "Epistles" is mentioned by Caelius Aurelianus. (l.c.)

2. A contemporary of Galen at Rome in the second century after Christ, of whose death and the morbid symptoms that preceded it, a very interesting account is given by that physician. (De Locis Afflic. iv. 11, vol. viii. p. 293.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), of Sidon, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, appears, from a passage of Cicero (de Offt. iii. 50), to have been contemporary with Q. Cetulius (con- sul b. c. 109), and with Crassus (quaeator in Macedonia b. c. 108). The many minute references made to him by Melanger, who also wrote his epigrams, would seem to show that Antipater was an elder contemporary of this poet, who is known to have flourished in the 17th Olympiad. From these circumstances he may be placed at b. c. 108-100. He lived to a great age. (Plin. vii. 52; Cic. de Pal. iii. 1. Vol. Mai. i. 9. 16, ext.; Jacobs, Ant. xiv. 119, 120, who wrote a history of [P. S.].

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, was the disciple and successor of Diogenes and the teacher of Pamphilus, n. c. 144 nearly. (Cic. de Divin. ii. 3, de Off. iii. 12.) Plutarch speaks of him with Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus, as one of the principal Stoic philosophers (de Stoic. Repugnat. p. 144), and Cicero mentions him as remarkable for atuteness. (De Off. iii. 12.) Of his personal history nothing is known, nor would the few extant notices of his philosophical opinions be a sufficient ground for any great reputation, if it were not for the testimony of ancient authors to his merit. He seems to have taken the lead during his lifetime in the disputes constantly recurring between his own school and the Academy, although he is said to have felt himself so unequal an antagonist to his contemporary Crates, as in public dis-
ANTIPHANES, a Scopite philosopher, and a contemporary of Cato the Younger, whose friend Antipater is said to have been when Cato was yet a young man. (Plut. Cato, Min. 4.) He appears to be the same as the Anti- pater of Tyre mentioned by Strabo. (xvi. p. 757.)

2. Of Tyre, likewise a Stoic philosopher, but unquestionably of a later date than the former, though Vossius (de Hist. Gr. p. 392, ed. Westermann) confounds the two. He lived after, or was at least younger than, Panneustis, and Gkileo (de Gr. ii. 24), in speaking of him, says, that he died lately at Athens, which must mean shortly before b.c. 45. From this passage we must infer that Antipater wrote a work on Duties (de Officiis), and Diogenes Laëritius (vili. 139, 140, 143, 146) refers to a work of Anti- pater on the Universe (φασιν κόσμου), of which he quotes the eighth book.

ANTIPHANES (Ἀντιφάνης), of Argos, a sculptor, the disciple of Pericleitus, and teacher of Cleon. Since Cleon flourished b.c. 380, Antiphanes may be placed at 400 B.C. Paussian mentions several of his works, which were at Delphi, especially a horse in bronze. (Pausan. v. 17, x. 6.)

ANTIPHANES (Ἀντίφανος), of Beroea in Thrace, a Greek writer on marvellous and incredible things. (Ἀντίφανος, Synnyamus Chius, 657, &c.) From the manner in which he is mentioned by Strabo (i. p. 47, ii. pp. 102, 104; comp. Polyb. xxxii. 12), it would seem that he wrote his sto-ANTIPHILUS. Phot. Cod. 166, p. 112, Babker, as the author of marvellous stories respecting distant countries: he is spoken of in the preceding article.

Suidas mentions "another Antiphilus, an Athenian comic poet, later than Panaceus," who is mentioned by no other writer, unless he be the Antiphilus who wrote a work Περὶ Ἐρασάων. (Suidas, s. v. Νάνων; Athen. xiii. 886.)

Antiphilus Carystius, who is called by Eudoxia (p. 61) a comic poet, was really a tragedian, contemporary with Thesippus. (Suidas, s. v.) [P. S.]

ANTIPHANES (Ἀντιφάνης), an Epigrammatist poet, several of whose epigrams are still extant in the Greek anthology. He lived after the time of Mesager (i.e. after B.C. 100), but before the time of Philip of Thessalonica, that is, about the reign of Augustus; for Philip incorporated the epigrams of Antiphilus in his Anthology, by which means they have come down to our time. (Jacobs, ad Anth. Gr. xiii. p. 850, &c.) [L. S.]

ANTIPHANES (Ἀντιφάνης), a physician of Delos, who is quoted by Caesius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chronic. iv. 8, p. 537), and Galen (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. v. 5, vol. xii. p. 877), and must therefore have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ. He is mentioned by St. Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. ii. 1, p. 140) as having said, that the sole cause of diseases in man was the too great variety of his food. [W. A. G.]

ANTIPLUS. [Lacoonis.]

ANTIPLUS (Ἀντιπληθ), a king of the Lacrymalians in Sicily. When on the seventh day after leaving the island of Aeolus Odyssey lands on the coast of the Lacrymalians, and sent three of his men to explore their country; one of them was immediately seized and devoured by Antiphanes, for the Lacrymalians were more like giants than men. They now made an attack upon the ships of Odysseus, who escaped with only one vessel. (Hom. Od. x. 80-162.) Two other mythical heroes of this name occur in Od. xv. 242, &c.; Virg. Aen. ix. 698. [L. S.]

ANTIPHIUS (Ἀντίφημις), the Rhodian, son of Gela, b.c. 689. The colony was composed of Rhodians and Cretans, the latter led by Antimachus the Cretan (Thuc. vi. 4, and Schol. ad Pind. Od. i. 14), the former chiefly from Lindus (Herod. vii. 153), and to this town Antiphilus himself (Philosthenus, ap. Athen. vii. 397, &c.) belonged. From the Elymn. Magn. (s. v. Γέας) and Aristarchus of Memphis, by Pausanias (s. v. Γέας) it appears the tale ran, that he and his brother leucis, the founder of Phaselis, were, when at Delphi, suddenly bid to go forth, one eastward, he westward; and from his laughing at the unexpected response, the city took its name. From Isamnias (viii. 46, § 2) we hear of his taking the Scamian town of Omphale, and carrying off from it a statue made by Daeadas. Muller (Dor. i. 6, § 6) considers him a mythical person. (See also, Coam. ad Pind. p. 115; Clinton, F. H. ii. 689; Harnack, Pol. Antiq. § 85; Gellner, s. Orig. Syrac. p. 265.) [A. H. C.]

ANTIPHILUS, an architect, built, in connexion with Posthales and Megacles, the treasury the Carchamnian at Olympia (Paus. vi. 19, § 4); is age and country are unknown. [P. S.]

ANTIPHILUS (Ἀντίφηλος), an Athenian merchant, was appointed as the successor of Leocles in the Laminian war, b.c. 324, and gained a victory over Leocrates. (Diod. xviii. 12-15; Plut. Phocian. 24.)

ANTIPHILUS (Ἀντίφηλος), of Byzantium, a writer of epigrams, who lived about the time of the emperor Nero, as appears from one of his epigrams in which he mentions the favour conferred by that emperor upon the island of Rhodes. (Antol. Gr. ix. n. 178; comp. Tacit. Annal. xii. 58.) The number of his epigrams still extant is upwards of forty, and most of them are superior in conception and style to the majority of these compositions. Reiske, in his notes on the Anthology of Cephalus (p. 191), was led, by the difference of style in some of the poems bearing the name of Antiphilus, to suppose that there were two or three poets of this name, and that their productions were all by mistake ascribed to the one poet of Byzantium. But there is not sufficient ground for such an hypothesis. (Jacobs, ad Anthol. Gr. xiii. p. 851, &c.) [L. S.]

ANTIPHILUS, of Egypt, a very distinguished painter, was the pupil of Ctesidemus, and the contemporary and rival of Apelles. (Lucian, de Catulent. lix. 1-5.) Having been born in Egypt, he went when young to the court of Macedonia, where he painted portraits of Philip and Alexander. The latter part of his life was spent in Egypt, under the patronage of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, whom he painted hunting. He flourished, therefore, during the latter half of the 4th century B.C. Concerning his false accusation against Apelles before Ptolemy, see APELLES.

The quality in which he most excelled is thus described by Quintilian, who mentions him among the greatest painters of the age of Philip and Alexander (xii. 10, § 6): "faciliter Antiphilus, consciens visibilibus, quas 'φαντασίας vocat," which expressions seem to describe a light and airy elegance. In the list of his works given by Pliny are some which answer exactly in subject to the "φαντασία" of Quintilian. (Plin. xxxv. 37, 40.) Varro (R. R. iii. 2, § 5, Schm.) names him with Lyssipus. [P. S.]

ANTIphon. [Antiphanes.] 1. The most ancient among the ten Attic orators contained in the Alexandrine canon, was a son of Sophilus the Sophist, and born at Bithynia in Attica in b.c. 489, (Plut. Vit. Α. Oration. p. 632, b.; Philost. Vit. Soph. i. 15, § 1; Phot. Cod. p. 483; Suid. s. v.; Endec. p. 58.) He was a man of eminent talent and a firm character (Thucyd. viii. 66; Plut. N. C. 6), and is said to have been educated partly by his father and partly by Pythodorus, while according to others he owed his education to none but himself. When he was a young man, the fame of Gorgias was at its height. The object of Gorgias' sophistical school of oratory was more to dazzle and captivate the hearer by brilliancy of diction and rhetorical artifices than to produce a solid conviction based upon sound arguments; it was, in short, a school for show-speeches, and the practical purposes of oratory in the courts of justice and the popular assembly lay beyond its sphere. Antiphon perceived this deficiency, and formed a higher and more practical view of the art to which he devoted himself; that is, he wished to produce conviction in the minds of the hearers by means of a thorough examination of the subjects proposed, and this not with a view to the narrow limits of the school, but to the courts and the assembly. Hence the ancients call Antiphon the inventor of ANTIPHON.

The want of freshness and gracefulness is very obvious in the orations still extant, but more especially in those actually spoken by Antiphon's clients. (No. 1, 14, and 15.) His language is pure and correct, and in the three orations mentioned above, of remarkable clearness. The treatment and solutions in the fourth are always striking and interesting. (Dionys. de Verb. Comp. 10, de Isocr. 20.)

The ancient public orator, or state that he raised it to a higher position. (Philost. Vit. Soph. i. 15, § 2; Hermog. de For. Orat. iii. p. 498; comp. Quintil. iii. 1, § 1; Diod. ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 363.) Antiphon was thus the first who regulated practical eloquence by certain theoretical laws, and he opened a school in which he taught rhetoric. Thucydides, the historian, in his life of Antiphon, speaks of his master with the highest esteem, and many of the excellencies of his style are ascribed by the ancients to the influence of Antiphon. (Schol. ad Thuc. iv. p. 312, ed. Bekker; comp. Dionys. Hal. de Comp. Verb. 10.) At the same time, Antiphon occupied himself with writing speeches for others, who delivered them in the courts of justice; and as he was the first who received money for such orations—a practice which subsequently became quite general—he was severely attacked and ridiculed, especially by the comic writers, Plato and Pelsander. (Philostr. l. c.; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 333, c.) These attacks, however, may also have been owing to his political opinions, for he belonged to the oligarchical party. This unpopularity, together with his own reserved character, prevented his ever appearing as a speaker either in the courts or the assembly; and the only time he spoke in public was in b.c. 411, when he defended himself against the charge of treachery. (Thuc. viii. 68; Lys. a. Eurip. p. 427; Cic. Brut. 13.)

The history of Antiphon's career as a politician is for the most part involved in great obscurity, which is in a great measure owing to the fact that Antiphon the orator is frequently confounded by ancient writers with Antiphon the interpreter of signs, and Antiphon the tragic poet. Plutarch (l. e.; and Philostratus (Vit. Soph. i. 15, § 1) mention some events in which he was engaged, but Thucydides seems to have known nothing about them. The only part of his public life of which the detail is known, is that connected with the revolution of b.c. 411, and the establishment of the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred. The person chiefly instrumental in bringing it about was Pelsander; but, according to the express testimony of Thucydides, Antiphon was the man who had done everything to prepare the change, and had drawn up the plan of it. (Comp. Philostr. l. c.; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 332, f.) On the overthrow of the oligarchical government six months after its establishment, Antiphon was brought to trial for having attempted to negotiate peace with Sparta, and was condemned to death. His speech in defence of himself is stated by Thucydides (viii. 69; comp. Cic. Brut. 12) to have been the ablest that was ever made by any man in similar circumstances. Antiphon was one of the seven orators, and is referred to by Harpocration (s. e. σταταστήρας), who calls it Μήγα τελευταίας. His property was confiscated, his house razed to the ground, and on the site of it a tablet was erected with the inscription “Antiphon the traitor.” His remains were not allowed to be buried in Attic ground, his children, as well as any one who should adopt them, were punished with atonia. (Plut. l. c.)

As an orator, Antiphon was highly esteemed by the ancients. Hermogenes (de For. Orat. p. 497) says of his orations, that they were clear, true in the expression of feeling, and faithful to nature, and consequently convincing. Others say, that his orations were beautiful but not graceful, or that they had something austere or antique about them. (Dionys. de Verb. Comp. 10, de Isocr. 20.)
2. A tragic poet, whom Plutarch (Vita. X. OraL, p. 833), Philostratus (Vit. Soph. i. 18. § 3), and others, confounded with the Attic orator Antiphon, who was put to death at Athens in b. c. 411. Now Antiphon the poet lived at Symnae, at the court of the elder Dionysius, who did not assume the tyranny till the year 411; that is, five years after the death of the Attic orator. The poet Antiphon is said to have written dramas in conjunction with the tyrant, who is not known to have shown his passion for writing poetry until the latter period of his life. These circumstances alone, if there were not many others, would shew that the orator and the poet were two different persons, and that the latter must have survived the former many years. The poet was put to death by the tyrant, according to some accounts, for having used a sarcastic expression in regard to tyranny, or, according to others, for having imprudently censured the tyrant's compositions. (Plut., Philostr. ii. 40; Aristot. Rhet. ii. 60.) We still know the titles of five of Antiphon's tragedies: viz. Melanger, Andromache, Medea, Jason, and Philotheus. (Bode, Gesch. der Drama, Dicht. d. Hellen, i. p. 534, &c.)

3. Of Athens, a sophist and an epic poet, Suidas, who says that he was named λυρούσταγεος, and others state, that he occupied himself with the interpretation of signs. He wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams, which is referred to by Artemidorus, Cicero, and others. Artemid. Oneirocr. ii. 14; Cic. de Divin. i. 20, i. 70.) He is unquestionably the same person as the Antiphon who was an opponent of Socrates, and who is mentioned by Xenophon Menon, i. 6. § 1; compare Diog. Laer. ii. 48; hence, Contr. 9), and must be distinguished from the rhetorician Antiphon of Rhannus, as well as from the tragic poet of the same name, although he himself expressly appears to have been doubtful as to who the Antiphon mentioned by Xenophon really was. (Ruhnken, Opuscula, i. pp. 148, 169, &c., ed. Friedemann.) Not a line of his oems is extant.

4. The youngest brother of Plato, whose name in philosophy has immortalized in his dialogue Parmenides." (Plut. de Frat. Amor. p. 484, f.) his father of Plato's wife was likewise called Antiphon. (Plat. de Genio Sorat.)

5. An Athenian, and a contemporary of the Sophists. For some offence his name was placed from the list of Athenian citizens, when he went to Philip of Macedon. He edging himself to the king, that he would detach from that he arranged for his safety in the Parthenon; it he arrived there with this intention, he was arrested by Demeothenes and accused of treachery. He was found guilty, and put to death in b. c. 342. (Dem. de Coron. p. 271; echow, de Ascheanis Orat. Vito, p. 73, &c.; Ascheanis, p. 38.)

6. A Greek sophist, who lived before the time of Aristotle, and whose opinions respecting the admixture of the circle, and the genesis of things, mentioned by this philosopher. (Aristot. Schol. Eth. i. 10, Phys. i. 2, ii. 1.)

7. A Greek author, who wrote an account of men distinguished for virtue (πειρατον ὁ ἄγας πρωτασώματων), one of whom was Pythagoras. (Diog. Laer. viii. 3; Porphyry de Vit. Pythag. p. 9.)

8. A writer on agriculture, mentioned by Athenaeus. (xvi. p. 650.) [L. S.]

ANTIPHUS ('Antipous'). 1. A son of Prais and Hecuba. (Hom. ii. iv. 490; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) While he was tending the flocks on mount Ida with his brother Isus, he was made prisoner by Achilles, but was restored to freedom after a ransom was given for him. He afterwards fell by the hands of Agamemnon. (Hom. ii. ix. 101, &c.)

2. A son of Thessalus, and one of the Greek heroes at Troy. He and his brother Phaedippus joined the Greeks with thirty ships, and commanded the men of Carpathos, Cosas, Cos, and other islands. (Hom. ii. ii. 675, &c.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 97) he was a son of Mnesylus and Chalciope. Four other mythical personages of this name are mentioned in Hom. ii. ii. 846, Od. ii. 19, xvii. 68; Apollod. i. 7. § 3. [L. S.]

ANTISTATES, CALLAESCHRS, ANTI-MACHIDES, and PORNES, were the architects who laid the foundations of the temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens, under Pelisstratus. (Vitr. viii. Praef. § 15.)

ANTISTHENES ('Antisthenes'), an AGRIGENTINE, is mentioned by Diodorus (xili. 94) as an instance of the immense wealth which private citizens possessed at Agrigentum. When his daughter was married, more than 800 carriages went in the nuptial procession.

ANTISTHENES ('Antisthenes'), a CYNIC philosopher, the son of Antisthenes, an Athenian, was the founder of the sect of the Cynics, which all the Greek schools of philosophy was perhaps the most devoid of any scientific purpose. He flourished b. c. 366 (Diod. xv. 76), and his mother was a Thracian (Suidas, s. v.; Diog. Laer. vi. 1), though some say a Phrygian, an opinion probably derived from his replying to a man who reviled him as not being a genuine Athenian citizen, that the mother of the gods was a Phrygian. In his youth he fought at Tanagra (b. c. 430), and was a disciple first of Gorgias, and then of Socrates, whom he never quitted, and at whose death he was present. (Plat. Phaed. § 59.) He never forgave his master's persecutors, and is even said to have been instrumental in procuring their punishment. (Diog. Laer. vi. 10.) He survived the battle of Leuctra (b. c. 371), as he is reported to have compared the victory of the Thebans to a set of schoolboys beating their master (Plut. Lycurg. 59), and died at Athens, at the age of 70. (Eudokias, Vioberias, p. 56.) He taught in the Cynosarges, a gymnasia for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers near the temple of Hercules. Hence probably his followers were called Cynics, though the Scholalist on Aristotle (p. 23, Brandis) deduces the name from the habits of the school, either their dog-like neglect of all forms and usages of society, sleeping in tubs and in the streets, and eating whatever they could find, or from their shameless insolence, or else their pertinacious adherence to their own opinions, or lastly from their habit of driving from them all whom they thought unfit for a philosophical life. His writings were very numerous, and chiefly dialogues, some of them being vehement attacks on his contemporaries, as on Alcibiades in the second of his two works entitled Cyrus, on Gorgias in his Archelaus and a most furious one on Plato in his Satire.
( Athen. v. p. 220, b.) His style was pure and elegant, and Theopompos even said that Plato stole from many of his thoughts. (Athen. xi. p.
591, c.) Cicero, however, said that he was a "homo acuta-tas hoc genus cito educatus" (ed. Al. xii. 383), and it is impossible that his writings could have deserved any higher praise. He possessed considerable powers of wit and sarcasm, and was fond of playing upon words; saying, for instance, that he would rather fall among κοράκες than κοτάκες, for the one devour the dead, but the other the living; and that one of his pupils stood in need βελτιω-θητον καπνόν, καὶ γραφεῖον καπνόν (i.e. καὶ νῦν).
Two declarations of his are preserved, namely Ajax and Ulysses, which are purely rhetorical, and an epistle to Aristippus is attributed to him.
His philosophical system was almost confined to ethics. In all that the wise man does, he said, he conforms to perfect virtue, and pleasure is not only unnecessary to man, but a positive evil. He is reported to have held in highest estimation (διογνώσις) to be blessings, and that madness is preferrable to pleasure, though Ritter thinks that some of these extravagances must have been advanced not as his own opinions, but those of the interlocutors in his dialogues. According to Schleiermacher (Anmerkungen zum Philol. S. 204), the passage in the Philobus (p. 44), which mentions the theory, that pleasure is a mere negation, and consists only in the absence of pain, refers to the opinions of Antisthenes; and the statement in Aristotle (Eth.
Nic. x. 1), that some persons considered pleasure wholly worthless (κομματικος φαθαλος) is certainly an allusion to the Cynical doctrine. It is, however, probable that he did not consider all pleasure worthless, but only that which results from the gratification of sensual or artificial desires, for we find him praising the pleasures which spring ἀπὸ τῆς ψυχῆς (Xen. Synap. iv. 41), and the enjoyments of a wisely chosen friendship. (Diog.
Laërt. vi. 11.) The summum bonum he placed in a life according to virtue,—virtue consisting in action, and being such, that when once obtained it is never lost, and exempts the wise man from the chance of error. That is, it is closely con-ected with reason, but to enable it to develop itself in action, and to be sufficient for happiness, it requires the aid of energy (Σωκρατικὴ ἐνέργεια);
so that we may represent him as teaching, that the summum bonum, ἀρετή, is attainable by teaching (διδασκαλία), and made up of ἰδιογένες and ἱλός.
But here he becomes involved in a vicious circle, for when asked what ἰδιογένες is, he could only tell it as insight into the good, having before made the good to consist in ἰδιογένες. (Plat.
Rep. vi. p. 505.) The negative character of his ethics, which are a mere denial of the Cynic.
enaic doctrine, is further shown in his apothegm,
that the most necessary piece of knowledge is ἀγάλματιν, while in his wish to isolate and withdraw the sage from all connexion with others, rendering him superior even to natural affection and the political institutions of his country, he really founds a system as purely selfish as that of Aristippus.

The Physica of Antisthenes contained a theory of the nature of the gods (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i.
15), in which he contended for the Unity of the Deity; and that man is unable to know him by any sensible representation, since he is unlike any being on earth. (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 601.)
He probably held just views of Providence, shewing the sufficiency of virtue for happiness by the fact, that outward events are regulated by God so as to benefit the wise. Such, at least, was the view of his pupil Diogenes, which is the same, and seems involved in his own statement, that all which beings to others is truly the property of the wise man. Of his logic we hear that he held definitions to be impossible, since we can only say that every individual is what it is, and can give no more than a description of its qualities, e. g. that silver is like tin in colour. (Arist. Met. viii. 3.) Thus he,
for course, disbeliefed the Platonic system of ideas, since each particular object of thought has its own separate essence. This also is in conformity with the practical and unsceintific character of his doctrine, and its tendency to isolate noticed above.
He never had many disciples, which ammowed him so much that he drove away those who did attend his teaching; except Diogenes, who remained with him; but he was not in the habit of teaching his rational clothing were only proofs of his vanity, which Socrates told him he saw through the holes of his coat. The same quality appears in his contempt for the Athenian constitution and social institutions generally, resulting from his being himself self-debarred from exercising the rights of a citizen by the foreign extraction of his mother. His philosophy was evidently thought worthless by Plat.
and Aristotle, to the former of whom he was personally hostile. His school is classed by Ritter among the imperfect Socraticists; after his death his disciples wandered further and further from al scientific objects, and plunged more deeply into fanatical extravagances. Perhaps some of those exaggerated statements have been attributed to their master. The fragments which remain of his writings have been collected by Winckelman (Antisthenes, Fragmenta, Turic, 1842), and the small work, with the account of him by Ritter (Gesch. der Philosophie, vii. 4) will supply all th information which can be desired. Most of the ancient authorities have been given in the cours of this article. We may add to them Arrian Epicteti. ii. 22, iv. 8, 11; Lucian, Cyneis. iii.
541; Julian, Orat. vii. [G. E. L. C.]

ANTISTHENES (Ἀντισθένης), a disciple o HERACLITUS, wrote a commentary on the word of his master. (Diog. Laërt. i. 15, vi. 19.)
is not improbable that this Antisthenes may l, the same as the one who wrote a work on tl succession of the Greek philosophers (of which the text is lost), which is so often referred to by Diogenes Laërtius (1. 40, ii. 39, 98, vi. 77, 8
vi. 108, &c.), unless it appear preferable to ass it to the periatic philosopher mentioned in Phegeon. (de Mirabil. 5.)

ANTISTHENES (Ἀντισθένης), of Rhodes,
a Greek historian who lived about the year n.
200. He took an active part in the politi affairs of his country, and wrote a history of own time, which, notwithstanding its partiali his native island, is spoken of in terms high praise by Polybius. (xvi. 14, &c.; con Diog. Laërt. vi. 19.) Plutarch (de Pies. 22) declares the Antisthenes who wrote a work call Meleagris, of which the third book is quoted; a Phiny (H. N. xxxii. 19) speaks of a person of th same name, who wrote on the pyramids; 1 whether they are the same person as the Rhodian, or two distinct writers, or the Ephesian Anti-thens mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 10), cannot be decided.

[LS] ANTISTHENES (Ἀντισθένης), a Spartan admiral in the Peloponnesian war, was sent out in b.c. 412, in command of a squadron, to the coast of Asia Minor, and was to have succeeded Axychus, in case the Spartan commissioners thought it necessary to deprive that officer of his command.
(Thuc. viii. 39.) We hear of him again in b.c. 399, when, with two other commissioners, he was sent out to inspect the state of affairs in Asia, and summoned the inhabitants of Aescharia to join in the campaign and was to be prolonged for another year.
(Xen. Hellam. ii. 2, § 6.) There was also an Athenian general of this name. (Mem. iii. 4, § 1.) [C. P. M.]

2. Daughter of P. Antistius [Antistius, No. 6] and Calpurnia, was married to Pompeius Magnus in b.c. 86, who contracted the connexion that he might obtain a favourable judgment from Antistius, who presided in the court in which Pompeius was to be tried. Antistius was divorced by her husband in b.c. 82 by Sulla’s order, who made him marry his step-daughter Aemilia. (Plut. Pompe. 4, § 6.)

ANTISTIA GENS, on coins and inscriptions usually ANTISTIA, plebeian. (Liv. vi. 30.) In the earlier ages of the republic, none of the members of the gens appear with any surname, and even in later times they are sometimes mentioned without one. The surnames under the republic are LABEO, REGINUS, and VETUS: those who had no surname are given under ANTISTIUS. No persons of this name are of great historical importance.

ANTISTIUS. 1. Sex. Antistius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 422. (Liv. iv. 42.)

2. L. Antistius, censor tribune, b.c. 379.
(Liv. vi. 30.)

3. M. Antistius, tribune of the plebs, about b.c. 320. (Liv. xxvi. 33, ix. 12.)

4. M. Antistius, was sent in b.c. 218 to the north of Italy to recall C. Flaminius, the consul, died to Rome. (Liv. xxv. 43.)

5. Sex. Antistius, was sent in b.c. 208 into Italy to watch the movements of Hasdrubal. (Liv.
xxvii. 36.)

6. P. Antistius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 86, possed in his tribuneship C. Caesar Strabo, who was a candidate for the consulsip without having been praetor. The speech he made upon this occasion brought him into public notice, and afterwards frequently had important causes entrusted to him, though he was already advanced in years.
Lecceus speaking favourably of his eloquence.
In consequence of the marriage of his daughter to compete Magnus, he supported the party of Sulla, who was put to death by order of young Marius in b.c. 82. His wife Calpurnia killed herself upon her death of her husband. (Cic. Brut. 63, 90, 70.
Rosc. Amer. 39; Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Appian,
C. i. 88; Liv. Epit. 88; Plut. Pompe. 9; Dru-mann, Gesch. Römer, i. p. 55.)

7. T. Antistius, quaeator in Macedonia, b.c.
1. When Pompey came into the province in the e following year, Antistius had received no successor; and according to Cicero, he died only as such for Pompey as circumstances compelled him, he took no part in the war, and after the battle of Pharsalia went to Bithynia, where he saw Caesar and was pardoned by him. He died at Corcyra on his return, leaving behind him considerable pro-property. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 29.)

ANTISTIUS, the name of the physician who examined the body of Julius Caesar after his murder, b.c. 44; and who is said by Suetonius (Jul. Caes. 62) to have declared, that of all his wounds only one was mortal, namely, that which he had received in the breast. [W. A. G.]

ANTISTIUS (Ἀντιστίου), a writer of Greek Epigrams, though, as his name seems to indicate,
A Roman by birth. Respecting his life and his age nothing is known, but we possess through his poems in this style of the Greek Anthology. (Jacobs, ed Anthol. Gr. cit. xiii. 532.) [L. S.]

ANTISTIUS SOSIA'NUS. [Sosianus.]
SP. ANTISTIUS, a Roman ambassador, was sent with three others to Lar Tolumnius, the king of the Velentres, in b.c. 458, by whom he was killed.
Statues of all four were placed on the Rostra.
(Liv. iv. 16; Cic. Phil. ix. 2.) In Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11) the reading is Sp. Sutius, which ought, however, to be changed into Antistus. (Comp.
Dranenberch, ad Liv. l. c.)

ANTONIA. 1. A daughter of Antonius the orator, Cos.
b.c. 69. (Antonius, No. 83.) She was seized on the coast by the pirates over whom her father triumphed, and obtained her liberation only on payment of a large sum.
(Plut. Pompe. 24.)

2. 3. The two daughters of C. Antonius, Cos.
b.c. 63, of whom one was married to C. Caius Gallus (Val. Max. iv. 2, § 6), and the other to her first cousin, M. Antonius, the triumvir. The latter was divorced by her husband in 47, on the ground of an alleged intrigue between her and Dolabella.
(Cic. Phil. ii. 38; Plut. Ant. 9.)

4. Daughter of M. Antonius, the triumvir, and his second wife Antonia, was betrothed to the son of M. Lepidus in b.c. 44, and married to him in 35. (Dion Cass. xlii. 53; Appian, B. C. v. 93.)
She must have died soon after; for her husband Lepidus, who died in 30, was at that time married to a second wife, Svetilla. (Voll. Pat. ii. 98; Dru-mann, Gesch. Römer, l. p. 518.)

5. The elder of two daughters of M. An-tonius by Octavia, the sister of Augustus, was born b.c. 39, and was married to L. Domitius Aenobarbus, Cos. b.c. 16. Her son by this marriage, Cn. Domitius, was the father of the emperor Nero. [See the Stemma, p. 84.] According to Tacitus (Ann. iv. 64, xlii. 64), this Antonia was the younger daughter; but we have followed Suetonius (Ner. 5) and Plutarch (Ant. 67) in calling her the elder.
(Compare Dion Cass. ii. 15.)

6. The younger of the two daughters of M.
Antonius by Octavia, born about b.c. 36, was married to Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, by whom she had three children: 1. Germanicus, the father of the emperor Caligula; 2. Livia or Livilla; and 3. the emperor Claudius. She lived to see the accession of her grandson Caligula to the throne, A.D. 37, who at first confounded her the greatest honours, but afterwards treated her with so much temptation, that her death was hastened by his conduct: according to some accounts, he admimistered poison to her. The emperor Claudius paid the highest honours to her memory. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 36. § 16) speaks of a temple of An-tonius, which was probably built at the command of Claudius. Antonia was celebrated for her beauty, ANTONINUS.

Caesar, Antonius Augustus, Antonius Augustalis, and Antoninus Augustus. It is a very valuable itinerary of the whole Roman empire, in which both the principal and the cross-roads are described by a list of all the places and stations upon them, the distances from place to place being given in Roman miles.

We are informed by Aethicus, a Greek geographer whose Cosmographia was translated by St. Jerome, that in the consulsiphip of Julius Caesar and M. Antonius (B.c. 44), a general survey of the empire was undertaken, at the command of Caesar and by a decree of the senate, by three persons, who severally completed their labours in 30, 24, and 19, B.C., and that Augustus pronounced the results by a decree of the senate. The probable inference from this statement, compared with the MS. titles of the Itinerary, is, that that work embodied the results of the survey mentioned by Aethicus. In fact, the circumstance of the Itinerary and the Cosmographia of Aethicus being found in the same MS. has led some writers to suppose that it was Aethicus himself who reduced the survey into the form in which we have it. The time of Julius Caesar and Augustus, when the Roman empire had reached its extent, was that at which we should expect such a work to be undertaken; and no one was more likely to undertake it than the great reformer of the Roman calendar. The honour of the work, therefore, seems to belong to Julius Caesar, who began it; to M. Antonius, who, from his position in the state, must have shared in its commencement and prosecution; and to Augustus, under whom it was completed. Nevertheless, it is highly probable that it received important additions and revision under one or both of the Antonines, who, in their labours to consolidate the empire, would not neglect such a work. The names included in it, moreover, prove that it was altered to suit the existing state of the empire down to the time of Diocletian (A.D. 285-305), after which we have no evidence of any alteration, for the passages in which the name "Constantinopolis" occurs are probably spurious. Whoever may have been its author, we have abundant evidence that the work was an official one. In several passages the numbers are doubtful. The names are put down without any specific rule as to the case. It was first printed by H. Stephens, Paris (1512). The best edition is that of Wosseling Amst. 1735, 4to. (The Preface to Wosseling's edition of the Itinerary; The Article "Antoninus the Itinerary of," in the Penny Cyclopaedia.) [P.S. ANTONINUS, M. AURELIUS. M. At REmius.]

ANTONINUS PIUS. The name of the emperor in the early part of his life, at full length was Titus Aurelius Fulves Boienius Arrius Antoninus—a series of appellations derived from his paternal and maternal ancestors, from whom he inherited great wealth. The family of his father was originally from Nemasus (Nemesis) in Tran alpine Gaul, and the most important members of the stock are exhibited in the following table:

TITUS AURELIUS FULVES
Consul A.D. 85 and 89, and Praefectus urbi.

Aurelius Fulves, Consul, but not named in the Fasti.
Antoninus himself was born near Lanuvium on the 18th of September, A. D. 66, in the reign of Domitian; was brought up at Lecum, a villa on the Aurelian way, about twelve miles from Rome; passed his boyhood under the superintendence of his two grandfathers, and from a very early age gave promise of his future worth. After having filled the offices of quaeator and praetor with great distinction, he was elevated to the consulship in 120, was afterwards selected by Hadrian as one of the four consuls to whom the administration of Italy was entrusted, was next appointed proconsul of the province of Asia, which he ruled so wisely that he surpassed in fame all former governors, not excepting his grandfather Arrius, and on his return home was admitted to share the secret counsels of the prince. In consequence, it would appear, of his merit alone, after the death of Aelius Caesar, he was adopted by Hadrian on the 26th of February 138, in the 62nd year of his age. He was immediately adopted by his new father as colleague in the tribunate and proconsular imperium, and thenceforward bore the name of T. Aelius Hadrianus Antoninus Caesar. Being at this period without male issue, he was required to adopt M. Annius Verus, the son of his wife's brother, and also L. Censorinus Commodus, the son of Aelius Caesar, who had been previously adopted by Hadrian but was now dead. These two individuals were afterwards the emperors M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus.

Hadrian died at Baiae on the 2nd of July, 138, but a few months after these arrangements had been concluded, and Antoninus without opposition ascended the throne. Several years before this event, he had married Annia Galeria Faustina, whose descent will be understood by referring to the account given of the family of her nephew, M. Aurelius. By her he had two daughters, Aurelia Padilla and Annia Faustina, and two sons, M. Aurelius Fulvus Antoninus and M. Galeria Antoninus. Aurelia married Lamius Syllanus, and died at the time when her father was setting out for Asia. Faustina became the wife of her first cousin Marcus Aurelius, the future emperor. Of the male progeny we know nothing. The name of the first mentioned was discovered by Pagi in an inscription, the portrait of the second appears on a rare Greek coin, with the legend, M. PALEPOC. ANTINOEC. ATTOKAPOTOC. ANTONIINOC. PIOC. On the reverse of the medal is the head of his mother, with the words, ΧΩΑ ΦΑΤΟΤΕΙΝΑ, which prove that it was struck subsequently to her death, which happened in the third year after her husband's accession. It will be observed, that while Galeria is styled "son of the emperor Antonius," he is not termed KAΣAP, a title which would scarcely have been omitted had he been born or been alive after his father's elevation. From this circumstance, therefore, from the absolute silence of history with regard to these youths, and from the positive assertion of Dion Cassius (xix. 21), that Antoninus had no male issue when adopted by Hadrian, we may conclude that both his sons died before this epoch; and hence the meagreness ascribed to him by Gibbon (c. 3) in preferring the welfare of Rome to the interests of his family, and sacrificing the claims of his own children to the talents and virtues of young Marcus, is probably altogether visionary.

The whole period of the reign of Antoninus, which lasted for upwards of twenty-two years, is almost a blank in history—a blank caused by the suspension for a time of war, and violence, and crime. Never before and never after did the Roman world enjoy for an equal space so large a measure of prosperous tranquillity. All the thoughts and energies of a most sagacious and able prince were steadfastly dedicated to the attainment of one object—the happiness of his people. And assuredly never were noble exertions crowned with more ample success.

At home the affections of all classes were won by his simple habits, by the courtesy of his manners, by the ready access granted to his presence, by the patient attention with which he listened to representations upon all manner of subjects, by his impartial distribution of favours, and his prompt administration of justice. Common informers were discouraged, and almost disappeared; never had confiscations been so rare; during a long succession of years no senator was punished with death; one man only was impeached of treason, and he, when convicted, was forbidden to betray his accomplices.

Abroad, the subject states participated largely in the blessings diffused by such an example. The best governors were permitted to retain their power for a series of years, and the collectors of the revenue were compelled to abandon their extortions. Moreover, the general condition of the provincials was improved, their fidelity secured, and the resources and stability of the whole empire increased by the communication, on a large scale, of the full rights and privileges of Roman citizens to the inhabitants of distant countries. In cases of national calamity and distress, such as the earthquakes which devastated Rhodes and Asia, and the great fires at Narbonne, Antioch and Caithage, the sufferers were relieved, and compensation granted for their losses with the most unsparing liberality.

In foreign policy, the judicious system of his predecessor was steadily followed out. No attempt was made to achieve new conquests, but all rebellions from within and all aggressions from without were promptly crushed. Various movements among the Germans, the Daedians, the Jews, the Moors, the Greeks, and the Egyptians, were quelled by persuasion or by a mere demonstration of force; while a more formidable insurrection in northern Britain was speedily repressed by the imperial legate Lollius Urbicus, who advancing beyond the wall of Hadrian, connected the friths of the Clyde and the Forth by a rampart of turf, in order that the more peaceful districts might be better protected from the inroads of the Caledonians. The British war was concluded, as we learn from me-and several different explanations, many of them very silly, are proposed by his biographer Capitolinus. The most probable account of the matter is this. Upon the death of Hadrian, the senate, incensed by his severity towards several members of their body, had resolved to withhold the honours usually conferred upon deposed emperors, but were induced to forego their purpose in consequence of the departure of Antoninus, and his earnest entreaties. Being, perhaps, after the first burst of indignation had passed away, somewhat alarmed by their own rashness, they determined to render the concession more gracious by paying a compliment to their new ruler which should mark their admiration of the feeling by which he had been influenced, and accordingly they hailed him by the name of Pius, or the dutifully affectionate.
This view of the question receives support from medals, since the epithet appears for the first time upon those which were struck immediately after the death of Hadrian; while several belonging to the same year, but coined before that date, bear no such addition. Had it been, as is commonly supposed, conferred in consequence of the general holiness of his life, it would in all probability have been introduced either when he first became Caesar, or after he had been seated for some time on the throne, and not exactly at the moment of his accession. Be that as it may, it found such favour in the eyes of his successors, that it was almost universally adopted, and is usually found united with the appellation of Augustus.

Our chief and almost only authority for the life of Antoninus Pius is the biography of Capitolinus, which, as may be gathered from what has been said above, is from beginning to end an uninterrupted panegyric. But the few facts which we can collect from medals, from the scanty fragments of Dion Cassius, and from incidental notices in later writers, all corroborate, as far as they go, the representations of Capitolinus; and therefore we cannot fairly refuse to receive his narrative merely because he paints a character of singular and almost unparalleled excellence.

COIN OF ANTONINUS PIUS.

ANTONINUS LIBERALIS ('Antwino Aispedalos'), a Greek grammarian, concerning whose life nothing is known, but who is generally believed to have lived in the reign of the Antonines, about A. D. 147. We possess a work under his name, titled 'Aispedaloi', a prose paraphrase, and consisting of forty-one tales about mythical metamorphoses.
With the exception of nine tales, he always mentions the sources from which he took his account.
Since most of the works referred to by him are no lost, his book is of some importance for the study of Greek mythology, but in regard to composition and style it is of no value. There are b very few MSS. of this work, and the chief ones are that at Heidelberg and the one in Paris. The first edition from the Heidelberg MS. with a Latin translation, is by Xylander, Basel, 1568, 8vo. There is a good edition by Verheyck (Lugd. Bat. 1774, 8vo.) with notes by Muncker, Hemsterhuis, &c. The best is by Koch (Leipz. 1832, 8vo.), who collated the Paris MS. and added valuable notes of his own. 8. M. ANTONIUS, the orator, was born b. c. 143. (Cic. Brut. 43.) He was quaestor in 113, and praetor in 104, and received the province of Cilicia with the title of proconsul in order to prosecute the war against the pirates. In consequence of his successes he obtained a triumph in 102. (Plut. Pomp. 24; Post. Triumph.) He was consul in 99 with A. Albinus [see ALBINUS, No. 22], and distinguished himself by resisting the attempts of Saturninus and his party, especially an agrarian law of the tribune Sex. Titus. He was censor in 97, and, while censor, was accused of bribery by M. Duronio, but was acquitted. He commanded in the Marse war a part of the Roman army. Antonius belonged to the aristocratic party, and espoused Sulla's side in the first civil war. He was in consequence put to death by Marius and Cinna when they obtained possession of Rome in 77. He was in the city at the time, and the soldiers sent to murder him hesitated to do their work through the moving eloquence of the orator, till their commander, P. Annius, cut off his head and carried it to Marius, who had it erected on he Rostra.

Antonius is frequently spoken of by Cicero as one of the greatest of the Roman orators. He is introduced as one of the speakers in Cicero's De Oratore, together with his celebrated contemporary L. Cассius. From the part which he takes in the dialogue, it would appear that his style of eloquence was natural and unartificial, distinguished by strength and energy rather than by finish and polish. He wrote a work de Ratione Discendi, which is referred to by Cicero (de Orat. 1. 21) and Quintilian (iii. 6, § 45), but neither it nor any of his orations has come down to us. His chief orations were, 1. A defence of himself, when accused of incest with a vestal virgin, b. c. 113. (Val. Max. iii. 7, § 9, vi. 8, § 1; Liv. Epit. 68; Ascon. ad Cio. Milon. c. 12; Oros. v. 15.) 2. A speech against Cn. Papirius Carbo, b. c. 111, who had been defeated by the Cimbri in 113. (Appul. de Magn. p. 316, ed. Ondend.) 3. An oration against Sex. Titus, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 99. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 11, pro Rubri, perd. 9.) 4. A defence of M. Aquillius, accused of extortion in the government of Sicily, about b. c. 99. This was the most celebrated of his orations. (Cic. Brut. 69, de Off. ii. 14, pro Plocio, 59, de Orat. ii. 29, 47, in Furi. v. 1; Liv. Epit. 70.) 5. A defence of himself when accused of bribery by Duronius. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 68.) 6. A defence of Nortinumus, who was accused of having caused the destruction of a Roman army by the Chibiri through carelessness. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 25, 39, 40, 48.)

9. M. Antonius M. f. C. n. Cretzous, son of the preceding and father of the Triumvir, was praetor in b. c. 75, and obtained in 74, through the influence of P. Cethegus and the consil Cotta, the command of the fleet and all the coasts of the Mediterranean, in order to clear the sea of pirates. But Antonius was avaricious and greedy, and misused his power to plunder the provinces, and especially Sicily. He did not succeed either in the object for which he had been appointed. An attack which he made upon Crete, although he was assisted by the Byzantines and the other allies, entirely failed; the greater part of his fleet was destroyed; and he probably saved himself only by an ignominious treaty. He shortly after died in Crete, and was called Creticus in decision. Sallust (Hist. lib. iii.) described him as "per undulam pecuniae genus, ut vacus a curis et instinstructus." He was married twice; first, to Numiloria, who had no children (Cic. Philipp. iii. 6), and afterwards to Julia. (Plut. Anton. 2, 1; Cic. Disc. in Catil. 17, in Frr. III. 3, 91; Paudo-Assen. in Disc. p. 129, in Verr. pp. 178, 208, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. II. 49; Appian, Sic. 6; Lactant. Inst. i. § 82; Tacit. Ann. 59.)

10. C. Antonius M. f. C. n., surnamed Hybrida (Plin. H. N. v. 53. s. 79), according to Drummam, Gesch. Roms, p. 531, because he was a homo semiferus, the friend of Catiline and the plunderer of Macedonia, was the second son of Antonius, the orator [No. 8], and the uncle of the triumvir [No. 12]. He accompanied Sulla in his war against Mithridates, and on Sulla's return to Rome, b. c. 83, was left behind in Greece with part of the cavalry and plundered the country. He was subsequently accused for his oppression of Greece by Julius Caesar (76). Six years afterwards (70), he was expelled the senate by the cursors for plundering the allies and wasting his property, but was soon after readmitted. He celebrated a friendship with extraordinary splendour. In his praetorship (65) and consulship (65), he had Cicero as his colleague. According to most accounts Antonius was one of Catiline's conspirators, and his well-known extravausage and rapacity seem to render this probable. Cicero gained upon him over his side by promising him the rich province of Macedonia, in which he would have a better opportunity of amassing wealth than in the other consular province of Gaul. Antonius had to lead an army against Catiline, but unwilling to fight against his former friend, he gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius.

At the conclusion of the war Antonius went into his province, in which he plundered so shamefully, that this is said to have caused him the same disgrace in beginning of 61. Cicero defended him; and it was currently reported at Rome that Cicero had given up the province to Antonius on the secret understanding, that the latter should give him part of the plunder. Antinony said the same himself; and Cicero's conduct in defending him in the senate, and also when he was brought to trial subsequently strengthened the suspicion. In 60, Antony was succeeded in the province by Octavius, the father of Augustus, and on his return to Rome was accused in 59 both of taking part in Catiline's conspiracy and of extortion in his province. He was defended by Cicero, but was notwithstanding condemned on both charges, and retired to the island of Cephalenna, which he rendered subject to him, as if it were his own; he even commenced building a city in it. (Strab. x. p. 453.) He was subsequently recalled, probably by Caesar, but at what time is uncertain. We know that he was in Rome at the beginning of 44 (Cic. Philipp. ii. 39), and he probably did not long survive Caesar. (For the ancient authorities, see Orelli's Onomastikon Tulli, and Drummam's Geschichte Roms, p. 81.)

11. ANTONIA. [ANTONIA, No. 1.]

12. M. Antonius M. f. M. n., the son of M. Antoninus Creticus [No. 9] and Julia, the sister of L. Julius Caesar, consul in b. c. 64, was born in all probability in b. c. 83. His father died while he was still young, and he was brought up in the house of Cornelius Lentulus, who married his mother Julia, and who was subsequently put to death by Cicero in 63 as one of Catiline's conspirators. Antony indulged in his very youth in every kind of dissipation, and became distinguished by his lavish expenditure and extravagance; and, as he does not appear to have received a large fortune from his father, his affairs soon became deeply involved. He was, however, released from his difficulties by his friend Carisius, who was his companion in all his sufferings and between whom and Antony there existed, if report be true, a most dishonourable connexion. The desire of revenging the execution of his step-father, Lentulus, led Antony to join Clodius in his opposition to Cicero and the aristocratical party. But their friendship was not of long continuance; and Antony, pressed by his creditors, repaired to Greece in 58, and from thence to Syria, where he served under the proconsul A. Gabinius as commander of the cavalry. He soon became distinguished as a brave and enterprising officer. He took part in the campaigns against Aristobulus in Palestine (57, 50), and also in the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt in 55. In the following year (64) he went to Gaul, in whose favour and influence he acquired, and was in consequence, on his return to Rome (53), elected quaestor for the following year. He was supported in his canvass for the quaestorship by Cicero, who became reconciled to him through the mediation of Caesar. As quaestor (52) he returned to Gaul, and served under Caesar for the next two years (52, 51).

Antony's energy and intrepidity pointed him out to Caesar as the most useful person to support his interests at Rome, where it was evident that the aristocratical party had made up their minds to crush Caesar, if it were possible. Antony accordingly left Gaul in 50 and came to Rome. Through the influence of Caesar, he was elected into the college of augurs, and was also chosen one of the tribunes of the plebs. He entered on the office of the 16th of December, and immediately commenced attacking the proceedings of Pompey and the aristocracy. On the 1st of January in the following year (49), the senate passed a decree depriving Cicero of his command. Antony and his colleague...

Q. Caesius interposed their veto; but as the senate set this at nought, and threatened the lives of the two tribunes, Antony and his colleague fled from Rome on the 7th of January, and took refuge with Caesar in Gaul. Caesar now marched into Italy, and within a few weeks obtained complete possession of the peninsula.

Antony was one of his legates, and received in the same year the supreme command of Italy, when Caesar crossed into Spain to prosecute the war against the Pompeian party. In the following year (46), he conducted reinforcements to Caesar in Greece, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia, where he commanded the left wing. In 47, Caesar, who was then dictator, appointed Antony master of the horse; and, during the absence of the former in Africa, he was again left in the command of Italy. The quiet state of Italy gave Antony an opportunity of indulging his natural love of pleasure. Cicero in his second Philippic has given a minute account of the flagrant debaucheries and licentiousness of which Antony was guilty at this time, both in Rome and the various towns of Italy; and it is pretty certain that most of these accounts are substantially true, though they are no doubt exaggerated by the orator. It was during this time that Antony divorced his wife Antonia (he had been previously married to Fulvia [FADIA], and lived with an actress named Cytheris, with whom he appeared in public).

About the same time, a circumstance occurred which produced a coolness between Caesar and Antony. Antony had purchased a great part of Pompey's property, when it was confiscated, under the idea that the money would never be asked for. But Caesar insisted that it should be paid, and Antony raised the sum with difficulty. It was perhaps owing to this circumstance that Antony did not accompany Caesar either to Africa or Spain in 46. During this year he married Fulvia, the widow of Clodius. In the next year (45) all trace of disagreement between Caesar and Antony disappeared; he went to Narbo in Gaul to meet Caesar on his return from Spain, and shortly after offered him the diadem at the festival of the Lupercalia. In 44 he was consul with Caesar, and during the time that Caesar was murdered (15th of March), was kept engrossed in conversation by some of the conspirators outside the senator's house. The conspirators had wished to engage Antony as an accomplice, and he was sounded on the point the year before by Trebonius, while he was in Gaul; but the proposition was rejected with indignation.

Antony had now a difficult part to play. The murder of Caesar had paralysed his friends and the people, and for a time placed the power of the state in the hands of the conspirators. Antony therefore thought it more prudent to come to terms with the senate; but meantime he obtained from Calpurnia the papers and private property of Caesar; and by his speech over the body of Caesar and the reading of his will, he so roused the feelings of the people against the murderers, that the latter were obliged to withdraw from the popular wrath. Antony, however, seemed not to have considered himself strong enough yet to break with the senate entirely; he accordingly effected a reconciliation with them, and induced them to accept a number of laws, which he alleged were found among Caesar's papers. Antony was now the most powerful man in the state, and seemed likely to obtain the same position that Caesar had occupied. But a new and unexpected rival appeared in young Octavianus, the adopted son and great-nephew of the dictator, who came from Apollonia to Rome, assumed the name of Caesar, and managed to secure equally the good will of the senate and of his uncle's veteran troops. A struggle now ensued between Antony and Caesar. The former went to Brundisium, to take the command of the legions which had come from Macedonia; the latter collected an army in Campania. Two of Antony's legions shortly afterwards deserted to Caesar; and Antony, towards the end of November, proceeded to Chalpiae, which had been previously granted him by the senate, and laid siege to Mutina, into which Dec. Brutus had thrown himself. At Rome, Brutus, who was declared a public enemy, and the conduct of the war against him committed to Caesar and the two consuls, C. Vibius Pansa and A. Hirtius, at the beginning of the next year, n. c. 43. Several battles were fought with various success, till at length, in the battle of Mutina (about the 27th of April, 43), Antony was completely defeated, and obliged to cross the Alps. Both the consuls, however, had fallen, and the command now devolved upon Dec. Brutus. In Gaul Antony was joined by Lepidus with a powerful army, and was soon in a condition to prosecute the war with greater vigour than ever. Meantime, Caesar, who had been slighted by the senate, and who had never heartily espoused its cause, became reconciled to Antony, through the mediation of Lepidus, and thus the celebrated triumvirate was formed in the autumn of this year (43). The reconciliation was made on the condition that the government of the state should be vested in Antony, Caesar, and Lepidus, who were to take the title of Tribuni Reipublicae Constituentes for the next five years; and that Antony should receive Gaul as his province; Lepidus, Spain; and Caesar, Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily. The mutual friends of each were proscribed, and in the executions that followed, Cicero fell a victim to the revenge of Antony—an act of cruelty, for which even the plea of necessity could not be urged.

The war against Brutus and Cassius, who commanded the senatorial army, was entrusted to Antony and A. Aemilius. It was decided by the battle of Philippi (42), which was mainly gained by the valour and military talents of Antony. Caesar returned to Italy; and Antony, after remaining some time in Greece, crossed over into Asia to collect the money which he had promised to the soldiers. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra, and followed her to Egypt, where he forgot everything in dalliance with her. But he was reuced from his inactivity by the Parthian invasion of Syria (40), and was at the same time summoned to support his brother Lucius [see No. 14] and his wife Fulvia, who were engaged in war with Caesar. But before Antony could reach Italy, Caesar had obtained possession of Parthia, in which Lucius had taken refuge; and he again took Fulvia in the same year to remove the chief cause of the war, and led to a reconciliation between Caesar and Antony. To cement their union, Antony married Caesar's sister Octavia. A new division of the Roman world was made, in which Antony received as his share all the provinces east of the Adriatic.

In the following year (39), the Trionvirs conwith a crown of ivy. On the reverse is a cista, a box used in the worship of Bacchus, surmounted by a female's head, and encompassed by two serpents. (Eckhel, vol. vi. p. 64.)

13. C. ANTONIUS M. P. M. N., the second son of M. Antonius Cretius [No. 9], and the brother of the triumvir, was Julius Caesar's legate in 48, and city praetor in 44, when his elder brother was consul, and his younger triumvir of the plebs. In the same year, he received the province of Macedonia, where, after an unsuccessful contest, he fell into the hands of M. Brutus in 43. Brutus kept him as a prisoner for some time, but put him to death at the beginning of 42, chiefly at the instigation of Hortensius, to revenge the murder of Cicero. (Orelli's Onomast.; Drummans' Gesch. Rome, i. p. 528, &c.) The following coin of C. Antonius must have been struck after he had been appointed to the government of Macedonia with the title of proconsul. The female head is supposed to represent the genius of Macedonia; the cap on the head is the cuirass, which frequently appears on the Macedonian coins. (Dict. of Ant. &c. Caesar; Eckhel, vol. vi. p. 41.)

14. L. ANTONIUS M. F. M. N., the younger brother of the preceding and of the triumvir, was tribune of the plebs in 44, and upon Caesar's death took an active part in supporting his brother's interests, especially by introducing an agrarian law to conciliate the people and Caesar's veteran troops. He subsequently accompanied his brother into Gaul, and obtained the consulship for 41, in which year he triumphed on account of some successes he had gained over the Alpine tribes. During his consulship a dispute arose between him and Caesar about the division of the lands among the veterans, which finally led to a war between them, commonly called the Persianian war. Lucius engaged in this war chiefly at the instigation of Fulvia, his brother's wife, who had great political influence at Rome. At first, Lucius obtained possession of Rome during the absence of Caesar; but on the approach of the latter, he retired northwards to Perusia, where he was straightway closely besieged. Fannine compelled him to surrender the town to Caesar in the following year (40). His life was spared, and he was shortly afterwards appointed governor of Spain and Cilicia. He died in Iberia, from which time we hear no more of him.

L. Antonius took the surname of Pictas (Dion Cass. xlviii. 5), because he pretended to attack Caesar in order to support his brother's interests. It is true, that when he obtained possession of Rome in his consulship, he proposed the abolition of the triumvirate; but this does not prove, as some modern writers have had it, that he was opposed to his brother's interests. Cicero draws a frightful picture of Lucius' character. He calls him a gladiator and a robber, and heaps upon him every term of reproach and contempt. (Plut. iii. 12, v. 7, 11, xii. 8, &c.) Much of this is of course exaggeration. (Orelli's Onomast.; Drummans' Gesch. Rome, i. p. 527, &c.) The annexed coin of L. An-

18. M. ANTONIUS, M. F. M. N., called by the Greek writers Astyllus (Ἀστυλος), which is probably only a corrupt form for Antonius (young Antonius), was the elder of the two sons of the triumvir by his wife Fulvia. In B.C. 36, while he was still a child, he was betrothed to Julia, the daughter of Caesar Octavius. After the battle of Actium, when Antony despaired of success at Alexandria, he conferred upon his son Marcus the agnus virilis (n. c. 30), that he might be able to take his place in case of his death. He sent him with proposals of peace to Caesar, which were rejected; and on his death, shortly after, young Marcus was executed by order of Caesar. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 54, i. 6, 8, 15; Suet. Aug. 17, 63; Plut. Ant. 71, 81, 87.)

19. JULIUS ANTONIUS, M. F. M. N., the younger son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was brought up by his step-mother Octavia at Rome, and after his father's death (n. c. 30) received great marks of favour from Augustus, through the influence of Octavia. (Plut. Ant. 87; Dion Cass. li. 15.) Augustus married him to Marcella, the daughter of Octavia by her first husband, C. Marcellus, conferred upon him the praetorship in n. c. 13, and consulsiply in n. c. 10. (Vell. Pat. ii. 100; Dion Cass. liv. 26, 30; Suet. Claud. 2.) In consequence of his adulterous intercourse with Julia, e daughter of Augustus, he was condemned to death by the emperor in n. c. 2, but seems to have attempted his execution by a voluntary death. e was also accused of aiming at the empire. (Dion Cass. lv. 10; Senec. de Brent. Ep. 5; Tac. ann. iv. 44, iii. 18; Plin. H. N. vii. 46; Vell. iv. I. e.) ANTONIUS was a poet, as we learn from e of Horace's odes (iv. 26), which is addressed to m.

25. I. ANTONIUS, son of No. 19 and Marcella, 1 grandson of the triumvir, was sent, after his her's death, into honourable exile at Mascula, ere he died in A. D. 25. (Tatn. ann. iv. 44.) ANTONIUS (Ἀρρενος), 1. Of Angos, a eek poet, one of whose epigrams is still extant the Greek Anthology. (ix. 102; comp. Jacobs, Anthel. vol. xiii. p. 352.)

2. Surnamed MELISSA (the Bee), a Greek monk, who is placed by some writers in the eighth and by others in the twelfth century of our era. He must, however, at any rate have lived after the time of Theophyact, whom he mentions. He made a collection of so-called lost commones, or sentences on virtues and vices, which is still extant. It resembles the Succession of the Cae saebs, and consists of two books in 176 titles. The extracts are taken from the early Christian fathers. The work is printed at the end of the editions of Stobaeus published at Frankfurt, 1581, and Geneva, 1609, fol. It is also contained in the Biblioth. Patr. vol. v. p. 878, &c., ed. Paris. (Fahr. Bibl. Gr. i. p. 744, &c.; Cave, Script. Eccles. Hist. Lit. i. p. 466, ed. London.)

3. A Greek monk, and a disciple of Simeon Stylites, lived about A. D. 460. He wrote a life of his master Simeon, with whom he had lived on intimate terms. It was written in Greek, and L. Alatus (Diar. de Script. Sim. p. 8) attests, that he saw a Greek MS. of it; but the only edition which has been published is a Latin translation in Polyanthus' Script. Eccl. Hist. Lit. ii. p. 145. It seems to be a translation of the Eutropius (H. E. p. 231), who knew only the Latin translation, was doubtful whether he should consider Antonius as a Latin or a Greek historian.

4. ST., sometimes surnamed Abbas, because he is believed to have been the founder of the monastic life among the early Christians, was born in A. D. 251, at Coma, near Hencelia, in Middle Egypt. His earliest years were spent in seclusion, and the Greek language, which then every person of education used to acquire, remained unknown to him. He merely spoke and wrote the Egyptian language. At the age of nineteen, after having lost both his parents, he distributed his large property among his neighbours and the poor, and determined to live in solitary seclusion in the neighbourhood of his birthplace. The struggle before he fully overcame the desires of the flesh is said to have been immense; but at length he succeeded, and the simple diet which he adopted, combined with manual labour, strengthened his health so much, that he lived to the age of 105 years. In A. D. 305 he withdrew to the mountains of eastern Egypt, where he took up his abode in a decayed castle or tower. Here he spent twenty years in solitude, and in constant struggles with the evil spirit. It was not till A. D. 505, that his friends prevailed upon him to return to the world. He now began his active and public career. A number of disciples gathered around him, and his preaching, together with the many miraculous cures he was said to perform on the sick, spread his fame all over Egypt. The number of persons anxious to learn from him and to follow his mode of life increased every year. Of such persons he made two settlements, one in the mountains of eastern Egypt, and another near the town of Arsinés, and he himself usually spent his time in one of these monasteries, if we may call them so. From the accounts of St. Athanasius in his life of Antonius, it is clear that most of the essential points of a monastic life were observed in these establishments. During the persecution of the Christians in the reign of the emperor Maximian, A. D. 311, Antonius, anxious to gain the palm of a martyr, went to Alexandria, but all his efforts and his opposition to the commands of the government were of no avail, and he was obliged to return uninvited to his solitude.

As his peace began to be more and more disturbed by the number of visitors, he withdrew further east to a mountain which is called Mount St. Antonius to this day; but he nevertheless frequently visited the tombs of Egypt, and formed an intimate friendship with Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria. During the exile of the latter from Alexandria, Antonius wrote several letters on his behalf to the emperor Constantine. The emperor did not grant his request, but showed great esteem for the Egyptian hermit, and even invited him to Constantinople. Antonius, however, declined this invitation. His attempts to use his authority against the Arians in Egypt were treated with contempt by their leaders. After the restoration of Athanasius, Antonius at the age of 104 years went to Alexandria to see his friend once more, and to exert his last powers against the Arians. His journey thither resembled a triumphant procession, every one wishing to catch a glimpse of the great Saint and to obtain his blessing. After having wrought many miracles at Alexandria, he returned to his monastery, where he died on the 17th of January, 356. At his express desire his favourite disciples buried his body in the earth and kept the spot secret, in order that his tomb might not be profaned by vulgar superstition. This request, together with the sentiments expressed in his sermons, epistles, and sentences still extant, show that Antonius was far above the majority of religious enthusiasts and fanatics of those times, and a more sensible man than he appears in the much interpolated biography by St. Athanasius. We have twenty epistles which go by the name of Antonius, but only seven of them are generally considered genuine. About A.D. 800 they were translated from the Egyptian into Arabic, and from the Arabic they were translated into Latin and published by Abrahm Eichennelles, Paris, 1641, 8vo. The same editor published in 1646, at Paris, an 8vo. volume containing various sermons, orations, and sentences of Antonius. (S. Athanasii, Vita S. Antonii, Gr. et Lat. ed. Hoeschel, Augustin Vindel, 1611, 4to.; Socrat. Hist. Eccles. i. 21, iv. 23, 25; Sozom. Hist. Eccles. i. 3, ii. 31, 34; comp. Cave, Script. Eccles. Hist. Lib. i. p. 150, &c.)

ANTONIUS, a Physician, called by Galen αὐτοῦ τὸς ἱλαρόν, "the herbalist," who must have lived in or before the second century after Christ. His medical formulae are several times quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. ii. 1, vol. xii. p. 857; De Compos. medicin. sec. Gen. vi. 15, vol. xiii. p. 930), and he is perhaps the same person who is called τὸ ἱλαρόν in the "draughtist." (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. ix. 4, vol. xiii. p. 281.) Possibly they may both be identical with Antonius Castor [CASTOR, ANTONIUS], but of this there is no proof whatever. A treatise on the Pulse (Opera, vol. xix. p. 629), which goes under Galen's name, but which is probably a spurious compilation from his other works on this subject, is addressed to a person named Antonius, who is there called θεολόγος καὶ ἱλαρός; and Galen wrote his work De Propriis Animai iugisuten Agtionem ut Curatione (Opera, vol. v. p. i, &c.) in answer to a somewhat similar treatise by an Epicurean philosopher of this name, who, however, does not appear to have been a physician. ANTYLLUS. [ANTYLLUS, A.[ANTYLLUS, A.

ANTYLLUS (Ἀντύλλος), an eminent physician and surgeon, who must have lived before the end of the fourth century after Christ, as he is quoted by Orisius, and who probably lived later than the end of the second century, as he is nowhere mentioned by Galen. Of the place of his birth and the events of his life nothing is known, but he appears to have obtained a great reputation, and is mentioned in Cyrilli Alexandrini (?) Lexicon (in Cramer's Anecdotae Graecae Parisienses, vol. iv. p. 196) among the celebrated physicians of antiquity. He was rather a voluminous writer, but none of his works are still extant except some fragments which have been preserved by Orisius Antonius, and other ancient authors. These, however, are quite sufficient to show that he was a man of talent and originality. The most interesting extracts from his works that has been preserved I probably that relating to the operation of tracheotomy, of which he is the earliest writer who directions for performing it are still extant. Th whole passage has been translated in the Diet. d'Ant. s. v. Chirurgia. The fragments of Antyllus have been collected and published in a separate form, with the title Antyllis, Veteris Chirurgii, v. ANUBIS (Ἀνύβις), an Egyptian divinity worshipped in the form of a dog, or of a hum aiming with a dog's head. In the worship of it divinity several phases must be distinguished, as the case of Ammon. It was in all probability piously a fetish, and the object of the worship the dog, the representative of that useful species animals. Subsequently it was mixed up and con blined with other religious systems, and Anubis assumed a symbolical or astronomical character, least in the minds of the learned. The worship dogs in Egypt is sufficiently attested by Herodot (ii. 66), and there are traces of its having been known in Greece at an early period; for was ascribed to the mythical Thothamans of being commanded, that men should not swear by gods, but by a goose, a dog, or a ram. (Bust xvii. No. 7.) The fact that Soemius used to swear his dog is so well known, that we scarcely need mention it. (Athen v. p. 300; Porphyry, de Astr. iii. p. 283.) It is however a remarkable fact, that, notwithstanding this, the name of Anubis is not expressly mentioned by any writer previous to the age of Augustus; but after that time, it frequently occurs both in Greek and Roman authors. (Ov. Met. ix. 680, Amor. ii. 13, 11; Propert. iii. 9, 41; Virg. Aen. viii. 689; Juven. xv. 8; Lucian, Jup. vagr. 8, Cones. Dorr. 10, 11, Town, 28.) Several of the passages here referred to attest the importance of the worship of dogs, both divine, and profane, and this expressly states, that the dog was worshiped throughout Egypt (xvii. p. 812); but the principal and perhaps the original seat of the worship above has been in the nomes of Cyopis in middle Egypt. (Strab. i. c.) In the stories about Anubis which have come down to us, as well as in the explanations of his nature, the original character—that of a fatig—lost sight of, probably because the philosophical spirit of later times wanted to find something higher and loftier in the worship of Anubis than it originally was. According to his nationalistic view of Diodorus (i. 18, Anubis was the son of king Osiris, who accompanied his father to the underworld, and was nursed by Isis. For this reason he was represented as a human being with the head of a dog. In another passage (i. 87) the same writer explains his monstrous figure by saying, that Anubis performed to Osiris and Isis the service of a guard, which is performed to men by dogs. He mentions third account, which has more the appearance of genuine myths. When Isis, it is said, sought Osiris, she was preceded and guided by dogs, which defended and protected her, and expressed their desire to assist her by barking. For this reason the procession at the festival of Isis was roed by dogs. According to Plato (Is. et Os.) Anubis was a son of Osiris, whom he begot by nephthys in the belief that she was his wife Isis. After the death of Osiris, Isis sought the child, caught him up, and made him her guard and companion under the name of Anubis, which thus was transferred to her husband. (Dion Cass. i. 60, xi. 3.) Anubis was an Egyptian divinity, who was worshipped in a grove near Amon (Terracina) together with Berenice. He was regarded as a youthful Jupiter, and Berenice as his Juno. (Serv. ad Aen. v. 799.) On coins his name appears as Amon or Anu. (Dumkeboh, ad Sil. Ital. viii. 392; Morell, Theor. Numa, ii. tab. 2.) [L.S.]

ANYSIS (Auris), an ancient king of Egypt, who, according to Herodotus, succeeded Asycurian. He was blind, and in his reign Egypt was invaded by the Ethiopians under their king Sabeo, and remained in their possession for fifty years. Anyas in the meanwhile took refuge in the marshes of lower Egypt, where he formed an island which afterwards remained unknown for upward of seven centuries, until it was discovered by Amyrtius. When last the fifth years the Ethiopians withdrew from Egypt, Anyas returned from the marshes and resumed the government. (Herod. ii. 137, 141.) [L.S.]

ANYTHE, of Tegens (Avn. Tegens), the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, is mentioned by Pollux (v. 6) and by Stephanus Byzantinus (v. Ter.). She is numbered among the lyric poets by Meleager (Jacobs, Anthol. i. 1, v. 5), in whose list she stands first, and by Antipater of Thessalonica (Ibid. ii. 101, no. 25), who names her with Praxilla, Myro, and Sappho, and calls her the female Homer (Σηραν. Ιακωβ), an epithet which might be used either with reference to the spiritual mission of some of her epigrams, or to their antique character. From the above notices and from the epigrams themselves, which are for the most part in the style of the ancient Doric choruses, like the poems of Alcmene, who should long been disposed to place her much higher than the date usually assigned to her, on the authority of a passage in Tullian (Athen. Groecos, 52, p. 114, Worth.), who says, that the statue of Anythe was made by Euthyrates and Cephalidas, who are known to have flourished about 300 B.C. But even if the Anythe here mentioned were certainly the poetess, it would not follow that she was contemporary with these artists. On the other hand, one of ANYTUS. (15, Jacobs) is an inscription for a monument erected by a certain Damis over his horse, which had been killed in battle. Now, the only historical personage of this name is the Damis who was made leader of the Messenians after the death of Aristodemus, towards the close of the first Messenian war. (Paus. iv. 10. § 4, 13. § 3.) We know also from Pausanias that the Arcadians were the allies of the Messenians in that war. The conjecture of Reiske, therefore, that the Damis mentioned by Anytus of Teges is the same as the leader of the Messenians, scarcely deserves the contempt with which it is treated by Jacobs. This conjecture places Anytus about 723 n. c. This date may be thought too high to suit the style and subjects of some of her epigrams. But one of these (17) bears the name of "Anytus of Myrtilea," and the same epigram may be fixed, by internal evidence, at 270 n. c. (Jacobs, xiii. p. 633.) And since it is very common in the Anthology for epigrams to be ascribed to an author simply by name, without a distinctive title, even when there was more than one epigrammatist of the same name, there is nothing to prevent the epigrams which bear traces of a later date being referred to Anytus of Myrtilea.

ANYTUS (Ἀνύτος), a Titan who was believed to have brought up the goddess Despoena. In an Arcadian temple his statue was placed by the side of Despoena's. (Paus. viii. 37. § 3.)

ANYTUS (Ἀνύτος), an Athenian, son of Anthemion, was the most influential and formidable of the accusers of Socrates. (Plat. Apol. p. 18, b.; Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 3.) His father is said to have made a large fortune as a tanner, and to have transmitted it, together with his trade, to his son. (Plat. Men. p. 90, a.; Xen. Apost. p. 29; Schol. ad Plat. Apol. l. c.) Anytus seems to have been a man of loose principles and habits, and Phatarch alludes (Aet. p. 193, d.; Amot. p. 762, c, d.) to his intimate and apparently disputable connexion with Alcibiades. In b. c. 409, he was sent with 30 ships to relieve Pylus, which the Lacedaemonians were besieging; but he was prevented by bad weather from doubling Malea, and was obliged to return to Athens. Here he was brought to trial on the charge of having uttered treacherously, and, according to Dioboros and Phatarch, who mention this as the first instance of such corruption at Athens, escaped death only by bribing the judges. (Xen. Hell. l. 2. § 18; Diod. xiii. 64; Plut. Cor. p. 220, b.; Aristot. op. Harpoec. v. v. Δᾶκρον, but see Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 94.) He appears to have been, in politics, a leading and influential man, to have attached himself to the democratic party, and to have been driven into banishment during the usurpation of the 30 tyrants, b. c. 404. Xenophon makes Theramenes join his name with that of Thrasylus; and Lysias mentions him as a leader of the exiles at Phyle, and records an instance of his prudence and moderation in that capacity. (Plat. Men. p. 90, a.; Aristot. op. Harpoec. p. 23, c.; Xen. Apost. p. 29; Diod. l. 3. §§ 42, 44; Lys. c. Agr. l. 137.) The grounds of his enmity to Socrates seem to have been partly political and partly personal. (Plat. Apol. pp. 21—23; Xen. Mem. l. 2. §§ 37, 38; Apost. p. 29; Plat. Men. p. 94, in fin.) The Athenians, according to Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 43), having repented of their condemnation of Socrates, put Meletus to death, and sent Anytus and Lycon into banishment. For the subject generally, see Stullbaum ad Plat. Apol. pp. 18, b., 23, c.; Schleiermacher, Introdu. to the Meno, in fin.; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. pp. 274—280. [E. E.]

AOEDE. [Murea.]

AON (Ἄων), a son of Poseidon, and an ancient Boeotian hero, from whom the Bocotian Aolians, and the country of Bocotia (for Bocotia was anciently called Aonia) were believed to have derived their names. (Paus. ix. 5. § 1; Stat. Theb. i. 34; Steph. Byz. s. a. Βοκοτία.)

APAMA (Ἀπάμα or Ἀπαμή). 1. The wife of Seleucus Nicator and the mother of Antiochus Soter, was married to Seleucus in b. c. 325, when Alexander gave to his general an Athenian wife. According to Arrian (vii. 4), she was the daughter of Spathamenes, the Bactrian, but Stрабo (xii. p. 579) calls her, erroneously, the daughter of Artabazus. (Comp. Appian. Syr. 57; and Liv. xxxvi. 13, who also makes a mistake in calling her the sister, instead of the wife, of Seleucus; Steph. Byz. s. v. Απαμή.)

2. The daughter of Antiochus Soter, married to Magas. (Paus. i. 7. § 3.)

3. The daughter of Alexander of Mogalopolis, married to Amyntas, king of the Athenians, about b. c. 200. (Appian. Syr. 13; Liv. xxxv. 47, where she is called Apameia.)

APANCHMMENES (Ἀπανχμήμενης), the stranded (goddess), a surname of Artemis, the origin of which is thus related by Pausanias. (viii. 28. § 5.)

In the neighbourhood of the town of Caphyae in Arcadia, in a place called Condyles, there was a sacred grove of Artemis Condytisatis. On one occasion when some boys were playing in this grove they put a string round the goddess' statue, and said in their jokes they would strangle Artemis. Some of the inhabitants of Caphyae who found the boys thus engaged in their sport, stoned them to death. After this occurrence, all the women of Caphyae had premature births, and all the children were brought dead into the world. This calamity did not cease until the boys were honourably buried, and an annual sacrifice to their names was instituted in accordance with the command of Apollo. The surname of Condytisatis was then changed into Apanchmmenides (Paus. iv. 32. 5; Steph. Byz. s. v. Απανχμήμενης.)

APATEMRIA (Ἀπατεμρία or Απατέμριος), the is, the deceitful. 1. A surname of Athena, which was given to her by Aethra. (Paus. ii. 33. § 1.)

2. A surname of Aphrodite at Phanagoria an other places in the Taurian Chersonesus, where it originated, according to tradition, in this way: Aphrodite was attacked by giants, and called her to her assistance. He concealed himself with her in a cavern, and as the giants approach her one by one, she surrendered them to Heracles to kill them. (Strab. xi. p. 459; Steph. Byz. s. v. Απατέμριος.)

APATIRIUS, of Alabanda, a scene-painter whose name of printing the scene of the little theatre at Tralles is described by Vitruvius, with the criticism made upon it by Liciunus. (Vitruvii vii. §§ 5, 6.)

APELLAS or APOLLAS (Ἀπαλλᾶς, Ἀπόλλας). 1. The author of a work Περὶ τῶν ἠπελθόντων πάθεων (Athen, ix. p. 369, a) at Delphic. (Clem. Alex. Protr. p. 31, a; Par. 1629.) He appears to be the same as Apellis the geographer of Cyrene. (Marc. Herod. p. 6) APELLES. Comp. Quintil. xi. 2. § 14 ; Boehl, Praef. ad Schol. Pind. p. xxiii., &c.

2. A sceptical philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 106.) APPELLAS (Ἀπελλάς), a sculptor, who made, in bronze, statues of worshipping females (adorautes eumines). (Plin. xxxvi. 10. § 26.) He made the statue of Cynips, who conquered in the chariot race at Olympia. (Paus. xxvi. 8. § 3.) He was sister to Apelles, king of Sparta, who died at the age of 84, in 362 B. C. Therefore the victory of Cynips, and the time when Apelles flourished, may be placed about 400 B. C. His name indicates his Doric origin. (Tolken, Ammuthes, iii. s. 128.)

APELLAS (Ἀπελλάς). 1. One of the guards of Philip V., king of Macedonia. (Philippus V.)

2. Perhaps a son of the preceding, was a friend of Philip V., and accompanied his son Demetrius to Rome, b. C. 163. (Polyb. xxii. 14. &c., xxiv. 1.)

3. Of Ascalon, was the chief tragic poet in the time of Caligula, with whom he lived on the most intimate terms. (Philos. Logel. ad Caesam, p. 720; Dion Cass. lix. 5; Suec. Colch. 33.)

APELLAS (Ἀπελλάς), the most celebrated of the Sicilian painters, was born, most probably, at Selophon in Ionia (Suidas, s. v.), though Pliny, xxxv. 36. § 10 and Ovid (Art. Am. iii. 401; Pont. iv. 1. 299) call him a Cœan. The account of Strabo (xiv. p. 612) and Lucian (De Calumn. ix. §§ 2, 6), that he was an Ephesian, may be explained from the statements of Suidas, that he was made a citizen at Ephesus, and that he studied painting there under Ephorus. He afterwards studied under Pamphilus of Amphipolis, to whom he paid the fee of a talent for a ten-years' course of instruction. (Suidas, s. v.; Plin. xxxvi. 36. § 8.) At a later period, when he had already gained a high reputation, he went to Sicily, and again paid talent for admission into the school of Melan- hius, whom he assisted in his portrait of the grant Aristocrates. (Plut. Act. 18.) By this course of study he acquired the scientific accuracy of the Sicilian school, as well as the elegance of the Ionic.

The best part of the life of Apelles was probably spent at the court of Philip and Alexander the Great; for Pliny speaks of the great number of his portraits of both these princes (xxxv. 36. § 16), and states that he was the only person whom Alexander would permit to take his portrait. (vid. § 8; see also Cic. ad Fam. v. 12, § 13; Hor. ep. ii. 1. 289; Valer. Max. vii. 11. § 2, ext.; triuvian. Amob. 1. 16. § 7.) Apelles enjoyed the friendship of Alexander; who used to visit him in his studio at Alexandria, and at one of these visits, when the king's conversation was exposing his ignorance of art, Apelles politely advised him to be silent, as the eyes who were grading the colours were laughing at him. (Plin. xxxvi. 36. § 12.) Plutarch relates his speech as having been made to Megabyzas, De Tranq. Anim. 12, p. 471, f. Aelian tells the anecdote of Zeuxis and Megabyzas. (Var. Hist. ii. 7.) Pliny (l. c.) also tells us that Apelles, having been commissioned by Alexander to paint his favourite companion, Campusa (Ῥέαρκτας, Aelian, Jr. Hist. xii. 34), naked, fell in love with her, upon which Alexander gave her to him as a present; and according to some she was the model of the painter's best picture, the Venus Anadyomene. From all the information we have of the connexion of Apelles with Alexander, we may safely conclude that the former accompanied the latter into Asia. After Alexander's death he appears to have travelled throughout the western parts of Asia. To this period we may probably refer his visit to Rhodes and his intercourse with Protagon. (See below.) Being driven by a storm to Alexandria, after leaving culture by Porus, whose favour he had not gained while he was with Alexander, his rivals laid a plot to ruin him, which he defeated by an ingenious use of his skill in drawing. (Plin. xxxvi. 36. § 13.) Lucian states that Apelles was accused by his rival Antiphilus of having had a share in the conspiracy of Theodorus at Tyre, and that when Ptolemy discovered the falsehood of the charge, he presented Apelles with a hundred talents, and gave Antiphilus to him as a slave; Apelles commemorated the event in an allegorical picture. (De Calumn. lxx. §§ 2—6; vol. iii. pp. 127—132.) Lucian's words imply that he had seen this picture, but he may have been mistaken in ascribing it to Apelles. He narrates also an anecdote of Apelles having been living at Ptolemy's court before this event occurred. If, therefore, Pliny and Lucian are both to be believed, we may conclude, from comparing their tales, that Apelles, having been accidentally driven to Alexandria, overcame the dislike which Ptolemy bore to him, and remained in Egypt during the latter part of his life, enjoying the favour of that king, in spite of the schemes of his rivals to disgrace him. The account of his life cannot be carried further; we are not told when or where he died; but from the above facts his date can be fixed, since he practised his art before the death of Philip (b. c. 350), and after the assumption of the regal title by Ptolemy (b. c. 306.) As the result of a minute examination of all the facts, Tolken (Ammuthes, iii. pp. 117—118) places him between 352 and 308 b. c. According to Pliny, he flourished about the 112th Olympiad, b. c. 332.

Many anecdotes are preserved of Apelles and his contemporaries, which throw an interesting light both on his personal and his professional character. He was ready to acknowledge that in some points he was excelled by other artists, as by Amphiion in grouping and by Asclepiodorus in perspective. (Plin. xxxvi. 36. § 10.) He first caused the merits of Protagon to be understood. Coming to Rhodes, and finding that the works of Protagon were scarcely valued at all by his countrymen, he offered him fifty talents for a single picture, and spread the report that he meant to sell the picture again as his own. (Plin. l. c. § 13.) In speaking of the great artists who were his contemporaries, he ascribed to them every possible excellence except one, namely, grace, which he claimed for himself alone. (l. c. § 10.)

Throughout his whole life, Apelles laboured to improve himself, especially in drawing, which he never spent a day without practising. (Plin. l. c. § 12; hence the proverb Nulla dies sine linea.) The tale of his contest with Protagon affords an example both of the skill to which Apelles attained in this portion of his art, and of the importance attached to it in all the great schools of Greece.

Apelles had sailed to Rhodes, eager to meet Protagon. Upon landing, he went straight to that artist's studio. Protagon was absent, but a large panel ready to be painted on hung in the studio. Apelles seized the pencil, and drew an excessively thin coloured line on the panel, by which Protagenes, on his return, at once guessed who had been his visitor, and in his turn drew a still thinner line of a different colour upon or within the former: (according to the reading of the recent editions of Pliny, in illa ipsa). When Apelles returned and saw the lines, ashamed to be defeated, says Pliny, "torto coloris lineae secutii, nullo relinquens amplius subtilitati locum." (Jb. §11.) The most natural explanation of this difficult passage seems to be, that down the middle of the first line of Apelles, Protagenes drew another so as to divide it into two parallel halves, and that Apelles again divided the line of Protagenes in the same manner. Pliny speaks of the three lines as visum efficiens. The panel was preserved, and carried to Rome, where it remained, exciting more wonder than all the other works of art in the palace of the Caesars, till it was destroyed by fire with that building.

Of the means which Apelles took to ensure accuracy, the following example is given. He used to expose his finished pictures to view in a public place, while he hid himself behind the picture to hear the criticisms of the passers-by. A cobbler detected a fault in the shoes of a figure: the next day he found that the fault was corrected, and was proceeding to criticise the leg, when Apelles rushed from behind the picture, and commanded the cobbler to keep to the shoes. (Plin. H. N. §12: hence the proverb, No supra ovipulam sutor: see also Val. Max. viii. 12, ext. §5; Lucian tells the tale of Phidias, pro Imag. 14, vol. ii. p. 492.) Marvellous tales are told of the extreme accuracy of his likenesses of men and horses. (Plin. xxxv. 35, §§14, 17; Lucian, de Colunn. l. c.; Aelian, V. H. ii. 3.) With all his diligence, however, Apelles was wont to cease correcting. He said that he excelled Protagenes in this one point, that the latter did not know when to leave a picture alone, and he laid down the maxim, Nocere supe riuminum diligentiam. (Plin. l.c. §10: Cic. Orat. 22; Quintil. x. 4.)

Apelles is stated to have made great improvements in the mechanical part of his art. The assertion of Pliny, that he used only four colours, is incorrect. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Color.) He painted with the pencil, but we are not told whether he used the cestrum. His principal discovery was that of covering the picture with a very thin black varnish (ultramarinum), which, besides preserving the picture, made the tints clearer and subdued the more brilliant colours. (Plin. l.c. §18.) The process was, in all probability, the same as that now called glazing. Apelles seems to have been one of those who in the excellence of colouring "which does not proceed from fine colours, but true colours; from breaking down these fine colours, which would appear too raw, to a deep-toned brightness." (Sir J. Reynolds, Notes on Du Fresney, note 37.) From the fact mentioned by Pliny, that this varnishing could be discovered only on close inspection, Sir J. Reynolds thought that it was the same or that of Correggio. That he painted on moveable panels is evident from the frequent mention of tabulce with reference to his pictures. Pliny expressly says, that he did not paint on walls. (xxxv. 37.)

* Does this refer only to the excessive thinness of the lines, or may it mean that the three lines were actually tapered away towards a common vanishing point? *

A list of the works of Apelles is given by Pliny. (xxxv. 36.) They are for the most part single figures, or groups of a few figures. Of his portraits the most celebrated was that of Alexander, who wielded a thunderbolt, which was known as θυοννόμος, and which gave occasion to the saying, that of two Alexanders, the one, the son of Philip, was invincible, the other, he of Apelles, inimitable. (Plut. Fort. Alex. 2, 3.) In this picture the thunderbolt and the hand which held it appeared to stand out of the panel; and, to aid this effect, the artist did not scruple to represent Alexander's complexion as dark, though it was really light. (Plut. Alex. 4.) The price of this picture was twenty talents. Another of his portraits, that of Antigonus, has been celebrated for its concealment of the loss of the king's eye, by representing his face in profile. He also painted a portrait of himself. Among his allegorical pictures was one representing Castor and Pollux, with Victory and Alexander the Great, how grouped we are not told; and another in which the figure of War with his hounds tied behind his back, followed the triumphant car of Alexander. "He also painted," says Pliny, "things which cannot be painted thunder and lightnings, which they call Bronte Astrapa, and Cennobilia." These were clearly allegorical figures. Several of his subjects were taken from the heroic mythology. But of all his pictures the most admired was the "Venus Andromedae," (η θηράδικη Αφροδίτη,) or Venu rising out of the sea. The goddess was wringing her hair, and the falling drops of water formed transparent silver veil around her form. This picture, which is said to have cost 100 talents, we painted for the temple of Aesculapius at Cos, on afterwards placed by Augustus in the temple which he dedicated to Julius Caesar. The lower part being injured, no one could be found to repair it. As it continued to decay, Nero had a copy made by Dorotheus. (Plin. l.c.; Strab. xiv. p. 657.) Apelles commenced another picture of Venus at the Cauns, which he intended should surpass the Venus Andromedae. At his death, he had finished only the head, the upper part of the breasts and the outline of the figure; but Pliny says, that it was more admired than his former finished picture. No one could be found to complete the work. (Plin. xxxv. l.c., and 40; § 41; Cic. ad Ver. l. 9, § 4, de Off. iii. 2.)

By the general consent of ancient authors, Apelles stands first among Greek painters. His undiscriminating admiration of Apelles, we are told to have regarded a portrait of a horse, as true that other horses neighed at it, as an achievement of art as admirable as the Venus Andromedae itself. we may add the unmeasured praise which Cicero, Varro, Columella, Ovid, and other write give to the works of Apelles, and especially to the Venus Andromedae. (Cic. Brut. 18, de Orat. iii. Varro, L. L. ix. 12, ed. Müller; Colum. R. Praef. §31; Schm.; Ovid. Art. Am. iii. 401; Pol. iv. 1. 29; Propert. iii. 7. 11; Auson. Ep. 10. Anthol. Plaud. iv. 178-182.) Statius (Silv. i. 100) and Martial (xii. 9) call painting by the name of "Ars Apellea." Sir Joshua Reynolds says the Greek painters, and evidently with somereference to Apelles, "if we look for the good forte in the ancients, we find it in the experimenters among their masterpieces, I have no doubt but we shall find their figures as correctly drawn as the L-cock, and probably coloured like Titian" (Notes on Du Fresney, note 37); and, though the point has been disputed, such is the general judgment of the best modern authorities. It need scarcely be said, that not one of the pictures of Apelles remains to decide the question by.

In order to understand what was the excellence which was peculiar to Apelles, we must refer to the state of the art of painting in his time. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Painting.) After the essential forms of Polygnotus had been elevated to dramatic effect and ideal expression by Apollodorus and Zeuxis, and enlivened with the vital character and feeling which the school of Eupompus drew forth from direct observation of nature, Apelles perceived that something still was wanting, something which the refinements attained by his contemporaries in grouping, perspective, accuracy, and finish, did not supply—something which he boasted, and succeeding ages confirmed the boast, that he alone achieved—namely, the quality called ἀκραῖος, ἕρμηνειας, γρανει (Plin. xxxiv. 36. § 10; Quintil. xii. 3; Plut. Dec. 22; Aelian, V. H. xii. 41); that is, not only beauty, sublimity, and pathos, but beauty, sublimity, and pathos, each in its proper measure; the expending of power enough to produce the desired effect, and no more; the absence of all exaggeration, as well as of any sensible deficiency; the most natural and pleasing mode of impressing the subject on the spectator's mind, without displaying the means by which the impression is produced. In fact, the meaning which Fuseli attaches to the word seems to be that in which it was used by Apelles: "By grace I mean that artless balance of motion and repose sprung from character, founded on propriety, which neither falls short of the demands nor over-casts the modesty of nature. Applied to execution, t means that dexterous power which hides the means by which it was attained, the difficulties t has conquered." (Lect. 1.) In the same Lecture Fuseli gives the following estimate of the character of Apelles as an artist: "The name of Apelles in history is the synonym of unrivalled and unattainable excellence, but the enumeration of his works points to a gratification which we ought to apply to that superiority; it neither comprises exclusive sublimity of invention, the most acute discrimination of character, the widest sphere of comprehension, the most judicious and best balanced composition, nor the deepest pathos of expression: is great prerogative consisted more in the union him in the extent of his powers; he knew better that he could do, what ought to be done, at what point he could arrive, and what lay beyond his reach, than any other artist. Grace of conception and refinement of taste were his elements, and he had hand in hand with grace of execution and taste in finish; powerful and seldom possessed ung, irresistible when united: that he built both the firm basis of the former system, not on its inversion, his well-known contest of lines with "rotenes, not a legendary tale, but a well attested fact, irrefragably proves: . . . the corollaries may adduce from the contest are obviously rese, that the schools of Greece recognized all one elemental principle: that acuteness and fidelity of ye and obedience of hand form precision; profusion, proportion; proportion, beauty: that it is the little more or less, imperceptible to vulgar eyes, which constitutes grace, and establishes the superiority of one artist above another: that the know-

APELLICON.

The degree of things, or taste, presupposes a perfect knowledge of them, and above all, that colour, grace, and taste, are ornaments, not substances, of form, expression, and character; and, when they usurp that title, degenerate into splendid faults. Such were the principles on which Apelles formed his Venus, or rather the personification of Female Grace,—the wonder of art, the despair of artists." That this view of the Venus is right, is proved, if proof were needed, by the words of Piny (xxxv. 36. § 10), "Deesse susum, Fenrir demisit quam Graec. Claudia cant," except that there is no reason for calling the Venus "the personification of Female Grace;" it was rather Male Grace personified in a female form.

Apelles wrote on painting, but his works are entirely lost.

APELLES (Ἀπελλᾶς), a disciple of Mardon, departed in some points from the teaching of his master. Instead of wholly rejecting the Old Testament, he looked upon its contents as coming partly from the good principle, partly from the evil principle. Instead of denying entirely the reality of Christ's human body, he held that in his descent from heaven he assumed to himself an aerial body, which he gave back to the air as he ascended. He denied the resurrection of the body, and considered differences of religious belief as unimportant, since, said he, "all who put their trust in the Crucified One will be saved, if they only prove their faith by good works."

Apelles flourished about A. D. 130, and lived to a very great age. Tertullian (Prescript. Hiat. 30) says, that he was expelled from the school of Mardon for fornication with one Philumena, who fancied herself a prophetess, and whose fantasies were recorded by Apelles in his book entitled Ἀφαίρεσις. But since Rhodon, who was the personal opponent of Apelles, speaks of him as universally honoured for his course of life (Eusèb. H. E. v. 18), we may conclude that the former part of Tertullian's story is one of those inventions which were so commonly made in order to damage the character of heretics. Besides the Ἀφαίρεσις, Apelles wrote a work entitled "Sylogismos," the object of which Eusèbina states (c. 2) to have been, to prove that the writings of Moses were false. It must have been a very large work, since Ambrose (De Paradis. 5) quotes from the thirty-eighth volume of it. (See also Tertull. adv. Marcin. iv. 17; Augustin. de Haer. 23; Epiphanius, Haer. 44.)

APELLICON (Ἀπελλίκον), a native of Teos, was a Peripatetic philosopher and a great collector of books. In addition to the number which his immense wealth enabled him to purchase, he stole several out of the archives of different Greek cities. His practices having been discovered at Athens, he was obliged to fly from the city to save his life. He afterwards returned during the tyranny of Aristion, who patronized him, as a member of the same philosophic sect with himself, and gave him the command of the expedition against Delos, which, though at first successful, was ruined by the carelessness of Apellicon, who was surprised by the Romans under Orbinius, and with difficulty escaped, having lost his whole army. (Athén. v. pp. 214, 215.) His library was carried to Rome by Sulla. (Plut. c. 34.) Apellicon had died just before. (Strab. xiii. p. 669.)

Apellicon's library contained the autographs of Aristotle's works, which had been given by that philosopher, on his death-bed, to Theophrastus, and by him to Neleus, who carried them to Scæpis, in Trœas, where they remained, having been hidden and much injured in a cave, till they were purchased by Apollon, who published a very faulty edition of them. Upon the arrival of the MSS. at Rome, they were examined by the grammarians Tyronius, who furnished copies of them to An- dronikus of Rhodes, upon which the latter prepared his edition of Aristotle. APEMUSI (Ἀπέμυς), a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar on mount Parnes in Attica, on which sacrifices were offered to him. (Paus. i. 32. § 2.)

APEMUSI, a Greek grammarian, who lived in Rome in the time of Tiberius. He belonged to the school of Aristarchus, and was the instructor of Heracleides Ponticus. He was a strenuous oppor- nent of the grammarians Didymus. (Suidas, s. v. Ἰδύμων.)

[C. P. M.]

M. APEMUS, a Roman orator and a native of Gaul, rose by his eloquence to the rank of Quaes- tor, Tribune, and Praetor, successively. He is introduced as one of the speakers in the Deipnosophists, attributed to Ctesias, defending the style of oratory in his day against those who advocated the ancient form. (See cc. 2, 7, &c.)

APEMUS, ARIUS, the praetorian prefect, and the son-in-law of the emperor Numerian, murdered the emperor, as it was said, on the retreat of the army from Persia to the Hellespont. He carefully concealed the death of Numerian, and issued all the orders in his name, till the soldiers learnt the truth by breaking into the imperial tent on the Hellespont. They then elected Diocletian as his successor, a. d. 284, who straightway put Aper to death with his own hand without any trial. Vo- piscus relates that Diocletian did this to fulfil a prophecy which had been delivered to him by a female Druid, "Imperator crisi, eum Aperocrin ac- cedit." (Veipsi. Numer. 12-14; Aurel. Vitr. de Caes. 38. 39, Epit. 38; Extrop. ix. 12, 13.)

APEASTAUNIUS (Ἀπασταυρίνου), a surname of Zeus, under which he had a temple on mount Apessa near Nemea, where Persus was said to have first offered sacrifices to him. (Paus. ii. 15. § 3; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀσταύαρος.)

APACHITAIUS (Ἀπαχίταιος), a surname of Aphr- dite, derived from the town of Apacha in Coele- Syria, where she had a celebrated temple with an oracle, which was destroyed by the command of the emperor Constantine. (Zosimus, i. 58.)

APHRAEA. [Ἄφραίας.]

APEPHAEUS (Ἀπεφαῖ), a son of the Messe- nian king Perieres and Gorgonides, the daughter of Perieres. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 6.) His wife is called by Apollodorus (ii. 10. § 3) Arnea, and by others Polydora or Lacoconia. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 152; Theocrit. xiii. 106.) Apephaeus had three sons, Lynceus, Idas, and Pelasus. He was believed to have founded the town of Arnea in Messenia, which he called after his wife. He received Neleus and Lycurgus the son of Pandion, who had fled from their countries into his dominions. To the former he assigned a tract of land in Messenia, and from the latter he and his family learned the oracles of the great gods. (Paus. iv. 2. § 3, &c.) Pausanias in this passage mentions only the two sons of Aphræus, Idas and Lynceus, who are celebrated in ancient story under the name of Aphræus. [Ἀπφραῖ] For their flight with the Dioscuri, which is described by Pindar. (Nem. x. 111.)

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Hom. ii. xii. 541; Od. Met. xii. 341. [L. S.]

APEPHAEUS (Ἀπεφαῖ), an Athenian poet and tragic poet, was a son of the rhetorician Thea- pias and Plathane. After the death of his father, his mother married the orator Iascrus, and adopted Apephaeus as his son. He was trained in the school of Iasctus, and is said to have written judicial and deliberative speeches. (Ἀπόφη οικίς συμβουλευτικοὶ.) An ornament of the kind, of which we know only the name, was written and spoken by Apephaeus on behalf of Isocrates against Megacleides. (Plut. Vit. X. Orol. p. 555, Dionys. Isocr. 18, Dinarch. 13; Euseb. p. Suid. s. v.; Phot. Cod. 260.) Accordingly to a nar- rach, Apephaeus wrote thirty-seven tragedies, the authorship of two of them was a matter of dispute. He began his career as a tragic poet about n. c. 369, and continued it till n. c. 454. He gained four prizes in tragedy, two at the Dion and two at the Lena. His tragedies for the most part lost to us, as e. four were performed at a time when the fragments, not even a ti- tle of any of them, have come down to us. (L. S.)

APEFIDAS (Ἀπεφίδας), a son of Arcas and Leaneira, or according to others, by Megaea and Chrysopoleia, or Erato. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 6.) When Apephidas and his two brothers had grown up, their father divided his kingdom among them. Apephidas obtained Tegea and the surrounding territory, which was therefore called by poets Καρπάρα Ἀπεφίδατος. Apephidas had a son, Alcmaeon. (Paus. viii. 4. § 2; Alcmaeon.) Two other mythological personages of this name occur in Hom. Od. x. 353; Od. Met. xii. 317. [L. S.]

APEFUSION (Ἀπεφύσων), a son of Bathiphus, who commenced operations against the laws of the Leptines respecting the exclusion of exiles from liturgies. Bathiphus was afterwards killed, and the matter was left to the decision of Clytius. Phormion, the orator, spoke in defence of Apeifuos, and Meneosthenes for Clytius. (A. G. ad Dom. Lepyt. p. 543; Dom. c. Lepyt. p. 540; Wolf, Proleg. in Demoth. Lepyt. p. 48, &c., pp. 54-56.)

APEPHINEUS (Ἀπεφεῖνος), the giver of food to the swine, a surname of Ares, under which he had a temple on mount Cnestus, near Tegea in Arcadia. Ares, the daughter of Cephisus, became the wife of Bathiphus, the mother of a son (Apefous), but she died at the moment she gave birth to the child, and Ares, wishing to save it, caused the child to derive its nourishment from the breast of its dead mother. This was given rise to the surname Apephineus. (Paus. viii. 3. § 8; L. S.)

APEPHIS (Ἀπεφῆς), a Persian, wrote a de- scription of the east in Greek, a fragment of which is given by Du Cange. (Ad Zonius, p. 50.)

[AP. S.]

APEPHIUS, SCRIDONIUS, a Roman, grammarian, originally a slave and disciple of Orbilius, was purchased by Scribonius, the first man of the name of Augustus, and by her manumitted. (Suet. Histr. Gram. 19.)

APEPHIONIUS (Ἀπεφίωνις), of Antioch, Greek rhetorician who lived about A. D. 315, but of whose life nothing is known. He is the author of an elementary introduction to the study of rhetoric, and of a number of fables in the style of those of Aesop. The introduction to the study of rhetoric, which bears the title Progymnasmata (προγυμνασματα), if considered from a right point of view, is of great interest, inasmuch as it shows us the method followed by the ancients in the instruction of boys, before they were sent to the regular schools of the rhetoricians. The book consists of rules and exercises. Previous to the time of Aphthonius the progymnasmata of Hermogenes were commonly used in schools; Aphthonius found it insufficient, and upon its basis he constructed his new work, which contained fourteen progymnasmata, while that of his predecessor contained only twelve. Soon after its appearance the work of Aphthonius superseded that of Hermogenes, and became the common school-book in this branch of education for several centuries. On the revival of letters the progymnasmata of Aphthonius recovered their ancient popularity, and during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries they were used everywhere, but more especially in Germany, in schools and universities, as the text-book for rhetoric. But by a singular mistake the work was during that period regarded as the canon of everything that was required to form a perfect orator, whereas the author and the ancients had intended and used it as a collection of elementary and preparatory exercises for children. The number of editions and translations which were published during that period is greater than that of any other ancient writer in education. Beil. Græc. vi. p. 99, &c.; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr. ii. p. 198, &c. The most important among the subsequent editions are that of Quinta, Florence, 1515, 8vo, which contains also the progymnasmata of Hermogenes; that of Camerarius, with a Latin translation, Lips. 1657, 8vo; of B. Harthart, 1591, 8vo, with a Latin translation and notes; of F. Scobarius, 1597, 8vo, and that of J. Scheffer, Upsala, 1670, 8vo. The last and best edition is that in Walz's collection of the "Rhetores Graeci," i. p. 54, &c. It contains the notes of cheffer, and an ancient abridgment of the work by M. Matteu (τα τυχουσα πρακτηρια προ-γυμνασμων), and a sort of commentary upon them by an anonymous writer (Ανευγραφων εκ των τοις μεταφρασθησαντων), p. 151, &c., 126, &c.

The Δαισικες fables of Aphthonius, which are in merit to those of Aesop, are printed in scobarius's edition of the progymnasmata, and also the Paris edition of 1623. Furia's edition of Δαισικες fables of Aesop contains twenty-three of those Aphthonius. (Westermann, Geschichte der rhetor. Beredsamkeit, § 98, nn. 16—20.) [L. S.] ΑΠΗΘΟΝΙΟΣ (Αθθονιος) of Alexandria is mentioned by Philostorgius (iii. 15) as a learned diligent bishop of the Manicheans. He is mentioned as a disciple and commentator of Mani Photius and Peter of Sicily, and in the form of juries Manicheans. Philostorgius adds, that this had a public dispute with Aphthonius, which the latter was defeated, and died of grief ten days afterwards. [P. S.]

APICATA, the wife of Seianus, was seduced by him, A. D. 29, after she had borne him three timet, when he had seduced Livia, the wife of Drusus, and was plotting against the life of the latter. His subsequent murder of Drusus was first disclosed by Apicata. (Tac. Ann. iv. 3, 11.) When Seianus and his children were killed eight years thereafter, A. D. 31, Apicata put an end to her own life. (Dion Cass. Vitii. 11.)

APICIUS. Ancient writers distinguish three Romans bearing this name, all of them indebted for celebrity to the same cause, their devotion to gluttony.

1. The first of these in chronological order, is who has been instrumental in procuring the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, who went into exile in the year a. c. 92. According to Posidonius, in the 49th book of his history, he transcended all men in luxury. (Athen. iv. p. 108, &c.; compare Post. Olymp. ephemerid. ed. Bak.)

2. The second and most renowned, M. Galbaus Aricia, flourished under Tiberius, and many aeolides have been preserved of the inventive genius, the skill and the prodigality which he displayed in discovering and creating new sources of culinary delight, arranging new combinations, and raising every part of the globe and every kingdom of nature for new objects to stimulate and gratify his appetite. At last, after having squandered upwards of eight hundred thousand pounds upon the indulgence of his all-engrossing passion, he balanced his books, and found that little more thirty thousand remained; upon which, des airing of being able to satisfy the cravings of hunger from such a miserable pittance, he forth with hanged himself. But he was not forgotten.
Sundry cakes (APICUS) and sauces long kept alive his memory; Apic, the grammarian, compiled a work upon his famous labours; his name passed into a proverb in all matters connected with the pleasures of the table; he became the model of gastronomers, and schools of cookery arose which hailed him as their mighty master. (Tact.
Ann. iv. 1; Dion Cass. Vitii. 10; Athen. i. p. 7, &c.; Plin.
H. N. viii. 51, ix. 17, x. 48, xii. 8; Suet. Consol.
ad Helo, 10, Epp. xiv. 43, eXX. 20, Do Vitt. Beatt.
xi. 3; Juuv. iv. 23, and Schol. xi. 2; Martial,
i. 69, iii. 22, x. 73; Laund. Heligob. 18, &c.; Sidon. Apollin. Epp. iv. 7; Suidas, s. v. ARICUS; Isidor. Orig. xx. 4; Tertullian. Apolog. 8.)

3. When the emperor Trajan was in Parthia, many days distant from the sea, a certain Apicius sent him fresh oysters, preserved by a skilful process of his own. (Athen. i. p. 7, &c.; Suidas,
s. v. ARICUS."

The first and third of these are mentioned by Atheneans alone, the second by very many writers, as may be seen from the authorities quoted above.
Hence some scholars, startled not unnaturally by the singular coincidence of name and pursuit, have endeavoured to prove that there was in reality only one Apicius, namely the second, and that the multiplication arose from the tales with regard to his excesses having passed from mouth to mouth among persons ignorant of chronology, or from the stories current with regard to various gluttons having been all in the process of time referred to the most famous of all. It will be observed, however, that in so far as the first is concerned Atheneans points directly to the source from whence his information was derived, and can only apply to individual with an imputed, and well known historical fact, nor is it probable that there is any confusion of names in the passage relating to the third, since it is confirmed by the text of Suidas, who evidently quotes from Athenaeus. (See, however, Vincent. Contemp. Var. Lect. c. xviii.; Lipsius on Tacit. Ann. iv. 1; Lister. Praef. ad Apion.)

The treatise we now possess, bearing the title CARLI APICH de operibus et condimentis, sive de re culinaria, Libri decem, appears to have been first discovered by Enoch of Asceli, about the year 1454, in the time of Pope Nicolas V., and the editio princeps was printed at Milan in 1498. It is a sort of Cook and Confectioner's Manual, containing a multitude of receipts for preparing and dressing all kinds of flesh, fish, and fowl, for compounding sauces, baking cakes, preserving sweetmeats, flavouring wines, and the like. From the inaccuracies and solemnities of the style, it is probable that it was compiled at a remote period by some one who prefixed the name of Apicus, in order to attract attention and insure the circulation of his book. It is not without value, however, since it affords an insight into the details of a Roman kitchen which we seek for elsewhere in vain.

The best editions are those of Martin Lister, published at London, in 1705, reprinted with additions by Almeloveen (Amstelod. 1709), and that of Bernhold (Marebrecht. 1737, Barth. 1791, and Ansbach. 1808). There is an illustrative work by Dierbach, entitled Flora Apiciana. (Heidelberg, 1831.) [W. R.]

APYNIUS TITRO. [TIRO.]

AP'ION (Ἀπίων), a Greek grammarian. His name is sometimes incorrectly spelt Appion, and some writers, like Suidas, call him a son of Pleistoneis, while others more correctly state that Pleistoneis was only a surname, and that he was the son of Poseidonius. (Gell. vi. 8; Senec. Epist. 88; Euseb. Praep. Eclog. x. 10.) He was a native of Asia, but used to say that he was born at Alexandria, where he studied under Apollonius, the son of Archibius, and Didymus, from whom he imbibed his love for the Homeric poems. (Suid. s. v. Ἀπίων; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 3, &c.) He afterwards settled at Rome, where he taught rhetoric as the successor of the grammarians Theon in the reign of Tibereius and Claudius. He appears to have enjoyed an extraordinary reputation for his extensive knowledge and his versatility as an orator; but the anecdotes are unauthentic, insuring his estimations vanity. (Gell. x. 14; Plin. H. N. Præf. and xxx. 6; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 12.) He declared that every one who mentioned in his works would be immortalized; he placed himself by the side of the greatest philosophers of ancient Greece, and used to say, that Alexandria ought to be proud of having a man like himself among its citizens. It is not unlikely that the name "cymbalum mundi," by which Tibereus was accustomed to call him, was meant to express both his loquacity and his boastful character. He is spoken of as the most active of grammarians, and the surname ῥῆσφα which he bore, according to Suidas, is usually explained as describing the zeal and labour with which he prosecuted his studies. In the reign of Caligula he travelled about in Greece, and was received everywhere with the highest honours as the great interpreter of Homer. (Senec. l. c.) About the same time, A. p. 28, the inhabitants of Alexandria raised complaints against the Jews residing in their city, and endeavoured to curtail their rights and privileges. They sent an embassy to the emperor Caligula, which was headed by Apion, for he was a skilful speaker and known to entertain great hatred of the Jews. The latter also sent an embassy, which was headed by Philo. In this transaction Apion appears to have overstepped the limits of his commission, for he not only brought forward the complaints of his fellow-citizens, but endeavoured to excite the emperor's anger against the Jews by reminding him that they refused to erect statues to him and to swear by his sacred name. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 10.)

The results of this embassy, as well as the remaining part of Apion's life, are unknown; but if we may believe the account of his enemy Josephus (c. Apion. ii. 10), he died of a disease which he had brought upon himself by his dissolute mode of life.

Apion was the author of a considerable number of works, all of which are now lost with the exception of some fragments. 1. Upon Homer, whose poems seem to have formed the principal part of his studies, for he is said not only to have made the best recension of the text of the poems, but to have written explanations of phrases and words in the form of a dictionary (Ἄρετες Ὀρμωπρα), and investigations concerning the life and native country of the poet. The best part of his Ἀρετες Ὀρμωπρα are supposed to be incorporated in the Homeric Lexicon of Apollonius. (Villoison, Proleg. ad Apollon. p. ix. &c.) Apion's labours upon Homer are often referred to by Eustathius and other grammarians. 2. A work on Egypt (Ἀριοτοκολλα), consisting of five books, which was highly valued in antiquity, for it contained descriptions of nearly all the remarkable objects in Egypt. It also contained numerous attacks upon the Jews. (Enseh. Proop. Eclog. x. 10; Gell. v. 14; Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 19.) 3. A work against the Jews. (Euseb. l. c.) A reply to these attacks is made by Josephus, in the second book of his work usually called ᾿Ις Ὀρμωπρος, and this reply is the only source from which we learn anything about the character of Apion's work. 4. A work in praise of Alexander the Great. (Gell. vi. 3.) 5. Histories of separate countries. (Ἱστορίας κατὰ Θέον, Suid. s. v. Ἀπίων.) 6. On the celebrated glutton Apicianus and, 7. Περὶ τῆς Ῥωμαϊκῆς διαλέκτου. (Athen. vii. p. 204, xv. p. 680.) 6. De metallis discipline (Plin. Eclog. xciv. 300.); xxxix. 171.) The greatest fragment of the works of Apion are the story about Androclus and his lion, and about the dolphin near Dicaearchia, both of which are preserved in Collini Suidas (σ. υ. Ἀγαλτῆς, σπειαδῆς, σφάγκον, an ῥῆσφα) refers to Apion as a writer of epigrams but whether he is the same as the grammarian uncertain. (Villoison, l. c.; Burigny, in the Mémoire de l'Acad. des Inspect. xxxviii. p. 171, &c.; Leb. Quest. Epicur. Dissert. i., who chiefly discuss what Apion did for Homer. [L. S.]

AP'ION, PTOLEMAEUS. [PTOLEMAEAE APION.]

API'S (Ἀπίς). 1. A son of Phoronessus by his nymph Laodice, and brother of Niobe. He was king of Argos, established a tyrannical government and called Ptolomeus after his own name Apis, but he was killed in a conspiracy headed by Thesid and Telchis. (Apollod. i. 7. 6, ii. 1. 8.) In the former of these passages Apollodorus states that Apis, the son of Phoronessus, was killed Aetolus; but this is a mistake arising from confusion of our Απίς with Ἀπις the son of Νιοβες.
who was killed by Actolus during the funeral games celebrated in honour of Asanes. (Paus. v. i. § 6; Arztolus.)

Actolus, son of Phoroneus, is said, after his death, to have been worshipped as a god, under the name of Sempis (Σαμπής); and this statement shows that Egyptian myths are mixed up more and more with the story of Apis. This confusion is still manifest in the tradition, that Apis gave his kingdom of Argos to his brother, and went to Egypt, where he reigned for several years afterwards. (Enach. Chron. n. 371; Augustin, de Cin. Dei, xvii. 5.) Apis is spoken of as one of the eldest lawgivers among the Greeks. (Theodoret. Grec. Aftect. Cpr. vol. iv. p. 927, ed. Schulz.)

2. A son of Telchis, and father of Thelxion. He was king at Sicyon, and is said to have been such a powerful prince, that previous to the arrival of Pelops, Peloponneseus was called after him Apis. (Paus. ii. 5 § 5.)

Besides the third Apis, the son of Jason, mentioned under the name of Serapis, there is a fourth, a son of Aegaeus, mentioned by Aeschylos. (Soph. 262.) (L.S.)

APIS (Apis), the Bull of Memphis, which enjoyed the highest honours as a god among the Egyptians. (Pomp. Mela. i. 9; Aelian, Hist. An. xi. 10; Lucian, de Serv. 15.) He is called the greatest of gods, and the god of all nations, while others regard him more in the light of a symbol of some great divinity; for some authorities state, that Apis was the bull sacred to the moon, as Menevis was the one sacred to the sun. (Suid. s.v.; Ammian. Marcell. xxix. 14; Aelian, l. c.; Lutatius, ad Stat. Thcb. iii. 473.) According to Macrobius (Sat. i. 21), on the other hand, Apis was regarded as the symbol of the sun. The most common opinion was, that Apis was sacred to Osiris, in whom the sun was worshipped; and sometimes Apis is described as the soul of Osiris, or as identical with him. (Diod. i. 21; Plut. de Is. et Os. 20, 34, 43; Strabo. xvii. p. 807.)

In regard to the birth of this divine animal Herodotus (iii. 26) says, that he was the offspring of a young cow which was frightened by a ray from heaven, and according to others it was by a ray of the moon that she conceived him. (Suid., Aelian, l. c.; Plut. de Is. et Os. 45.) The signs by which it was recognised that the newly born bull was really the god Apis, are described by several of the ancients. According to Herodotus (l. c.; comp. Strabo. l. c.), it was requisite that the animal should be quite black, have a white square mark on the forehead, on its back a figure similar to that of an eagle, have two kinds of hair in its tail, have the horns in sections and an insect called καθαρέας. (Compare Ammian. Marcell. l. c.; Jolius, 32.) Pliny (H. N. viii. 71), who states, that the castratus was under the tongue, adds, that the right side of the body was marked with a white spot resembling the horns of the new moon. Kellian says, that twenty-nine signs were required; but some of those which he mentions have reference to the later astronomical and physical speculations about the god. When all the signs were found satisfactorily in a newly born bull, the ceremony of his consecration began. This solemnity is described by Aelian, Pliny, Ammianus Marcellus, and Diodorus. (l. 50.) When it was made known, says Aelian, that the god was born, some of the sacred scribes, who possessed the secret knowledge of the signs of Apis, went to the place of his birth, and built a house there in the direction towards the rising sun. In this house the god was fed with milk for the space of four months, and the priests, who went every day to the new-born god, the scribes and prophets prepared a ship sacred to the god, in which he was conveyed to Memphis. Here he entered his splendid residence, containing extensive walls and courts for his amusement. A number of the choicest cows, forming as it were the harem of the god, were kept in his palace at Memphis. The account of Diodorus, though on the whole agreeing with that of Aelian, contains some additional particulars of interest. Pliny and Ammian Marcellinus do not mention the god's harem, and state that Apis was only once in every year allowed to come in contact with a cow, and that this cow was, like the god himself, marked in a peculiar way. Apis, moreover, drank the water of only one particular well in his palace, since the water of the Nile was believed to be too fattening.

The god had no other occupation at Memphis, than the care of his household, and the maintenance of his attendants and worshippers, and to give oracles, which he did in various ways. According to Pliny, his temple contained two thalami, and accordingly as he entered the one or the other, it was regarded as a favourable or unfavourable sign. Other modes in which oracles were derived from Apis are mentioned in the following passages: Lutat. ad Stat. Theb. iii. 473; Diog. Laërt. viii. 9; Paus. vii. 23; § 2; Plin. Aelian, Solinus, U. cc.; Plut. de Is. et Os. 14.

As regards the mode in which Apis was worshipped, we know, from Herodotus (ii. 38, 41), that oxen, whose purity was scrupulously examined before, were offered to him as sacrifices. His birthday, which was celebrated every year, was his most solemn festival; it was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt. The god was allowed to live only for a certain number of years, probably twenty-five. (Lucan, Phare. vii. 477; Plut. de Is. et Os. 56.) If he had not died before the expiration of that period, he was killed and buried in a sacred well, the place of which was unknown except to the initiated, and who he betrayed it was severely punished. (Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. p. 194.) If, however, Apis died a natural death, he was buried publicly and solemnly, and, as it would seem, in the temple of Serapis at Memphis, to which the entrance was left open at the time of Apis' burial. (Paus. i. 16 § 4; Clem. Alex. Strom. l. p. 522; Plut. de Is. et Os. 28.) The name Serapis or Serapis itself is said to signify "the tomb of Apis." Respecting the particular costume and rites of the burial, as well as the miracles which used to accompany it, see Diod. i. 84; 96; Plut. l. c. 29, 35. As the birth of Apis filled all Egypt with joy and festivities, so his death threw the whole country into grief and mourning; and there was no one, as Lucian says, who valued his hair so much that he would not have shorn his head on that occasion. (Lucian, de Serv. 15; de Deo Syr. 6; Tibull. i. 11; Ammian. Marc. Solin. l. c.) However, this time of mourning did not usually last long, as a new Apis was generally kept ready to fill the place of his predecessor; and as soon as he was found, the mourning was at an end, and the rejoicings began. (Diod. i. 85; Spurius, Haur. 12.)

The worship of Apis was, without doubt, originally nothing but the simple worship of the bull, and formed a part of the Aielh-worship of the APHRODITE.

Egyptians; but in the course of time, the bull, like other animals, was regarded as a symbol in the astronomical and physical systems of the Egyptian priests. How far this was carried may be seen from what Aelian says about the twenty-nine marks on the body of Apis, which form a complete astronomical and physical system. For further details respecting these late speculations, the reader is referred to the works on Egyptian mythology by Jabloński, Champollion, Pritchard, and others.

The Persians, in their religious intolerance, ridiculed and scorned the Egyptian gods, and more especially Apis. Cymbyses killed Apis with his own hand (Herod. iii. 29), and Osiris had him slaughtered. (Plut. i. c. 51.) The Greeks and Jews had a different reason for their contempt: no man to their feelings in the worship of Apis, and Alexander the Great gained the good will of the Egyptians by offering sacrifices to Apis as well as to their other gods. (Arrian, Amab. iii. 1.) Several of the Roman emperors visited and paid homage to Apis, and his worship seems to have maintained itself nearly down to the extinction of paganism. (Suet. Aug. 93; Vespas. 5; Tacit. Annal. ii. 59; Plin. l.c.; Spartan. l.c., Sept. Sophr. 17.) [L.S.]

APHRODITE ('Aphrodithē), one of the great Olympian divinities, was, according to the popular and poetical notions of the Greeks, the goddess of love and beauty. Some traditions stated that she had sprung from the foam ('bathos') of the sea, which had gathered around the mutilated parts of Uranus, that had been thrown into the sea by Kronos after he had unmanned his father. (Hesiod, Theog. 190; compare Anadyomene.) With the exception of the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite there is no trace of this legend in Homer, and according to him Aphrodite is the daughter of Zeus and Dione. (H. v. 370, &c., x. 105.) Later traditions call her a daughter of Kronos and Eunomie, or of Uranus and Hemera. (Cic. De Nat. Doctr. iii. 28; Natal. Con. iv. 13.) According to Hesiod and the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite, the goddess after rising from the foam first approached the island of Cythera, and thence went to Cyprus, and as she was walking on the sea-coast flowers sprung up under her feet, and Eros and Himeros accompanied her to the assembly of the other great gods, all of whom were struck with admiration and love when she appeared, and her surpassing beauty made every one desire to have her for his wife. According to the cosmogonic views of the nature of Aphrodite, she was the personification of the generative powers of nature, and the mother of all living beings. A trace of this notion seems to be contained in the tradition that in the contest of Typhon with the gods, Aphrodite metamorphosed herself into a fish, which animal was considered to possess the greatest generative powers. (Ov. Met. v. 318, &c.; comp. Hygin. Poet. Aed. 30.) But according to the popular belief of the Greeks and their poetical descriptions, she was the goddess of love, who excited this passion in the hearts of gods and men, and by this power ruled over all the living creation. (Hom. Hymn. in Ven.; Lucret. 15, &c.) Ancient mythology furnishes numerous instances in which Aphrodite punished those who neglected her worship or despised her power, as well as others in which she favoured and protected those who did homage to her and recognized her sway. Love and beauty are ideas essentially connected, and Aphrodite was therefore also the goddes of beauty and gracefulness. In these points she surpassed all other goddesses, and she received the prize of beauty from Paris; she had further the power of granting beauty and invincible charms to others. Youth is the herald, and Peitho, the Home, and Charites, the attendants and companions of Aphrodite. (Pind. Nem. viii. 1, &c.) Marriages are called by Zeus her work and the things about which she ought to busy herself. (Hom. H. v. 429; comp. Od. xx. 74; Pind. Pyth. ix. 16, &c.) As she herself had sprung from the sea, she is represented by later writers as having some influence upon the sea. (Verg. Aen. viii. 500; Ov. Herod. xvi. 213; comp. Paus. H. ii. 34, § 11.)

During the Trojan war, Aphrodite, the mother of Aeneas, declared the most beautiful of all the goddesses by a Trojan prince, naturally sided with the Trojans. She saved Paris from his contest with Menelaus (H. ii. 330), but when she endeavoured to rescue her darling Aeneas from the fight, she was pursued by Diomede, who wounded her in her hand. In her fright she abandoned her son, and was carried by Iris in the chariot of Ares to Olympus, where she complained of her misfortune to her mother Dione, but was laughed at by Hera and Athena. (H. ii. 311, &c.) She also protected the body of Hector, and anointed it with ambrosia. (H. xxiii. 185.)

According to the most common accounts of the ancients, Aphrodite was married to Hephaestus (Odys. viii. 270), who, however, is said in the Iliad (viii. 393) to have married Charis. Her faithlessness to Hephaestus in her amour with Ares, and the manner in which she was caught by the ingenuity of her husband, are beautifully described in the Odyssey. (viii. 266, &c.) By Ares she became the mother of Phobos, Deimos, Harmonia, and, according to later traditions, of Eros and Anteros also. (Hesiod. Theog. 334, &c.; Suid. H. 195; Hom. H. vii. 299, iv. 440; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 26; Cie. de Nat. Doctr. iii. 23.) But Ares was not the only god whom Aphrodite favoured; Dionysus, Hermes, and Poseidon likewise enjoyed her charms. By the first she was, according to some traditions, the mother of Priamus (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 383) and Bacchantes (Iliasch. e. n. Bédroschou Andromé). By the second of her offspring (Schol. ad Iliasch. n. 6; Lucian, Dial. Doctr. x. 2), and by Poseidon she had two children, Rhodos and Herophilus (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. viii. 24.) As Aphrodite is often kindled in the hearts of the gods a love for mortals, Zeus at last resolved to make her pay for her wanton sport by inspiring her too with love for a mortal man. This was accomplished, and Aphrodite conceived an invincible passion for Anchises, by whom she became the mother of Aeneas and Lyneas. [Anchises.] Respecting her connections with other mortals see ADOIDES and BURRJ.

Aphrodite possessed a magic girdle which had the power of inspiring love and desire for those who wore it; hence it was borrowed by Her when she wished to stimulate the love of Aeneas (Hom. H. xiv. 214, &c.) The arrow is also sometimes mentioned as one of her attributes. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 330; Theocrit. xi. 16.) In the vegetable kingdom the myrtle, rose, apple, poppy, and other were sacred to her. (Ov. Fast. iv. 15, 143; Bio. I. 64; Schol. ad Aetych. Nub. 993; Pau. ii. 10. § 4; Phornut. 23.) The animals sacred her, which are often mentioned as drawing h chariot or serving as her messengers, are the sparrow, the dove, the swan, the swallow, and a bird called lynx. (Sappho, in Fes. 10; Athen. ix. p.
395; Horst. Carm. iv. 1. 10; Aelian, Hist. An.
xs. 34; Pind. Pyth. l.c.) As Aphrodite Urania the tortoise, the symbol of domestic modesty and chastity, and as Aphrodite Pandemos the ram was sacred to her. (Urania; Pandemos.) When she was represented as the victorious goddess, she had the attributes of Ares, a helmet, a shield, a sword:
or a lance, and an image of Victory in one hand.
The planet Venus, final of the spring months of April were likewise sacred to her. (Cic. de Nat.
Dens. iii. 20; Ov. Fast. iv. 90.) All the surnames and epithets given to Aphrodite are derived from places of her worship, from events connected with the legends about her, or have reference to her character and her influence upon man, or are descriptive of her extraordinary beauty and charms. All her surnames are explained in separate articles.

The principal places of her worship in Greece were the islands of Cyprus and Cythera. At Chnidus in Caria she had three temples, one of which contained her renowned statue by Praxiteles.
Mount Ida in Crete was an ancient place of her worship, and among the other places we may mention particularly the island of Cos, the towns of Abydos, Athens, Thebes, Megara, Sparta, Sicyon, Corinth, and Eryx in Sicily. The sacrificial offers to her consisted mostly of incense and garlands of flowers (Virg. Aen. i. 416; Tacit. Hist. li. 5), but in some places animals, such as pigs, goats, young cows, hares, and others, were sacrificed to her.
In some places, as at Corinth, great numbers of females belonged to her, who prostituted themselves in her service, and bore the name of ἑραίσκων. (Did. de Δεικτικανοὺς. (Dict. of Ant.) s. v. ἑραίσκων.) Respecting the festivals of Aphrodite see Dict. of Ant. s. v. ἑραίσκων, ἑραίσκων, ἑραίσκων, ponent of the Arias, and a personal friend of Athanasius; and in arguing against the former, he maintained, that the Divine Word (the Logos) supplied the place of a rational soul in the person of Christ. He died between 392 and 392 a.d. His doctrine was condemned by a synod at Rome, about 375 A.D., but it was continued to be held by a considerable sect, who were called Apollinarians, down to the middle of the fifth century. (Hieron. de Vin. Iustit. 104; Socrates, H. E. ii. 46, iii. 16; Sozomen, H. E. v. 18, vi. 25; Suidas, s. v.; Cave, Hist. Eccl.; Wernstedt, Diss. de Apollin.)

3. The author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, is very probably the same person as the elder Apollinaris of Laodicea. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. xxii. p. 837.)

APOLLINARIS, CLAUDIUS, the commander of Vitellius' fleet at Mammeeum, when it revolted to Vespasian in A.D. 70. Apollinaris escaped with six galleys. (Tac. Hist. iii. 57, 76, 77.)

APOLLO (Ἀπόλλων), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, was, according to Homer (I. ii. 21, 36), the son of Zeus and Leto. Hesiod (Theog. 918) states the same, and adds, that Apollo's sister was Artemis. Neither of the two poets suggests anything in regard to the birth-place of the god, unless we take Αὐτήρεσις (H. i. 101) in the sense of "born in Lycia," which, however, according to others, would only mean "born of or in light." Several towns and places claimed the honour of his birth, as we see from various local traditions mentioned by late writers. Thus the Ephesians said that Apollo and Artemis were born in the grove of Ortygia near Ephesus (Tacit. Annal. iii. 61); the inhabitants of Tegea in Boetia and of Zoster in Attica claimed the same honour for themselves. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Τέγεα.) In some of these local traditions Apollo is mentioned alone, and in others together with his sister Artemis. The account of Apollo's parentage, too, was not the same in all traditions (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 25), and the Egyptians made out that he was a son of Dione and Isis. (Herod. ii. 158.) But the opinion most universally received was, that Apollo, the son of Zeus and Leto, was born in the island of Delos, together with his sister Artemis; and the circumstances of his birth there are detailed in the Homer of the same Apollo, and in that of Callimachus on Delos. (Comp. Apol. l. iv. § 1; Hygin. Foh. 140.) Hera in her jealousy pursued Leto from land to land and from isle to isle, and endeavoured to prevent her from giving birth. At last, however, she arrived in Delos, where she was kindly received, and after nine days' labour she gave birth to Apollo under a palm or an olive tree at the foot of Mount Cynthia. She was assisted by all the goddesses, except Hera and Eileithyia, but the latter too hastened to lend her aid, as soon as she heard what was taking place. The island of Delos, which previous to this event had been unpeopled and floating on or buried under the sea, was now covered with new houses, and was fastened to the roots of the earth. (Comp. Virg. Aen. iii. 75.) The day of Apollo's birth was believed to have been the seventh of the month, whence he is called ἑβδοματής. (Plut. Sympse. 8.) According to some traditions, he was a seven months' child (ἑπταμήνιος). The number seven was sacred to the god; on the seventh of every month sacrifices were offered to him (ἑβδοματικώς), Aeschyl. Sept. 802; comp. Callim. Hygin. in Del, 260, &c.), and his festivals usually fall on the seventh of a month. Immediately after his birth, Apollo was fed with ambrosia and nectar by Hermes, and no sooner had he tasted the divine food, than he sprang up and demanded a lyre and a bow, and declared, that henceforth he would declare to men the will of Zeus. Delos exulted with joy, and covered herself with golden flowers. (Comp. Theognis, 5, &c.; Eurip. Heucb. 457, &c.)

Apollo, though one of the great gods of Olympus, is yet represented in some sort of dependence on Zeus, who is regarded as the source of the powers exercised by his son. The powers ascribed to Apollo are apparently of different kinds, but all are connected with one another, and may be said to be only ramifications of one and the same, as will be seen from the following classification.

Apollo is—1. the god who punishes and destroys (ἀδικεῖ) the wicked and overbearing, and as such he is described as the god with bow and arrows, the gift of Hephæstus. (Hom. II. i. 42, xxiv. 605, Od. xi. 318, xv. 410, &c.; comp. Pind. Pyth. iii. 15, &c.) Various epithets given to him in the Homeric poems, such as ἀκατός, ἀκάρυς, ἀθέας, ἀνατρόπος, ἀγέρετος, κλοντάβος, and ἀγνωστός, refer to him as the god who with his dart hits his object at a distance and never misses it. All sudden deaths of men, whether they were regarded as a punishment or a reward, were believed to be the effect of the arrows of Apollo; and with the same arrows he sent the plague into the camp of the Greeks. Hyginus relates, that four days after his birth, Apollo went to mount Parnassus, and there killed the dragon Python, who had pursued his mother during her wanderings, before she reached Delos. He is also said to have assisted Zeus in his contest with the giants. (Apol. i. 6, § 2.) The circumstance of Apollo being the destroyer of the wicked was believed by some of the ancients to have given rise to his name Apollo, which they connected with ἀπόλλωμι, "to destroy." (Aschyl. Agam. 1061.) Some modern writers, on the other hand, who consider the power of avenging evil to have been the original and principal feature in his character, say that Ἀπόλλων, τ. e. Ἀπόλλων, (from the root palleo), signifies the god who drives away evil, and is synonymous with ἐπαλλάξας, Δίκαιος, Ακατός, ἀθέας, and other names and epithets applied to Apollo.

2. The god who affords help and strengthens evil. As he had the power of visiting men with plague and epidemics, so he was also able to deliver men from them, if duly propitiated, or at least by his oracles to suggest the means by which such calamities could be averted. Various names and epithets which are given to Apollo, especially by later writers, such as ἀλλάξων, ἀλλὴς ἀλλὰς, ἀλλὴ αἰσθήσεως, ἀνάρρητος, ἀνατρόπως, ἐπίκοιρος, ἀνατρέπως, and other names and epithets descriptive of this power. (Paus. i. 8, § 8; vi. 24, § 4, viii. 14, § 8; Plut. de Diap. Delph. 21 de Defect. Orac. 7; Aeschyl. Eum. 63; comp. Mus. Delph. 6.) It seems to be the lot of his being the god who afforded help, that mad him the father of Asclepius, the god of the healing art, and that, at least in later times, identified him with Pasion, the god of the healing art in Homer (Paelon.)

3. The god of prophecy. Apollo exercised his power in his numerous oracles, and especially that of Delphi. (Dict. de Nat. s. v. Oraculam.) The source of all his prophetic powers was Zeus his self (Apollodorus states, that Apollo received the μαρτυρία from Pan), and Apollo is accordingly called "the prophet of his father Zeus," (Aeschyl., Eum. 19); but he had nevertheless the power of communicating the gift of prophecy both to gods and men, and all the ancient seers and prophets are placed in some relationship to him. (Hom. Il. i. 72, Hymn. in Merc. 3, 471.) The manner in which Apollo came into the possession of the oracle of Delphi (Pytho) is related differently. According to Apollodorus, the oracle had previously been in the possession of Themiis, and the drongon Python guarded the mysterious chasm, and Apollo, after having slain the monster, took possession of the oracle. According to Hyginus, Python himself possessed the oracle; while Pausanias (x. 8, § 8) states, that it belonged to Gaia and Poseidon in common. (Comp. Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 1246, &c.; Athen. xvi. p. 701; Óv. Met. i. 439; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 706.)

4. The god of song and music. We find him in the Iliad (i. 603) delighting the immortal gods with his play on the phorminx during their repast; and the Homeric bards derived their art of song either from Apollo or the Muses. (Od. vii. 488, with Kastth.) Later traditions ascribed to Apollo even the invention of the flute and lyre (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 253; Plut. de Mus.), while the common tradition was, that he received the lyre from Hermes. Ovid (Horat. xvi. 100) makes Apollo build the walls of Troy by playing on the lyre, as Amphinom did the walls of Thebes. Respecting his musical contests, see MARVING, Mus. Mag. 5. The god who protects the flocks and cattle (νιμως δεις, from νιμως or νιμως, a meadow or pasture land). Homer (Il. ii. 766) says, that Apollo reared the swift steeds of Eumeus Phere- tiades in Pieria, and according to the Homeric hymn to Hermes (22, 70, &c.) the birds of the gods fed in Pieria under the care of Apollo. At the command of Zeus, Apollo guarded the cattle of Leomedon in the valleys of mount Ida. (Il. xxi. 483.) There are in Homer only a few allusions to this character of Apollo, but in later writers it assumes a very prominent form (Pind. Pyth. ix. 114; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 50, &c.); and in the story of Apollo tending the flocks of Admetus in Thebes, the idea of a young god of the river Amphryus, the idea reaches its height. (Apollod. i. 9, § 15; Eurip. Alcest. 8; Tibull. ii. 3, 11; Virg. Geor. iii. 2.)

6. The god who delights in the foundation of towns and the establishment of civil constitutions. His assistance in the building of Troy was mentioned above; respecting his aid in raising the walls of Megara, see ALCAEUS. Pindar (Pyth. v. 89) calls Apollo the δευτερεύγετος, or the leader of the Dorians in their migration to Peloponnesus; and this idea, as well as the one that he delighted in the foundation of cities, seems to be intimately connected with the circumstance, that a town or a colony was never founded by the Greeks without consulting an oracle of Apollo, and, so it is said in Plutarch, or at least as he became, as it were, their spiritual leader. The epithets κοινωνικός and κοινωνικὸς (see Böckh, ad Pind. l.c.) refer to this part in the character of Apollo.

These characteristics of Apollo necessarily appear in a peculiar light, if we adopt the view which was almost universal among the later poets, mytho-graphers, and philosophers, and according to which Apollo was identical with Helios, or the Sun. In Homer and for some centuries after his time Apollo and Helios are perfectly distinct. The question which here presents itself, is, whether the idea of the identity of the two divinities was the original and primitive one, and was only revived in later times, or whether it was the result of later speculations and of foreign, chiefly Egyptian, influence. Each of these two opinions has had its able advocates. The former, which has been maintained by Buttmann and Hermann, is supported by strong arguments. In the time of Callimachus, some persons distinguished between Apollo and Helios, for which they were censured by the poet. (Progym. 46, ed. Bentley.) Pausanias (vii. 28, § 8) states, that he met a Spartan who declared the two divinities to be identical, and Pausanias adds, that this was quite in accordance with the belief of the Greeks. (Comp. Strab. xiv. p. 653; Plat. de Elag. Delph. 4, de Def. Orac. 7.) It has further been said, that if Apollo be regarded as the Sun, the powers and attributes which we have enumerated above are easily explained and accounted for; that the surname of Φως (the shining or brilliant), which is frequently applied to Apollo in the Homeric poems, points to the sun; and lastly, that the traditions concerning the Hyperboreans and their worship of Apollo bear the strongest marks of their regarding the god in the same light. (Alcaeus, op. Hymn. xiv. 10; Diod. ii. 47.) Still greater stress is laid on the fact that the Egyptian Horus was regarded as identical with Apollo (Herod. ii. 144, 156; Diod. ii. 25; Plut. de Is. et Os. 12, 61; Aelian, Hist. An. x. 14), as Horus is usually considered as the god of the burning sun. Those who adopt this view derive Apollo from the East or from Egypt, and regard the Athenian Ἀπόλλων παρθένος as the god who was brought to Attica by the Egyptian colony under Cecrops. Another set of accounts derives the worship of Apollo from the very opposite quarter of the world—from the country of the Hyperboreans, that is a nation living beyond the point where the north wind rises, and whose country is in consequence most happy and fruitful. According to a fragment of an ancient Doric hymn in Pausanias (x. 5, § 4), of Delphi was founded by Hyperboreans; and it is said to have come from the Hyperboreans to Delos, and Blesthyia likewise. (Herod. iv. 33, &c.; Paus. i. 18, § 4; Diod. ii. 47.) The Hyperboreans, says Diodorus, worship Apollo more seriously than any other people; they are all priests of Apollo; one town in their country is sacred to Apollo, and its inhabitants are for the most part players on the lyre. (Comp. Pind. Pyth. x. 55, &c.)

These opposite accounts respecting the original seat of the worship of Apollo might lead us to suppose, that they refer to two distinct divinities, which were in the course of time united into one, as indeed Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 28) distinguishes four different Apollos. But most decidedly and justly the hypothesis, that Apollo was derived from Egypt; but he rejects at the same time, without very satisfactory reasons, the opinion that Apollo was connected with the worship of nature or any part of it; for, according to him, Apollo is a purely spiritual divinity, and far above all the other gods of Olympus. As regards the identity of Apollo and Helios, he justly remarks, that it would be a strange phenomenon if this identity should have fallen into oblivion for several centuries, and then have been revived. This objection is indeed strong, but not insurmountable if we recollect the tendency of the Greeks to change a peculiar attribute of a god into a separate divinity; and this process, in regard to Hermes, seems to have been especially noticeable in the time of Homer. Müller's view of Apollo, which is at least very ingenious, is briefly this.
The original and essential feature in the character of Apollo is that of "the avenger of evil" ("Σάελωνος"); he is originally a divinity peculiar to the Doric race; and the most ancient seats of his worship are the Thessalian Temple and Delphi.
From thence it was transplanted to Croote, the inhabilants of which spread it over the coasts of Asia Minor and parts of the continent of Greece, such as Bocota and Attica. In the latter country it was introduced during the immigration of the Ionians, whence the god became the Απελλω παρθέρος of the Athenians. The conquest of Pelopomnesus by the Dorians raised Apollo to the rank of the principal divinity in the peninsula. The Ἀτράλων ούιμος was originally a local divinity of the shepherds of Arethusa, who was transformed into and identified with the Doric Apollo during the process in which the latter became the national divinity of the Peloponnesians. In the same manner as in this instance the god assumed the character of a god of herds and flocks, his character was changed and modified in other parts of Greece also: with the Hyperboreans he was the god of prophecy, and with the Cretans the god with bow and dart. In Egypt he was made to form a part of their astronomical system, which was afterwards introduced into Greece, where it became the prevailing opinion of the learned.

But whatever we may think of this and other modes of explaining the origin and nature of Apollo, one point is certain and attested by thousands of facts, that Apollo and his worship, his festivals and oracles, had more influence upon the Greeks than any other god. It may safely be asserted, that the Greeks would never have become what they were, without the worship of Apollo: in him
the brightest side of the Greco mind is reflected.
Respecting his festivals, see Dict. of Ant. s. v.
Ἀπολλώνια, Θυρεώδες, and others.

In the religion of the early Romans there is no trace of the worship of Apollo. The Romans became acquainted with this divinity through the Greeks, and adopted all their notions and ideas about him from the latter people. There is no doubt that the Romans knew of his worship among the Greeks at a very early time, and tradition says that they consulted his oracle at Delphi even before the expulsion of the kings. But the first time that we hear of the worship of Apollo at Rome is in the year B.C. 490, when, for the purpose of averting a plague, a temple was raised to him, and soon after dedicated by the consul, C. Julius. (Liv.
iv. 25, 26.) A second temple was built to him in the year B.C. 380. One of these two (it is not certain which) stood outside the porta Capena.
During the second Punic war, in B.C. 212, the Latin Apollinaries were instituted in honour of Apollo.
(Liv. xxv. 12; Macro. Sat. i. 37; Dict. of Ant.
s. v. LXX. d. apollinaries; etcam, Latin Seculariae.)

The worship of this divinity, however, did not form a very prominent part in the religion of the Romans till the time of Augustus, who, after the battle of Actium, not only dedicated to him a portion of the spoils, but built or embellished his tempie at Actium, and founded a new one at Rome on the Palatine, and instituted quinquennial games at Actium. (Suet. Aug. 51, 52; Dict. of Ant. s. v.
Hercules; Hirtius, die Religion der Römer, ii. p.
203.)

Apollo, the national divinity of the Greeks, was of course represented in all the ways which the plastic arts were capable of. As the ideas of the god became gradually and more and more fully developed, so his representations in works of art rose from a rude wooden image to the perfect ideal of youthful manliness, so that he appeared to the ancients in the light of a twin brother of Aphrodite.
(Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4. § 10.) The most beautiful and celebrated among the extant representations of Apollo are the Apollo of Belvedere at Rome, which was discovered in 1808 at Rotuna (Mus. Pic-Clom.
i. 14, 15), and the Apollo at Florence. (Hist.
Mythol. Bildbuche, i. p. 52, &c.) In the Apollo of Belvedere the god is represented with the sun-god, but serene majesty; sublime intellect and physical beauty are combined in it in the most wonderful manner. The forehead is higher than in other ancient figures, and on it there is a pair of locks, while the rest of his hair flows freely down on his neck. The limbs are well proportioned and harmonious, the muscles are not worked out too strongly, and at the hips the figure is rather thin in proportion to the breast. (Buttmann, Mythologiz, i. p. 13; G. Hermann, Dessertato de Apollione et Diana, 2 parts, Leipzig, 1836 and 1837; Muller, Dorian, book ii.)

APOLLOCRATES (Ἀπόλλοκρατης), the elder son of Dionysius, the Younger, was left by his father in command of the island and citadel of Syrmium, but was compelled by famine to surrender them to Dion, about B.C. 364. He was allowed to sail away to join his father in Italy. (Plut.
Dion., 37, &c., 56; Strab. vi. p. 259; Nepos, Dion. 5; 435, f. 436, a.) of Apolloclates as the son of the elder Dionysius; but this must be a mistake, unless we suppose with Kühn (ad Aet. l. o.), that there were two persons of this name, one a son of the elder and the other of the younger Dionysius.

APOLLODORUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος). I. Of Achae-ans in Asia, son of Pasion, the celebrated banker, who died B.C. 570, when his son Apollodorus was twenty-four years of age. (Dem. pro Pharn., p.
551.) His mother, who married Phronimon, a freeman of Pasion, after her husband's death, lived ten years longer, and after her death in B.C.
360, Phronimon became the guardian of her younger son, Pasicles. Several years later (B.C. 350), Apollodorus brought an action against Phronimon, for whom Demosthenes wrote a defence, the option for Phronimon, which is still extant. In this year, Apollodorus was archon eponymus at Athens.
(Diod. xvi. 46.) When Apollodorus afterwards attacked the witnesses who had supported Phronimon, Demosthenes wrote for Apollodorus the two orations still extant κατά Προνήμου, (Aesch. in, Dep. Leg.
p. 59; Plut. Demosth. 15.) Apollodorus had many and very important law-suits, in most of which Demosthenes defended him (Cicero, Post. Helt. ii. p.
410, &c. 3d. ed.) (Demosthenes); the latest of them is that against Neros, in which Apollodorus is the pleader, and which may perhaps be referred to the year B.C. 349, when Apollo-dorus was fifty-four years of age. Apollodoros was a very wealthy man, and performed twice the liturgy of the trierarchy. (Dem. c. Polycl. p. 1208, Euseb. p. 1247.)

2. Of Amphipolis, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, was entrusted in B.C. 351, together with Menes, with the administration of Babylon and of all the satrapies as far as Cilicia.
Alexander also gave them 1000 talents to collect as many troops as they could. (Diod. xvi. 54; Curius, v. 1; comp. Arrian, *Abd. vii. 18; Appian, de Bell. Civ. ii. 152.)

3. Of Artemisia, whence he is distinguished from others of the name of Apollodoros by the ethnic adjective Ἀρτεμισία or Ἀρτέμισιος. (Steph.
Byz. s. v. Ἀρτέμισιος.) The time in which he lived is unknown. He wrote a work on the Parthians which is referred to by Strabo (ii. p. 118, xi. pp.
509, 512, xv. p. 685), and by Athenaeus (xiv. p.
682), who mentions the fourth book of his work.
There are two passages in Strabo (xi. pp. 516 and 526), in which according to the common reading he speaks of an Apollodoros Adramyttianus; but as he is evidently speaking of the author of the Parthica, the word Ἀδραμυττίδης has justly been changed to Ἀδραμyttιος. Whether this Apollodorous of Artemisia is the same as the one to whom a history of Caria is ascribed, cannot be decided.
Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Ἀρτεμισιός καὶ Ἀρτέ-μισιος) mentions the seventh and fourteenth books of this work.

4. An Athenian, commanded the Persian auxiliaries which the Athenians had solicited to the king of Persia against Philip of Macedon in B.C. 340. Apollodoros was engaged with these troops in protecting the town of Perinthus while Philip invaded its territory. (Paus. i. 29, § 7; comp. Diod. vii. 65; Arrian, *Abd. ii. 14.)

5. A Bocotian, who together with Epeamenos served as ambassador from Bocotia to Messenia, in B.C. 186, just at the time when the Messenians, certified by Lycurgos, the general of the Achaeans, were inclined to negotiate for peace. The influence of the Bocotian ambassadors decided the question, and the Messenians concluded peace with the Achaeans. (Polyb. xiv. 12.)

6. Of Carystus. The ancients distinguish between two comic poets of the name of Apollodoros:
the one is called a native of Gela in Sicily, and the other of Carystus in Euboea. Suidas speaks of an Attic comic poet Apollodoros, and this circumstance has led some critics to imagine that there were three comic poets of the name of Apollodoros.
As the Athenian is not mentioned anywhere else, and as Suidas does not notice the Carystian, Diodorus supposed that Suidas called the Carystian an Athenian either by mistake, or because he had the theban franchise. It should, however, be remembered that the plays of the Carystian were not represented at Athens, but at Alexandria. (Athen.
5. p. 664.) Athenaeus calls him a contemporary of Mochon; so that he probably lived between the B.C. 300 and 260. Apollodoros of Carystus died to the school of the new Attic comedy, and was one of the most distinguished among its writers. (Athen. *ix. c.) This is not only stated by all authorities, but may also be inferred from the fact that Terence took his Hecyra and Phormio from Apollodoros of Carystus. (A. Mai, *Frages.
Latin et Graecae*, p. 36.) According to Suidas Apollodoros wrote 47 comedies, and five times prized the "prize." *We know the titles and possess fragments of several of his plays; but ten comedies are mentioned by the ancients under the name of Apollodoros alone, and without any suggestion as to whether they belong to Apollodoros of Carystus or to Apollodoros of Gela. (A. Melitne,

7. Tyrant of CASSANDRA (formerly Poliddes) in the peninsula of Paphlagonia. He at first pretended to be a friend of the people; but when he had gained his confidence, he formed a conspiracy for the purpose of making himself tyrant, and bound his acccomplices by most barbarous ceremonies described in Diodorus. (xxii. i. p. 563.) When he had gained his object, about B.C. 279, he began his tyrannical reign, which in cruelty, rapaciousness, and debauchery, has seldom been equalled in any country. The ancients mention him along with the most detestable tyrants that ever lived. (Polyb. vii.
7; Seneca, De Ira, ii. 5; De Benef. vii. 19.
But notwithstanding the support which he derived from the Gauls, who were then protesting sachtward, he was unable to maintain himself, and was conquered and put to death by Antigonus Gonatas. (*Athen. vii. 7, iv. 6, 14;
De Serae Nat. Vent. 10, 11; Paus. iv. 5 § 18;
Hesiodus, ad Osil. ex Ponti. ii. 9, 43.)

8. Of Cumax, a Greek grammarian, who is said to have been the first person that was distinguished by the title of grammarian and critic. (Clem. Alex.
37) his fame was so great that he was honoured by the Amphiacyotonic council of the Greeks.

9. Of Cyril, a Greek grammarian, who was famous from other Greek grammarians, as the Scho-list on Euripides (Orest. 1463), in the Erythologicum M. (s. v. Βοισελος), and by Suidas (*s. v.
Ἀττακορ, Βιωκναρα, Ναισον*, and Βολοκονομος).
From Athenaeus (xi. p. 437) it would seem that he wrote a work on the meaning of verbs (συνειμερο-νει), which we believe to be the authority of Natalis Cornes (iii. 16—18, ix. 5) but he also wrote a work on the gods, but this may possibly be a confusion of Apollodoros of Tyrana, with the celebrated gram-1174, &c., 1167.)

10. Of Cyzicus, lived previous to the time of Plato, who in his dialogue Ion (p. 541), mentions him as one of the foreigners whom the Athenians had frequently placed at the head of their armies.
This statement is repeated by Aelian (V. H. iv. 5), but in what campaigns Apollodoros served the Athenians is not known. Athenaeus (xi. p. 500), in concerning Plato for his malignity, mentions Apollodoros, and the other foreigners with whom in the passage of the Ion, at instance of persons calam-ized by the philosopher, although the passage does not contain a scene of anything derogatory to them.

11. Of Cyzicus, an unknown Greek writer, who is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 39), and is perhaps the same as the Apollodorus spoken of by Clemens of Alexandria. (Strom. ii. p. 417.)

12. Surnamed EPHILUS, a Stoic philosopher, who is frequently mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, who attributes to him two works, one called φαινών, and the other δηθη, (Diog. Laërt. vii. 39, 41, 54, 64, 84, 102, 121, 125, 129, 135, 140.) Theon of Alexandria wrote a commentary on the φαινών (Suid. s. v. Θεωρία), and Stobaeus (Edag. Phys. l.

17. A Greek grammarian of Athens, was a son of Asclepiades, and a pupil of the grammarian Aristarchus of Panaetius, and Diogenes the Babylonian. He flourished about the year B.C. 140, a few years after the fall of Corinth. Further particulars are not mentioned about him. We know that one of his historical works (the \( \chiρων \)) came down to the year B.C. 143, and that it was dedicated to Attalus II., surnamed Philadelphus, who died in B.C. 138; but how long Appolodorus. lived after the year B.C. 143 is unknown. Appolodorus wrote a great number of works, and on a variety of subjects, which were much used in antiquity, but all of them have perished with the exception of one, and even this one has not come down to us complete. This work bears the title \( \betaιζα\ο\θη\φ\ι\γ\υ \); it consists of three books, and is by far the best among the extant works of the kind. It contains a well-arranged account of the numerous mythuses of the mythology and the heroic age of Greece. The materials are derived from the poets, especially the cyclic poets, the logographers, and the historians. It begins with the origin of the gods, and goes down to the time of Theseus, when the work suddenly breaks off. The part which is wanting at the end contained the stories of the families of Peleus and Atreus, and probably the whole of the Trojan cycle, also. The first portion of the work (i. 1—7) contains the ancient theogonic and cosmogonic mythuses, which are followed by the Hellenic mythuses, and the latter are arranged according to the different tribes of the Greek nation. The ancients valued this work very highly, as it formed a running mythological commentary to the Greek poets; and this is still greater value, as most of the works from which Appolodorus derived his information, as well as several other works which were akin to that of Appolodorus, are now lost. Appolodorus relates his mythical stories in a plain and unadorned style, and gives only that which he found in his sources, without interpolating or perverting the genuine forms of the legends by attempts to explain their meaning. This extreme simplicity of the Bibliotheca, more like a mere catalogue of events, than a history, has led some modern critics to consider the work in its present form either as an abridgment of some greater work of Appolodorus, or as made up out of several of his works. But this opinion is a mere hypothesis without any evidence. The first edition of the Bibliotheca of Appolodorus, in which the text is in a very bad condition, was edited by Benedictus Augustus of Spoleto, at Rome, 1555, 8vo. A somewhat better edition is that of Heidelberg, 1599, 8vo. (Ap. Commelin.) After the editions of Tan. Faber (Salamanca, 1651, 8vo.), and Th. Gale in his Script. Hist. poet. (Goteborg, 1725), they followed the critical edition of Ch. G. Heyne. Göttingen, 1782 and 183, 4 vols. 12mo., of which a second and improved edition appeared in 1803 2 vols. 8vo. The best among the subsequent editions is that of Clavier, Paris, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo., with a commentary and a French translation. The Bibliotheca is also printed in C. and Th. Müller, Fragment Hist. Graec. Paris, 1841, and in A. Westermann's Mythologis, sive Scripturae Poeticæ Histor. Graecæ, 1843, 8vo.

Among the other works ascribed to Appolodorus which are lost, but of which a considerable number of fragments are still extant, which are contained in Heyne's edition of the Bibliotheca and in C. and Th. Müller's Fragm. Hist. Graec., the following must be noticed here: 1. Πες τηρον Αριστερην, i.e. on the Athenian Courtship (Athens, xiii. pp. 567, 582, xiv. pp. 586, 591 Heyne, vol. iii. pp. 1163, etc.; & Müller, p. 467, etc. 2. Αντιγραφη πρò την Αριστερηνος επιστολην (Athens, xiv. p. 682; Heyne, p. 1172, &c.) 3. Πνευματος, καμιας μητρος, that is, a Univers Geography in iambic verses, such as was afterward written by Scymnus of Chios and by Dionysius (Strabo, xiv. p. 566; Stephan. Byz. passim; Heyn p. 1126, &c.; Müller, p. 449, &c. 4. Πες Εντεραμον, either a commentary or a dissertation on the plays of the comic poet Epicharmus, which consisted of ten books. (Porphyr. Vit. Pluton. Heyne, p. 1442, etc.; Müller, p. 402.)

Εντεραμον, or Eunyma, a work which was frequently referred to, though not always understood in this title, but sometimes apparently referred to, that the head of a particular article. (Heyne, p. 114 &c.; Müller, p. 462, &c.) 5. Πες Σεωρ, twenty-four books. This work contained 1 mythology of the Greeks, as far as the gods themselves were concerned; the Bibliotheca, giving an account of the heroic ages, formed a kind of continuation to it. (Heyne, p. 1039, &c.; Müller, p. 428, &c.) 7. Περὶ νεῶν καταλογοὺς οἱ περὶ νεῶν, was an historical and geographical explanation of the catalogue in the second book of the Illiad. It consisted of twelve books, and is frequently cited by Strabo and other ancient writers. (Heyne, p. 1039, &c.; Müller, p. 453, &c.) 8. Περὶ Σευδέρας, that is, a commentary on the Mimes of Sophron, of which the third book is quoted by Athenaeus (vii. p. 291), and the fourth is ascribed on Aristoph. (Vog. 483; Heyne, p. 1138; Müller, p. 461, &c.) 9. Χρονικά or χρονικός στιχίων, was a chronicle in iambic verses, comprising the history of 1040 years, from the destruction of Troy (1184) down to his own time, B.C. 143. This work, which was again a sort of continuation of the Bibliotheca, thus completed the history from the origin of the gods and the world down to his own time. Of how many books it consisted is not quite certain. In Stephæus of Byzantium the fourth book is mentioned, but if Symeolus (Chronogr. p. 349, ed. Dindorf) refers to this work, it must have consisted of at least eight books. The loss of the other two is a lamentable defect in the literature of antiquity. (Heyne, p. 1072, &c.; Müller, p. 435, &c.) For further information respecting Apollodorus and his writings, see Fabricius, Bibliogr. iv. pp. 287—299; C. and Th. Müller, pp. xxxviii.—xiv. 18. Of Lémnos, a writer on agriculture, who lived previous to the time of Aristotle (Politi. i. 4, p. 21, ed. Götting.) He is mentioned by Varro (De Re Rust. i. 1), and by Pliny. (Hort. ad urb. viii. x. xiv. xv. xvii. and xviii.) 19. Surnamed Logisticus, appears to have been a mathematician, if as is usually supposed, he is the same as the one who is called ἄριστομάκης. Diog. Liert. i. 25, viii. 12; Athen. x. p. 418.) Whether he is the same as the Apollodorus of whom Plutarch (Non posse cæl. secund. Epict. p. 1094) quotes two lines, is not quite certain. 20. A Macedonian, and secretary to king Philip V. He is the same as the surnamed of Jemonethen accompanied the king to the colloquy at Nicaea, on the Malian gulf, with T. Quinius Sallustius, in B.C. 198. (Politi. xvi. i. 3.) 21. Of Nicaea. Nothing is known about him except that Stephanus Byzantius (s, u. Nicaea) mentions him among the distinguished persons of that own. 22. Of Perigamus, a Greek rhetorician, was the author of a school of rhetoric called after him Άπολλωνιάκων ἢερες, which was subsequently opposed by the school established by Theodorus of Gadim. (Théodorys ἄρες.) In his advanced age Apollodorus taught rhetoric at Apollonia, and here young Acanthianus (Augustus) was one of his pupils and became his friend. (Strab. xiii. p. 625; Sueott. Ingr. 89.) Strabo ascribes to him scientific works τέχνης on rhetoric, but Quintillian (iii. 1 § 18, comp. § 1) on the authority of Apollodorus himself declares only one of the works ascribed to him as genuine, and this he calls Δράς (τέχνης) edita ad Mutumum, in which he treated on oratory nly in so far as speaking in the courts of justice was concerned. Apollodorus himself wrote little, and his whole theory could be gathered only from the works of his disciples, C. Valgus and Atticus.
APOLLONIDES.

Theodorus of imitation, and personnified the central form of the class to which his object belonged, and to which the rest of its qualities administered, without being absorbed: agility was not suffered to destroy fineness, solidity, or weight; nor strength and weight agility; elegance did not degenerate to effeminacy, or grandeur swell to hugeness. The Plutarcha justly adduces these principles of style seem to have been exemplified in his two works of which Pliny has given us the titles, a worshipping priest, and Ajax struck by lightning, the former being the image of piety, the latter of impyuty and blasphemy. A third picture by Apollodoros is mentioned by the Schoiast on the Plutarch of Aristophanes. (v. 385.)

Apollodoros made a great advance in colouring. He invented chiaroscuro (φορον και σπαρώχων σκέδων, Plut. de Gloria Alcin. 2). Earlier painters, Dionysius for example (Plut. Timol. 36), had attained to the quality which the Greeks called τόνος, that is, a proper gradation of light and shade, but Apollodoros was the first who heightened this effect by the gradation of tints, and thus obtained what modern painters call tone. Hence he was called σκάλογγος. (Ulysses, s. n.) Pliny says that his pictures were the first that riveted the eyes, and that he was the first who conferred due honour upon the pencil, plainly because the cestrum was an inadequate instrument for the production of those effects of light and shade which Apollodoros produced by the use of the pencil. In this state he delivered the art to Zeuxis, apollonides, upon whom he is said to have written verses, complaining that he had robbed him of his art. Plutarch (l. c.) says, that Apollodoros inscribed upon his works the verse which Pliny attributes to Zeuxis, Μου γιατον τι μάλλον ἃ μισήσαναι.

2. A sculptor, who made statues in bronze. He was so fastidious that he often broke his works in pieces after they were finished, and hence he obtained the surname of "the madman," in which character he was represented by the sculptor Silanion. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 21.) Assuming from this that the two artists were contemporary, Apollodoros flourished about 324 B.C.

A little further on (§ 26) Pliny names an Apollodoros among the artists who had made bronze statues of philosophers.

On the lase of the "Venus de Medici," Apollodoros is mentioned as the father of Cleomenes. Thiersch (Epocph, p. 292) suggests, that he may have been the same person as the subject of this article, for that the statue of the latter by Silanion may have been made from tradition at mere conjecture, nor his death. But Apollodoros is so common a Greek name that no such conclusion can be drawn from the mere mention of it.

3. Of Damascus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian. The former emperor employed him to build his Forum, Odeum, and Gymnasium, at Rome; the latter, on account of some indelicate words uttered by the architect, first banished him and afterwards put him to death. (Dion Cass. liv. 4; Spartan. Hadrian 19.) [P. S.]

APOLLODORUS, a Graeco-Roman jurist, and one of the commission appointed by the Theodosius the Younger to compile the Theodosian Code. In A.D. 429 he appears as comes and magister memoriae (Cod. Th. i. tit. 1. s. 5), and he appears as comes sacr. consistorii in the years 433 and 436.

(Cod. Th. i. tit. 1. s. 6; Nov. 1. Theod. 11., printed in the Bonn Corpus Juris Anticae. as a second preface to the Theod. Cod.) There seems to be no reason, beyond sameness of name and nearness of date, to identify him with the Apollodoros who was comes priuatus under Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 399, and was procuress of Africa in 400. (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 36. s. 22; 16. tit. 11. s. 1.) To Apollodoros, procuress of Africa, are addressed some of the letters of Symmachus, who was connected with him by affinity. (viii. 4, ix. 14, 48.) [J. T. G.]

APOLLODORUS (Ἀπόλλωνις), the name of two physicians mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xx. 13), one of whom was a native of Citium, in Cyprus, the other of Tarentum. Perhaps it was one of those who wrote to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, giving him directions as to what wines he should drink (vind. xiv. 9), though to which king of this name his precepts were addressed is not mentioned. A person of the same name wrote a work, Πελετήριον και Σφάκηδ.committee, quoted by Athenaeus (xv. p. 875), and another, quoted by the same author, Πελετήριον, Ον Πενημανικάν. (Bid. xv. p. 681), which is possibly the work that is in several times referred to by Pliny. (H. N. xxii. 15, 29, &c.) [W. A. G.]

APOLLONIDEAE or APOLLONIADAS (Ἀπόλλωνίδαι). 1. Governor of Argos, who was raised to this office by Cassander. In the year B.C. 315, he invaded Arcadia, and got possession of the town of Symphales. The majority of the Argives were hostile towards Cassander, and while Apollonides was engaged in Arcadia, they invited Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, and promised to surrender their town to him. But Alexander was not quick enough in his movements, and Apollonides, who seems to have been informed of the plan, suddenly returned to Argos. About 500 senators were at the time assembled in the ptoynemmon; Apollonides had all the doors of the house well guarded, that none of them might escape, and then set fire to it so that all perished in the flames. The other Argives who had taken part in the conspiracy were partly exiled and partly put to death. (Diod. xix. 65.)

2. A Brotician, an officer in the Greek army which supported the claims of Cyrus the Younger. He was a man of no courage, and the difficulties which the Greeks had to encounter led him to oppose Xenophon, and to urge the necessity of entering into friendly relations with king Araxeses. He was rebuked by Xenophon, and deceived in his office for having said things unworthy of a Greek. (Thuc. iii. 425. &c.)

3. Of Caria, to whom Philip of Macedon assigned for his private use the whole territory of the Carians. (Demosth. de Halones. p. 86. Apollonides was afterwards sent by Charidemus ambassador to Philip. (Demosth. de Aristocr. p. 681.)

4. Of Chios, was during the eastern expedition of Alexander the Great one of the leaders of the Persian party in his native island; but whilst Alexander was in Egypt, Apollonides was quelled by the king's admirals, Hegelochus and Amphitorus. He and several of his partizans were taken prisoners and sent to Elephantine in Egypt, where they were kept in close imprisonment. (Arrian. Anab. iii. 2; Curtius, iv. 5.)

5. Of Nicarea, lived in the time of the emperor Tiberius, to whom he dedicated a commentary on... the Sili of Timon. (Diog. Laér. ix. 109.) He wrote several works, all of which are lost.—
1. A commentary on Demostenes' oration περὶ διαμαρτυρίας. (Ammon. s. v. δίκαιος.) 2. On fictitious stories (περὶ καταστροφήνων), of which the third and eighth books are mentioned. (Ammon. s. v. καταστροφή. Anonym. in Vit. Arati.) 3. A work on proverbs. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Τέρας.) 4. A work on Ion, the tragic poet. (Harpocr. s. v. Ιων.) An Apollonides, without any statement as to what was his native country, is mentioned by Strabo (vii. p. 309, xi. pp. 328, 338), Pliny (H. N. vii. 2), and by the Scholast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 963, 1174; comp. ii. 964), to whom the work called τὰ κειμένα τῆς Ἐρωτησίας. Stobaeus (Flor. lxxv. 3, 6) quotes some sayings from one Apollonides.

6. An OLYNTHIAN general who used his influence at Olynthus against Philip of Macedonia. The king, with the assistance of his intriguing agents in that town, contrived to induce the people to send Apollonides into exile. (Demost. Philip. iii. pp. 125, 128.) Apollonides went to Athens, where he was honoured with the civic franchise; but being found unworthy, he was afterwards deprived of it. (Demost. & Near. p. 1376.)

7. Surnamed ORAPUS or Hornius, wrote a work on Egypt, entitled Schemnuthi (Σχημνούθη), and seems also to have composed other works on the history and religion of the Egyptians. (Theo-phil. Alex. ii. 6; comp. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 396, ed. Westermann.)

8. Of SICYON. When in B.C. 186 the great congress was held at Megalopolis, and king Cænasus wished to form an alliance with the Acheaeans, and offered them a large sum of money as a present with a view of securing their favour, Apollonides of Sicyon strongly opposed the Acheaeans' accepting the money, as something unworthy of them, and which would expose them to the influence of the king. He was supported by some other distinguished Acheaeans, and they magnanimously reused accepting the money. (Polyb. xxii. 8.) At his congress Roman ambassadors also had been present, and after their return, Spartan and Achean ambassadors went to Rome, B.C. 165. Among the later was Apollonides, who endeavoured to explain to the Roman some of the real state of affairs.
Sparta, against the Spartan ambassadors, and to indicate the conduct of Philopomus and the Acheaeans against the charges of the Spartans.
Polyb. xxiii. 11, 12.) At the outbreak of the war between the Romans and Persians of Macedonia, Apollonides advised his countrymen not to gossip the Romans openly, but at the same time censured severely those who were for throwing themselves into their hands altogether. (Polyb.
xxvii. 6.)

9. A SPARTAN who was appointed in B.C. 101 of the treasurers to check the system of squarning the public money which had been carried for some time by Charon, a low demagogue.
As Apollonides was the person whom Charon most feared, he had him assassinated by his assissaries. (Polyb. xxvii. 8; Charon.)

10. A STOIC philosopher, with whom Cato the ouger conversed on the subject of suicide shortly fore he committed this act at Utica. (Plut. Cat. 4m. i. 65, 66, 69.)

11. A SYRACUSIAN, who, during the dissensions long his fellow-citizens in the second

Punic war, as to whether they were to join the Carthaginians or the Romans, insisted upon the necessity of acting with decision either the one or the other way, as division on this point would lead of inevitability ruin. At the same time, he suggested that it would be advantageous to remain faithful to the Romans. (Liv. xxiv. 28.)

12. A TRAGIC poet, concerning whom nothing is known. Two verses of one of his dramas are preserved in Clemens of Alexandria (Pseudag. iii. 12) and Stobaeus. (Serv. i. 1.) [L. S.]

APOLLOIDES (Ἀπόλλωνιδης). 1. A Greek physician and surgeon, was born at Cos, and, like many other of his countrymen, went to the court of Pompey, under Artaxerxes Longimanus, B.C. 465; 425, 423 B.C., he joined Megabyzas, the king's brother-in-law, of a dangerous wound, but was afterwards engaged in a sinful and scandalous amour with his wife, Amytis, who was herself a most profligate woman. For this offence Apollonides was given up by Artaxerxes into the hands of the king's mother, Amestris, who tortured him for about two months, and at last, upon the death of her daughter, ordered him to be buried alive. (Ctesias, De Ross. Pers. §§ 30, 42, pp. 40, 50, ed.
Lob.)

2. Another Greek physician, who must have lived in the first or second century after Christ, as he is said to have been at Galen (De Cura. Polem. i. vol.
pp. 138, 139) to have differed from Archigenes respecting the state of the pulse during sleep. No other particulars are known of his history; but he is sometimes confounded with Apollonius of Cyprus, a mistake which has arisen from reading Ἀπόλλωνιδης instead of Ἀπόλλωνιος in the passegge of Galen where the latter physician is mentioned. [APOLLONIUS CYPRIS.] He may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Artemidorus (Onirocr. iv. 2), and Aëtius (tactum. ii.
sem. iv. c. 48, 403), in which last passage the name is spelled Απόλλωνιάς. (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr.
vol. xiii. p. 74, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

APOLLONIUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος), historical. 1.
The son of Chazius, appointed by Alexander the Great, before leaving Egypt, as governor of the part of Libya on the confines of Egypt, B.C. 331.
(Attal. ii. 5 3; Curtius, iv. 5.)

2. A friend of Demetrius, king of Macedon, who accompanied Demetrius when he went to Rome as a hostage, B.C. 175, and supported him with his advice. Apollonides had been educated together with Demetrius, and their two families had been long connected by friendship. The father of Apollonides, who bore the same name, possessed great influence with Sceules. (Polyb. xxxi. 19, 21.)

3. The spokesman of an embassy sent by Antiochus IV. to Rome, B.C. 173. He brought from his master tribute and rich presents, and requested that the senate would renew with Antiochus the alliance which had existed between his father and the Romans. (Liv. iii. 6.)

4. Of Cyme. Came together with Apollonides, in B.C. 170, as ambassador to king Antiochus after he had made himself master of Egypt. (Polyb. xxvi. 16.)

5. One of the principal leaders during the revolt of the slaves in Sicily, which had been brought about by one Titus Miniacus, in B.C. 103. The senate sent L. Lucullus with an army against him, and by bribes and the promise of impunity he in-

APOLLONIUS.

5. The son of ARCHIBULUS, Archibus, or Archibius, was like his father an eminent grammarian of Alexandria. He lived about the time of Augustus, and was the teacher of Apion, while he himself had been a pupil of the school of Didymus. This is the statement of Suidas, which Villiozian has endeavoured to confirm. Other critics, as Ruhnken, believe that Apollonius lived after the time of Apion, and that our Apollonius in his Homeric Lexicon made use of a similar work written by Apion. This opinion seems indeed to be the more probable of the two; but, however this may be, the Homeric Lexicon of Apollonius to the Iliad and the Odyssey, which is still extant, is to us a valuable and instructive relic of antiquity, if we consider the loss of so many other works of the same kind. It is unfortunately, however, very much interpolated, and must be used with great circumspection.

1. Of ALCABANDA, surnamed Μαλακας, was some years older than Apollonius Molon, with whom he sometimes been confounded. He was a rhetorician, and went from Alabaia to Rhodes, where he taught rhetoric. (Strab. xiv. p. 655.) Scevalo in his praetorship saw him and spoke with him in Rhodes. He was a very distinguished orator, and used to ridicule and despise philosophy. (Cic. de Orat. i. 17.) Whenever he found that a pupil had not talent for oratory, he dismissed him, and advised him to apply to what he thought him fit for, although by retaining him he might have derived pecuniary advantages. (Cic. de Orat. i. 28; comp. Spalding, ed Quintil. i. p. 439, ii. p. 453, iv. p. 562; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 147, &c.)

2. Of ALABANDA, surnamed Molon, likewise a rhetorician, who left his country and went to Rhodes (Strabo, xiv. p. 655); but he appears to have also taught rhetoric at Rome for some time, as Cicero, who calls him a great pleader in the courts of justice and a great teacher, states that, in B. c. 88, he received instructions from him at Rome. (Cic. Brut. 83.) In B. c. 91, when Sulla was dictator, Apollonius came to Rome as ambassador of the Molonians, on which occasion Cicero again received the benefit of his instructions. (Brut. 90.) Four years later, when Cicero returned from Asia, he stayed for some time in Rhodes, and had an opportunity of admiring the practical eloquence of Apollonius in the courts as well as his skill in teaching. (Brut. 91.) Apollonius is also called a distinguished writer, but none of his works has come down to us. They appear however to have treated on rhetorical subjects, and on the Homeric poems. (Phocian. i. p. 98; Porphyry, Quest. Homeric. p. 10.) Josephus (c. Apion. ii. 36) mentions some work of his in which he spoke against the Jews. Julius Caesar was also one of his disciples. (Plut. Caesar. 3; Suet. Caesar. 4; comp. Cic. ad Att. ii. 1; Brut. 70; de Invent. i. 39; Plut. Cic. 4; Quintil. iii. 1. § 16, xii. 6. § 7.)

4. Of APLIPHOCTHYS in Cilicia, is called by Suidas a high priest and an historian. He is said to have written a work on the town of Tarraces, a second on Orpheus and his mysteries, and a third on the history of Caria (Kapisd), of which the eighteenth book is mentioned, and which is often referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium. (s. v. Βαργας, Χελιδωνις, Καταφας, Χελιδον τεχεως; Etym. M. s. v. 'Απλιφοχτης, &c.)
A very flattering letter of recommendation to Caes.

(Chris. ad Fam., xii. 6.)

13. A Christian writer, whose parents and country are unknown, but who is believed to have been bishop of Ephesus, and to have lived about the year A. D. 192. He wrote a work exposing the errors and the conduct of the Christian sect called Cataphryges, some fragments of which are preserved in Eusebius. (Hist. Eccles. v. 18, 21.) Tertullian defended the sect of the Montanists against this Apollonius, and the seventh book of his work De exordiis was especially directed against Apollonius. (Auctor Prædicaehist., cc. 26, 27, 68; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 53; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vii. p. 163.)

14. A Christian, who suffered martyrdom at Rome in the reign of Commodus. He is said to have been a Roman senator. At his trial he made a beautiful defence of Christianity in the Roman senate, which was afterwards translated into Greek and inserted by Eusebius in his history of the Martyrs, but is now lost. (Hieronym. Epist. 84, Catalog. 42, 55; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 51.) Nicerchus (iv. 26) confounds the martyr Apollonius with Apollonius the writer against the Cataphryges. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 53; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vii. p. 163.)

15. Cronus, a native of Issus in Caria. He was a philosopher of the Megarian school, a pupil of Zaleleides, and teacher of the celebrated Diadochus, who received from his master the surname Cronos. (Strab. xiv. p. 638; Diog. Laert. ii. 111.)

16. Surnamed Dyscolus, that is, the ill-tempered, was a son of Menathens and Aristeme, and born at Alexandria, where he flourished in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius. He was one of the most renowned grammarians of his time, partly on account of his numerous and excellent works, and partly on account of his son, Aelius Herodian, who had been educated by him, and was as great a grammarian as himself. Apollonius is said to have been so poor, that he was obliged to write on shells, as he had no means of procuring the ordinary writing materials; and his poverty created that state of mind to which he owed the surname of Dyscolus. He lived and was buried in that part of Alexandria which was called Brachium or Pompeio. But, unless he is confounded with Apollonius of Chalcis, he also spent some time at Rome, where he attracted the attention of the emperor M. Antoninus. Apollonius and his son are called by Priscian in several passages the greatest of all grammarians, and declare, that it was only owing to the assistance which he derived from their works that he was enabled to undertake his task. (Priscian, Praef. lib. i. and vii. p. 833, ix. init. and p. 341.) He was the first who reduced grammar to anything like a system, and is therefore called by Priscian grammaticorum princeps." A list of his works, out of which are lost, is given by Suidas, and a complete one in Fabricius. (Bibl. Græc. vi. 272, 76.)" We can form some idea of those which are still extant. 1. Περὶ συμβολῆς τοῦ θεοῦ μεταφ. "de Constructione Orationis," or de Ordinatione sive Constructione Dictionum," four books. The first edition of this work is the Idone. (Venice, 1495, fol.) A much better one, with a Latin translation and notes, was published Fr. Sylburg, Frankf. 1599, 4to. The last edition, which was greatly corrected by the assistance of four new MSS., is I. Bekker's, Berlin, 1817, 8vo.

17. A native of Egypt, a writer who is referred to by Theophilus Antiocenus (ad Autol. iii. pp. 127, 126, 139) as an authority respecting various opinions upon the age of the world. Whether he is the same as the Apollonius from whom Athenaeus (v. p. 191) quotes a passage concerning the symposia of the ancient Egyptians, is uncertain. The number of persons of the name of Apollonius, who were natives of Egypt, is so great, that unless some other distinguishing epithet is added, it is impossible to say who they were. An Apollonius, an Egyptian, is mentioned as a soothsayer, who prophesied the death of Caligula. (Dion. Cass. lxi. 29.)

18. Surnamed Eidocephus (εἴδοσεβός), a writer referred to by the Scholast on Pindar (Pyth. ii. 1) respecting a contest in which Hiero won the prize. Some writers have thought he was a poet, but from the Etymol. M. (v. εἴδος) it is probable that he was some learned grammarian.

19. Of Laodicæa, is said to have written five books on astrology (astrologia apoemenatika) in which he accused the Egyptians of various astronomical errors. (Paulus Alex. Praef. ad log. In the royal library of Paris there is a MS. containing "Apoemenata" of one Apollonius, which Fabricius believes to be the work of Apollonius of Laodicæa.

20. Of Myndus, lived at the time of Alexander the Great, and was particularly skilled in explaining nauticles. He professed to have learned his art from the Chalcæans. (Seneq. Quaest. Nat. vii. 3 and 17.) His statements respecting the APOLLONIUS.

comets, which Senece had preserved, are sufficient to show that his works were of great importance for astronomy. Whether he is the same as Apolloni-us, a grammarian of Myndus, who is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Ἀρκάς), is uncertain.

21. Of Naucratits, a pupil of Adriannus and Christus, taught rhetoric at Athens. He was an opponent of Henekleides, and with the assistance of his associates he succeeded in expelling him from his chair. He cultivated chiefly political oratory, and used to spend a great deal of time upon preparing his speeches in retirement. His moral conduct is mentioned as he had a son, by his wife, called Apollinus. He died at Athens
h. 19, 26, 2; Endoc. p. 66.)

22. PERGAMUS. See below.

23. Rhodius, was, according to Suidas and his Greek anonymous biographers, the son of Silleus or Ileus and Rhode, and born at Alexandria (comp. Strab. xiv. p. 635) in the phyle Potomatos, whereas Athenaeus (vii. p. 283) and Achain (Hist. An. xv. 22) describe him as a native or, at least, as a citizen of Naucratits. He appears to have been born in the first half of the reign of Potemny Energetes, that is, about n. c. 233, and his most active period falls in the reign of Potemny Philopator (c. 221-204 B.C.) and of Potemny Epiphanes (n. c. 204—181.) In his youth he was instructed by Callimakhus, but afterwards we find a bitter enmity existing between them. The cause of this hatred has been explained by various assumptions; the most probable of which seems to be, that Apollonius, in his love of the simplicity of the ancient poets of Greece and in his endeavours to imitate them, offended Callimakhus, or perhaps even expressed contempt for his poetry. The love of Apollonius for the ancient epic poetry was indeed so great, and had such fascinations for him, that even when a youth (δευτερος) he began himself an epic poem on the expedition of the Argonauts.
When at last the work was completed, he read it in public at Alexandria, but it did not meet with the approbation of the audience. The cause of this may in part have been the imperfect character of the poem itself, which was only a youthful at-temptation; but it was more especially owing to the intrigues of the other Alexandrine poets, and above all of Callimakhos, for Apollonius was in some degree opposed to the taste which then prevailed at Alexandria in regard to poetry. Apollonius was deeply hurt at this failure, and it is not improbable that the bitter epigram on Callimakhos which is still extant (Anthol. Graec. cu. 275) was written at that time. Callimakhos in return wrote an invective poem called "Ibis," against Apollonius, of the nature of which we may form some idea from Ovid's imitation of it in a poem of the same name.
Callimakhos, moreover, expressed his enmity in other poems also, and in his hymn to Apollo there occurs several hostile allusions to Apollonius, especially in n. c. 103. Disturbed by these circumstances Apollonius left Alexandria and went to Rhodes, which was then one of the great seats of Greek literature and learning. Here he revised his poem, and read it to the Rhodians, who recieved it with great approbation. At the same time he delivered lectures on rhetoric, and his reputation soon rose to such a height, that the Rhodians honoured him with their franchises and other distinctions. Apollonius now regarded himself as a Rhodian, and the surname Rhodius has at all times been the name by which he has been distinguished from other persons of the same name.
Notwithstanding these distinctions, however, he afterwards returned to Alexandria, but it is unknown whether he did so of his own accord, or in consequence of an invitation. He is said to have now read his revised poem to the Alexandrians, who were so delighted with it, that he at once rose to the highest degree of fame and popularity.
According to Suidas, Apollonius succeeded Eneastheus as chief librarian of the museum at Alexandria, or the reign of Potemny Epiphanes, about
n. c. 194. Further particulars about his life are not mentioned, but it is probable that he held his office in the museum until his death, and one of his biographers states, that he was buried in the same tomb with Callimakhos.

As regards the poem on the expedition of the Argonauts (Argonautica), which consists of four books and is still extant, Apollonius collected his materials from the rich libraries of Alexandria, and his scholiasts are always anxious to point out the sources from which he derived this or that account.
The poem gives a straightforward and simple description of the adventure, and in a tone which is equal to its subjects. The scenes which are not numerous and contain particular mythologies or descriptions of countries, are sometimes very beautiful, and give life and colour to the whole poem. The character of Jason, although he is the hero of the poem, is not sufficiently developed to win the interest of the reader. The character of Medea, on the other hand, is beautifully drawn, and the gradual growth of her love is described with a truly artistic moderation. The language is an imitation of that of Homer, but it is more brief and concise, and has all the symptoms of something which is studied and not natural to the poet. The Argonautica, in short, is a work of art and labour, and thus forms, notwithstanding its many resemblances, a contrast with the natural and easy flow of the Homeric poems. On its appearance the work seems to have made a great sensation, for even contemporaries, such as Chiron, wrote commentaries upon it. Our present Scholiast is absent from the episodes of which are not treated of in the Argonautica. Such is the case with the stories of Scylla, Thyestes, and Theon, all of whom seem to have lived before the Christian era. One Eireneus is also mentioned as having written a critical and exegetical commentary of the Argonautica. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i 1299, ii. 127, 1015.) The common Scholia or Apollonius are called the Florentine Scholia, because they were first published at Florence, and to distinguish them from the Paris Scholia, which were first published in Schaeler's edition of the Argonautica, and consist chiefly of verbal explanations and criticisms. Among the Romans th Argonautica was much read, and P. Terentius Varrus Atacimus acquired great reputation by his translation of it. (Quintil. x. I. § 87.) The Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus is a free imitation of the poem of Apollonius. In the reign of Anantius I, one Marianus made a Greek paraphrase of Apollonius' poem in 5606 rhymes. The first edition of the Argonautica is that of Florence 1496, 4to, by J. Lascaris, which carries t Scholia. The next is the Aldine (Venice, 155 8vo.), which is little more than a reprint of t Florentine edition. The first really critical editi is that of Brunck. (Argentum. 1780, in 4to, and 8vo.) The edition of Beck (Leipzig, 1797, 8vo.) is incomplete, and the only volume which appeared of it contains the text, with a Latin translation and a few critical notes. G. Schaefer published an edition (Leipzig, 1810—13, 2 vols. 8vo.), which is an improvement upon that of Brunck, and is the first in which the Paris Scholia are printed. The best edition is that of Wellauer, Leipzig, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo., which contains the various readings of 13 MSS., the Scholia, and short notes.

Besides the Argonautica and epigrams (Antonini, Lib. 25), of which we possess only the one on the war between the Greeks and the Amazons, and the fables which are not lost. Two of them, Περὶ Αργολίδος (Athien. x. p. 451) and τὸς Σωρός (Schoel. Venct. ad Hom. II. xiii. 657), were probably grammatical works, and the latter may have had reference to the recension of the Homeric poems by Zenodotus, for the Scholia on Homer occasionally refer to Apollonius. A third class of Apollonius' writings were his κτίσεις, that is, poems on the origin or foundation of several towns. These poems were of an historico-epical character, and most of them seem to have been written in hexameter verse. The following are known: 1. Ρόδου κτίσις, of which one line and a half are preserved in Symm. p. 146, and (2 and) (3 and) (4 and) (5 and) (6 and) (7 and) (8 and), which we have perhaps to refer the statements contained in the Scholiast on Pindar. (Ol. vii. 86; Προθ. iv. 72.) 2. Ναυαργίστου κτίς, of which nine lines are preserved in Athenaeus. (vii. p. 283, κε; comp. Aelian, Hist. An. xx. 28.) 3. Ἀλεξανδρείας κτίς (Schoel. ad Nicand. Thér. 11.) 4. Ἰδρύμα κτίς (Parthen. Evrot. 1 and 11.) 5. Κωνίστους κτίς (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κωνίστους). Whether he last three were like the first two in verse or verse is uncertain, as no fragments are extant. Καλαμός, which may likewise have been an account of the foundation of Camoës. It was written in verse, and consisted of at least two books. Two choliamic lines of it are extant: Steph. Byz. s. v. Κάλαμος. (Compare Gerhard, Lexicon Apolloniacum, Leipzig, 1816, voi.; Weichert: Über das Leben und Gedicht des apollonios von Rhodos, Meissen, 1821, 8vo.)

24. A Syrian, a platonist philosopher, who lived about the time of Hadrian, and who had inserted his works an oracle which promised to Hadrian e government of the Roman world. (Spartian, adr. 2.)

25. Τύκανκος. See below.

26. Of Tyke, a stoic philosopher, who lived in a reign of Ptolemy Auletes, is mentioned by Iogenes Leontii (vii. 1, 2, 24, and 26) as the author of a work on Zeno. Strabo (xvi. p. 757) mentions a work of his which he calls πίνακα των δ Ζηνονος χρόνων και των βιβλιων, and which appears to have been a short survey of the philosophers and their writings from the time of Zeno. Whether this Apollonius is the same as one who wrote a work on female philosophers (Cod. 161), or as the author of the chronolical work (χρονολόγου) of which Stephanus Byzantin essay, (s. v. Χρονολόγου) quotes the fourth book, not be decided.

27. King of Tyke, is the hero of a Greek romance, the author of which is unknown. Barth. Minerv. ili. 1) thought that the author was a Riasian of the name of Symposius. About the a.d. 1500, the romance was put into scalled political verse by Constantinus or Gabriel Contiusus, and was printed at Venice, 1603, 4to. A Latin translation had been published before that time by M. Velserus, under the title, "Narratio cornum acne accidentum Apollonius Tyricus," Ang. Vindel. 1605, 4to. During the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries this romance was very popular, and was translated into most of the European languages. [L. S.]

APOLLONIUS, surnamed PERGAEUS, from Perga in Pamphylia, his native city, a mathematician educated at Alexandria under the successors of Euclid. He was born in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, and died under Philopator, who reigned a.c. 222, 205. (Hephaest. ap. Phot. cod. ccc.) He was, therefore, probably about 40 years younger than Archimedes. His geometrical works were held in such esteem, that they procured for him the appellation of the Great Geometer. (Eutoc. l. c.) He is also mentioned by Ptolemy as an astronomer, and is said to have been called by the sobriquet of ζευς from his fondness for observing the moon, the shape of which was supposed to resemble that letter. His most important work, the only considerable one which has come down to our time, was a treatise on Conic Sections in eight books. Of these the first four, with the commentary of Eutocius, are extant in Greek; and all but the eighth in Arabic. The eighth book seems to have been lost before the date of the Arabic versions. We have also introductory lemmata to all the eight, by Pappus. The first four books probably contain little more than the substance of what former geometers had done; they treat of the definitions and elementary properties of the conic sections, of their diameters, tangents, asymptotes, mutual intersections, &c. But Apollonius seems to lay claim to originality in most of what follows. (See the introductory epistle to the first book.) The fifth treats of the longest and shortest right lines (in other words the normal) which can be drawn from a given point to the curve. The sixth of the equality and similarity of conic sections; and the seventh relates chiefly to their diameters, and rectilinear figures described upon them. We learn from Eutocius (Comm. in lib. l.), that Hermellius in his life of Archimedes accused Apollonius of having appropriated to himself in this work the unpublished discoveries of that great mathematician; however this may have been, there is trust in the reply quoted by the same author from Geminus: that neither Archimedes nor Apollonius pretended to have invented this branch of Geometry, but that Apollonius had introduced a real improvement into it. For whereas Archimedes, according to the ancient method, considered only the section of a right cone by a plane perpendicular to its side, so that the species of the curve depended upon the angle of the cone; Apollonius took a more general view, conceiving the curve to be produced by the intersection of any plane with a cone generated by a right line passing always through the circumference of a fixed circle and any fixed point. The principal edition of the Conics is that of Halley, "Apoll. Perg. Conic. lib. viii., &c." Oxon. 1710, fol. The eighth book is a conjectural restoration founded on the introductory lemmata of Pappus. The first four books were translated into Latin, and published by J. Bapt. Memus (Venice, 1537), and by Commandine

(Apollonius, according to the narrative of his biographer, was of noble ancestry, and claimed kindred with the founders of the city of Tyana. We need not stop to dispute the other story of the incarnation of the god Proteus, or refer it, with Tillemont, to demonical agency. At the age of fourteen he was placed under the care of Euclidimonus, a rhetorician of Pausae; but, being disgusted at the library of the inhabitants, he chose the company of his father and instructor to retire to the neighboring town of Aegae. Here he is said to have studied the whole circle of the Platonic, Sceptic, Epicurean, and Peripatetic philosophy, and ended by giving his preference to the Pythagorean, in which he had been trained by Eucmenus of Heraclicus. (Phil. i. 7.) Immediately, as if the idea of treading in the footsteps of Pythagoras had seized him in his earliest youth, he began to exercise himself in the severe asceticism of the sect; abstained from animal food and woolen clothing, forewore wine and the company of women, suf-fed his hair to grow, and betook himself to the temple of Assobaum at Aegae, who was supposed to regard him with peculiar favour. He was recalled to Tyana, in the twentieth year of his age, by his father's death; after dividing his inheritance with a brother whom he is said to have reclaimed from dissolute living, and giving the greater part of what remained to his poorer relatives (Phil. i. 13), he returned to the discipline of Pythagoras, and for five years preserved the mystic silence, during which alone the secret truths of philosophy were disclosed. At the end of the five years, he travellled in Asia Minor, having been from city to city and everywhere disputing, like Pythagoras, upon divine rites. There is a blank in his biography at this period of his life, of about twenty years during which we must suppose the same employment to have continued, unless indeed we have reason to suspect that the received date of his birth has been anticipated twenty years. He was between forty and fifty years old when he set out on his travels to the east; and here Philostratus sends forth his hero on a voyage of discovery, i which we must be content rapidly to follow him. From Aegae he went to Nineveh, where he met Damis, the future chronicler of his actions, and proceeding on his route to India, he discoursed:

BABYLON; with Bardanes, the Parthian king, consulted the magi and Brahmins, who were aspos to have imparted to him some theurgic secrets. He next visited Taxila, the capital of Phraorides, an Indian prince, where he met Iarchus the chief of the Brahmins, and disputed with Indian Grecymorphien, who had already versed in Alexandria philosophy. (Phil. ii. 1.) This eastern journey lasted five years: at its conclusion, he returned the Ionian cities, where we first hear of his pi-tensions to minuscule power, founded, as it was seen, on the possession of some divine knowledge derived from the east. If it be true that the honours of a god were decreed to him at period of his life, we are of course led to suspect some collusion with the priests (iv. 1), who said to have referred the sick to him for reli-

APOLLONIUS.

(Bologna, 1566). The 5th, 6th, and 7th were translated from an Arabic manuscript in the Medicean library by Abraham Echallensius and Bozelli, and edited in Latin (Florenc. 1681), and by Ravius (Kiliom, 1669).

Apollonius was the author of several other works. The following are described by Pappus in the 7th book of his Mathematical Collections, (Διαμορφώμενος, and Πολλός Αστοροτήτας, in which it was shown how to draw a line through a given point so as to cut segments from two given lines, 1st. in a given ratio, 2nd. containing a given rectangle.

Of the first of these an Arabic version is still extant, of which a translation was edited by Halley, with a conjectural restoration of the second. (Oxon. 1706.)

Περὶ Διαμορφωμένων Τομῆς. To find a point in a given straight line such, that the rectangle of its distances from two given points in the same should fulfiil certain conditions. (See Pappus, i. c.) A solution of this problem was published by Robt.

Simson.* (Lug. 1749.

Περὶ Εὐτερτῶν, in which it was proposed to draw a circle fulfilling any three of the conditions of passing through one or more of three given points, and touching one or more of three given circles and three given straight lines. On, which is the same thing, to draw a circle touching three given circles whose radii may have any magnitude, including zero and infinity. (Ap. de Tactionibus quae super, ed. J. G. Camer.) Gott. et Amst. 1795, 8vo.)

Περὶ Νεόσεως. To draw through a given point a right line so that a portion of it should be intercepted between two given right lines. (Restored by S. Horsley, Oxon. 1770.)

Proclus, in his commentary on Euclid, mentions two treatises, De Cœclae and De Porte et Rota Rationium.

Ptolomy (Magn. Const. lib. xii. init.) refers to Apollonius for the demonstration of certain propositions relative to the stations and retrogradations of the planets.

APOLLONIUS TYANAEOUS (Ἀπολλώνιος τυαναῖος), a Pythagorean philosopher, born at Tyana in Cappadocia about four years before the Christian era. Much of his reputation is to be attributed to the belief in his magical or supernatural powers, and the parallel which modern and ancient writers have attempted to draw between his character and supposed miracles, and those of the Author of our religion. His life by Philostratus is a mass of incongruities and fables; whether it have any groundwork of historical truth, and whether it were written wholly or partly with a controversial aim, are questions we shall be better prepared to discuss after giving an account of the contents of the work itself.}

a later period of his life: the same cause excluded him at the court of Tychonius (from whence he pretended to have obtained the sacred books of Pythagoras), and which he entered by force. (viii. 19.) After visiting Iacobielson, Corinth, and the other towns of Greece, he went to Rome, and arrived there just after an edict against magicians had been issued by Nero. He was immediately brought before Telesinus the consul, and Tigellinus, the favourite of the emperor, the first of whom dismissed him, we are told, from the love of philosophy, and the latter from the fear of a magic power, which could make the letters vanish from the indictment. On his acquittal, he went to Spain, Africa, and Athens, where, on a second aplication, he was admitted to the mysteries; and from Athens proceeded to Alexandria, where Ves-pasian, who was maturing his revolt, soon saw the use which might be made of such an ally. The story of their meeting may be genuine, and is certainly curious as exhibiting Apollonius in the third of the triplexfold characters assumed by Pythagoras—philosopher, mystic, and politician. Vespasian was met at the entrance of the city by a body of magistrates, praefects and philosophers, and hastily asked whether the Tyanean was among the number. Being told that he was philosophizing in the Scrapeum, he proceeded thither, and begged Apo-llonius to make him emperor: the philosopher re-piled that "he had already done so, in praying the gods for a just and venerable sovereign;" upon which Vespasian declared that he resigned himself entirely into his hands. A council of philosophers was forthwith held, including Dio and Euphrates, Statius in the emperor's train, in which the question was formally debated, Euphrates protesting against the ambition of Vespasian and the base subervency of Apollonius, and advocating the restoration of a republica. (v. 31.) This dispute laid the foundation of a lasting quarrel between the two philosophers, to which Philostratus often alludes. The last journey of Apollonius was to Ethiopia, whence he returned to settle in the Ionian cities. The same friendship which his father had shewn was continued towards him by the emperor Titus, who is said to have invited him to Argos in Cilicia, and to have obtained a promise that he would one day visit Rome. On the accession of Domitian, Apollonius endeavoured to excite the provinces of Asia Minor against the tyrant. An order was sent to bring him to Rome, which he thought proper to anticipate by voluntarily surrendering himself, to avoid bringing suspicion on his companions. On being conducted into the emperor's presence, his prudence deserted him: he launched forth into the praise of Nerva, and was hurried to

Rhodes, and Crete, laid claim to the honour of being his last dwelling-place. Tyana, where a temple was dedicated to him, became henceforth one of the sacred cities, and possessed the privilege of electing its own eparchus. We now proceed to discuss very briefly three questions. I. The historical groundwork on which the narrative of Philostratus was founded. II. How far, if at all, it was designed as a rival to the Gosp. el history. III. The real character of Apollonius himself.

I. However impossible it may be to separate truth from falsehood in the narrative of Philostratus, we cannot conceive that a professed history, appealed to as such by contemporary authors, and written about a hundred years after the death of Apollonius himself, should be simply the invention of a writer of romance. It must be allowed, that all the absurd fables of Ctesias, the confused falsehoods of all mythologies (which become more and more absurd as they are further distant), eastern fairy tales, and perhaps a parody of some of the Christian miracles, are all pressed into the service by Philostratus to adorn the life of his hero: it will be allowed further, that the history itself, stripped of the miracles, is probably as false as the miracles themselves. Still we cannot account for the reception of the narrative among the ancients, and even among the fathers themselves, unless there had been some independent tradition of the character of Apollonius on which it rested. Eusebius of Caesarea, who answered the ἄνδρες φλαλισθεὺς πρὸς Χρυστόνος of Hierocles (in which a comparison was attempted between our Lord and Apollonius), seems (c. v.) to allow the truth of Philostratus's narrative in the main, with the exception of what is miraculous. And the parody, if it may be so termed, of the life of Pythagoras, may be rather traceable to the impostor himself than to the ingenuity of his biographer. Statues and temples still existed in his honour; his letters and supposed writings were extant; the manuscript of his life by Damis the Assyrian was the original work which was dressed out by the rhetoric of Philostratus; and many notices of his visits and acts might be found in the public records of Asian cities, which would have at once disproved the history, if inconsistent with it. Add to this, that another life of Apollonius of Tyana, by Mor-rages, is mentioned, which was professedly disregarded by Philostratus, because, he says, it omitted many important particulars, and which Origen, who had read it, records to have spoken of Apollonius as a magician, whose imposture had deceived many celebrated philosophers. The conclusion we seem to come to on the whole is, that at a period when there was a general belief in magical powers Apollonius did attain great influence by pretending to them, and that the history of Philostratus gives a just idea of his character and reputation, however inconsistent in its facts and absurd in its marvels.

II. We have purposely omitted the wonders with which Philostratus has garnished his narrative, of which they do not in general form an essential part. Many of these are curiously con-incident with the Christian miracles. The proclamation of the birth of Apollonius to his mother by Proteus, and the incarnation of Proteus himself, the chorus of swans which sung for joy on the occasion, the casting out of devils, raising the dead, and healing the sick, the sudden disappearances and reappearances of Apollonius, his adventures in the cave of Trophonius, and the sacred voice which called him at his death, to which may be added his claim as a teacher having authority to reform the world—cannot fail to suggest the parallel passages in the Gospel history. We know, too, that Apollonius was one among many rivals set up by the Eclectics (as, for instance, by Hierocles of Nicomedia in the time of Diocletian) to our Saviour—an attempt, it may be worth remarking, renewed by the English freethinkers, Blount and Lord Herbert. Still it must be allowed that the resemblances are very general, that where Philostratus has borrowed from the Gospel narrative, it is only as he has borrowed from all other wonderful history, and that the idea of a controversial aim is inconsistent with the account which makes the life written by Damis the groundwork of the more recent story. Moreover, Philostratus wrote at the command of the emperor Julia Domna, and was at the time living in the palace of Alexander Severus, who worshipped our Lord with Orpheus and Apollonius among his Panegyricus; so that it seems improbable he should have felt any peculiar hostility to Christianity; while, on the other hand, he would be acquainted with the general story of our Lord's life from which he might naturally draw many of his own incidents. On the whole, then, we conclude with Ritter, that the life of Apollonius was not written with a controversial aim, as the resemblances, although real, only indicate that a few things were borrowed, and exhibit no trace of a systematic parallel. (Ritter, Geschichte der Phil. vol. iv. p. 492.)

III. The character of Apollonius as well as the facts of his life bear a remarkable resemblance to those of Pythagoras, whom he professedly followed. Travel, mysticism, and disputation, are the three words in which the earlier half of both their lives may be summed up. There can be no doubt that Apollonius pretended to supernatural powers, and was variously regarded by the ancients as a magician and a divine being. The object of his scheme, as far as it can be traced, was twofold—purely philosophic and purely religious. As a philosopher, he is to be considered as one of the middle terms between the Greek and Oriental systems, which he endeavoured to harmonize in the symbolic lore of Pythagoras. The Pythagorean doctrine of numbers, and their principles of music and astronomy, he looked upon as quite subordinate, while his main efforts were directed to re-establish the old religion on a Pythagorean basis. His aim was to purify the worship of Paganism from the corruptions which he said the scribes of the poets had introduced, and restore the rites of the temples in all their power and meaning. In his works on divination by the stars, and on offerings, he rejects sacrifices as impure in the sight of God. All objects of sense, even fire, partook of a material and corruptible nature: prayer itself should be the untainted offering of the heart, and was polluted by passing through the lips. (Euseb. Prep. Ev. iv. 13.)

This objection to sacrifice was doubtless connected with the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. In the miracles attributed to him we see the same trace of a Pythagorean character: they are chiefly prophetic, and it is not the power of controlling the laws of nature which Apollonius lays claim to, but rather a wonder-working secret, which gives him a deeper insight into them than is possessed by ordinary men. Upon the whole, we may place Apollonius midway between the mystic philosopher and the mere impostor, between Pythagoras and Lucian's Alexander; and in this double character he was regarded by the ancients themselves.

The following list of Apollonius's works has come down to us: 1. "Ipmes eis Mphmatwmwn." (Philost. Vit. Apoll. i. 14; Suidas, s. o. Apoll.) 2. Ποιευμάθεια ἐδίδα, and 3. Ποιευμάθεια Εἰσερχόμεν, mentioned by Suidas, and probably (see Ritter) one of the works which, according to Philostratus (viii. 50), was taken from him by the oracles of Trophonius. 4. Διάθεσθα, written in Ionic Greek. (Phil. i. 3; vii. 39.) 5. 'Ἀπολογία against a complaint of Euphates the philosopher to Domitian. (viii. 7.) 6. Πρὶ πανοικείου διαφωνίας. 7. Τελεταὶ ἐπὶ ἐναντίων. (iii. 41, iv. 19; Euseb. Prep. Ev. iv. 13.) 8. Χρησμοῦ, quoted by Suidas. 9. Νουτικήμερος, a spurious work. 10. 'Επιστολαὶ LXXXV. Bp. Lloyd supposes those which are still extant to be a spurious work. On the other hand, it must be allowed that the Laconic brevity of their style suits well with the authoritative character of the philosopher. They were certainly not inventions of Philostratus, and are not wholly the same with the collection to which he refers. The 'Ἀπολογία which is given by Philostratus (viii. 7) is the only other extant writing of Apollonius. [B. J.]

APOLLONIUS, artists. 1. APOLLONIUS and TAURISCUS of Tralles, were two brothers, and the sculptors of the group which is commonly known as the Farnese bull, representing the punishment of Dircæ by Zethus and Amphion. [Dircæ.] It was taken from Rhodes to Rome by Asinius Pollio, and afterwards placed in the baths of Caracalla, where it was dug up in the sixteenth century, and deposited in the Farnese palace. It is now at Naples. After its discovery, it was restored, in a manner not at all in keeping with its style, by Battista Bianchi of Milan. There is some reason to believe that additions were made to it in the time of Caracalla. It was originally formed out of one block of marble. A full description of the group is given by Winckelmann, who distinguishes the old parts from the new.

From the style of the ancient portions of the group, Winckelmann and Müller refer its execution to the same period to which they imagine the Laocoön to belong, that is, the period after Alexander the Great. Both groups belong to the same school of art, the Rhodian, and both probably to the same period. If, therefore, we admit the force of the arguments of Lessing and Thiélemann respecting the date of the Laocoön [APAROLAS], we may infer, that the Farnese bull was newly executed when Asinius Pollio took it to Rome, and consequently, that Apollonius and Tauriscus flourished about the beginning of the first century of the Christian era. It is worth while to notice, that we have no history of this work before its removal from Rhodes to Rome.

Pliny says of Apollonius and Tauriscus, "Pàrentum ii certam dē se fecere: Menercaten videri professo, sed esse naturalēm Artemidōrum," which is understood to mean, that they placed an inscription on their work, expressing a doubt whether their father, Artemidorus, or their teacher Menercaten, ought to be considered their true pà rent. The Farnese bull bears no such inscription, but there are the marks of an enfeoffed inscription on a trunk of a tree which forms a support for the figure of Zethus. (Plin. xxxvi. 4, § 10; Winckelmann, "Werk", vi. p. 203; Müller, Arch. der Kunst, § 187.)

2. An Athenian sculptor, the son of Nestor, was the maker of the celebrated torse of Hercules in the Belvedere, which is engraved in the Mus. Père-Clement. III. pl. 10, and on which is inscribed ΑΠΟΛΛΩΝΙΟΣ ΝΕΣΤΟΡΟΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΣ ΕΙΔΙΟΙ. From the formation of the letters of the inscription, the age of the sculptor may be fixed at about the birth of Christ. The work itself is one of the most splendid remains of Grecoan art. There is at Rome a statue of Aesculapius by the same artist. (Winckelmann, "Werk", i. p. 226, iii. p. 39, vi. pp. 64, 94, 101, vii. p. 215; Thiersch, "Epochen", p. 532.)

3. An Athenian sculptor, the son of Archias, made the bronze head of the young hero, which was found at Heracleum and is engraved in the Mus. Hercul. i. tab. 45. It bears the inscription, ΑΠΟΛΛΩΝΙΟΣ ΑΡΧΙΟΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΣ ΕΙΔΙΟΙ. It probably belongs to the period about the birth of Christ. (Winckelmann, "Werk", ii. p. 156, iv. p. 284, v. p. 295, vii. p. 92.)

4. A sculptor, whose name is inscribed on the beautiful marble statue of a young satyr, in the possession of the Earl of Egermont, at Petworth, Sussex. [P. S.]

APOLLONIUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος), physicians.

1. APOLLONIUS ANTIKHEMUS (Ἀντικήθημος), the name of two physicians, father and son, who were born at Antioch, and belonged to the sect of the Empirics. They lived after Serafin of Alexandria and before Memodotus (Σαραφίνων; Μεμοδοτος), and therefore probably in the first or second century B.C. (Gal. Introd. c. 4, vol. iv. p. 633.) One of them is very likely the person sometimes called "Apollonius Empiricus"; the other may perhaps be Apollonius Senior.

APOLLONIUS ARCHISTRATOV (Ἀρχιστράτωρ) is the author of a medical prescription quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. v. 12, vol. xiii. p. 635), and must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. Nothing is known of the events of his life.

4. APOLLONIUS BIBLAS (Βιβλάς), lived probably in the second century B.C., and wrote, after Zenes, a Syriac work on diseases which he had composed on the meaning of certain marks (χαρακτήρες) that are found at the end of some chapters in the third book of the Epidemics of Hippocrates. (Gal. Comm. II. in Hipp. "Εἰδι. III.," § 5, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 618.) It seems most likely that he is not the same person as Apollonius Empiricus. His name is supposed to be connected with the word βιβλάς, and seems to have been given for him (as we say) a book-worm.

5. APOLLONIUS CITIRHE (Κίτιρής), the oldest commentator on Hippocrates whose works are still extant. He was a native of Clitium, in Cyprus. Strabo, xvi. 6, p. 242, ed. Taulch.), and studied medicine at Alexandria under Zopyrus (Apollon. Str. p. 2, ed. Diels); he is supposed to have lived in the first century B.C. The only work of his that remains is a short Commentary on Hippocrates, Πεπλο Ἀρτοκλέα, De Articulis, in three books. It is dedicated to a king of the name of Ptolemy, who is conjectured to have been a younger brother of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, who was made king of Cyprus, and who is mentioned several times by Ciceron. (Pro Dom. c. 8, 20, Pro Planc. c. 15, Pro Sest. c. 26.) Some portions of this work were published by Cocchi in his "De Discis ellipt. Placentini," Florence, 1745, 4to., p. 8, and also in his "Graciocruom. Libri," Florent. 1754, fol. The whole work, however, appeared for the first time in the first volume of Dietz's "Scholia in Hippocrum et Galenum," Regim. Pruss. 1834, 8vo.; and an improved edition with a Latin translation was published by Kühn, Lips. 1837, 4to., which, however, was not quite finished at the time of his death. (See Kühn, "Addit. ad Elenaum Medicorum Veterum a Jo. A. Fabriaco, &c. exhibturn," Lips. 1826, 4to., fascic. ii. p. 5; Dietz, "Schol. in Hipp. et Gal." vol. i. præf. p. v.; Littre, "Oeuvres d'Hippocr." vol. i. Introd. p. 92; Choulant, "Handbuch der Böhrerför der Actiaae Medicin." 6. APOLLONIUS CIITHAEIMUS, must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as one of his antidotes is quoted by Galen. (De Antid. ii. 11, vol. xiv. p. 171.) Nothing is known of his life.

7. APOLLONIUS CYRILUS (Κύριος) was the pupil of Olympius and the tutor to Julianus. He was a native of Cyprus, belonging to the sect of the Methodici, and lived probably in the first century after Christ. Nothing more is known of his history. (Gal. De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. pp. 53, 54.)

8. APOLLONIUS EMPIRICUS (Ἐμπηρικός), is supposed to be one of the persons called "Apollonius Antiochenus." He lived, according to Galen (De Med. i. præf. p. 5), after Serafin of Alexandria, and before Heracleides of Tarentum, and therefore probably in the second century B.C. He belonged to the sect of the Empirics, and wrote a book in answer to Zeno's work on the χαρακτήρες in Hippocrates, mentioned above. This was answered by Zeno, and it was this second work that drew from Apollonius Biblates his treatise on the subject after Zeno's death. (Gal. Comm. II. in Hipp. "Εἰδι. ΙΙΙ.," § 5, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 618.) He is mentioned also by Galen, De Meth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142.

9. APOLLONIUS GLAUCCUS must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as his work "On Internal Diseases" is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Chron. iv. 6, p. 536.) Nothing is known of his life.

10. APOLLONIUS HEGOFILHEUS (Ἡγοφιλέας), is supposed to be the same person as Apollonius Mus. He wrote a pharmaceutical work entitled Πεπλο Ἀκροτρίων, De Faciele Paradoxia (Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. vi. 9, vol. xii. p. 995), which is very frequently quoted by Galen, and which is probably the work referred to by Orbasius ("Espor. ad Eupon." 1. proem. p. 574), and of which some fragments are quoted in Cramer's "Anecd. Graecia Paris." vol. i. p. 390, as still existing in MS. in the Royal Library at Paris. He lived before Andromachus, as that writer quotes him (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. vol. xiii. pp. 76, 114, 137, 306, 526, 981), and also before Archi-genesis (Gal. ibid. vol. xii. p. 518); we may therefore conclude that he lived in or before the first century after Christ. He was a follower of Herophilus, and is said by Galen (ibid. p. 510) to have lived for some time at Alexandria. His work, Πράξεις, or Οἰκονομία, is quoted by Athenaeus (xv. 688), and he is also mentioned by Caesius Aurélianus. (De Morb. Ac. ii. 28, p. 139).

11. APOLLONIUS HIPPOCRATICUS (Περιπλογίων), is said by Galen (De Secta Oph. c. 14. vol. i. p. 144; Comment. III. in Hippocr. "De Stat. Vicr. in Morb. Ac." c. 33. vol. xv. p. 703) to have been a pupil of Hippocrates II, and must therefore have lived in the fourth century B.C. He is blamed by Erasistratus (ap. Gal. l. c.) for his excessive severity in restricting the quantity of drink allowed to his patients.

12. APOLLONIUS MEMPHITES (Μεμφήτης), was born at Memphis in Egypt, and was a follower of Erasistratus. (Gal. Introd. c. 10. vol. xiv. p. 700.) He must therefore have lived about the third century B.C., and it is probably the same person who is called "APOLLONIUS STATONICUS." He wrote a work "On the Names of the Parts of the Human Body" (Gal. l. c., and Definit. proem. vol. xix. p. 347), and is quoted by Erotianus (Gloss. Hipp. p. 86), Galen (De Antid. ii. 14. vol. xiv. p. 168), Nicolaus Myereus (De Avar. cc. 11. 16. pp. 631, 632), and other ancient writers.

13. APOLLONIUS MUS (Μῦσ), a follower of Herophilus, of whose life no particulars are known, but who must have lived in the first century B.C., as Strabo mentions him as a contemporary. (Xiv. 1, p. 183, ed. Tauchn.) He was a fellow-pupil of Heracleides of Erythrae (ibid.), and composed a long work on the opinions of the sect founded by Herophilus. (Cael. Anecr. De Morb. Aecol. ii. 13. p. 110; Gal. De Differ. Puls. iv. 10. vol. viii. pp. 714, 716.) He also wrote on pharmacy. (Cael. De Med. v. praef. p. 81; Pallad. Comn. in Hipp. "Epit. VI." ap. Dietz, Schol. in Hipp. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 98; Gal. De Antid. ii. 7. 8, vol. xiv. pp. 143, 146), and is supposed to be the same person who is sometimes called "APOLLONIUS HERPHILEUS."

14. APOLLONIUS OPHIS (Οῆς) is said by Erotianus (Gloss. Hipp. p. 8) to have made a compilation from the Glossary of difficult Hippocratic words by Bacchius; he must therefore have lived about the first or second century B.C. He is supposed by some persons to be APOLLONIUS PERGAMENUS, by others APOLLONIUS FERETRIS.

15. APOLLONIUS ORBANNUS (Ορβαννᾶς) is quoted by Galen (De Conosog. Medicum. sec. Loc. v. 1. vol. xii. p. 856), and must therefore have lived in or before the second century after Christ. Nothing is known of his life.

16. APOLLONIUS Pergaminus (Περγαμηνός) is supposed by some persons to be APOLLONIUS OPHIS, or APOLLONIUS Ther. He was born at Pergamus in Asia, but his date is very uncertain, since it can only be positively determined that, as he is quoted by Ortabius, he must have lived in or before the fourth century after Christ. (Oribi. Eupor. ad Eur. i. 9. p. 570.) He is probably the author of several fragments preserved by Ortabius (Cael. Anecr. ii. 13. 20. pp. 316), which is published by C. F. Matthei in his Collection of Greek Medical Writers, entitled XXI. Veterum et Clemorum Medicorum Graecorum Variae Opuscula, Mosq. 1808, 4to, p. 144.

17. APOLLONIUS PITANARUS was born at Pita-mae in Aquila, and must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as an absurd and superstitious remedy is attributed to him by Pliny. (HN. xiii. 18.)

18. APOLLONIUS SENIOR (ὁ Πραξιόπετρος) is quoted by Erotianus (Gloss. Hipp. p. 86), and must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. Some persons suppose him to be one of the physicians called APOLLONIUS ANTIOCHUS.

19. APOLLONIUS STRATONICUS (ὁ στρατονῖκος) was probably not the son, but the pupil, of Strato of Berytus: he is very likely the same person as APOLLONIUS MEMPHITES, and may be supposed to have lived about the third century B.C. He was a follower of Erasistratus, and wrote a work on the Pulse, which is quoted by Galen. (De Differ. Puls. iv. 17. vol. viii. p. 759.)

20. APOLLONIUS TARSENUS (ὁ Ταρσεύς) was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, and lived perhaps in the first or second century after Christ. His prescriptions are several times quoted by Galen. (De Conosog. Medicum. sec. Gal. v. 19. vol. xiii. p. 843.)

21. APOLLONIUS ThER (ὁ Θερ) is supposed by some persons to be the same as APOLLONIUS OPHIS, or APOLLONIUS Pergamæns, as he is quoted by Erotianus (Gloss. Hipp. p. 86), he must have lived in or before the first century after Christ.

22. Another physician of this name, who is mentioned by APOLLONIUS (Met. ix. init. as having been bitten by a mad dog; must (if he ever really existed) have lived in the second century after Christ; and the name occurs in several ancient authors, belonging to one or more physicians, without any distinguishing epithet. [W. A. G.]

APOLLOPHILES (Ἀπολλοφάιοι)." A name applied to those who were followers of Apollonius Thessalianus, a 1st century A.D. Stoic philosopher, who was a friend of Aristotle of Chios, on whom he wrote a work called "Ἀπολλοφάες." (Athene. vii. p. 291.) Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 140, comp. 92) mentions a work of his called "νομισματος." His name also occurs in Tertullian. (De Anim. 14.) Some writers have asserted, though without any good reason, that Apollonius Thessalaeus was the same as Apollonius the physician who lived at the court of Antiochus. A later Stoic philosopher of this name occurs in Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vi. 19) and in Suidas. (c. ε. Πορευτής; comp. Runken, Dissert. de Vitae et Script. Longini, sect. vii.)

2. Of ATHENS, a poet of the old Attic comedy (Said), appears to have been a contemporary of Strattis, and to have consequently lived about Ol. 95. (Harpoen. s. a. δελθητος.) Suidas ascribes to him five comedies, viz. δαίμον, θηργανώ, θηρίς, δεντροκάθορος, καινούσα. Of the former three we still possess a few fragments, but the last two are completely lost. (Athenn. iii. pp. 75, 114, xi. pp. 407, 455; Phot. Lexia. s. v. μεωδαθός; Aelian. Hist. Anim. vi. 51; Phot. p. 624; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Comic. Graec. p. 266, &c.)

3. Of CYZICUS, was connected by friendship with the Persian satrap PHARNAZUS, and afterwards formed a similar connexion with Agesilus. Soon after this, Pharnazus requested him to persuade Agesilus to meet him, which was done accordingly. (Xenoph. Helian. iv. i. § 20; Philt. Agesil. 12.) This happened in the first of the withdrawal of Agesilus from the war, and led to the defection of PHARNAZUS. [L. S.]

APOLLOPHILES (Ἀπολλοφάιοι), a native of Seleucia, and physician to Antiochus the Great king of Syria, b. c. 223—187, with whom, as ap pears from Polybius. (v. 56, 58), he possessed considerable influence. Mead, in his "De Natura Rerum," p. 180, says in Mammals, a paper on Homo rex, London, 1794, 4to., thinks that two bronze coins, struck in honour of a person named Apollonius, refer to the physician of this name; but this is now generally considered to be a mistake. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Medicus.) A physician of the same name is mentioned by several ancient medical writers. (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 76, ed. vet.; C. G. Kühn, Additam, ad Elementum Medicorum Veterum a Jo. A. Fabricii, &c., editionem, Lips., 4to., 1836. Fascic. iii. p. 8.)

[No text provided for W. A. G.]

APOLLONEUMIS (Ἀπολλόνεμος), a Greek historian, whom Plutarch made use of in his life of Lycurgus. (c. 91.)

APOMYUS (Ἀπομυος) "driving away the flies," a surname of Zeus at Olympia. On one occasion, when Hercules was offering a sacrifice to Zeus at Olympia, he was annoyed by hosts of flies, and in order to get rid of them, he offered a sacrifice to Zeus Aponius, whereupon the flies withdrew across the river Alpheius. From that time the Eleans sacrificed to Zeus under this name. (Paus. v. 14, § 2.)

[No text provided for L. S.]

APONIUS ANTONIUS, DULLIUS, joined Antonius Primus with the third legion, A.D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iii. 10, 11.)

Q. APONIUS, was one of the commanders of the troops which revolted, in B.C. 46, from Trebonius, Caesar's lieutenant in Spain. (Dion Cass. xiii. 29.) Aponius was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, and put to death. (Appian, B. C. iv. 26.)

APONIUS MUTIUS. [MUTIUS.]

APONIUS SATURNINUS. [SATURNINUS.]

APOTROPEAI (Ἀποτρόπαι), certain divinities, by whose assistance the Greeks believed that they were able to avert any threatening danger or calamity. Their statues stood at Sicyon near the tomb of Epeus. (Paus. ii. 11, § 2.) The Romans likewise worshipped gods of this kind, and called them avxorucov, derived from avxovcavc. (Varro, de I. L. vii. 102; Gellius, v. 12.) [L. S.]

APOTROPHEIA (Ἀποτροπεια), "the expeller," an aephorite of Aphrodite, under which she was worshipped at Thieles, and which described her as the goddess who expelled from the hearts of men the desire after filthy pleasure and lust. Her worship under this name was believed to have been instituted by Harmonia, together with that of Aphrodite Urania and Pandemos, and the antiquity of her statues confirmed this belief. (Paus. ix. 16, § 2.)

APPIANUS (Ἀπίανος), a native of Alexandria, lived at Rome during the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius, as we gather from various passages in his work. We have hardly any particulars of his life, for his autobiography, to which he refers at the end of the preface to his history, is now lost. In the same passage he mentions, that he was a man of considerable distinction at Alexandria, and afterwards removed to Rome, where he was engaged in pleasing causes in the schools of the lawyers. He further states that the emperors considered him worthy to be entrusted with the management of their affairs (μεγαλον με στησειον οδετοσικον νησιαν;) which Schweighaeusen and others interpret to mean, that he was appointed to the office of procurator or praefectus of Egypt. There is, however, no reason for this supposition.

We know, from a letter of Fronto, that it was the office of procurator which he held (Fronto, Ep. ad Galienum, ii. p. 13, ed. Niebuhr); but whether he had the management of the emperors' finances at Rome, or went to some provinces in this capacity, is quite uncertain.

Appian wrote a Roman history (Ῥωμαϊκόν, or Ρωμαϊκὴ ιστορία) in twenty-four books, on a plan different from that of most historians. He did not treat the history of the Roman empire as a whole in chronological order, following the series of events; but he gave a separate account of the affairs of each country from the time that it became connected with the Romans, till it was finally incorporated in the Roman empire. The first foreign people with whom the Romans came in contact were the Gauls; and consequently his history, according to his plan, would have begun with that people. But in order to make the work a complete history of Rome, he devoted the first three books to an account of the early times and of the various nations of Italy which Rome subdued. The subjects of the different books were: 1. The kingy period (Ῥωμαϊκῶν βασιλευς), 2. Italy (Ἰταλίας), 3. The Samnites (Σαμνίτων), 4. The Gauls or Celta (Κελτῶν), 5. Sicily and the other islands (Σικελίας καὶ Νησίων), 6. Spain (Σπανία), 7. Hannibal's wars (Ἀρμαβαλίας), 8. Libya, Carthage, and Numidia (Λιβύς, Καρθαγινής καὶ Νομιδαί), 9. Macedonia (Μακεδονία), 10. Greece and the Greek states in Asia Minor (Ἑλληνικῶν καὶ Νομικῶν), 11. Syria and Parthia (Συρηνικῶν καὶ Παρθικῶν), 12. The war with Mithridates (Μιθρικής), 13—21. The civil wars (Εποικότητα), comprised the history of a hundred years, from the battle of Actium to the beginning of Vespasian's reign. 23. The wars with Ilyria (Ιλιρικὴς ή Διονίκης), 24. Those with Arabia (Ἀραβίων). We possess only eleven of these complete; namely, the sixth, seventh, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-third. There are also fragments of several of the others. The Parthian history, which has come down to us as part of a later book, has been proved by Schweighaeusen to be no work of Appian, but merely a compilation from Plutarch's Lives of Antony and Caesar, probably made in the middle ages. (See Schweighaeusen's Apoikeia, vol. iii. p. 995, &c.)

Appian's work is a mere compilation. In the early times he chiefly followed Dionysius, as far as the latter went, and his work makes up to a considerable extent for the books of Dionysius, which are lost. In the history of the second Punic war Fabius seems to have been his chief authority, and subsequently he made use of Polybius. His style is clear and simple; but he possesses few merits as an historian, and he frequently makes the most absurd blunders. Thus, for instance, he places Saguntum on the north of the Ebro (ibid. 7), and states that it took only half a day to sail from Saguntum to Britain. (Ibid. 1.)

Appian's history was first published in a barba- rous Latin translation by Candidus, at Venice, in 1472. A part of the Greek text was first pub- lished by Carolus Stephanus, Paris, 1551; which was followed by an improved Latin version by Gelenium, which was published after the death of APPULIEUS.

4. APPULIEUS, a praedictor, mentioned by Cicero in two of his letters (ad Att. xii. 14, 17), must be distinguished from No. 3.

5. M. APPULIEUS, was elected augur in B.C. 45, and Cicero pleaded illness as a reason for his absence from the state festival, which seems to have lasted several days. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 13—15.) At the time of Caesar’s death, B.C. 44, Appuleius seems to have been questor in Asia; and when Brutus crossed over into Greece and Asia, he assisted him with money and troops. (Cic. Phil. x. 11, xiii. 16; Appian, B. C. lii. 63, iv. 75.) He was proscribed by the triumvirs, B.C. 43, and fled to Brutus, who placed him over Bithynia. After the death of Brutus, B.C. 42, he surrendered the province to Antony, and was restored by him to his native country. (Appian, B. C. iv. 46.)

6. APPULIEUS, proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, escaped with his wife to Sicily. (Appian, B. C. iv. 40.) He must be distinguished from No. 5, who was proscribed at the same time. This Appuleius is mentioned by the same name as the tribune of the plebs spoken of by Appian. (B. C. liii. 93.)

7. SEX. APPULIEUS SEX. P. SEX. N., consul in B.C. 29. He afterwards went to Spain as proconsul, and obtained a triumph in B.C. 26, for the victories he had gained in that country. (Dion Cass. li. 20; Fest. Capitol.)

8. M. APPULIEUS SEX. P. SEX. N., consul in B.C. 26, may possibly be the same person as No. 5. (Dion Cass. iv. 7.)

9. SEX. APPULIEUS SEX. P. SEX. N., probably a son of No. 7, consul in A.D. 14, the year in which Augustus died. (Dion Cass. iv. 29; Suet. Aug. 100; Tac. Ann. i. 7; Vell. Pat. ii. 123.) He is called in two passages of Dion Cassius (c. li. 30) a relation of Augustus. Tacitus (Ann. ii. 50) speaks of Appuleia Varilia, who was accused of adultery and treason in A.D. 17, as a granddaughter of a sister of Augustus. It is, therefore, not impossible that Sex. Appuleius may have married one of the Marcellae, the two daughters of Octavia, by her first husband Marcus; but there is no authority for this marriage.

APPULIEUS or APPULEIUS (inscriptions and the oldest MSS. generally exhibit the double consonant, see Cren. Animad. Phil. P. x. sub. init.; Oudendorp, ad Apul. Asinn. not. p. 1), chiefly celebrated as the author of the Golden Ass, was born in the early part of the second century in Africa, at Madura, which was originally attached to the kingdom of Sylphus, was transferred to Numidia at the close of the second Punic war, and having been eventually colonized by a detachment of Roman veterans, attained to considerable splendour. This town was situated far inland on the border line between Numidia and Gætulica, and hence Appuleius styles himself Seminuideo or Semigaeutes, declaring at the same time, that he had no more reason to feel ashamed of his hybrid origin than the elder Cyrus, who in like manner might be termed Seminuideo ac Semigaeutes. (Apolog. pp. 443, 444, ed. Florid.) His father was a man of high repectability, who having filled the office of duumvir and enjoyed all the other dignities of his native town, bequeathed at his death the sum of nearly two millions of stercuses to his two sons (Apolog. p. 442.) Appuleius received the first rudiments of education at Carthage, renowned a that period as a school of literature (Ritورية, iv p. 20), and afterwards proceeded to Athens, where he became warmly attached to the tenets of the Platonic philosophy, and, prosecuting his researches in many different departments, laid the foundations of that copious stock of various and profound learning by which he was subsequently so distinguished. He next travelled extensively, visiting, it would appear, Italy, Greece, and Asia, acquiring a knowledge of a vast number of religious opinions and modes of worship, and becoming initiated in the greater number of the mysteries and secret fraternities so numerous in that age. (De Mundo, p. 729; Apol. p. 404.) Not long after his return home, although he had in some degree diminished by his long-continued course of study, by his protracted residence in foreign countries, and by various acts of generosity towards his friends and old instructors (Apol. p. 442), he set out upon a new journey to Alexandria. (Apol. p. 518.) On his way thither he was taken ill at the town of Oea, and was hospitably received into the house of a young man, Sienius Pontianus, with whom he had lived upon terms of close intimacy, a few years previously, at Athens. (Apol. i. c.) The mother of Pontianus, Pudentilla by name, was a very rich widow whose fortune was at her own disposal. With the full consent of this lady, and in compliance with the earnest solicitation of her son, the young philosopher agreed to marry her. (Apol. p. 518.) Meanwhile Pontianus himself was united to the daughter of a certain Herennius Rufinus, who being ingenuous that so much wealth should pass out of the family, instigated his son-in-law, together with a younger brother, Sienius Pudens, a mere boy, and their paternal uncle, Sienius Aeclaninus, to join him in impeaching Appuleius upon the charge, that he had gained the affections of Pudentilla by charms and magic spells. (Apol. p. 401, 451, 521, 522, &c.) The accusation seems to have been in itself sufficiently ridiculous. The alleged culprit was young, highly accomplished, eloquent, popular, and by no means careless in his matters of dress and personal adornment, although, according to his own account, he was wont even from infancy to lie in bed, nude in winter. (Apol. p. 406, seqq. 421, compare p. 547.) The lady was early old enough to be his mother; she had been widow for fourteen years, and owned to forty, while her enemies called her sixty; in addition to which she was by no means attractive in her appearance, and had, it was well known, been for some time desirous again to enter the married state. (Apol. pp. 450, 514, 520, 535, 546, 541, 47.) The cause was heard at Sabaena before Hadrian Maximus, proconsul of Africa (Apol. p. 400, 448, 501), and the spirited and triumphant defence spoken by Appuleius is still extant. His subsequent career we know little. Judging from the voluminous catalogue of works attributed to him, he must have devoted himself most sedulously to literature; he occasionally declaimed publicly with great applause; he had the charge of exhibiting gladiatorial shows and wild beasts in the province, and statues were erected in his honour by the senate of Carthage and of other cities. (Apol. pp. 445, 494; Florid. iii. n. 16; August. Ev. v.) Nearly the whole of the above particulars are rived from the statements contained in the writings of Appuleius, especially the Apologia; but in dition to these, we find a considerable number of circumstances recorded in almost all the biographies prefixed to his works. Thus we are told that his phenomena was Lucius; that the name of his father was Theseus; that his mother was called Sylvia, was of Thessalian extraction, and a descendant of Plutarch; that when he visited Rome he was entirely ignorant of the Latin language, which he acquired without the aid of an instructor, by his own exertions; and that, having dissipated his fortune, he was reduced at one time to such abject poverty, that he was compelled to sell the clothes which he wore, in order to pay the fees of admission into the mystery of "medicina homunculi" by various expenses. In one instance only does he appear to forget himself (Met. xi. p. 260), where Lucius is spoken of as a native of Madaura, but no valid conclusion can be drawn from this, which is probably an oversight, unless we are at the same time prepared to go as far as Saint Augustine, who hesitates whether we ought not to believe the account given of the transformation of Lucius, that is, Appuleius, into an ass to be a true narrative. It is to this fanciful identification, coupled with the charges preferred by the relations of Pudentilla, and his acknowledged predilection for mystical solemnities, that we must attribute the belief, which soon became current in the ancient world, that he really possessed the supernatural powers attributed to him by his enemies. The early pagan controversy, we learn from Lactantius, was wont to rank the marvels said to have been wrought by him along with those ascribed to Apollonius of Tyana, and to appeal to these as equal to, or more wonderful than, the miracles of Christ. (Lact. Div. Inst. v. 3.) A generation later, the belief continued so prevalent, that St. Augustine was requested to draw up a serious refutation—a task which that renowned prelate executed in the most satisfactory manner, by simply referring to theocarion of Appuleius himself. (Marcellin. Ep. iv. ad Augustin. and Augustin. Ep. v. ad Marcill.)

No one can peruse a few pages of Appuleius without being at once impressed with his conspicuous excellences and glaring defects. We find everywhere an exuberant play of fancy, liveliness, humour, wit, learning, acuteness, and not unfrequently, real eloquence. On the other hand, no style can be more vicious. It is in the highest degree unnatural, both in its general tone and also in the phraseology employed. The former is disfigured by the constant recurrence of ingenious but forced and tawdry conceits and studied prettinesses, while the latter is remarkable for the multitude of obsolete words ostentatiously parade in almost every sentence. The greater number of these are to be found in the extant compositions of the oldest dramatic writers, and in quotations preserved by the grammarians; and those for which no authority can be produced were in all probability drawn from the same source, and not arbitrarily coined to answer the purpose of the moment, as some critics have imagined. The least faulty, perhaps, of all here is the Apologia. Here he seeks to support his arguments, and although we may in many places detect the invertebrate affection of the rhetorician, yet there is often a bold, manly, straight-forward heartiness and truth which we seek in vain in those compositions where his feelings were less touched.

We do not know the year in which our author was born, nor that in which he died. But the names of Lollius Urbicus, Scipio Orfitus, Severianus, Lollianus Avitus, and others who are incidentally mentioned by him as his contemporaries, and who from other sources are known to have held high offices under the Antonines, enable us to determine the epoch when he flourished.

The extant works of Appuleius are: L. Metapoboson de Deo nostro Libri XI. This celebrated romance, which, together with the Bovs of Lucian, is said to have been founded upon a work bearing the same title by a certain Lucius of Patrae (Photius, Bibl. cod. cxxix. p. 165) belonged to the class of tales distinguished by the ancients under the title of Milosae fabulae. It seems to have been intended simply as a satire upon the hypocrisy and debauchery of certain orders of priests, the frauds of jugglers pretenders to supernatural powers, and the gross profanity of public morals. There are some however who discover a more recondite meaning, and especially the author of the Divine Legation of Moses, who has at great length endeavoured to prove, that the Golden Ass was written with the view of recommending the Pagan religion in opposition to Christianity, which was at that time making rapid progress, and especially of insinuating the importance of initiation into the purer mysteries. (Div. Leg. lib. ii. sect. iv.) The epithet Aures is generally supposed to have been bestowed in consequence of the admiration in which the tale was held, for being considered as the most excellent composition of its kind, it was compared to the most excellent of metals; just as the apothegms of Pythagoras were distinguished as χρυσά τινα. Warburton, however, ingeniously contends that aures was the common epithet bestowed upon all Milesian tales, because they were such as strollers used to rehearse for a piece of money to the rabble in a circle, after the fashion of oriental story-tellers. He finds his conjecture upon an expression in one of Pliny's Epistles (ii. 20), essem pura, et aequa aures fabulam, which seems, however, rather to mean give me a piece of copper and receive in return a story worth a piece of gold, or, precious as gold,” which brings us back to the old explanation. The well-known and exquisitely beautiful episode of Cupid and Psyche is introduced in the 4th, 5th, and 6th books. This, whatever opinion we may form of the principal narrative, is evidently an allegory, and is generally understood to shadow forth the progress of the soul to perfection.

11. Floridorum Libri IV. An ἄδολογια, containing select extracts from various orations and dissertations, collected probably by some admirer. It has, however, been imagined that we have here a sort of common-place book, in which Appuleius registered, from time to time, such ideas and forms of expression as he thought worth preserving, with a view to their insertion in some continuous composition. This notion, although adopted by Oude- dorp, has not found many supporters. It is wonderful that it should ever have been seriously promulgated.

III. De Deo Secretis Liber. This treatise has been roughly attacked by St. Augustine.

IV. De Dogmate Platonis Libri tres. The first book contains some account of the speculative doctrines of Plato, the second of his morales, the third of his logic.

V. De Mundo Liber. A translation of the work necs τιθηκα, at one time ascribed to Aristotle.

VI. Apologia sive De Magia Liber. The oration described above, delivered before Claudius Maximus.

VII. Hermeti Trismegisti De Natura Deorum Dialoga. Scholars are at variance with regard to the authenticity of this translation of the Asclepian dialogue. As to the original, see Fabriz. Biblioth. orac. i. 8.

Besides a number of works now lost are mentioned incidentally by Appuleius himself, and many others belonging to some Appuleians are cited by the grammarians. He professes to be the author of "poemata omnes genis apta virgins, lyros, socco, collariam, item satiras usque gripos, item historias varias varum nec non orationes laudatios discursus nec non dialogos laudatos philosophiae," both in Greek and Latin (Florid. ii. 9. iii. 18. 20. iv. 24); and we find special mention made of a collection of poems on playful and amatory themes, entitled Ludere, from which a few fragments are quoted in the Apologia. (pp. 408, 409, 414; compare 538.)

The Edito Princeps was printed at Rome, by Swayneboyn and Pannuris, in the year 1469, edited by Andrew, bishop of Aleria. It is excessively rare, and is considered valuable in a critical point of view, because it contains a genuine text honestly copied from MSS, and free from the multitude of conjectural emendations by which nearly all the rest of the earlier editions are corrupted. It is moreover, the only old edition which escaped mutilation by the Inquisition.

An excellent edition of the Asinus appeared a Leyden in the year 1786, printed in 4to., an edited by Oude-dorp and Ruhmken. Two additional volumes, containing the remaining work, appeared at Leyden in 1829, edited by Bosch. A new and very elaborate edition of the whole works of Appuleius has been published at Leipzig, from 1842, by G. F. Hildebrand.

A great number of translations of the Golden Ass are to be found in all the principal European languages. The last English version is that of Thomas Taylor, in one volume 8vo., London 1822, which contains also the tract De D Socratis.

[W. R.]

L. APPULEIUS, commonly called Appulei Barbarus, a botanical writer of whose life no particulars are known, and whose date is rather uncertain. He has sometimes been identified with Appuleius, the author of the "Golden Ass," and sometimes with Appuleius Celcus. But his work is evidently written later than the time of either of those persons, and probably cannot be placed earlier than the fourth century after Christ. It is written in Latin, and entitled Herbarum,
3. L. APRONIUS, consul successus in A.D. 8 (Fast. Capt.), belonged to the military staff of Drusus (cohors Drass.), when the latter was sent to quell the revolt of the army in Germany, A.D. 14. Apronius was sent to Rome with two others to carry the demands of the Germani and on his return to Germany he served under Germansicus, and is mentioned as one of the Roman generals in the campaign of A.D. 15. On account of his services in this war he obtained the honour of the triumphal ornaments. (Tac. Ann. i. 29, 56, 72.) He was in Rome in the following year, A.D. 16 (ii. 32); and four years afterwards (A.D. 20), he succeeded Cumillus, as proconsul, in the government of Africa. He carried on the war against Tacfarinas, and enforced military discipline with great severity. (iii. 21.) He was subsequently the procurator of lower Germany, when the Frisi revolted, and seems to have lost his life in the war against them. (iv. 73, compared with xl. 13.) Apronius had two daughters: one of whom was married to Plautius Silvanus, and was murdered by her husband (iv. 22); the other was married to Lentulus Gaetulicus, consul in A.D. 20. (vi. 30.) He had a son, L. Apronius Cassianus, who accompanied his father to Africa in A.D. 20 (iii. 21), and who was consul for six months with Caligula in A.D. 39. (Dion Cass. liv. 13.)

APRONIUS'NUS. 1. C. VIPSTANUS APRONIUS, was proconsul of Africa at the accession of Vespasian, A.D. 70. (Tact. Hist. i. 76.) He is probably the same Apronius as the consul of that name in A.D. 59.

2. CASSIUS APRONIUS, the father of Dion Cassius, the historian, was governor of Dalmatia and Cilicia at different periods. Dion Cassius was with his father in Cilicia. (Dion Cass. xlii. 36, 1xix. 1, lxvii. 7, 7.) Reimar (de Vita Caesarum Dioni § 6, p. 1535) supposes, that Apronius was admitted into the senate about A.D. 180.

3. APRONIUS, governor of the province of Asia, was unjustly condemned to death in his absence, A.D. 208. (Dion Cass. lxvi. 5.)

4. APRONIUS ASTERIUS. [ASTERIUS.]

APSIDINIS (ἀψιδίνος). 1. An Athenian sophist, called by Suidas (s. v.; comp. Eudoc. p. 67) a man worthy of note, and father of Onasimus, but otherwise unknown.

2. A son of Onasimus, and grandson of Apsines No. 1, is likewise called an Athenian sophist. It is not impossible that he may be the Apsines whose commentary on Demosthenes is mentioned by Ulpian (ad Despect. Legit. p. 11; comp. Schol. ad Hemon. p. 402), and who taught rhetoric at Athens at the time of Aedesius, in the fourth century of our era, though this Apsines is called a Lacedaemonian. (Eunap. V. Soph. p. 113, ed. Antwerp. 1568.) This Apsines and his disciples were hostile to Julianus, a contemporary rhetorician at Athens, and to his school. This enmity grew so much that Athens in the end found itself in a state of civil warfare, which required the presence of a Roman proconsul to suppress. (Eunap. p. 115, &c.)

3. Of Gadara in Paphiaca, a Greek sophist and rhetorician, who flourished in the reign of Maximinus, about A.D. 235. He studied at Smyrna under Hierocles, the Lycean, and afterwards at Nicomedia under Basilicus. He subsequently taught rhetoric at Athens, and distinguished himself so much that he was honoured with the consular dignity. (Suidas, s. v.; Tzetzes. Ch. viii. 696.) He was a friend of Philostratus (Vit. Soph. ii. 33, § 4, who praises the strength and fidelity of his memory, but is afraid to say more for fear of being suspected of flattery or partiality. We still possess two rhetorical works of Apollonius: 1. Περὶ τῶν μέρων τοῦ πολιτικοῦ λόγου τέχνης, which was first printed by Aldus in his Rhetorices Graecae (pp. 682—726), under the incorrect title τέχνη δημο-ρρυπή τῆς πρωταίου, as it is called by the Scholiast on Hecatomneus (p. 14, but see p. 297). This work, however, is only a part of a greater work, which is so much interpolated, that it is scarcely possible to form a correct notion of it. In some of the interpolated parts Apollonius himself is quoted. A considerable portion of it was discovered by Ruhnken to belong to a work of Longinus on rhetoric, which is now lost, and this portion has consequently been omitted in the new edition of Walz in his Rhetorices Graecae. (ix. p. 465, &c.; comp. Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Beredsamh. § 98, n. 6.) 2. Περὶ τῶν ἐκπράξεων προ- θαμετάτου, of little importance and very short. It is printed in Aldus' Rhetorices Graecae. pp. 737—750, and in Walz. Rhetor. Graec. ix. p. 543, &c. [L.S.]

APYRHTOS or ABSYRTOS (Ἀπυρήτος), one of the principal veterinary surgeons of whom any remains are still extant, was born, according to Suidas (s. v.) and Eudocia (Viecar. ap. Villainose, Anecol. Graecav. vol. i. p. 665), at Prusa or Nicomedias in Bithynia. He is said to have served under Constantine in his campaign on the Danube, which is generally supposed to mean that under Constantine the Great, A. d. 329, but some refer it to that under Constantine IV. (or Pogonatus), A. d. 677. His remains are to be found in the "Veterinaria Medicinae Libri Duo," first published in Latin by J. Rubilius, Paris, 1559, fol., and afterwards in Greek by S. Grynaeus, Basil. 1537, 4to. Sprngel published a little work entitled "Programma de Apyroto Bithynico," Halea, 1832, 4to.

APTERTOS (Ἀπτέρτης), "the wingless," a surname under which Nio (the goddess of victory) had a sanctuary at Athens. This goddess was usually represented with wings, and their absence in this instance was intended to signify that Victory would or could never fly away from Athens. The same idea was expressed at Sparta by a statue of Ares with his feet chained. (Paus. i. 22. § 4, iii. 15. § 5) [L. S.]

APULIEUS. [APULIEUS.

APUSTIA GEN. had the cognomen FULLO. The Apati who bear no cognomen are spoken of under APUSSTUS. The first member of this gens who obtained the consulship, was L. Apustius Fullo, b. c. 3208. APUSSTUS. 1. L. APUSSTUS, the commander of the Roman troops at Tarentum, b. c. 215. (Liv. xxii. 38.)

2. L. APUSSTUS, legate of the consul P. Sulpicius in Macedonia, b. c. 200, was an active officer in the war against Philip. He was afterwards a legate of the consul L. Cornelius Sulpio, b. c. 190, and was killed in the same year in an engagement in Lybia. (Liv. xxxi. 27, xxxvii. 4, 16.)

3. P. APUSSTUS, one of the ambassadors sent to the younger Ptolemy, b. c. 161. (Polyb. xxxii. 1.)

APULIEUS (Ἀπολλάιος, the translator of the Old Testament into Greek, was a native of Pontus. Epiphanes (De Poud. et Mens, 15) states, that he was a relation of the emperor Hadrian, who employed him in the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Adia Capitolina); that he was converted to Christianity, but excommunicated for practising the heathen astrology; and that he then went over to the Jews, and was circumcised; but this account is probably founded only on vague rumours. All that we know with certainty is, that having been a heathen he became a Jewish proselyte, and that he lived in the reign of Hadrian, probably about 130 a. d. (Iren. iii. 24; Euseb. Praep. Ewam. vii. 11; Hieron. Ep. ad Pamvucul. vol. iv. pt. 2, p. 255, Mart.)

He translated the Old Testament from Hebrew into Greek, with the purpose of furnishing the Jews who spoke Greek with a version better fitted than the Septuagint to sustain them in their opposition to Christianity. He did not, however, as some have supposed, falsify or pervert the sense of the original, but he translated every word, even the titles, such as Messiah, with the most literal accuracy. This principle was carried to the utmost extent in a second edition, which was named παεσφύζης. The version was very popular in the Jews, in whose language it was read. (Nestle. 146.) It was generally disliked by the Christians; but Jerome, though sometimes showing this feeling, at other times speaks most highly of Aquila and his version. (Quaest. 2. ad Domast. iii. 33; Epist. ad Marc. iii. 58, ii. 312; Quaest. Hdb. in Genes. iii. 216; Comment. in Jos. c. 8; Comment. in Hos. c. 2.) The version is also praised by Origen. (Comment. in Joh. viii. 131; Respons. ad African. p. 224.)

Only a few fragments remain, which have been published in the editions of the Hexapla [Or- ganes], and in Dathe's Opuscula, Lips. 1746. [P. S.]

AQUILA, JULIUS, a Roman knight, stationed with a few cohorts, in a. d. 50, to protect Cotys, king of the Bosporus, who had received the sovereignty after the expulsion of Mithridates. In the same year, Aquila obtained the praetorius insignia. (Tac. Ann. xii. 18, 21.)

AQUILA, JULIUS (GALLUS), a Roman jurist, from whose liber responsorum two fragments concerning tutores are preserved in the Digest. In the Florentine Index he is named Gallus Aquila, probably from an error of the scribe in reading Τατούειο for Τατούειο. This has occasioned Julius Aquila to be confounded with Aquilius Gallus. His date is uncertain, though he probably lived under or before the reign of Septimius Severus A. d. 193-8; for in Dig. 26. tit. 7, s. 34 he gives an opinion upon a question which seems to have been first settled by Severus. (Dig. 27. tit. 3. s. 1. § 6.) By most of the historians of Roman law it is referred to a later period. He may possibly be the same person with Lucius Julius Aquila, who wrote de iusso discipline, or with that Aquil who, under Septimius Severus, was praefect of Egypt, and became memorable by his persecution the Christians. (Majansius, Comment. ad 30 Jurispr. Caput, vol. ii. p. 288; Otto, in Proef. Thes. vi. p. 13; Zimmerm. Röm. Rechts-Geschichte, vol. 3. § 163.) [J. T. G.

AQUILA, L. PONTIUS, tribune of the plebe probably in a. d. 55, was the only member of that college that did not rise to Caesar as he passed the tribunes' seats in his triumph. (Suet. Au. Cae AQUILLIA.

78.) He was one of Caesar’s murderers, and afterwards served as a legate of Brutus at the beginning of B.C. 43 in Cilicia Gaul. He defeated T. Munatius Planus, and drove him out of Pollentia, but was killed himself in the battle fought against Antony by Hirtius. He was honoured with a statue. (Appian, B. C. ii. 113; Dion Cass. xlv. 38, 40; Cic. Phil. xi. 6, xii. 12, ad Fam. x. 33.) Pontius Aquila was a friend of Cicero, and is frequently mentioned by him in his letters. (Ad Fam. v. 2–4, vii. 2, 3.)

AQUILA ROMANUS, a rhetorician, who lived after Alexander Numinus but before Julius Rutilianus, probably in the third century after Christ, the author of a small work intitled, de Eligendis Sententiarum et Eloquentiis, which is usually printed with Rutilius Lupus. The best edition is by Ruhnken, Legd. Bat. 1768, reprinted with additional notes by Fretzcher, Lips. 1831. Rutilianus states, that Aquila took the materials of this work from one of Alexander Numinus on the same subject. [See p. 123, a.]

AQUILA, VECLUSIUS, commander of the thirteenth legion, one of Otho’s generals, was present in the battle in which Otho’s troops were defeated by those of Vitellius, A. D. 70. He subsequently espoused Vespanian’s party. (Tac. Hist. ii. 44, iii. 7.)

AQUILIA SEVERA, JULIA, the wife of the emperor Elagabalus, whom he married after divorcing his former wife, Paula. This marriage gave great offence at Rome, since Aquilia was a Vestal virgin; but Elagabalus said that he had contracted it in order that divine children might be born from himself, the pontifex maximus, and a Vestal virgin. Dion Cassius says, that he did not live with her long; but that after marrying three others successively, he again returned to her. It appears from coins that he could not have married before A.D. 221. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 9; Historian. v. 6; Eckhel, vii. p. 259.)

COIN OF JULIA AQUILIA SEVERA.

AQUILINUS, a cognomen of the Herminia gens.

1. T. HERMINIUS AQUILINUS, one of the heroes of the battle of the Tanars, was with M. Horatius Cius, commander of the troops of Tanarinius Superbus when he was expelled from the camp. He was one of the defenders of the Subelian bridge against the whole force of Perseus, and took an active part in the subsequent battle against the Etruscans. He was consul in B.C. 506, and fell in the battle the lake Regillus in 498, in single combat with galli. (Liv. ii. 10, 11, 20; Dion. iv. 75, 72, 23, 26, 36, vii. 12; Plut. Poplic. 16.)

2. LAR HERMINIUS T. F. AQUILINUS, Cons. 448. (Liv. iii. 65; Diony. xi. 31.)

AQUILLIA, whom some had said that Quintus, the brother of the orator, intended to marry, mentions the report in one of his letters.

AQUILLIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. On coins and inscriptions the name is almost always written Aquillius, but in manuscripts generally with a single l. This gens is of great antiquity. Two of the Aquillii are mentioned among the Roman nobles who conspired to bring back the Tarquins (Liv. ii. 4); and a member of the house, C. Aquilius Tuscus, is mentioned as consul as early as B.C. 487. The cognomina of the Aquillii under the republic are Corvinus, Clasius, Florus, Galvus, and Aquilus: for those who bear no surname, see AQUILlius.

AQUILLIUS. 1. M. AQUILLIUS, M. F. M. N. Consul B.C. 129, put an end to the war which had been carried on against Ariovistus, the son of Eumenes of Pergamus, and which had been almost terminated by his predecessor, Perperna. On his return to Rome, he was accused by P. Lentulus of maladministration in his province, but was acquitted by bribing the judges. (Pliny ii. 20; Justin. xxxvi. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 5, Div. in Casuall. 21; Appian, B. C. i. 22.) He obtained a triumph on account of his successes in Asia, but not till B.C. 126. (Past. Capit.)

2. M. AQUILLIUS M. F. M. N., probably a son of the preceding, consul in B.C. 101, conducted the war against the slaves in Sicily, who had a second time revolted under Athenion. Aquillius completely subdued the insurgents, and triumphed on his return to Rome in 100. (Florus, i. 19; Liv. Epit. 69; Dio. xxxvi. Ed. 1; Cic. de Verr. iii. 54, v. 2; Fast. Capit.) In 98, he was accused by L. Fulius of maladministration in Sicily; he was defended by the orator M. Antonius, and, though there were strong proofs of his guilt, was acquitted on account of his bravery in the war. (Cic. Brut. 52, de Off. ii. 14, pro Florac. 39, de Orat. ii. 29, 47.)

In B.C. 86, he went into Asia as one of the consular legates to prosecute the war against Mithridates and his allies. He was defeated near Phrygian, and afterwards delivered up to the Mithridates by the inhabitants of Mytilene. Mithridates treated him in the most barbarous manner, and eventually put him to death by pouring molten gold down his throat. (Appian, Mithr. 7, 19, 21; Liv. Epit. 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Cic. pro Leg. Man. 5; Athen. v. p. 213, b.)

AQUILLIUS JULIUS AQUILIANUS. [Julianus.] AQUILLIUS REGULUS. [Regulus.] AQUILLIUS SEVERUS. [Severus.]

AQUINIUS, a very inferior poet, a contemporary of Catullus and Cicero. (Catull. xiv. 18; Cic. Tusc. vi. 28.)

M. AQUINUS, a Pompeian, who took part in the African war against Caesar. After the defeat of the Pompeians, he was pardoned by Caesar, B.C. 47. (De Bell. Afr. 57, 89.)

ARABIANUS (Aqabaru), an eminent Christian writer, about 186 A.D., composed some books on Christian doctrine, which are lost. (Euseb. Hist. v. 27; Hieron. de Vit. Illust. c. 51.) [P. S.]

ARABIUSSCHOLASTICUS (Arabius Symm. Aq. Chas.), the author of seven epigrams in the Greek Anthology, most of which are upon works of art, lived probably in the reign of Justinian. (Jacobs, xiii. p. 856.) [P. S.]

ARACHNE, a Lydian maiden, daughter of Imon of Celophon, who was a famous dyer in purple. His daughter was greatly skilled in the art of weaving, and, proud of her talent, she even ventured to challenge Athena to compete with her. Arachne produced a piece of cloth in which the amours of the gods were woven, and as Athena could find no fault with it, she tore the work to pieces, and Arachne in despair hung herself. The goddess loosed the rope and saved her life, but the rope was changed into a cobweb and Arachne herself into a spider (δαράγχη), the animal most odious to Athena. (Ov. Met. vi. 1—145; Virg. Georg. iv. 244.) This fable seems to suggest the idea that man learnt the art of weaving from the spider, and that it was invented in Lydia. [L. S.]

ARATHOYREAN (Ἀραθούρεια), a daughter of Aras, an autochthon who was believed to have built Aratus, the most ancient town in Phliasia. She had a brother called Aoros, and is said to have been fond of the chase and warlike pursuits. When she died, her brother called the country of Phliasia after her Arathyrean. (Hom. H. ii. 571; Strab. viii. p. 382.) She was the mother of Phlias. The monuments of Arathreia and her brother, consisting of round pillars, were still extant in the time of Pausanias; and before the mysteries of Demeter were commenced at Phlius, the people always inquired of Aras and his two children with their faces turned towards their monuments. (Paus. ii. 12. §§ 4—6.)

ARATUS (Ἀρατος), Euphor. n. c. 409, (Hell. ii. 3. § 10), was appointed admiral of the Macedonian fleet in n. c. 405, with Lysander for vice-admiral (στενοτέλειος), who was to have the real power, but who had not the title of admiral (ναύαρχος), because the laws of Sparta did not allow the same person to hold this office twice. (Plut. Lyc. 7; Xen. Hellen. ii. 1. § 7; Dio. xiii. 100; Paus. x. 9. § 4.) In 398 he was sent to Asia as one of the commissioners to inspect the state of things there, and to prolong the command of Durellidas (ill. 2. § 6); and in 395 he was one of the ambassadors sent to Athens. (vii. 5. § 33.) Here "Aratos" should be read instead of "Aratos.

ARAGYNTIUS (Ἀράγγινιος), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from mount Araynus, the position of which is a matter of uncertainty, and on which she had a temple. (Rhimus, ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. "Αράγγινιος.

ARARUS, PATRICIUS (Πατρικίου Ἀραρ- σιος), a Christian writer, was the author of a discourse in Greek entitled Oeconomus, a passage out of which, relating to Meletus and Aratus, is quoted in the Synodicon Velut. (32, ap. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xii. p. 55.) The title of this fragment is Πατρικίου Αραρσιον τω μισάρων, εκ τω λόγων αὐτῷ τοις διαβατεῖσθαι Ωκεανό. Nothing more is known of the writer. [L. S.]

ARATOS (Ἀράτος), an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, was the son of Aristophanes, who first introduced him to public notice as the principal actor in the second Fintus (a. c. 388), the last play which he exhibited in his own name: he wrote two more comedies, the Κάκαλος and the Αλολοκαρν, which were brought out in the name of Aratos (Arg. ad Pind. iv. Bokker), probably very soon after the above date. Aratos first exhibited in his own name n. c. 375. (Suidas, s. v.) Suidas mentions the following as his comedies: Κανώς, Καμπύλων, Πατός γεναλ., Τυμάων, Ἀδο- νις, Παράδεισοι. All that we know of his dramatic character is contained in the following passage of Alexis (Athen. iii. p. 123, c), who, however, was his rival:

κάρ γαρ βολώματα
διώτα χειματα πράγμα.

ARAS. [ARATHEIANA.]

ARASPES (Ἀρασπῆς), a Mede, and a friend of the elder Cyrus from his youth, contends with Cyrus that love has no power over him, but shortly afterwards refutes himself by falling in love with Panthea, whom Cyrus had committed to his charge. [ABRADATAS.] He is afterwards sent to Croesus as a deserrer, to inspect the condition of the enemy, and subsequently commands the right wing of Cyrus' army in the battle with Croesus. (Xen. Cyr. v. 1. §§ 1, 6, &c., iv. 1. §§ 36, &c., 3. §§ 14, 21.)

ARATUS (Ἀρατος), of Sicyon, lived from n. c. 271 to 212. The life of this remarkable man, as afterwards of Philipomen and Lycurgus, was devoted to an attempt to unite the several Greecian states together, and by this union to assert the national independence against the dangers with which it was threatened by Macedonia and Rome. Aratus was the son of Cleinias, and was born at Sicyon, n. c. 271. On the murder of his father by Abiantidas (ἈΒΑΙΝΤΙΑΔ) Aratus was saved from the general extermination of the family by Sosos, his uncle's widow, who conveyed him to Argos, where he was brought up. When he had reached the age of twenty, he gained possession of his native city by the help of some Argians, and the cooperation of the remainder of his party in Sicyon itself, without loss of life, and deprived the usurper Nicocles of his power, n. c. 251. (Comp. Polib. ii. 43.)

Through the influence of Aratus, Sicyon now joined the Achaean league, and Aratus himself sailed to Egypt to obtain Ptolemy's alliance, in which he succeeded. In n. c. 245 he was elected general (στρατηγὸς) of the league, and a second time in 243. In the latter of these years he took the citadel of Corinth from the Macedonian garrison, and induced the Corinthian people to join the league. It was chiefly through his instrumenality that Megara, Troezon, Epidaurus, Argos, Cleonea, and Megalopolis, were soon afterward added to it. It was about this time that the Aetolians, who had made a plundering expedition into Peloponnesus, were stopped by Aratus a Pollene (Polyb. iv. 8), being surprised at the sac of that town, and 700 of their number put to the sword. But at this very time, at which the power of the league seemed most secure, the seeds of its ruin were laid. The very prospect, which now for the first time opened, of the hitherto scattered powers of Greece being united in the league, awakened the jealousy of Aetolus, of Cleomenes, and of Cleomene, who was too ready to have a pretext for war [CLEOMENES.] Aratus, to save the league from that danger, contrived to win the alliance of Antigom Dosen, on the condition, as it afterwards appeared, of the surrender of Corinth. Ptolemy, as might be expected, joined Cleomenes; and in a succession of actions at Lycaeum, Megapolis, and Hecator baum, near Dyne, the Achaeans were well n pair destroyed. By these Aratus lost the confidence of the people, who passed a public censure on his conduct, and Sparta was placed at the head of a confederacy, fully able to dictate to the whole of Grec-ARATUS.

—Troizen, Epidaurus, Argos, Hermione, Pellene, Caphyae, Phlius, Pheneus, and Corinth, in which the Achaean garrison kept only the citadel. —

It was now necessary to call on Antigonus for the promised aid. Permission to pass through Aetolia having been refused, he embarked his army in transports, and, sailing by Eleusis, landed in the same place where Aetolia was occupied with the siege of Sicyon. (Polyb. ii. 52.)

The latter immediately raised the siege, and hastened to defend Corinth; but no sooner was he engaged there, than Aratus, by a master-stroke of policy, gained the assistance of a party in Argos to place the Lacedaemonian garrison in a state of siege. Cleomenes hastened thither, leaving Corinth in the hands of Antigonus; but arriving too late to take effectual measures against Aratus, while Antigonus was in his rear, he retreated to Mantinea and thence home. Antigonus meanwhile was by Aratus' influence elected general of the league, and made Corinth and Sicyon his winter quarters. What hope was there now left that the great design of Aratus' life could be accomplished — to unite all the Greek governments into one Greek nation? Henceforward the caprice of the Macedonian monarch was to regulate the relations of the powers of Greece. The career of Antigonus, in which Aratus seems henceforward to have been no further engaged than as his adviser and guide, ended in the great battle of Sellasis (b. c. 222), in which the Spartan power was for ever put down. Philip succeeded Antigonus in the throne of Macedon (b. c. 221), and it was his policy during the next two years (from 221 to 219 n. c.) to make the Achaenians feel how dependent they were on him. This period is accordingly taken up with incursions of the Aetolians, the unsuccessful opposition of Aratus, and the trial which followed. The Aetolians seized Clarium, a fortress near Megapolis (Polyb. iv. 6), and hence made their plundering excursions, till Cleomenes, general of the league, took the place and drove out the garrison. As the time for the expiration of Aratus' office arrived, the Aetolian general Dorimachus and Scopas made an attack on Thebes and Patras, and carried on their ravages up to the borders of Messene, in the hope that active measures would be taken against them till the commander for the following year was chosen. To remedy this, Aratus anticipated command five days, and ordered the troops of the league to assemble at Megapolis. The Aetolians, finding his force superior, prepared to quit the country, when Aratus, thinking his object disturbed by the disbandment of the Aetolians, marched with about 4000 to accuse. The Aetolians turned round in pursuit, and encamped at Methymnion, upon which Aratus ranged his position to Caphyae, and in a battle, which began in a skirmish of cavalry to gain some ground advantageous to both positions, was quickly defeated and his army nearly destroyed. The Aetolians marched home in triumph, and Aratus was recalled to take his trial on several charges, — assuming the command before his legal age, distounding his troops, unskilful conduct in the time and place of action, and carelessness in the action itself. He was acquitted, not on the ground that the charges were untrue, but consideration of his past services. For some time after this the Aetolians continued their invasions, and Aratus was unable effectually to check them, till at last Philip took the field as commander of the allied army. The six remaining years of Aratus' life are a mere history of intrigues, by which at different times his influence was more or less shaken with the king. At first he was entirely set aside; and this cannot be wondered at, now his object was to unite Greece as an independent nation, while Philip wished to unite it as subject to himself. In b. c. 218, it appears that Aratus regained his influence by an exposure of the treachery of his opponents; and the effects of his presence were shown in a victory gained over the combined forces of the Aetolians, Eleans, and Lacedaemonians. In b. c. 217 Aratus was the 17th time chosen general, and every thing, so far as the security of the league was concerned, prospered; but the feelings and objects of the two men were so different, that no unity was to be looked for, so soon as the immediate object of subduing certain states was effected. The story told by Plutarch, of Aratus' advice to Philip about the garrisoning of Ithome, would probably represent well the general tendency of the feeling of these two men. In b. c. 213 he died, as Plutarch and Polybius both say (Polyb. viii. 14; Plut. Arat. 52), from the effect of poison administered by the king's order. Divine honours were paid to him by his countrymen, and annual solemnities established. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ἀρατεα.) Aratus wrote Commentaries, being a history of his own times down to b. c. 220 (Polyb. iv. 2), which Polybius characterises as clearly written and faithful records. (ii. 40.) The greatness of Aratus lay in the steadiness with which he pursued a noble purpose,—of uniting the Greeks as one nation; the consummate ability with which he guided the elements of the storm which raged about him; and the zeal which kept him true to his object to the end, when a different conduct would have secured to him the greatest personal advantage. As a general, he was unsuccessful in the open field; but for success in stratagem, which required calculation and dexterity of the first order, unrivalled. The leading object of his life was noble in its conception, and, considering the state of Macedonia and of Egypt, and more especially the existence of a contemporary with the virtues and abilities of Cleomenes, ably conducted. Had he been supported in his attempt to raise Greece by vigour and purity, such as that of Cleomenes in the cause of Sparta, his fate might have been different. As it was, he left his country surrounded by difficulty and danger to the guiding hand of Philopoemen and Lycorides. (Phil. Aratus and Ages. i Polyb. ii. iv. v. vii.)

[ C. T. A. ]

ARATUS (Apoeres), author of two Greek astronomical poems. The date of his birth is not known; but it seems that he lived about b. c. 270; it is probable, therefore, that the death of Euclid and the birth of Apollonius Pergaeus happened during his life, and that he was contemporary with Aristarchus of Samos, and Theocritus, who mentions him. (Iasyl. vi. and vii.) There are several accounts of his life by anonymous Greek writers: three of them are printed in the 2nd vol. of Bulle's Aratus, and one of the same in the Uranographia of Petavius. Suidas and Eutocius also mention him. From these it appears that he was a native of Soli (afterwards Pompeopolis) in Cilicia, or (according to one authority) of Tarsus; that he was invited to the court of Antiguious Gonatas, king of Macedonia, where he spent all the latter part of his life; and that his chief pursuits were physic (which is also said to have been his profession), grammar, and philosophy, in which last he was instructed by the Stoic Dionysius Hermocrates.

Several poetical works on various subjects, as well as a number of prose epistles, are attributed to Aratus (Buhle, vol. ii. p. 455), but none of them have come down to us, except the two poems mentioned above. These have generally been joined together as if parts of the same work; but they seem to be distinct poems. The first, called Εὐσκύρη καὶ Ἑρμήνευς (Eusyrēs and Hermēnyus), composed about 230 B.C., consists of a part of the second book of the Phaenomena (Phaenomena), of 422. Eudosius, about a century earlier, had written two prose works, Φασιστήρ and Εὔκοπτος, which are both lost; but we are told by the biographers of Aratus, that it was the desire of Antiguious to have them turned into verse, which gave rise to the Εὐσκύρη of the latter writer; and it appears from the fragments of the works preserved by Hipparchus (Ptole. Τῆς Αἰτωλίας, p. 173, &c., ed. Paris. 1630), that Aratus has in fact versified, or closely imitated parts of them both, but especially of the first. The design of the poem is to give an introduction to the knowledge of the constellations, with the rules for their risings and settings; and of the circles of the sphere, amongst which the milky way is reckoned. The positions of the constellations, north of the ecliptic, are described by reference to the principal groups surrounding the north pole (the Bears, the Dragon, and Cepheus), whilst Orion serves as a point of departure for those to south. The immobility of the earth, and the revolution of the heavens about a fixed axis are maintained; the path of the sun in the zodiac is described; but the planets are introduced merely as bodies having a motion of their own, without any attempt to define their periods; nor is anything said about the moon's orbit. The opening of the poem asserts the dependence of all things upon Zeus, and contains the passage τοις ἄμορφοις τοις ἀμαρτοῖς, quoted by St. Paul (Aratus' fellow-countryman) in his address to the Athenians. (Acts xviii. 28.) From the general want of precision in the descriptions, it would seem that Aratus was neither a mathematician nor observer (comp. Cic. de Orig. i. 16) or at any rate, that in this work he did not aim at scientific accuracy. He not only represents the configurations of particular groups incorrectly, but describes some phenomena which are inconsistent with any one supposition as to the latitude of the spectator, and others which could not coexist at any one epoch. (See the article ARATUS in the Penny Cyclopaedia.) These errors are partly to be attributed to Eudoxus himself, and partly to the way in which Aratus has used the material supplied by him. Hipparchus (about a century later), who was a scientific astronomer and observer, has left a commentary upon the Εὐσκύρη of Eudoxus and Aratus, occasioned by the discrepancies which he had noticed between his own observations and their descriptions.

The Διονυσιακας consists of prognostics of the weather from astronomical phaenomena, with an account of its effects upon animals. It appears to be an imitation of Hesiod, and to have been imitated by Virgil in some parts of the Georgics.

The materials are said to be taken almost wholly from Aristotle's Meteorologica, from the work of Theophrastus, "De Signis Ventorum," and from Hesiod. (Buhle, vol. ii. p. 471.) Nothing is said in either poem about Astrology in the proper sense of the word.

The style of these two poems is distinguished by the elegance and accuracy resulting from a study of ancient models; but it wants originality and poetic elevation; and variety of matter is excluded by the nature of the subjects. (See Quintil. x. 1.) That they became very popular both in the Greek and Roman world (comp. Ov. Am. i. 15. 16) is proved by the number of commentaries and Latin transmissions. The introduction to the poem by Achilles Tatius, the Commentarius of Hipparchus in three books, and another attributed to Petavius to Achilles Tatius, are printed in the Uranologium, with a list of other Commentators (p. 267), which includes the names of Aristarchus, Geminus, and Eratosthenes. Parts of three poetical Latin translations are preserved. One written by Cicero when very young (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 41), one by Caesar Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus, and one by Festus Avienus. The earliest edition of Aratus is that of Aldus. (Ven. 1499, fol.) The principal later ones are by Grotius (Lugd. Bat. 1600, 4to.), Buhle (Lips. 1735, 2 vols. 8vo., with the Commentaries), Mattheus (Franco. 1617, 8vo.), Voss (Heidelberg. 1624, 8vo., with a German poetical version), Buttman (Berol. 1826, 8vo.), and Bekker. (Berol. 1828, 8vo.)

ARATUS (Ἀράτος), of Cnidus, the author of a history of Egypt. (Anonym. Vitr. Arat.)

ARBACES (Ἀρβάκης). 1. The founder of the Median empire, according to the account of Ctesias (ap. Diod. ii. 24, &c., 82). He is said to have taken Nineveh in conjunction with Belisias, the Babylonian, and to have destroyed the old Assyrian empire under the reign of Sardanapalus, n. c. 876. Ctesias assigns 26 years to the reign of Arbaces, n. c. 876-850, and makes his dynasty consist of eight kings. This account diverges from that of Herodotus, who makes Deioces the first king of Media, and assigns only four kings to his dynasty [Diodores.] Ctesias' account of the overthrow of the Assyrian empire by Arbaces is followed by Velleius Paterculus (i. 6), Justin (i. 3), and Strabo (xvi. p. 737.)

2. A commander in the army of Artaxerxes which fought against his brother Cyrus, n. c. 401. He was satrap of Media. (Xen. Anab. i. 7. § 11. vii. 8. § 25.)

A'RBİTER, PETRONIUS. [PETRONIAC ARBITRAL.]

ARBOFRIUS, AEMLIUS MAGNUS, a poet of a poem in ninety-two lines in elegiac verse, entitled "Ad Nymphum namis cultum," which contains a great many expressions taken from the older poets, and bears all the traces of artificial Labour which characterizes the later Latin poetry. It is printed in the Anthology of Buemann (iii. 275) and Meyer (Ep. 262), and Wernsdorff's Poet. Lat. Minor. (iii. p. 217.) The author of it was a rhetorician at Tolosa in Gaule, the maternal uncle of Ausonius, who speaks of him with great praise, and mentions that he enjoy the friendship of the brothers of Constantine, when they lived at Teos, and was afterwards called to Constantineople to superintend the education of one of the Caesars. (Amm. Marcell. Pler. xvi.)

ARBIUS (Apobides), a surname of Zenus, derived from mount Arbus in Crete, where he was worshipped. (Steph. Byz. s. a. Apobides.) [L. S.]

ARBUSCULA, a celebrated female Pantomime, whose Cleo speaks of in B.c. 54 as having given him great pleasure. (Ad Att. iv. 16; Hor. Sat. i. 10. 76.)

ARCA'DIUS, emperor of the East, was the eldest of the two sons of the emperor Theodosius I. and the empress Flacilla, and was born in Spain in A.D. 383. Themistius, a pagan philosopher, and afterwards Arculfus, a Christian saint, conducted his education. As early as 395, Theodosius conferred upon him the title of Augustus; and, upon the death of his father in the same year, he became emperor of the East, while the West was given to his younger brother, Honorius; and with him begins the series of emperors who reigned at Constantinople till the capture of the city by the Turks in 1453. Arcadius had inherited neither the talents nor the manly beauty of his father; he was ill-shapen, of a small stature, of a swarthy complexion, and without either physical or intellectual vigour; his only accomplishment was a beautiful handwriting. Docility was the chief quality of his character; others, women or eunuchs, reigned for him; for he had neither the power to have his own will, nor even passion enough to make others obey his whims. Rufinus, the prefect of the East, a man capable of every crime, had been appointed by Theodosius the guardian of Arcadius, while Stilicho became guardian of Honorius. Rufinus intended to marry his daughter to the young emperor, but the eunuch Eupropius rendered this plan abortive, and contrived a marriage between Arcadius and Eudoxia, the beautiful daughter of Bauto, a Frank, who was a general in the Roman army. Exposed to the rivalry of Honorius and Arcadius, he grew fond of the guardianship over Arcadius also. Rufinus was accused of having caused an invasion of Greece by Alaric, chief of the Goths, to whom he had neglected to pay the annual tribute. His fall was the more easy, as the people, exasperated by the rapacity of the minister, held him in general execration; and thus Rufinus was murdered as early as 398 by order of the Goth Gainus, who acted on the command of Stilicho. His successor as minister was Eutropius, and the emperor was a mere tool in the hands of his eunuch, his wife, and his general, Gainus. They declared Stilicho an enemy of the empire, confiscated his estates within the limits of the Eastern empire, and, concluded an alliance with Alaric, for the purpose of preventing Stilicho from marching upon Constantinople. (307.) After this, Eutropius was invested with the dignities of consul and general-in-chief—the first eunuch in the Roman empire who had ever been honoured with those titles, but who was unworthy of them, being as ambitious and insidious as Rufinus.

The fall of Eutropius took place under the following circumstances. Tribigildus, the chief of a portion of the Goths who had been transplanted to Phrygia, rose in rebellion, and the disturbances became so dangerous, that Gainus, who was perhaps the secret instigator of them, advised the emperor to settle this affair in a friendly way. No sooner was Tribigildus informed of it, than he demanded the head of Eutropius before he would enter into negotiations; and the emperor, persuaded by Eudoxia, gave up his minister. St. Chrysostom, afraid of Arianism, pleaded the cause of Eutropius, but in vain; the minister was banished to Cyprus, and soon afterwards beheaded. (309.) Upon this, the Goths left Phrygia and returned to Europe, where they stayed partly in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and partly within the walls of the city. Gainus, after having ordered the Roman troops to leave the island, demanded liberty of divine service for the Goths, who were Arians; and as St. Chrysostom energetically opposed such a concession to heresy, Gainus tried to set fire to the imperial palace. But the people of Constantinople took up arms, and Gainus was forced to evacuate the city with those of the Goths who had not been slain by the inhabitants. Crossing the Bosporus, he suffered a severe defeat by the imperial fleet, and fled to the banks of the Danube, where he was killed by the Huns, who sent his head to Constantinople.

After his fall the incompetent emperor became entirely dependent upon his wife Eudoxia, who assumed the title of "Augusta," the empress hitherto having only been styled "Nobilissima." Through her influence St. Chrysostom was exiled in 404, and popular troubles preceded and followed his fall. As to Arcadius, he was a sincere adherent of the orthodox church. He confirmed the laws of his father, which were intended for its protection; he interdicted the public meetings of the heretics; he purged his palace from heretical officers and servants; and in 396 he ordered that all the buildings in which the heretics used to hold their meetings should be confiscated. During his reign great numbers of pagans adopted the Christian religion. But his reign is stigmatized by a cruel and unjust law concerning high treason, the work of Eutropius, which was issued in 397. By this law, which was a most tyrannical extension of the Lex Julia Majestatis, the principal civil and military officers of the emperor were identified with his sacred person, and offences against them, either by deeds or by thoughts, were punished as crimes of high treason. (Cod. Theod. x. 3. 7; Cod. Theod. xii. 14. 3.) Arcadius died on the 1st of May, 408, leaving the empire to his son Theodosius II., who was a minor. (Cod. Theod. v. 11. 567—586, ed. Bonn, pp. 327—334, ed. Paris; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. x. 10, vi. pp. 372—384, ed. Reading; Sozomenus, viii. pp. 328—363, Theophanes, pp. 68—69, ed. Paris; Theodoret, v. 32, & cc, p. 326, ed. COIN OF ARCADIUS.

ARCADIUS, bishop of Constantinople in Cyprus, wrote a life of Simaeus Stylias the younger, sum-named Thaumastorita, several passages from which are quoted in the Acts of the second council of Nice. A few other works, which exist in MS., are ascribed to him. (Fabric. Bib. Graec. xi. pp. 578, 579, xii. p. 178.) Cave (Dés. de Script. Inor. Act. p. 4) places him before the eighth century. [P. S.]

ARCHDIUS (Ἀρχδίας) of Antioch, a Greek grammarian of uncertain date, but who did not live before 200 A.D., was the author of several grammatical works, of which Suidas mentions Πελδρηγορίας, Πελδυστζεων των τω λόγω μεραν, and Οιουμαστικια. A work of his on the accents (Πελδε Τωνω) has come down to us, and was first published by Barker from a manuscript at Paris. (Leipz. 1820.) It is also included in the first volume of Dindorf's Gramat. Graec. Lips. 1823.

ARCA (Ἀρκα). 1. The ancestor and eponymic hero of the Arcadians, from whom the country and its inhabitants derived their name. He was a son of Zeus by Callisto, a companion of Artemis. [Callisto] Zeus gave the child to Maia, and called him Arcas. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 2) Arcas became afterwards by Leuanem or Megamira the father of Elatus and Aphebeia. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 176, Post. Astr. ii. 4) Arcas was the son of Lycaon, whose flesh the father set before Zeus, to try his divine character. Zeus upset the table (παιρετσα) which bore the dish, and destroyed the house of Lycaon by lightning, but restored Arcas to life. When Arcas had grown up, he built the site of his father's house the town of Tripeus. When Arcas once during the chase pursued his mother, who was metamorphosed into a she-bear, as far as the sanctuary of the Lycaean Zeus, which no mortal was allowed to enter, Zeus placed both of them among the stars. (Ov. Met. ii. 410, &c.) According to Pausanias (viii. 4. § 1, &c.) Arcas succeeded Nyctimus in the government of Arcadia, and gave to the country which until then had been called Peleagia the name of Arcadia. He taught his subjects the arts of making bread and of weaving. He was married to the nymph Ento, by whom he had three sons, Elatus, Aphebeias, and Azan, among whom he divided his kingdom. He had one illegitimate son, Autolalus, whose mother is not mentioned. The tomb of Arcas was shewn at Mynthela, whither his remains had been carried from mount Maenius at the command of the Delphic oracle. (Paus. viii. 9. § 2.) Statues of Arcas and his family were dedicated at Delphi by the inhabitants of Tegen. (x. 9. § 3.)

2. A surname of Hermes. (Lucan, Phars. ix. 601; Martial, xi. 34, 6; Hermes.) [L. S.]

MARCTHIA (Ἀρκας), a son of Mithridates, joined Neoptolemus and Archelaus, the generals of his father, with 10,000 horse, which he brought from the lesser Armenia, at the commencement of the war with the Romans, b.c. 88. He took an active part in the great battle fought near the river Amniae or Amnias (see Strab. xii. p. 562) in Paphlogonia, in which Nicomedes, the king of Bithynia, was defeated. Two years afterwards, b.c. 86, he invaded Macedonia with a separate army, and completely conquered the country. He then proceeded to march against Sulla, but died on the way at Tithaeum (Polluneia) (Appian, Mithr. 17, 18, 35, 41.)

ARCHA (Ἀργχα), a daughter of Thaumis and sister of Iris, who in the contest of the gods with the Titans sided with the latter. Zeus afterwards punished her for this by throwing her into Tartarus and depriving her of her wings, which were given to Thetis at her marriage with Peleus. Thetis afterwards fixed these wings to the feet of her son Achilles, who was therefore called ἄρσατερ. (Plut. Heph. 6.) [L. S.]

ARCHESIUS/ADES (Ἀρχεσιάδης), a patronymic from Archeius, the father of Laertes, who as well as his son Odysses are designated by the name of Archeiades. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 270, iv. 758.) [L. S.]

ARCHESIUS (Ἀρχεσίουs), a son of Zeus and Eurydias, husband of Chalcodamus and father of Laertes. (Hom. Od. xiv. 102, xiv. 116; Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Ov. Met. xiii. 145; Bostath. ad Hom. p. 1796.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 169), he was a son of Cepheus and Praxia, and according to others, of Cepheus and a she-bear. (Bostath. ad Hom. p. 1796, comp. p. 1756.) [L. S.]

ARCHESIUS (Ἀρχεσίουs), a son of Gymnias, a son of Gymnias of Solanis in Cyprus. Antoninus Liberalis (39) relates of him and Artemis precisely the same story which Ovid (Met. xiv. 698, &c.) relates of Anaxarete and Iphisestheo (Anaxarotes). [L. S.]

ARCHESIUS (Ἀρχεσίουs), a son of Lycaon and Theobule, was the leader of the Boeotians in the Trojan war. He led his people to Troy in ten ships, and was slain by Hector. (Hom. II. 495, xv. 329; Hygin. Fab. 97.) According to Pausanias (ix. 39. § 2) his remains were brought back to Boeotia, where a monument was erected to his memory in the neighbourhood of Lebubia. A son of Odysses and Penelope of the name of Archeiades is mentioned by Bostath. (Ad Hom. p. 1794, comp. p. 1796.) [L. S.]

ARCHESIUS (Ἀρχεσίουs). 1. The name of four kings of Cyrene. [BATAVUS AND BATIADABE]

2. The murderer of Archagathus, the son of Agathocles, when the latter left Africa, b.c. 307. Archeius had formerly been a friend of Agathocles. (Justin. xxii. 8; Agathocles, b. 64.)

3. One of the ambassadors sent to Rome by the Lacedaemonian exiles about b.c. 183, who was intercepted by pirates and killed. (Polymb. xxiv. 11.)

4. Of Megalopolis, was one of those who disarmed the Achaeans league from assisting Perseus in the war against the Romans in b.c. 170. In the following years he was one of the ambassadors sent by the league to attempt the reconciliation of Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy. (Polymb. xxvii. 6, xxix. 10.)

ARCHESIUS/US (Ἀρχεσίας) or ARCHELISIUS, the founder of the new Academy, flourished towards the close of the third century before Christ. (Comp. Strab. i. p. 15.) He was the son of Seuthes or Scytheus (Diog. Laërt. iv. 13), and born at Pitane in Aetolia. His early education was entrusted to Antylopes, a mathematician, with whom he migrated to Sardis. Afterwards, at the wish of his elder brother and guardian, Môneas, he came to Athens to study rhetoric; but becoming the disciple first of Theophrastus and afterwards of Crantor, he found his inclination led to philosophical pursuits. Not content, however, with any single school, he left his early masters and studied under sceptical and dialectic philosophers; and the life of Aristotle upon him, Pyrrho, Leucip, Theodorus, Cleantus, Antigonus, described the course of his early education, as well... as the discordant character of some of his later views. He was not without reputation as a poet, and Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 30) has preserved two epigrams of his, one of which is addressed to Attalus, king of Pergamus, and records his admiration of Homer and Pindar, of whose works he was an enthusiastic reader. Several of his puns and witlessies have been preserved in his life by the same writer, which give the idea of an accomplished man of the world rather than a grave philosopher. Many traits of character are also recorded of him, some of them of a pleasing nature. The greatness of his personal character is shewn by the imitation of his peculiarities, into which his admirers are said insensibly to have fallen. His oratory is described as of an attractive and persuasive kind, the effect of it being enhanced by the frankness of his demeanour. Although his means were not large, his resources being chiefly derived from king Eumenes, many tales were told of his unassuming generosity. But it must be admitted, that there was another side to the picture, and his enemies accused him of the grossest profligacy—a charge which he only answered by citing the example of Aristippus—and it must be confessed, that the accusation is slightly confirmed by the circumstance that he died in the 70th year of his age from a fit of excessive drunkenness; on which event an epigram has been preserved by Diogenes.

It was on the death of Crater that Arcesilas succeeded to the chair of the Academy, in the history of which he makes so important an era. As, however, he committed nothing to writing, his opinions were imperfectly known to his contemporaries, and can now only be gathered from the confused statements of his opponents. There seems to have been a gradual decline of philosophy since the time of Plato and Aristotle: the same subjects had been again and again discussed, until no room was left for original thought—a deficiency which was but poorly compensated by the extravagant paradox or overdrawn subtlety of the later schools. Whether we attribute the scepticism of the Academy to a reaction from the dogmatism of the Stoics, or whether it was the natural result of extending to intellectual truth the distrust with which Plato viewed the information of sense, it would seem that in the time of Arcesilaus the whole of philosophy was absorbed in the single question of the grounds of human knowledge. What were the peculiar views of Arcesilas on this question, it is not easy to collect. On the one hand, he is said to have restored the doctrines of Plato in an uncorrupted form; while, on the other hand, according to Cicero (Acad. i. 12), he summed up his opinions in the formula, "that he knew nothing, not even his own ignorance." There are two ways of reminding the difficulty: either we may suppose him to have thrown out such epicles or the ingenuity of his pupils, as Sextus Empiricus (Pseud. Hypotyp. i. 324), who disclaims him as a sceptic and says of his belief in Leucippus (the atomistic as well as the atomistic) the same that he elsewhere has doubted the atomistic meaning of Plato, and supposed himself to have been stripping his words of the figments of the Dogmatists, while he is in fact taking from them all certain principles. However, (Cic. de Orat. iii. 18.) A curious result the confusion which pervaded the New Academy is the return to some of the doctrines of the older school, which they attempted to harmonise with Plato and their own views. (Euseb. Pr. Ec. xiv. 5, 6.) Arcesilas is also said to have restored the Socratic method of teaching in dialogues; although it is probable that he did not confine himself strictly to the Socratic method, perhaps the supposed identity of his doctrines with those of Plato may have originated in the outward form in which they were conveyed.

The Stoics were the chief opponents of Arcesilas; he attacked their doctrine of a convincing conception (καταλεκτικὴ φαντασία) as understood to be a mean between science and opinion—a mean which he asserted could not exist, and was merely the interpolation of a name. (Cic. Acad. ii. 24.) It involved in fact a contradiction in terms, as the very idea of phantasia implied the possibility of false as well as true conceptions of the same object.

It is a question of some importance, in what the scepticism of the New Academy was distinguished from that of the followers of Pyrrhon. Admitting the formula of Arcesilas, "that he knew nothing, not even his own ignorance," to be an exposition of his real sentiments, it was impossible in one sense that scepticism could proceed further: but the New Academy does not seem to have doubted the existence of truth in itself, only our capacities for obtaining it. It differed also from the principles of the pure sceptic in the practical tendency of its doctrines: while the object of the one was the attainment of perfect equipoise (ἐξορύξα), the other seems rather to have retired from the barren field of speculation to practical life, and to have acknowledged some vestiges of a moral law within, at best a practical good, the possession of which, however, formed the real distinction between the sage and the fool. Slight as the difference may appear between the speculative statements of the two schools, a comparison of the lives of their founders and their respective successors leads us to the conclusion, that a practical moderation was the characteristic of the New Academy, to which the Sceptics were wholly strangers. (Sex. Empiricus, ado. Math. ii. 158, Pseud. Hypotyp. i. 3, 226.) [B.J.]

ARCESILAS. (Ἀρκεσιλαος), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, none of whose works are extant. (Diog. Laert. iv. 45.)

[П. С.]

ARCESILAS, artists. 1. A sculptor who made a statue of Dionysus celebrated by an ode of Semonides. (Diog. Laert. iv. 45.) He may, therefore, have flourished about 500 B. c.

2. Of Paros, was, according to Pliny (xxxv. 39), one of the first encaustic painters, and a contemporary of Polygnotus (about 460 B. c.).

3. A painter, the son of the sculptor Tissernates, flourished about 280 or 270 B. c. (Plin. xxxv. 40, § 42.) Pausanias (i. 1. § 5) mentions a painter of the same name, whose picture of Leosthenes and his sons was to be seen in the Peirama. Though Leosthenes was killed in the war of Athens against Lamin, B. c. 323, Silius argues, that the fact of his son being included in the picture favours the supposition that it was painted after his death. But we may therefore safely refer the passages of Pausanias and of Pliny to the same person. (Catacl. Artif. s. v.)

4. A sculptor in the first century B. c., who, according to Pliny, was held in high esteem at Rome, was especially celebrated by M. Varro, and was intimate with L. Lentulus. Among his works were a statue of Venus Genetrix in the forum of Caesar, and a marble likeness of a winged Cupid, who was sporting with her. Of the latter work the mosaics in the Mus. Borb. vii. 61, and the Mus. Capit. iv. 19, are supposed to be copies. There were some statues by him of centaurs carrying nymphs, in the collection of Asimius Pollio. He received a talent from Octavius, a Roman knight, for the model of a bowl (cruet), and was engaged by Lucullus to make a statue of Felicita for 60 sesterces; but the deaths both of the artist and of his patron prevented the completion of the work. (Plin. xxx. 45, xxxvi. 4. §§ 10, 13: the reading Archiætæs, in § 10, ought, almost undoubtedly, to be Acessius or Acesiæus.) [P. S.]

ARCHAEANA CITIDÆÆ (Ἀρχαιανα Καιτίδαι), the name of a race of kings who reigned in the Cimmerian Bosporus forty-two years, B.C. 460—438. (Diod. xii. 31, with Wesselein's note.)

ARCHAGATHUS (Ἀρχαγαθός). 1. The son of Agathocles, accompanied his father in his expedition into Africa, B.C. 310. While there he narrowly escaped being put to death in a tumult of the soldiers, occasioned by his having murdered Lyceus, who reproached him with committing incest with his step-mother Alia. When Agathocles was summoned from Africa by the state of affairs in Sicily, he left Archagathus behind in command of the army. He met at first with some success, but was afterwards defeated three times, and obliged to take refuge in Tunis. Agathocles returned to his assistance; but a mutiny of the soldiers soon compelled him to leave Africa again, and Archagathus and his brother were put to death by the troops in revenge, B.C. 307. (Diod. xx. 59, 57—61; Justin. xxi. 32.)

2. The son of the preceding, described as a youth of great bravery and daring, murdered Agathocles, the son of Agathocles, that he might succeed his grandfather. He was himself killed by Mnenon. (Diod. xxi. Ed. 12.)

ARCHAGATHUS (Ἀρχαγαθός), a Peloponnesian, the son of Lysanias, who settled at Rome as a practitioner of medicine, B.C. 219, and, according to Cassius Hemia (as quoted by Pliny, H. N. xxix. 6), was the first person who made it a distinct profession in that city. He was received in the first instance with great respect, the "As Quirinius was given him, and a shop was bought for him at the public expense; but his practice was not observed to be so successful, that he did not extirpate the dislike of the people at large, and produced a complete disgust to the profession generally. The practice of Archagathus seems to have been almost exclusively surgical, and to have consisted, in a great measure, in the use of the knife and powerful caustic applications. (Bostock, Hist. of Med.) [W. A. G.]"

ARCHIBULUS (Ἀρχιβολύς), of Thbes, a lyric poet, who appears to have lived about the year B.C. 280, as Euphorion is said to have been instructed by him in poetry. (Suid. s.v. Ἐυφόριον.) A particular kind of verse which was frequently used by other lyric poets, was called after him. (Hephaestion, p. 27.) Not a fragment of his poetry now extant. [L. S.]

ARCHIDEMUS or ARCHEDAMUS (Ἀρχιδήμος or Ἀρχέδαμος). 1. A popular leader at Athens, took the first step against the generals who had gained the battle of Arginusae, B.C. 406, by imposing a fine on Eranistes, and calling him to account in a court of justice for some public money which he had received in the Hellaspont. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. § 2.) This seems to be the same Archidamus of whom Xenophon speaks in the Memnonia (τ. 9), as originally poet, but of considerable talent both for speaking and public business, and who was employed by Criton to protect him and his friends from the attacks of scyphophants. It appears that Archidamus was a foreigner, and obtained the franchise by fraud, for which he was attacked by Aristophanes (Ran. 419) and by Eupolis in the Baptæ. (Schol. ad Aristoph. l. a.) Both Aristophanes (Ran. 588) and Lysias (c. Alcib. p. 583, ed. Reiske) call him bea-verved (γλαφρός).

3. Ό Πηδος, mentioned by Aeschines (c. Cleon. p. 531, ed. Reiske), should be distinguished from the preceding.

3. An Aetolian (called Archidamus by Livy), who commanded the Aetolian band which assisted the Romans in their war with Philip. In B.C. 199 he compelled Philip to raise the siege of Thamacii (Liv. xxxii. 4), and took an active part in the battle of Cynoscephalæa, B.C. 197, in which Philip was defeated. (Pol. xvii. 4.) When the war broke out between the Romans and the Aetolians, he was sent as ambassador to the Achaeanas to solicit their assistance, B.C. 192 (Liv. xxxiv. 48); and on the defeat of Antiochus the Great in the following year, he went as ambassador to the consuls M. Atilius Glabrio to sue for peace. (Pol. xxiv. 6.) In B.C. 169 he was denounced to the Romans by Lysineas as one of their enemies. (Pol. xxviii. 47.) He joined Perseus the same year, and accompanied the Macedonian king in his flight after his defeat in 168. (Livy. xiii. 23, 24, xiv. 43.)

4. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher (Strab. xiv. p. 674; Diog. Laërt. vii. 40, 66, 84, 88), two of whose works, Πείρονδος and Πετρονίονων, are mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius. (vii. 55, 134.) He is probably the same person as the Archidamus, whom Plutarch (de Scipio, p. 605) calls an Athenian, and who, he states, went into the country of the Parthians and left behind him the Stoic succession at Babylon. Archidamus is also mentioned by Cicero (Acad. Quaest. i. 47), Seneca (Epist. 121), and other ancient writers.

ARCHIDICE (Ἀρχιδίκη), daughter of Hippias the Peloponnesian, and given in marriage by him to his friend and companion Aesop. Her chief work is a lamentation to Aesopides, son of Hippocles, the tyrant of Lampascus. She is famous for the epitaph given in Thucydides, and ascribed by Aristotel to Simonides, which told that, with father, husband, and sons in sovereign power, still she retained her meekness. (Thuc. vi. 59; Arist. Eth. 1. 9.) [A. H. C.]

ARCHIDICES (Ἀρχιδίκης), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, who wrote, at the instigation of Timaeus, against Democritus, the nephew of Demeoclides, and supported Antipater and the Macedonian party. The titles of two of his plays are preserved, Δεμοκρίτου and Σωματοφυαί. He flourished about 302 B.C. (Suidas, s. v.; Athen. vi. p. 252, f., vii. pp. 292, e., 294, a. b., x. p. 467, e., xiii. p. 610, f.; Polb. xii. 13.)

ARCHGETES (Ἀρχγετῆς). 1. A surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped in several places, as at Naxos in Sicily (Thuc. vi. 3 Pind. Puth. v. 80), and at Megara. (Paus. ii. 42 § 5.) The name has reference either to Apollo as the leader and protector of colonies, or as the founder of towns in general, in which case the import of the name is nearly the same as Σέδες παρθέ

ARCHGETES.
2. A surname of Asclepius, under which he was worshipped at Tithorea in Phocis. (Paus. x. 32, § 8.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαυς), a son of Teseus, a Heracleid, who, when expelled by his brothers, fled to king Cissenus in Macedonia. Cissenus promised him the succession to his throne and the hand of his daughter, if he would assist him against his neighbouring enemies. Archelaus performed what was asked of him; but when, after the defeat of the enemy, he claimed the fulfilment of the promise, Cissenus had a hole dug in the earth, filled it with burning coals, and covered it over with branches, that Archelaus might fall into it. The plan was discovered, and Cissenus himself was thrown into the pit by Archelaus, who then fled, but at the command of Apollo built the town of Aegae on a spot to which he was led by a goat. According to some accounts, Alexander the Great was a descendant of Archelaus. (Hygin. Fab. 219.)

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollodorus. (li. 1, § 4, 4, § 5, &c.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαυς), the author of a poem consisting of upwards of three hundred barbarous Greek iambics, entitled Προς τὴν Ἰππίς Τέχνην, De Sacra Arte (sc. Chrysopoeia). Nothing is known of the events of his life; his date also is uncertain, but the poem is evidently the work of a comparatively recent writer, and must not be attributed to any of the older authors of this name. It was published for the first time in the second volume of Hèder's Poëtics et Medéli Geueil Ménènèes, Berol. 1842, 8vo; but a few extracts had previously been inserted by J. S. Bernard, in his edition of Palladivs, De Rébus. Lugd. Bat. 1745, 8vo, pp. 160—163. [W. A. G.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαυς), one of the illegitimate sons of AMYNTAS II. by Cygama. Himself and his two brothers (Archidus or Archibideus, and Menelaus) excited the jealousy of their half-brother Philip; and this华为 proved fatal to one of them, the other two fled for refuge to Olympos. According to Justin, the protection which they obtained there gave occasion to the Olympanic war, v. c. 349; and on the capture of the city, v. c. 347, the two princes fell into Philip's hands and were put to death. (Just. vii. 4, viii. 3.) [T. E.]

ARCHELAUS, bishop of CASSARELLA in Cappadocia, wrote a work against the heresy of the Messalians, which is referred to by Photius. (Cod. 52.) C was placed at 440 A. D. (Hist. Lit. sub. ann.) [P. S.]

ARCHELAUS, KING OF CAPPADOCIA. [Archelaus, general of Mithridates, No. 4, p. 263.]

ARCHELAUS, bishop of Carrhae in Mesopotamia, a. d. 278, held a public dispute with the heretic Manes, an account of which he published in Syria. The work was soon translated both into Greek and into Latin. (Socrates, H. E. i. 22; Hieron, de Vir. Illust. 73.) A large fragment of the Latin version was published by Valesius, in his edition of Socrates and Sozomen. The same version, almost entire, was again printed, with the fragments of the Greek version, by Zacagninus, in his Collect. Monument. Var., Rom. 1698, and by Fabricius in his edition of Hippolytus. [P. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαυς), a Greek geogra-

Archelaus, who wrote a work in which he described all the countries which Alexander the Great had traversed. (Diog. Laërti. ii. 17.) This statement would lead us to conjecture, that Archelaus was a contemporary of Alexander, and perhaps accompanied him on his expeditions. But as the work is completely lost, nothing certain can be said about the matter. In like manner, it must remain uncertain whether this Archelaus is the same as the one whose "Euboeia" are quoted by Harpocrates (sa. ʿAbūṣuṣa, who however Maurusius reads Arabedænæus), and whose works on rivers and stones are mentioned by Plutarch (De Flor. 1 and 9) and Stobæus. (Hieron. i. 15.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαυς), son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan woman, is called by Dion Cassius Ἡραλδός Παλαιοσαρίων, and was whole brother to Herod Antipas. (Dion Cass. iv. 27; Joseph. Ant. xvi. 1. § 5, 10, § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 28, § 4.) The will of Herod which had at first been so drawn up as to exclude Archelaus in consequence of the false representations of his eldest brother Antipater, was afterward altered in his favour on the discovery of the latter's treachery [see p. 208]; and, on the death of Herod, he was saluted as king by the army. This title, however, he declined till it should be ratified by Augustus; and, in a speech before the people after his father's funeral, he made large professions of his moderation and his willingness to repress all grievances. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 4. § 3, 6. § 1, 8. §§ 2—4; Bell. Jud. i. 31, § 1, 32. § 7, 23. §§ 7—9.) Immediately after this a serious sedition occurred, which Archelaus quenched in blood (Ant. xvii. 8. §§ 1—9 Bell. Jud. i. 31; comp. Ant. xvii. 6; Bell. Jud. i. 23.), and he then proceeded to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his father's will. Here he was opposed by Antipas, who was supported by Herod's sister Salome and her son Antipater, and ambassadors also came from the Jews to complain of the cruelty of Archelaus, and to entreat that their country might be annexed to Syria and ruled by Roman governors. The will of Herod was, however, ratified in its main points by Augustus, and in the division of the kingdom Archelaus received Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea, with the title of Rheimach, and a promise of that of king should he be found to deserve it. (Ant. xvii. 3, 11; Bell. Jud. ii. 2, 6; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 9. § 3, 12. § 27.) On his return from Rome he set the Jewish law at defiance by his marriage with Glaphyra (daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappado-icia), the widow of his brother Alexander, by whom she had children living (Levit. xviii. 16, xx. 21; Deut. xxv. 5); and, his general government being most tyrannical, he was again accused before Augustus by the Jews in the 10th year of his reign (A. D. 7), and, as he was unable to clear himself from their charges, he was banished to Vienna in Gaul, where he died. (Ant. xvii. 13; Bell. Jud. ii. 7. § 3; Strab. vii. p. 765; Dion Cass. iv. 27; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 9.) [E. B.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαυς), king of MAC-

DOMAIA from 133 to 106 B. C. According to Plato, he was an illegitimate son of Perdiccas II. and obtained the throne by the murder of his uncle Alextas, his cousin, and his half-brother (Plat. Gorg. p. 471; Athen. v. p. 217, d; Ael. V. H. xii. 45), further strengthening himself by marriage with Cleopatra, his father's widow. (Plat. Gorg. p. 471, c; Aristot. Polis. v. 10, ed. Bekk.) Nor does there appear to be any valid reason for rejecting this story, in spite of the silence of Thucydides, who had no occasion to refer to it, and of the remarks of Athenaeus, who ascribes it to Plato's love of sensual. (Thuc. ii. 109; Athen. xii. p. 500 c. e.; Mitford, Gr. Hist. ch. 94, sec. 1; Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 157.) In a. c. 410 Pydna revolted from Archelaus, but he reduced it with the aid of an Athenian squadron under Themistocles, and the better to retain it, in subjection, rebuilt it at a distance of about two miles from the coast. (Diod. xiii. 49; Wess. ad loc.) In another war, in which he was involved with Sibyllas and Archelaus, he purchased peace by giving his daughter in marriage to the former. (Aristot. Pol. ii. c. 36; comp. Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 156.) For the internal improvement and security of his kingdom, as well as for its future greatness, he effectually provided by building fortresses, forming roads, and increasing the army to a stronger force than he had been known upon any of the former kings. (Thuc. ii. 100.) He established also at Aegae (Arist. Ath. i. p. 11, f.) or at Isthmia (Diod. xvi. 16; Wess. ad Diod. xvi. 55,) public games, and a festival which he dedicated to the Muses and called "Olympian." His love of literature, science, and the fine arts is well known. His palace was adorned with magnificent paintings by Zeuxis (Ael. V. H. xiv. 17); and Euripides, Aeschylus, and other men of eminence, were among his guests. (Ael. V. H. ii. 21, xiii. 4; Kuhn, ad Ael. V. H. xiv. 17; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 85.) But the tastes and the (so-called) refinement thus introduced failed at least to prevent, even if they did not foster, the great moral corruption of the court. (Ael. H. ii. 44.) Socrates himself received an invitation from Archelaus, who, travelling with him, said to Aristotle (Plut. p. 23, § 8), that he might not subject himself to the degradation of receiving favours which he could not return. Possibly, too, he was influenced by disgust at the corruption above alluded to, and contempt for the king's character. (Ael. V. H. xiv. 17.) We read in Diodorus, that Archelaus was accidentally slain on a hunting party by his favourite, Craterus or Cretanus (Diod. xiv. 37; Wess. ad loc.); but according to other accounts of apparently better authority, Craterus murdered him, either from ambition, or from disgust at his odious vices, or from revenge for his having broken his promise of giving him one of his daughters in marriage. (Ael. V. H. viii. 9; Facund-Plat. Ael. ii. p. 141.) [E.E.] ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος), a general of Mithridates, and the greatest of that he had. He was a native of Cappadocia, and the first time that his name occurs is in B.C. 88, when he and his brother Neoptolemus had the command against Nicomedes III. of Bithynia, whom they defeated near the river Amnisus in Paphalagonia. In the next year he was sent by Mithridates with a large fleet and army into Greece, where he reduced several islands, and after persuading the Athenians to abandon the cause of the Romans, he soon gained for Mithridates nearly the whole of Greece south of Thessaly. In B.C. 87, however, he met Brutius Sura, the legate of Sextius, the governor of Macedonia, with whom he had during three days a hard struggle in the neighbourhood of Chaeronea, until at last, on the arrival of Lacedaemonian and Achaean auxiliaries for Archelaus, the Roman general withdrew to Peiraeus, which however was blockaded and taken possession of by Archelaus. In the meantime, Sulla, to whom the command of the war against Mithridates had been given, had arrived in Greece, and immediately marched towards Attica. As he was passing through Boeotia, Thebes deserted the cause of Archelaus, and joined the Romans. On his arrival in Attica, he sent a part of his army to besiege Aristion in Athens, while he himself with his main force went straight on to Peiraeus, where Archelaus had retreated within the walls. Archelaus maintained himself during a long-protracted siege, until in the end, Sulla, despairing of success in Peiraeus, turned against Athens itself. The city was soon taken, and then fresh attacks made upon Peiraeus, with such success, that Archelaus was obliged to withdraw to the most impregnable part of the place. In the meanwhile, Mithridates sent fresh reinforcements to Archelaus, and on their arrival he withdrew with them into Boeotia, a. c. 69, and there assembled all his forces. Sulla followed him, and in the neighbourhood of Chaeronea he made a battle ensued, in which the Romans gained such a complete victory, that of the 120,000 men with whom Archelaus had opened the campaign no more than 10,000 assembled at Chalcis in Euboea, where Archelaus had taken refuge. Sulla pursued his enemy as far as the coast of the Euphrus, but having no fleet, he was obliged to allow him to make his predatory excursions among the islands, from which, however, he afterwards was obliged to return to Chalcis. Mithridates had in the meantime collected a fresh army of 60,000 men, which Dorylalus or Dorylas led to Archelaus. With these increased forces, Archelaus again crossed over into Boeotia, and in the neighbourhood of Oropheum was completely defeated by Sulla, but managed to escape and retired. The last battle lasted for eight days. Archelaus himself was concealed for three days after in the marshes, until he got a vessel which carried him over to Chalcis, where he collected the few remants of his forces. When Mithridates, who was himself hard pressed in Asia by C. Fimbria, was informed of this defeat, he commissioned Archelaus to negotiate for peace on honourable terms, a. c. 85. Archelaus accordingly had an interview with Sulla at Dilorum in Boeotia. Sulla's attempt to make Archelaus betray his master was rejected with indignation, and Archelaus confined himself to concluding a preliminary treaty which was to be binding if it received the sanction of the Romans. Not having for the king's answer, Sulla made an expedition against some of the barbarian tribes which at that time infested Macedonia, and was accompanied by Archelaus, for whom he had conceived great esteem. In his answer, Mithridates refused to surrender his fleet, which Archelaus, in his interview with Sulla, had likewise refused to do; and when Sulla would not conclude peace on any other terms, Archelaus himself, who was exceedingly anxious that peace should be concluded, set out for Asia, and brought about a meeting of Sulla and his king at Durbanus in Thrace, at which peace was agreed upon, on condition that each party should remain in possession of what had belonged to them before the war. This peace was in so far favourable to Mithridates, as he had made all his enormous sacrifices for nothing; and when Mithridates began to feel that he had made greater concessions than he ought, he also began to suspect Archelaus of treachery, and the latter, fearing for his life, deserted to the Romans just before the outbreak of the second Mithridatic war, a. c. 81. He stimulated Marcia not to wait for the attack of the king, but to begin hostilities at once. From this moment Archelaus is no more mentioned in history, but several writers state inincidently, that he was honoured by the Roman senate. (Appian, de Bell. Mithrid. 17—64; Plut.

Sulla. 11—24; Liv. Epit. 31 and 82; Vell. Pat.
ii. 25; Florus, iii. 5; Oros. vi. 2; Paus. i. 50. § 3, &c.; Aur. Vict. de Vit. Illust. 75, 76; Dion Cass.
lib. iv.)

2. A son of the preceding. (Strab. xvii. p. 796;
Dion Cass. xxxix. 57.) In the year b. c. 63, Pompey mixed him to the dignity of priest of the goddess (Epaph. Bellon. ad Comana, which was, according to Strabo, a Portunus, and according to Hirtius (de Bell. Alex. 66), in Cappadocia. The dignity of priest of the goddess at Comana conferred upon the person who held it the power of a king over the place and its immediate vicinity. (Appian, de Bell. Mithr. 114; Strab. i. c., xili. p. 588.) In
b. c. 56, when A. Gabinius, the proconsul of Syria, was making preparations for a war against the Parthians, Archelaus went to Syria and offered to take part in the war; but this plan was soon abandonned, as other prospects opened before him.
Be-renice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who after the expulsion of her father had become queen of Egypt, wished to marry a prince of royal blood, and Archelaus, pretending to be a son of Mithridates Emperor, sued for her hand, and succeeded.
(Strab. il. e.; Dion Cass. L. e.) According to Strabo, the Roman senate would not permit Archelaus to partake in the war against Parthia, and Archel-aus left Gabinius in secret; whereas, according to Dion Cassius, Gabinius was induced by bribes to assist Archelaus in his suit for the hand of Ber-enice, while at the same time he received bribes from Ptolemy Auletes on the understanding that he would restore him to his throne. Archelaus enjoyed the honour of king of Egypt only for six months, for Gabinius kept his promise to Ptolemy, and in b. c. 55 he marched with an army into Egypt, and in the battle which ensued, Archelaus lost his crown and his life. His daughter too was put to death. (Strab. il. e.; Dion Cass. xxxix. 56; Liv. Epit. lib. 165; Cic. pro Rub. Post. 8; Val.
Max. v. i, xii. 3; Polyb. i. 4; M. Ammianus; he had been connected with the family of Archelaus by ties of hospitality and friendship, had his body searched for among the dead, and buried it in a manner worthy of a king. (Plut. Ant. 3.)

3. A son of the preceding, and his successor in the office of high priest of Commn. (Strab. xvii.
p. 796, xili. p. 558.) In b. c. 51, in which year Cicero was proconsul of Cilicia, Archelaus assisted with troops and money those who created disturbances in Cappadocia and threatened king Ariobarzanes I.; but Cicero compelled Archelaus to quit Cappadocia. (Cic. ad Pess. vac. xiv.) In b. c. 47,
C. Caesar, after the conclusion of the Alexandrine war, deprived Archelaus of his office of high priest, and gave it to Lycomedes. (Appian, de Bell. Mithr.
21; Hirt. de Bell. Alex. 66.)

4. A son of the preceding. (Strab. xvii. p. 796.)
In b. c. 34, Antony, after having expelled Ariara-hes, gave to Archelaus the kingdom of Cappadocia
—a favour which he owed to the charms of his mother, Gaphrya. (Dion Cass. xiii. 32; Strab.
ii. p. 540.) Appian (de Bell. Civ. v. 7), who laces this event in the year b. c. 41, calls the son Gaphrya, to whom Antony gave Cappadocia, Iasina; which, if it is not a mistake, may have been a surname of Archelaus. During the war between Antony and Octavianus, Archelaus was among the allies of the former. (Plut. Ant. 61.)
After his victory over Antony, Octavianus not only left Archelaus in the possession of his kingdom (Dion Cass. b. 3), but subsequently added to it a part of Cilicia and Lesser Armenia. (Dion Cass. liv. 9; Strab. xii. p. 534, &c.) On one occasion, during the reign of Augustus, accusations were brought before the emperor against Archelaus by his own subjects, and Tiberius defended the king. (Dion Cass. liiv. 17; Suet. Tiber. 8.) But after the death of Tiberius, Archelaus, the cause of which was jealousy, as Archelaus had paid greater attentions to Calus Caesar than to him. (Comp. Tacit. Annal. ii. 42.) When thereto Tiberius had ascended the throne, he enticed Archelaus to come to Rome, and then accused him in the senate of harbouuring revolutionary schemes, hoping to get him condemned to death. But Ar-chelaus was then at such an advanced age, or at least pretended to be so, that it appeared unnessary to take away his life. He was, however, obliged to remain at Rome, where he died soon after. A. D. 17. Cappadocia was then made a Roman province. (Dion Cass. Tactit. ii. c.; Suet.
Aug. 37, Cyprianus of Carthage, who had been connected with the family of Archelaus by ties of hospitality and friendship, had his body searched
for among the dead, and buried it in a manner
worthy of a king. (Plut. Ant. 3.)

The annexed coin of Archelaus contains on the reverse a club and the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΟΣ ΑΡ-ΧΕΛΑΥΟΥ ΦΙΛΟ(ΑΡΠΑΠΙΡΙΟΣ ΤΟΥ ΚΤΙΣΤΟΥ.
He is called κτιστής, according to Eckel (iii. p.
201), on account of having founded the city of Blessus in an island of the same name, off the coast of Cilicia. (Comp. Joseph. Anti. xvi. 4. § 6.)

ARCHELAIUS (ΑΡΧΕΛΑΙΟΣ), a PHILOLOGIST of the Ionian school, called Phusaeus from having been the first to teach at Athens the physical doctrines of that philosophy. This statement, which is that of Ierou (ii. 16), is contradicted by the assertion of Clemens Alexandraus (Stron. i. p. 30), that Anatigoras metαγονευσαν της τον 'Aρκαλος Αθή-νης την ιδιοτρόπη, but the two may be reconciled by supposing with Clinton (F. H. ii. p. 51), that Archelaus was the first Athenian who did so. For the fact that he was a native of Athens, is connidered by Ritter as nearly established on the authority of Simplicius (in Phys. Aristot. fol. 6, b.), as it was probably obtained by him from Theophrates;
and we therefore reject the statement of other writers, that Archelaus was a Milesian. He was the son of Apelles, or as some say, of Phileas, Midon, (Strab.) or Mykon, and is said to have taught at Lampus before he established himself at Athens. He is commonly reported to have had numbered Socrates and Euripides among his pupils.
If he was the instructor of the former, it is strange that he is never mentioned by Xenophon, Plato, or Aristotle; and the tradition which connects him with Euripides may have arisen from a confusion with his namesake Archelaus, king of Macedonia, the well-known patron of that poet.

The doctrine of Archelaus is remarkable, as

form a point of transition from the older to the newer form of philosophy in Greece. In the mental history of all nations it is at once evident that such inquiries are first confined to natural objects, and afterwards pass into moral speculations; and so, among the Greeks, the Ionians were occupied with physics, the Sophists schools chiefly with ethics. Archelaus is the union of the two: he was the last recognized leader of the former (succeeding Diogenes of Apollonia in that character), and added to the physical system of his teacher, Anaxagoras, some attempts at moral speculation. He held that air and infinity (τὸ ἄπειρον) are the principle of all things, by which Plutarch (Plac. Phil. i. 3) supposes that he meant infinite air; and we are told, that by this statement he intended to exclude the operations of mind from the creation of the world. (Stob. Ed. Phys. i. 1, 2.) If so, he abandoned the doctrine of Anaxagoras in its most important point; and it therefore seems safer to conclude with Ritter, that while he wished to inculcate the materialist notion that the mind is formed of air, he still held infinite mind to be the cause of all things. This explanation has the advantage of agreeing very fairly with that of Simplicius (i. c.); and as Anaxagoras himself did not accurately distinguish between mind and the animal soul, this confusion may have given rise to his pupil's doctrine. Archelaus deducted motion from the opposition of heat and cold, caused of course, if we adopt the above hypothesis, by the will of the material mind. This opposition separated fire and water, and produced a thin mass of earth. While the earth was hardening, the motion of heat upon its moisture gave birth to animals, which at first were nourished by the mud from which they sprang, and gradually acquired the power of propagating their species. All these animals were endowed with mind, but man separated from the others, and established laws and societies. It was just from this point of his physical theory that he seems to have passed into ethical speculation, by the proposition, that right and wrong are of φύσεις ἄλλα γόρμα — a dogma probably suggested to him, in its form at least, by the contemporary Sophists. But when we consider the purely mechanical and materialistic character of his physics, which make every thing arise from the separation or distribution of the primary elements, we must say that nothing, except the original chaotic mass, is strictly by nature (φύσεις), and that Archelaus assigns the same origin to right and wrong that he does to man. Now a contemporaneous origin with that of the human race is not very different from what a sound system of philosophy would demand for these ideas, though of course such a system would maintain quite another origin of man; and therefore, assuming the Archelian physical system, it does not necessarily follow, that his ethical principles are so destructive of all goodness as they appear. This view is made almost certain by the fact that Democritus taught, that the ideas of sweet and bitter, white and yellow, as well as their opposites, can be accounted for only by a similar supposition.

Of the other doctrines of Archelaus we need only mention, that he asserted the earth to have the form of an egg, the sun being the largest of the stars; and that he correctly accounted for speech by the motion of the air. For this, according to Plutarch (Plac. Phil. iv. 19), he was indebted to Anaxagoras.

ARCHELAUS flourished B. C. 450. In that year Anaxagoras withdrew from Athens, and during his residence there, had much influence over the young princes. (Læbert. L. C.) To the authorities given above add Brucker, Histor. Crit. Phil. ii. 2; Ritter, Geschichte der Phil. iii. 9; Tenemann, Ornerdiss der Gesch. der Phil. § 107. [G. E. L. C.]

ARCHELAUS ('Ἀρχέλαος'), a Greek poet, is called an Egyptian, and is believed to have been a native of a town in Egypt called Chersonesus, as he is also called Chersonesita. (Antig. Caryst. 19; Athen. xii. p. 554.) He wrote epigrams, some of which are still extant in the Greek Anthology, and Jacobs seems to infer from an epigram of his on Alexander the Great (Anthol. Pianud. ii. 120) that Archelaus lived in the time of Alexander and Ptolemy Soter. Lobeck (Lycoth. p. 749), on the other hand, places him in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, II. But both of these opinions are connected with chronological difficulties, and Westermann has shewn that Archelaus in all probability flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom, according to Antigonus Carystius (l. c., comp. 89), he narrated wonderful stories (μαρτυρία in epigrams. Besides this peculiar kind of epigrams, Archelaus wrote a work called ἱστορία, i. e. strange or peculiar animals (Athen. ix. p. 409; Diog. Laërt. ii. 17), which seems to have likewise been written in verse, and to have treated on strange and paradoxical subjects, like his epigrams. (Plin. Elench. lib. xxviii.; Schol. ad Nicand. Thet. 829; Artemid. Onagog. iv. 29. Compare Westermann, Scriptor. Rev. mirabil. Graec. p. xxii., &c., who has also collected the extant fragments of Archelaus, p. 158, &c.)

ARCHELAUS ('Ἀρχέλαος'), a Greek historian of uncertain date, who wrote on his profession; whence he is called τεχνουργός ἄρθροι. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 17.)

[LL. S.]

ARCHELAUS, a sculptor of Priene, the son of Apolloioun, made the marble bas-relief representing the Apotheosis of Homer, which formerly belonged to the Colonna family at Rome, and is now in the Towerly Gallery of the British Museum. (Inscription on the work.) The style of the bas-relief, which is little, if at all, inferior to the best remains of Greek art, confirms the supposition that Archelaus was the son of Apolloioun of Rhodes (Pausan. vii. 29. 1), and that he flourished in the 3rd century of the Christian era. From the circumstance of the "Apotheosis" having been found in the palace of Claudius at Bovillae (now Fratochechi), coupled with the known admiration of that emperor for Homer (Suet. Claud. 42), it is generally supposed that the work was executed in his reign. A description of the bas-relief, and a list of the works in which it is referred to, is given in The Towerly Gallery, in the Library of Entertaining Knowledge, ii. p. 120. [P. S.]

ARCHELAUS ('Ἀρχέλαος'), king of Sparta. 7th of the Agis, son of Agesilaus I., contemporary with Charibias, with whom he took Aegypt, a town in Egypt, said to have revolted, but probably then first taken. (Pausan. iii. 2. Plut. Ages. v; Euseb. Porph. v. 32.) [A. H. C.]

ARCHELAUS ('Ἀρχέλαος'), son of Thronus, was appointed by Alexander the Great the military commander in Susiana, B. C. 300. (Arthr. iii. 16; Curt. v. 2.) In the division of the province in 323, Archelaus obtained Mesopotamia. (Dexip. ap. Phot. Cod. 82, p. 64, b., ed. Bekker.)
ARCHIDES.

ARCHIAS (Ἀρχίας). I. A Spartan, who fell bravely in the Laconian battle against the Corinthians in B.C. 525. Herodotus saw at Plataea in Lacedaemon and his ancient Achaeas. (Herod. i. 55.)

2. Of Thurii, originally an actor, was sent in B.C. 323, after the battle of Granicus, to apprehend the orators whom Antipater had commanded of the Athenians, and who had fled from Athens. He seized Hyperides and others in the sanctuary of Aesculapius in Aegina, and transported them to Cleone, in Argolis, where they were executed. He also apprehended Demosthenes in the temple of Poseidon in Calauria. Archias, who was nick-named ήφισσικός, the hunter of the oxen, ended his life in great poverty and disgrace. (Plut. Dem. 28, 29, Vit. X. Orat. p. 949; Arian, op. Phot. p. 69, b. 41, ed. Bekker.)

3. The governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy, received a bribe in order to betray the island to Demetrius, b. c. 155, but being detected he hung himself. (Polyb. xxxii. 3.)

4. An Alexandrine grammarian, probably lived about the time of Augustus, as he was the teacher of Epaphroditus. (Suidas, s. a. Ἐπαφροδίτος; Villiozson, Proleg. ad Apoll. Lex. Hom. p. xx.)

ARCHIAS, A. LICYNIUS, a Greek poet, born at Antioch in Syria, about b. c. 120. His name is known chiefly from the speech of Cicero in his defence, which is the only source of information about him, and must therefore be very questionable evidence of his talent, considering that the verses of Archias had been employed in celebrating the part which that orator played in the conspiracy of Catiline. He was on intimate terms with many of the first families in Rome, particularly with the Licini, whose name he adopted. His reception during a journey through Asia Minor and Greece (pro Arch. c. 3), and afterwards in Greece, where Tarentum, Rhegium, Naples, and Locri enrolled him on their registers, shews that his reputation was, at least at that time, considerable. In a. D. 102 he came to Rome, still young (though not so young as the expression of b. c. 130, sect. 3, vi.) literally explained would lead us to suppose; comp. Clinton, Φ. H. iii. p. 542), and was received in the most friendly way by Lucullus (ad Att. i. 16. 9). Marius, then consul, Hortensius the father, Metellus Pius, Q. Catulus, and Cicero. After a short stay, he accompanied Lucullus to Sicily, and followed him to the banishment to which he was sentenced for his management of the slave war in that island, to Heraclea in Lucania, in which town, as being a confederate town and having more privileges than Tarentum, he was enrolled as a citizen. He was in the suite of L. Lucullus,—in Asia under Sulla, again in b. c. 76 in Africa, and again in the third Mithridatic war. As he had sung the Cimbric war in honour of Marius, so now he wrote a poem on this war, which he had witnessed (c. 9), in honour of Lucullus. We do not hear whether he finished his poem in honour of Cicero's consulship (c. 11); in b. c. 61, when he was already old, he had not begun it (ad Att. i. 16); or whether he ever published his intended Ceceleania, in honour of Metellus Pius. He wrote many epigrams; it is still disputed, whether any of those preserved under his name in the Anthologia were really his writings. (Comp. Igen, Opuscula, p. 49; Clinton, iii. p. 432, note K.) These are all of little merit.

In b. c. 61, a charge was brought against him, which led to his imprisonment and banishment from his patrons, of assuming the citizenship illegally, and the trial came on before Q. Cicero, who

* Schroeter has attacked the genuineness of this oration (Oratio quae vulgo fertur pro Archia, &c., Lips. 1818), which is however as fully established as that of any other of Cicero's orations.

ARCHIDAMUS.

ARCHIDAMUS, king of Sparta, 12th of the Eurypontids, son of Anaxi- damus, contemporary with the Tegean war, which followed soon after the end of the second Messenian, in b. c. 696 (Paus. iii. 7, 6, comp. 3, 5).

[ARCHIDAMUS II., king of Sparta, 17th of the Eurypontids, son of Zeuxidamus, succeeded to the throne on the banishment of his grandfather Leotychides, b. c. 469. In the 4th or perhaps rather the 5th year of his reign, his kingdom was

(pur. Agis, 4. 20.)

3. A Spartan woman, who distinguished herself by her heroic spirit when Sparta was nearly taken by Pyrrhus in b. c. 272, and opposed the plan which had been entertained of sending the women to Crete. Plutarch (Pyrrh. 27) calls her Αρχιδάμη, but Polyuenus (vii. 49) Αρχιδάμη. The latter writer calls her the daughter of king Cleodas (Cleomenes?).

ARCHIDAMUS I. (Αρχίδαμος), king of Sparta, 12th of the Eurypontids, son of Anaxidamus, contemporary with the Tegean war, which followed soon after the end of the second Messenian, in b. c. 696. (Paus. iii. 7, 6, comp. 3, 5.)

[ARCHIDAMUS II., king of Sparta, 17th of the Eurypontids, son of Zeuxidamus, succeeded to the throne on the banishment of his grandfather Leotychides, b. c. 469. In the 4th or perhaps rather the 5th year of his reign, his kingdom was visited by the tremendous calamity of the great earthquake, by which all Laconia was shaken, and Sparta made a heap of ruins. On this occasion his presence of mind is said to have saved his people. Foreseeing the danger from the Helots, he summoned, by sounding an alarm, the scattered surviving Spartans, and collected them around him, apparently at a distance from the ruins, in a body sufficient to deter the assailants. To him, too, rather than to Niconedes, the guardian of his colleague, Pleistoxanthes, (Pleistoxanthes was probably dead,) would be committed the conduct of the ensuing conflict with the Meessenians, which occupies this and the following nine years. After the expeditions to Delphi and to Doris, and the hostilities with Athens down to the 30 years’ truce, his name is not mentioned; though in the discussion at Sparta before the final dissolution of that truce he comes forward as one who has had experience of many wars. Of the Peloponnesian war itself we find the first 10 years sometimes styled the Archidamian war; the share, however, taken in it by Archidamus was no more than the command of the first two expeditions into Attica; in the 3rd year, of the investment of Plataea; and again of the third expedition in the 4th year, 426 B.C. In 427 Cleomenes commanded; in 426 Agis, son and now successor of Archidamus. His death must therefore be placed before the beginning of this, though probably after the beginning of that under Cleomenes; for had Agis already succeeded, he, most likely, and not Cleomenes, would have commanded; in the 42nd year, therefore, of his reign, B.C. 457. His views of this momentous struggle, as represented by Thucydides, seem to qualify the character that historian gives him of intelligence and temperance. His just estimate of the comparative strength of the parties, and its reluctance to enter without preparation on a contest involving so much, deserve our admiration; though in his actual conduct of it he may seem to have somewhat wasted Lacedaemon’s moral superiority. The opening of the siege of Plataea displays something of the same deliberate character; the proposal to take the town and territory in trust, however we may question the probable result, seems to breathe his just and temperate spirit. He may at any rate be safely excluded from all responsibility for the cruel treatment of his besieged, on their surrender in the year of his death. We may regard him as the happiest instance of an accommodation of the Spartan character altered circumstances, and his death as a misfortune to Sparta, the same in kind though not in degree as that of Pericles was to Athens, with horridly un-Christian results. Though the treatment here and there in some points he seems to have resembled, c left two sons and one daughter, Agia by his 5th wife, Lampito or Lampido, his father’s half-brother; Agis by a second, named Eupolia (apparently the woman of small stature whom the shores fined him for marrying), and Cynisca, the ly woman, we are told, who carried off an Olympic victory. (Thuc. i. ii. iii.; Diod. xii. 63; Paus. iii. §§ 9, 10; Plut. Cimon, 16, Ages. 1; Herod. 71.) [A. H. C.]

ARCHIDAMUS III., king of Sparta, 20th the Eurypontids, was son of Agesilus II. A first hear of him as interceding with his father behalf of Sphodrias, to whose son Cleonymus he was attached, and who was thus saved, through the weak affection of Agesilus, from the punishment which his unwarrantable invasion of Attica had deserved, b.c. 378. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, §§ 25—33; Diod. xii. 29; Plut. Ages. c. 25; comp. Plat. Pol. c. 14.) In b.c. 371, he was sent, in consequence of the illness of Agesilus (Xen. Hell. v. 4, §§ 58; Plut. Ages. c. 27), to succour the defeated Spartans at Leuctra; but Jason of Phærae had already meditated between them and the Thebans, and Archidamus, meeting his countrymen on their return at Megara in Megara, dismissed the allies, and led the Spartans home. (Xen. Hell. vi. 4, §§ 17—26; Diod. xvi. 9.) In 369, he was again sent against Arcadia, and Argives in what has been called the “Terrorless Battle,” from the statement in his despatches, that he had won it without losing a man (Xen. Hell. vii. 1, §§ 28; Plut. Ages. c. 33; Polyb. i. 45; Diod. xv. 73); and to the next year, 366, must he assigned the “Archidamian” of Isocrates, written perhaps to be delivered by the prince in the Spartan senate, to encourage his country in her resolution of maintaining her claim to Messenia, when Corinth had made, with Sparta’s consent, a separate peace with the Thebans. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4, § 9.) In 364, he was again sent against Arcadia, then at war with Elis (Xen. Hell. vii. 4, §§ 20, &c.; Just. vi. 5); and in 362, having been left at home to protect Sparta while Agesilus went to join the allies at Mantinea, he baffled the attempt of Epaminondas on the city. (Xen. Hell. vii. 5, §§ 9, &c.; Diod. xvii. 53, 83; Plut. Ages. c. 34; Isocr. Ep. ad Arch. § 5.) He succeeded his father on the throne in 361. In 356, he find privately furnishing Philomelus, the Phocians, with fifteen talents, to aid him in his resistance to the Amphictyonic decree and his seizure of Delphi, whence arose the sacred war. (Diod. xvi. 24; Just. viii. 1; comp. Paus. iv. 4; Theopomp. ap. Paus. iii. 10.) In 352, occurred the war of the Spartans against the Thebans, and the latter to the dismantling (Bouleuteria) of that community; and Archidamus was appointed to the command, and gained some successes, though the enterprise did not ultimately succeed. (Diod. xvi. 39; Paus. viii. 27; Demost. pro Meleg. comp. Aristot. Pol. vi. 10, cd. Beck.) In the last year of the sacred war, 346, we find Archidamus marching into Phocis at the head of 1000 men. According to Dio- dorus (xvi. 59), the Phocians had applied for aid to Sparta, but this seems questionable from what Aeschines (de Fals. Leg. p. 45) reports as the advice of the Phocians leader to Archidamus, “to alarm the states against the danger of the Philistines.” Archidamus (de Fals. Leg. p. 365) hints at a private understanding between Philip and the Spartans, and at some treachery of his towards them. Whether however on this account, or as being distracted by Philoacus (Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 46), or as finding it impossible to effect anything on behalf of the Phocians, Archidamus, on the arrival of Philip, withdrew his forces and returned home. In 338, he went to Italy to aid the Tarentines against the Lucanians, and there he fell in battle on the very day, according to Diodorus, of Philip’s victory at Chaeronea. (Diod. xvi. 63, 65; Paus. iii. 10; Strab. vi. p. 200; Theopomp. ap. Athen. xi. p. 558, c. 5; Plut. Ages. c. 3.) The Spartans erected a statue of him at Olympia, which is mentioned by Pausanias. (vii. ch. 4, 15.) [E. E.] ARCHIDAMUS IV., king of Sparta, 23rd of the Euryptontidae, was the son of Eumidas I. and the grandson of Archidamus III. (Plut. Agis, 3.) He was king in B.C. 296, when he was defeated by Eumenes and Polycrates. (Plut. Demet. 35.)

ARCHIDAMUS V., king of Sparta, 27th of the Euryptontidae, was the son of Eumidas II. and the brother of Agis IV. On the murder of his brother Agis, in B.C. 240, Archidamus fled from Sparta, but obtained possession of the throne some time after the accession of Cleomenes, through the means of Aratus, who wished to weaken the power of the Ephors: it appears that Cleomenes also was privy to his recall. Archidamus was, however, slain almost immediately after his return to Sparta, by those who had killed his brother and who feared his vengeance. It is doubtful whether Cleomenes was a party to the murder. (Plut. Cleom. 1, 5; comp. Polyb. v. 37, viii. 1.) Archidamus V. was the last king of the Euryptontid race. He left sons who were alive at the death of Cleomenes, B.C. 229, but they were predeceased, and the crown given to a stranger, Lycurgus. (Polyb. iv. 35; Clinton, F. H. ii. Append. c. 3.)

ARCHIDAMUS, the Aetolian. [ARCHIDAMUS, No. 3.]

ARCHIDAMUS (Ἀρχιδάμος), a Greek physician of whom no particulars are known, but who must have lived in the fourth or fifth century B.C., as Galen quotes one of his opinions (De Simpl. Medicem. Temper. ac Facult. ii. 5, &c., vol. xi. p. 471, &c.), which was preserved by Dioscorides of Carysanta. A physician of the same name is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. Ind. Auct.), and a few fragments on veterinary surgery by a person named Archecomus are to be found in the "Veterinariae Medicinae Libri Duo," first published in Latin by J. Ruellius, Paris, 1530, fol., and afterwards in Greek by S. Grymoeus, Basel, 1537, 4to.

[The name of the father of Archidamus was Philistus; he was a pupil of Agathinus, whose life he once saved (Agathinus); and he died at the age of either sixty-three or eighty-three. (Suid. s. v. Ἀρχιδάμος; Suid. Vetus, μαθηματικός τοις μαθημασίοις ὑπάρχων; Isid. Hist. Nat. x. 1, p. 65.) The titles of several of his works are preserved, of which, however, nothing but a few fragments remain; some of these have been preserved by other ancient authors, and some are still in MS. in the King's Library at Paris. (Cramer's Anec. Gr. Paris. vol. i. pp. 394, 395.) By some writers he is considered to have belonged to the sect of the Pneumatici. (Galen, Introduct. c. 9. vol. xiv. p. 599.) For further particulars respecting Archidamus see Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 80, ed. vet.; Sprenger, Hist. de la Méd.; Haller, Bibl. Med. [The name of the father of Archidamus was Philistus; he was a pupil of Agathinus, whose life he once saved (Agathinus); and he died at the age of either sixty-three or eighty-three. (Suid. s. v. Ἀρχιδάμος; Suid. Vetus, μαθηματικός τοις μαθημασίοις ὑπάρχων; Isid. Hist. Nat. x. 1, p. 65.) The titles of several of his works are preserved, of which, however, nothing but a few fragments remain; some of these have been preserved by other ancient authors, and some are still in MS. in the King's Library at Paris. (Cramer's Anec. Gr. Paris. vol. i. pp. 394, 395.) By some writers he is considered to have belonged to the sect of the Pneumatici. (Galen, Introduct. c. 9. vol. xiv. p. 599.) ARCHILLOCUS (Ἀρχιλόχος), of Paros, was one of the earliest Ioniaic lyric poets, and the first Greek poet who composed fabie verses according to fixed rules. He flourished about 714-676 B.C. (Bode, Geschichte der Lyr. Dichter. i. pp. 38, 47.) He was descended from a noble family, who held the priesthood in Paros. His grandfather was Tellis, who brought the worship of Demeter into Thasos, and whose portrait was introduced by Polygnotus into his painting of the infernal region at Delphi. His father was Telesicidas, and his mother a slave, named Eupipo. In the flower of his age (between 710 and 700 B.C.), and probably after he had already gained a prize for his hymn to Demeter (Schol. in Aristoph. At. 1762), Archilocus went from Paros to Thasos with a colony, of which one account makes him the leader. The motive for this emigration can only be conjectured. I was more probably the result of a political change to which cause was added, in the case of Archilocus, a sense of personal wrongs. He had been suitor to Neobule, one of the daughters of Lycean, who, first promised and afterwards refused to give his daughter to the poet. Enraged at this treatment, Archilocus attacked the whole family in an iambic poem, accusing Lycurgus of perjury, and his daughters of the most abandoned life. The verses were recited at the festival of Demete and produced such an effect that the daughters - Lycurgus are said to have hung themselves through shame. The bitterness which he expresses in his poems towards his native island (Athen. iii. p. 7 b.) seems to have arisen in part also from the loss in which he was held, as being the s of a slave. Neobule was more happy at Thasos, where he has the most melancholy picture of a adopted country, which he left. (Plut. de Exil. 12. p. 604; Strabo, xi. p. 643, viii. p. 370; Eustath. in Ilias. i. p. 22 Aelian, V. H. xii. 50.) While at Thasos, he had cured the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite co-tinent; but, like Aeneas under similar circumstances, instead of being embarrassed of the distress he recorded in his verse. (Plut. de Exil. p. 643, viii. p. 370; Aelian, V. H. xii. 50.) While at Thasos, he had cured the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite continent; but, like Aeneas under similar circumstances, instead of being embarrassed of the distress he recorded in his verse. (Plut. de Exil. p. 643, viii. p. 370; Aelian, V. H. xii. 50.) While at Thasos, he had cured the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite continent; but, like Aeneas under similar circumstances, instead of being embarrassed of the distress he recorded in his verse.
man had better throw away his arms than lose his life.

But Valerius Maximus (vi. 3, ext. 1) says, that the pupils of Archilochus were educated in Sparta because of their licentiousness, and especially on account of the attack on the daughters of Lyceambes. It must remain doubtful whether a confusion has been made between the personal history of the poet and the fate of his works, both in this instance and in the story that he won the prize at Olympia with his hymn to Hercules (Tzetzes, Cid. l. 685), of which thus much is certain, that the Olympic victors used to sing a hymn by Archilochus in their triumphal procession. (Pindar, Olym. ix. 1.) These traditions, and the certain fact that the name of Archilochus was spread, in his lifetime, over the whole of Greece, together with his uns settled character, render it probable that he made many journeys of which we have no account. It seems, that he visited Siris in Lower Italy, the only city of which he speaks well. (Athen. xii. p. 523, d.) At length he returned to Paros, and, in a war between the Parians and the people of Naxos, he fell by the hand of a Naxian named Calondas or Corox. The Delphic oracle, which, before the birth of Archilochus, had promised to his father an immortal son, now pronounced a curse upon the man who had killed him, because "he had slain the servant of the Muses." (Dion Chrysost. Orat. 35, vol. ii. p. 5.)

Archilochus shared with his contemporaries, Thalasius and Terpander, in the honour of establishing lyric poetry throughout Greece. The invention of the elegy is ascribed to him, as well as to Callinus; and though Callinus was somewhat older than Archilochus [Callinus], there is no doubt that the latter was one of the earliest poets who excelled in this species of composition. Meleager enumerates him among the poets in his Corone. (38.)

But it was on his satiric iambic poetry that the fame of Archilochus was founded. The first place in this style of poetry was awarded to him by the consent of the ancient writers, who did not hesitate to compare him with Sappho, Pindar, and even Homer—meaning, doubtless, that as they stood at the head of tragic, lyric, and epic poetry, so was Archilochus the first of iambic satirical writers; while some place him, next to Homer, above all other poets. (Dion Chrysost. l. c.; Longin. xii. 3; Velleius, i. 5; Cicero, Orat. 2; Herod. ap. Diog. Laert. i. 1.) The statues of Archilochus and of Homer were dedicated on the same day (Antip. Thesal. Epigr. 45), and two aces, which are thought to be their likenesses, are found placed together in a Janus-like bust. (Visonti, Tom. Grec. i. p. 62.) The emperor Hadrian said that the Muse had shown a special mark in favour to Homer in leading Archilochus into a different department of poetry. (Epigr. 5.) Other testimonies are collected by Liebel (p. 45.).

The lanmics of Archilochus expressed the strongest feelings in the most unmeasured language. The licence of Ionic democracy and the licentiousness of a disinterested and of the highest degree of poetical power to give them rise and point. In countries and ages unfamiliar with the political and religious licence which at once incited and protected the poet, his satire was admired for its severity (Liebel, p. 41.) and the motion accounted most conspicuous in his verses was "rage," as we see in the line of Horace (A. P. 70):

"Archilochum proprio rubies arvavit immo," and in the expression of Hadrían (loc.), "antistás hidnois; and his bitterness passed into a proverb, "Archiléchoi patēs. But there must have been something more than mere sarcastic power, there must have been truth and delicate wit, in the sarcasms of the poet whom Plato does not hesitate to call "the very wise," (τοῦ σοφότατον, Repub. ii. p. 365.) Quintilian (x. 1, § 60) ascribes to him the greatest power of expression, displayed in sentences sometimes strong, sometimes brief, with rapid changes (quam velociter, tenui brevis specie sentimenti), the greatest life and nervousness (plurimum sanguiinis atque novitatus), and considers that whatever blame his works deserve is the fault of his subjects more than of his genius. In the latter opinion the Greek critics seem to have joined. (Plut. de Aud. 13, p. 45, a.) Of modern writers, Archilochus has been perhaps best understood by Müller, who says, "The ostensible object of Archilochus' iambics, like that of the later comedy, was to give reality to caricatures, every hideous feature of which was made more striking by being magnified. But that these pictures, like caricatures from the hand of a master, had a striking truth, may be inferred from the impression which Archilochus' iambics produced, both upon contemporaries and posterity. Mere calumnies could never have driven the daughters of Lyceambes to hang themselves,—if, indeed, this story is to be believed, and is not a gross exaggeration. But we have no use of it; the universal admiration which was awarded to Archilochus' iambics proves the existence of a foundation of truth; for when had a satire, which was not based on truth, universal reputation for excellence? When Plato produced his first dialogue against the sophists, Gorgias is said to have exclaimed, "Athens has given birth to a new Archilochus!" This comparison, made by a man not unacquainted with art, shows at all events that Archilochus must have possessed somewhat of the keen and delicate satire which in Plato was most severe where a dull listener would be least sensible of it." (History of the Literature of Greece, i. p. 135.)

The satire of preceding writers, as displayed for example in the Hapalites, was less pointed, because its objects were chosen out of the remote world which furnished all the personages of epic poetry; while the iambics of Archilochus were aimed at those among whom he lived. Hence their personal bitterness and sarcastic power. This kind of satire had already been employed in extemporaneous effusions of wit, especially at the festivals of Demeter and Com., and Dionysos. This millery, a specimen of which is preserved in some of the songs of the chorus in Aristophanes' Frogs, was called iambus; and the same name was applied to the verse which Archilochus invented when he introduced a new style of poetry in the place of these irregular effusions. For the measured movement of the heroic hexameter, with its stress and accentual inequalities, he substituted a movement in which the stress was twice as long as the thesis, the light tripping character of which was admirably adapted to express the lively play of wit. According as the thesis followed or preceded the thesis, the verse gained, in the former case, strength, in the latter, speed and lightness, which are the charateristics respectively of the iambus and of the trochee. These short feet he formed into continued systems, by uniting every two of them into a pair (a meter or dipodè), in which one axis was more strongly accentuated than the other, and one of the two thesses was left doubtful as to quantity, so that, considered with reference to musical rhythm, each dipodè formed a bar. Hence arose the great kindred dramatic metres, the iambic trimeter and the trochaic tetrameter, as well as the shorter forms of iambic and trochaic verse. Archilochus was the inventor also of the epode, which was formed by subjoining to one or more verses a shorter one. One form of the epode, in which it consists of three trochees, was called the isyphalic verse (Isyphalos). He used also a kind of verse compounded of two different metrical structures, which was called amyntite. Some writers ascribe to him the invention of the Saturnian verse. (Bentley's Dissertation on Phalaris.) Archilochus introduced several improvements in music, which began about his time to be applied to the public recitations of poetry.

The best opportunity we have of judging of the structure of Archilochus' poetry, though not of its satiric character, is furnished by the Epodes of Horace, as we learn from that poet himself (Epist. i. 19. 20) :

"Parias ego primam iammos Ostendi Latini, numeros animosque securus Archilochi, non res et agentia verba Lycamben."

Fabricius (ii. pp. 107—110) discusses fully the passages in which other writers of the name are supposed to be mentioned. [P. S.]

ARCHIMEDES ('Aρχιμήδης), of Syracuse, the most famous of ancient mathematicians, was born b. c. 387, if the statement of Tzetzes, which makes him 75 years old at his death, be correct. Of his family little is known. Platarch calls him a relation of king Hiero; but Cicero (Tusc. Disp. v. 29), contrasting him apparently not with Dionysius (as Torelli seems in order to avoid the contradiction), but with Plato and Archytas, says, "humilium homunculum a pulvere et radio excitabo." At any rate, his actual condition in life does not seem to have been elevated (Silius Ital. xiv. 348), though he was certainly a friend, if not a kinsman, of Hiero. A modern tradition makes him an ancestor of the Syracusean virgin martyr St. Lucy. (Rivalius, in vit. Archim. Macrueheli, p. 6.) In the early part of his life he travelled into Egypt, where he is said, on the authority of Proclus, to have studied under Conon the Samian, a mathematician and astronomer (mentioned by Virg. Est. iii. 40), who lived under the Ptolemies, Philadelphus and Euergetes, and for whom he testifies his respect and esteem in several places of his works. (See the introductions to the Quadratura Parabolae and the De Helicibus.) After visiting other countries, he returned to Syracuse. (Diod. v. 37.) Livy (xxiv. 34) calls him a distinguished astronomer, "unius speciator coeli siderumque," a description of which the truth is made sufficiently probable by his treatment of the astronomical questions occurring in the Aenar- nius. (See also Macrobi. Somm. Sip. ii. 3.) He was probably best known as the inventor of several ingenious machines; but Plutarch (Marcell. c. 14), who, it should be observed, confounds the application of geometry to mechanics with the solution of geometrical problems by mechanical means, represents him as despising these contrivances, and only condescending to write himself from the abstractions of pure geometry at the request of Hiero. Certain it is, however, that Archimeides did cultivate not only pure geometry, but also the mathematical theory of several branches of physics, in a truly scientific spirit, and with a success which placed him very far in advance of the age in which he lived. His theory of the lever was the foundation of statics till the discovery of the composition of forces in the time of Newton, and no essential addition was made to the principles of the equilibrium of fluids and floating bodies, established by him in his treatise "De Insidentibus," till the publication of Stevin's. Researches on the pressure of fluids in 1608. (Lagrange, Mé. Anal. vol. ii. pp. 11, 176.)

He constructed for Hiero various engines of war, which, many years afterwards, were so far effectual in the defence of Syracuse against Marcellus, as to convert the siege into a blockade, and delay the taking of the city for a considerable time. (Plat. Marcell. 15-18; Liv. xxiv. 34.; Polypb. viii. 5-9.) The accounts of the performances of these engines are evidently exaggerated; and the story of the burning of the Roman ships by the reflected rays of the sun, though very current in later times, is probably a fiction, since neither Polybius, Livy, nor Plutarch gives the least hint of it. The earliest writers who speak of it are Galen (De Temper. iii. 2) and his contemporary Lucian (Hypius. c. 2), (in the second century) merely alluding to it as a thing well known. Zonaras (about a. d. 1100) mentions it in relating the use of a similar apparatus, contrived by a certain Proclus, when Byzantium was besieged in the reign of Anastasius; and gives Dion as his authority, without referring to the particular passage. The extant works of Dion contain no allusion to it. Tzetzes (about 1150) gives an account of the principal inventions of Archimeides (Chil. ii. 103—150), and amongst them of this burning machine, which, he says, set the Roman ships on fire when they came within a bow-shot of the walls; and consisted of a large hexagonal mirror with smaller ones disposed round it, each of the latter being a polygon of 24 sides. The subject has been a good deal discussed in modern times, particularly by Cavaliere (in cap. 29 of a treat entitled "De Spiegio Ustorio," Dologna 1680), and by Buffon, who has left an elaborate dissertation upon it in his introduction to his history of minerals. (Oeuvres, tom. v. p. 301, &c.) The latter author actually succeeded in igniting wood at a distance of 150 feet, by means of a combination of 146 plane mirrors. The question is also examined in vol. ii. of Peyrard's Archi- medes; and a prize essay upon it by Capelle i translated from the Dutch in Gilbert's "Annalen der Physik," vol. iii. p. 242. The most probable conclusion seems to be, that Archimedes had on some occasion set fire to a ship or ships by means of a burning mirror, and that later writers falsely connected the circumstance with the siege of Syracuse. (See Eisch and Graber's Cyclop. art. Archim. note, and Gibbon, chap. 40.)

The following additional instances of Archimedes' skill in the application of science have been collected from various authors by Rivalus (who edited his works in 1613) and others.

He detected the mixture of silver in a crown which Hiero had ordered to be made of gold, and determined the proportions of the two metals, by a method suggested to him by the overflowing of the water when he stepped into a bath. When the thought struck him he is said to have been so much pleased that, forgetting to put on his clothes, he ran home shouting Ευρίκα, Ευρίκα. The particulars of the calculation are not preserved, but it probably depended upon a direct comparison of the weights of certain volumes of silver and gold with the weight and volume of the crown; the volumes being measured, at least in the case of the crown, by the quantity of water displaced when the mass was immersed. It is not likely that Archimedes was at this period among the mechanicians demonstrated in his hydrostatic treatise concerning the loss of weight of bodies immersed in water, since he would hardly have evinced such ively gratification at the obvious discovery that they might be applied to the problem of the crown; his delight must rather have arisen from his now rst catching sight of a line of investigation which led immediately to the solution of the problem in question, and ultimately to the important theorems referred to. (Vitruv. ix. 3.; Proclus, summ. in lib. i. Execli. ii. 3.)

He superintended the building of a ship of extraordinary size for Hiero, of which a description is given in Athenaeus (v. p. 206, d), where he is said to have moved it to the sea by the help of a screw. According to Proclus, this ship was tendered by Hiero as a present to Polemy; it may possibly have been the occasion of Archimedes' sitting for a statue.

He invented a machine called, from its form, a scilae, and now known as the water-screw of Archimedes, for pumping the water out of the hold of this vessel; it is said to have been also used in Egypt by the inhabitants of the Delta in irrigating its lands. (Diod. i. 34.; Vitruv. x. 11.) An investigation of the mathematical theory of the water-screw is given in Esher and Gruber. The abian historian Abulpharagius attributes to Archimedes the raising of the dykes and bridges of the Nile. (Pope-Blompt, Eusebius, p. 32.) Tzetzes I Orphilus (de Mach. xxvii.) spoke of his Tric or a machine for moving large weights; probably combining some wheels, or with spiral axes. A tridacan organ (a musical instrument) is mentioned by Tertullian (de Anima, cap. 14), but Phlny i. 37) attributes it to Cresilus. (See also Pappus, Math. Coll. lib. 8, introd.) An apparatus called loculus, apparently somewhat resembling the voce puzzles is also attributed to Archimedes, Dromatianus, de Arte Metrica, p. 2684.) His st celebrated performance was the construction a sphere; a kind of orrery, representing the movements of the heavenly bodies, of which we have no particular description. (Claudian, Epigr. xxi. in Sphairum Archimedes; Cic. Nat. Deor. ii. 33, Tusc. Dis. i. 35; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 115; Laclant. Din. Inst. ii. 5; Or. Past. vii. 277.)

When Syracuse was taken, Archimedes was killed by the Roman soldiers, ignorant or careless who he might be. The accounts of his death vary in some particulars, but mostly agree in describing him as intent upon a mathematical problem at the time. He was deeply respected by Marcellus, who directed his burial, and befriended his surviving relations. (Liv. xxv. 51; Valer. Max. viii. 7. 7; Plutarch De Pyrrh. 25.) When Marcellus saw the Upompi tomb was placed the figure of a sphere inscribed in a cylinder, in accordance with his known wish, and in commemoration of the discovery which he most valued. When Cicero was quaestor in Sicily (c. 75) he found this tomb near one of the gates of the city, almost hid amongst briars, and forgotten by the Syracusans. (Tusc. Dis. i. 23.)

Of the general character of Archimedes we have no direct account. But his apparently disinterested devotion to his friend and admirer Hiero, in whose service he was ever ready to exercise his ingenuity upon objects which his own taste would not have led him to choose (for there is doubtless some truth in what Plutarch says on this point) the affectionate regret which he expresses for his deceased master Conon, in writing to his surviving friend Dositheus (to whom most of his works are addressed); and the unaffected simplicity with which he announces his own discoveries, seem to afford probable grounds for a favourable estimate of it. That his intellect was of the very highest order is unquestionable. He possessed, in a degree never exceeded unless by Newton, the inventive genius which discovers new provinces of inquiry, and finds new points of view for old and familiar objects; the clearness of conception which is essential to the resolution of complex phenomena into their constituent elements; and the power and habit of intense and persevering thought, without which other intellectual gifts are comparatively fruitless. (See the Intro. to the treatise De Con. et Sphaer.) It may be noticed that he resembled other great thinkers, in his habit of complete abstraction from outward things, when reflecting on subjects which made considerable demands on his mental powers. At such times he would forget to eat his meals, and require compulsion to take him to the bath. (Plat. l. c.) Compare the stories of Newton sitting great part of the day half dressed on his bed, while composing the Principia; and of Socrates standing a whole day and night, thinking, on the same spot. (Plat. Symp. p. 220, c. d.)

The following works of Archimedes have come down to us: A treatise on Equiponderants and Centres of Gravity, in which the theory of the equilibriam of the straight lever is demonstrated, both for commensurable and incommensurable weights; and various properties of the centres of gravity of plane surfaces bounded by three or four straight lines, or by a straight line and a parabola, are established.

The Quadrature of the Parabola, in which it is proved, that the area cut off from a parabola by any chord is equal to two-thirds of the parallelogram of which one side is the chord in question, and the opposite side a tangent to the parabola. This was the first real example of the quadrature of a cuneiform space; that is, of the discovery of a rectilinear figure equal to an area not bounded entirely by straight lines.

A treatise on the Sphere and Cylinder, in which various propositions relative to the spheres and volumes of the plane, cylinder, and cone, were demonstrated for the first time. Many of them are now familiarly known; for example, those which establish the ratio (3) between the volumes, and also between the surfaces, of the sphere and circumscribing cylinder; and the ratio (1) between the area of a great circle and the surface of the sphere. They are easily demonstrable by the modern analytical methods; but the original discovery and geometrical proof of them required the genius of Archimedes. Moreover, the legitimacy of the modern applications of analysis to questions concerning curved lines and surfaces, can only be proved by a kind of geometrical reasoning, of which Archimedes gave the first example. (See Lacroix, Diff. Cal. vol. i. pp. 63 and 431; and compare De Morgan, Diff. Cal. p. 32.)

The book on the Dimension of the Circle consists of 15 propositions. Every circle is equal to a right-angled triangle of which the sides containing the right angle are equal respectively to its radius and circumference. 2d. The ratio of the area of the circle to the square of its diameter is nearly that of 11 to 14. 3d. The circumference of the circle is greater than three times its diameter by a quantity greater than $\frac{1}{4}$ of the diameter but less than $\frac{1}{4}$ of the same. The last two propositions are established by comparing the circumference of the circle with the perimeters of the inscribed and circumscribed polygons of 96 sides.

The treatise on Spirals contains demonstrations of the principal properties of the curve, now known as the Spiral of Archimedes, which is generated by the uniform motion of a point along a straight line revolving uniformly in one plane about one of its extremities. It appears from the introductory words of Dositheus that Archimedes had not been able to put these theorems in a satisfactory form without long-continued and repeated trials; and that Conon, to whom he had sent them as problems along with various others, had died without accomplishing their solution.

The book on Conoids and Spheroids relates chiefly to the volumes cut off by planes from the solids so called; those namely which are generated by the rotation of the Conic Sections about their principal axes. Like the work last described, it was the result of laborsious, and at first unsuccessful, attempts. (See the introduction.)

The Aronarius is a short tract addressed to Gelo, the eldest son of Hiero, in which Archimedes proves, that it is possible to assign a number greater than that of the grains of sand which would fill the sphere of the fixed stars. This singular investigation was suggested by an opinion which some persons had expressed, that the sands on the shores of Sicily were either infinite, or at least would exceed any numbers which could be assigned for them; and the success with which the difficulties caused by the awkward and imperfect notion of the ancient Greek arithmetic are eluded by a device identical in principle with the modern method of logarithms, affords one of the most striking instances of the great mathematician's genius. Having briefly discussed the opinions of Aristarchus upon the constitution and extent of the Universe [Aristarchus], and described his own method of determining the apparent diameter of the sun, and the magnitude of the pupil of the eye, he is led to assume that the diameter of the sphere of the fixed stars may be taken as not exceeding 100 million of millions of stadia; and that a sphere, one $\delta$arca in diameter, cannot contain more than 650 millions of grains of sand, in the same manner as a solid sphere of numbers, as not greater than 10,000 $\delta$arca, he shows that the number of grains in question could not be so great as 1000 myriads multiplied by the eighth term of a geometrical progression of which the first term was unity and the common ratio a myriad of myriads; a number which in our notation would be expressed by unity with 63 ciphers annexed.

The two books On Floating Bodies (Περὶ τῶν Ὀχυρῶν) contain demonstrations of the laws which determine the position of bodies immersed in water; and particularly of segments of spheres and parabolic cones. They are extant only in the Latin version of Commandine, with the exception of a fragment, Περὶ τῶν Ὀχυρῶν in Ang. Mai's Collection, vol. i. p. 427.

The treatise entitled Lomnata is a collection of 15 propositions in plane geometry. It is derived from an Arabic MS., and its genuineness has been doubted. (See Torelli's preface.)

Euclides of Ascalon, about A. D. 600, wrote a commentary on the Ttreatises on the Sphere and Cylinder, on the Dimension of the Circle, and on Centres of Gravity. All the works above mentioned, together with this Commentary, were found on the taking of Constantinople, and brought first into Italy and then into Germany. They were printed at Basle in 1544, in Greek and Latin, by Hervagius. Of the subsequent editions by far the best is that of Torelli, "Arithm. quaæ super omniva, cum Euclidis Ascolaniæ commentariis ex recens. Joseph. Torelli. Veronensiæ tertii Oræ 1792. It was founded upon the Basle edition except in the case of the Aronarius, the text of which is taken from that of Dr. Wallis, who published this treatise and the Dimensio Circuli, with a translation and notes, at Oxford, in 1679. (The are reprinted in vol. iii. of his works.)

The Arenarius, having been little meddled with by the ancient commentators, retains the Dor dialect, in which Archimedes, like his countryman Theoricus, wrote. (See Wallis, Op. vol. i. p. 537, 545. Torelli says, δέγχε δε καὶ δισεροκεφαλωτρευτή, Πάθει καὶ ευκρίππω μεν τὸ σκευον θάνατος.) A French translation of t works of Archimedes, with notes, was publish by F. Peyrard, Paris, 1803, 2 vols. 8vo., and an English translation of the Arenarius by G. And son, London, 1784.

ARCHIPUS. 415. (Suidas, s. v.) His chief play was Τύχες, "the Fishes," in which, as far as can be gathered from the fragments, the fish made war upon the Athenians, as excessive eaters of fish, and at length a treaty was concluded, by which Melanthius, the tragic poet, and other various fish-eaters, were given up to be devoured by the fishes. The wit of the piece appears to have consisted chiefly in playing upon words, which Archippus was noted for carrying to great excess. (Schoi. in Aristoph. Vesp. 581, Bekker.) The other plays of Architas, mentioned by the grammarians, are Αρμινίος, Ποιμήν, Βίος, Σπειρίδας, and Πουλιά. Four of the lost plays which are assigned to Aristo- thenes, were by some ascribed to Archippus, namely, Πειρατία, Ναυαράγ, Νίαξ, Νεόσων, or Νεόσων. (Meineke, i. 207—210.) Two Pythagorean philosophers of this name are mentioned in the list of Fabricii. (Bibl. Græc. i. p. 581.)

ARCHITI'YUS (Αρχιτιγιμός), the author of a work on Arcadia. (Plut. Quaest. Græc. c. 39.)

ARCHO, the daughter of Herodicus, a Thessalian chief, whose children met with the tragic death mentioned by Livy. (xl. 4.) [Thucyd.] ARCHON (Αρχην). 1. The Pelasgian, appointed satrap of Babylonia after the death of Alexander, b. c. 323 (Justin. viii. 4; Dio. viii. 3), is probably the same as the son of Cleisthen mentioned in the Indian expedition of Alexander. (Arian. Ind. c. 18.)

2. Of Aegeira, one of those who defended the conduct of the Achaean league with reference to Sparta before Cæcilius Metellus, b. c. 185. He was one of the Achaean ambassadors sent to Egypt in b. c. 168 (Polyb. xxi. 10, xxix. 10), and is perhaps the same as the Arch, the brother of Konareus, mentioned by Livy, (xii. 20.)

ARCHYTAS (Αρχητάς), of Aphyissa, a Greek poet, who was probably a contemporary of Euphorion, about b. c. 300, since it was a matter of doubt with the ancients themselves whether the epic poem Ευθύμων was the work of Archytas or Euphorion. (Athen. iii. p. 82.) Plutarch (Quaest. Gr. v.) quotes from him an hexameter verse concerning the country of the Ossolian Locrians. Two other lines, which he is said to have inscribed in the Hermes of Rontathesos, are preserved in Stobaeus. (Ser. viii. 10.) He seems to have been the same person whom Longius (viii. 29) calls an epigrammatist, and upon whom Bion wrote an epigram which he quotes. (iv. 82.)

ARCHYTAS (Αρχητάς), of Methene, a musician, who may perhaps have been the author of the work Ρηγάδ Αθηνών, which is ascribed to Archytas of Tarentum. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 82; Athen. i. p. 206, 214, 216.)

ARCHYTAS (Αρχητάς), a Greek of Tarentum, who was distinguished as a philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman, and was no less admired for his integrity and virtue, both in public and in private life. Little is known of his history, since the lives of him by Aristoxenus and Aristotle (Athen. xii. p. 545) are lost. A brief account of him is given by Diogenes Laërtius. (vii. 79—83.) His father’s name was Mnesarchus, Mnesagoras, or Histaenus. The time when he lived is disputed, but it was probably about 400 B.C., and onwards, so that he was contemporary with Plato, whose life he is said to have saved by his influence with the tyrant Dionysius (Tzetzes, Chil. x. 358, xi. 362; Snädes, s. v. Ἀρρητός), and with whom he kept up a familiar intercourse. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. 12.) Two letters written by him have passed down to us, and they are preserved by Diogenes (i. e. ; Plato, Ep. 9). He was seven times the general of his city, though it was the custom for the office to be held for no more than a year, and he commanded in several campaigns, in all of which he was victorious. Civil affairs of the greatest consequence were entrusted to him by his fellow-citizens. After a life which secured to him a place among the very greatest men of antiquity, he was drowned while upon a voyage on the Adriatic. (Hor. Carm. i. 20.) He was greatly admired for his domestic virtues. He paid particular attention to the comfort and education of his slaves. The interest which he took in the education of children is proved by the mention of a child’sattle (ματαιγίς) among his mechanical inventions. (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 19; Aristotle, Pol. viii. 6, § 1.)

As a philosopher, he belonged to the Pythagorean school, and he appears to have been himself the founder of a new sect. Like the Pythagoreans in general, he paid much attention to mathematics. Horace (car. 1.) calls him “maris et terrae numeroque carentis arenam Mensorem.” He solved the problem of the doubling of the cube, (Vitruv. i. praef.) and invented the method of analytical geometry. He was the first who applied the principles of mathematics to mechanics. To his theoretical science he added the skill of a practical mechanician, and constructed various machines and automata, among which his wooden flying dove in particular was the wonder of antiquity. (Gell. x. 13.) He also applied mathematics to music with success, science, and even to metaphysical philosophy. His influence as a philosopher was so great, that Plato was undoubtedly indebted to him for some of his views; and Aristotle is thought by some writers to have borrowed the idea of his categories, as well as some of his ethical principles, from Archytas.

The fragments and titles of works ascribed to Archytas are very numerous, but the genuineness of many of them is greatly doubted. Most of them are found in Stobaeus. They relate to physics, metaphysics, logic, and ethics. A catalogue of them is given by Fabricius. (Bib. Graec. i. p. 833.) Several of the fragments of Archytas are published in Gale, Opus. Mythol. Cantab. 1671, Amst. 1688. A work ascribed to him “on the 10 Categories,” was published by Camerarius, in Greek, under the title Ἀρρητοῦ φιλόσοφου νέμων δέκα λόγοι καλολέομεν, Lips. 1564; and in Greek and Latin, Ven. 1571. A full collection of his fragments is promised in the Tentamen de Archytas Taruntini vita aequo operibus, a Jos. Navarro, of which only one part has yet appeared, Hafn. 1830.

From the statement of Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth. 23), that Archytas was a hearer of Pythagoras, some writers have thought that there were two Pythagorean philosophers of this name. But Iamblichus was undoubtedly mistaken. (Bentley’s Phalaris.) The writers of his name on agriculture (Diog. Laërt. i. 1; Varro, R. R. i. 1; Columella, R. R. i. 1), on cookery (Diog. Laërt. i. 1; Vitruv. V. 28, 29; Athen. xii. p. 516, c.), and on architecture (Diog. Laërt. i. 1; Vitruv. viii. praef.), are most probably identical with the philosopher, to whom most of these various treatises are ascribed.

ARCTYNIUS (Ἀρκτύνιος), of Miletus, is called by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (A. R. i. 68, &c.) the most ancient Greek poet, whence some writers have placed him even before the time of Homer; but the ancients who assign to him any certain date, agree in placing him about the commencement of the Olympiads. We know from good authority that his father’s name was Teles, and that he was a descendant of Nautes. (Suid. s. v. Ἀρπυνιος; Tzetzes, Chil. xiii. 641.) He is called a disciple of Homer, and from all we know about him, there was scarcely a poet in his time who deserved this title more than Arctinus. He was the most distinguished among the so-called cyclic poets. There were in antiquity two epic poems belonging to the cycle, which are unanimously attributed to him. 1. The Aethiopis (Ἀθηνίους), in five books. It was a kind of continuation of Homer’s Iliad, and its chief heroes were Memnon, king of the Ethiopians, and Achilles, who slew him. The substance of it has been preserved by Proclus. 2. The Destruction of Ithaca (Ἰθαίρων ἐποιημένος), in two books, contained a description of the taking and destruction of Troy, and the subsequent events until the departure of the Greeks. The substance of this poem has likewise been preserved by Proclus. A portion of the Little Iliad of Lesches was likewise called Ἐποιημένος, but the account which it gave differed materially from that of Arctinus. [Lesches.] A third epic poem, called Ἐποιημένος, that is, the fight of the gods with the Titans, and which was probably the first poem in the epic cycle, was ascribed by some to Eumelus of Corinth, and by others to Arctinus. (Athen. i. p. 22, vii. p. 277.) The fragments of Arctinus have been collected by Dünzner (De fragm. orig. Poet. bis acu. 2., cc. 16, cc. 21, cc. Nucleus, p. 16) and Dübner. (Homer. Carma. et cyclic Epic. Reprint, Paris, 1837.) Compare C. W. Müller, De Cyclo Graeco Epic. Weicker, Der Epische Cyclos, p. 211, &c.; Hude, Gesch. der Ep. Dichtkunst der Helian, p. 276, &c. 378, &c. [L.S.] ARCHYON (Ἀρχύηον), or, as some read, ALEXG (Ἀλεξόν), a surgeon at Rome, mentioned by Jose phus (Ant. xix. 1), as having been called in to attend to those persons who had been wounded a Caligula’s assassination, &c. 41. [W. A. G.] ARDALUS (Ἀρδάλος), a son of Hephæstus who was said to have invented the flute, and who has built a sanctuary of the Muses at Troezen, who derived from him the surname Ardalides; Ardalotides. (Paus. ii. 31. § 5; Hesych. s. अर्दाले. [L.S.] ARETHOUS.

AR’DEAS (Ἀρδέας), a son of Odysseus and Circe, the mythical founder of the town of Ardea in the country of the Rutuli. (Dionys. i. 72; Steph. Byz. s. v. "Ἀρδέα")

[Minutes.]

AR’DICES of Corinth and TELEPHANES of Sicily were, according to Pliny (xxxv. 5), the first artists who practised the monogram, or drawing in outline with an indication also of the parts within the external outline, but without colour, as in the designs of Phlaxman and Retzsch. Pliny, after stating that the invention of the earliest form of drawing, namely, the external outline, as marked by the edge of the shadow (κόκυλον ἡμισε περὶ κύκλου, or πικτοῦ χωμοῦ), was claimed by the Egyptians, the Corinthians, and the Sicyontians, adds, that it was said to have been invented by Philotes, an Egyptian, or by Cleansides, a Corinthian, and that the next step was made by Ar’dices and Telephanes, who first added the inner lines of the figure (αἱ περὶ τοῦ δρακόντος ὀμαλὴ ἔπεμφια).

[Minutes.]

ARDYS (Ἀρδύς). 1. King of Lydia, succeeded his father Gyges, and reigned from b.c. 680 to 631. He took Priene and made war against Miletus. During his reign the Cimmerians, who had been driven out of their abodes by the Nomad Scythians, took Sardis, with the exception of the citadel. (Herod. i. 15, 16; Paus. iv. 24. § 1.)

2. An experienced general, commanded the right wing of the army of Antiochus the Great in his battle against Molo, b.c. 220. (See p. 196, b.) He distinguished himself in the next year in the siege of Seleucia. (Polyb. v. 53, 60.)

ARE’GON (Ἀρέγον), a Corinthian painter, who, in conjunction with Cleansides, ornamented the temple of Artemis Alephoïnion at the mouth of the Alpheus in Elis. He painted Artemis riding on a griffin. (Strab. vii. p. 543.) If Cleansides be the artist mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 5), Areion must be placed at the very earliest period of the rise of art in Greece.

[Minutes.]

AR’EGONIS (Ἀρεγώνις), according to the Orphic Argonautica (127), the wife of Amycous and mother of Mopsus. Hyginus (Fab. 14) calls her Chloris.

[Minutes.]

AREIA (Ἀρεία), the warlike. 1. A surname of Aphrodis, when represented in full armour like Arès, as was the case at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 17. § 5.)

2. A surname of Athens, under which she was worshipped at Athens. Her statue, together with those of Ares, Aphrodis, and Eryno, stood in the temple of Athens at Athens. (Paus. i. 8. § 4.) Her worship under this name was instituted by Orestes after he had been acquitted by the Areopagus of the murder of his mother. (i. 26. § 5.) It was Athens Areia who gave her casting vote in cases where the Areopagitae were equally divided. (Aeschyl. Eum. 350.) From these circumstances, it has been inferred, that the name Areia ought not to be derived from Ares, but from ἄρει, a prayer, or τώ ἄρει or ἄρειον, to propitiate or atone for.

3. A daughter of Cleuchus, by whom Apollo became the father of Miletus. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2.) For other traditions about Miletus, see AΣCOLΛIΣ and MILETIUS.

[Minutes.]

ARE’LYCΥUS (Ἀρέλυκος). Two mythical personages of this name occur in the Iliad. (xiv. 51, xvi. 308.)

[Minutes.]

ARE’PiTHOUS (Ἀρεπίθοος), king of Arse in Locotia, and husband of Philomedusa, is called in the Iliad (vii. 9, 39. sc.) κατοικητής, because he fought in no other weapon but a club. He fell by the hand of the Arcadian Lycurgos, who drove him into a narrow defile, where he could not make use of his club. Lycurgos, the friend of Lycurgos, wore the armour of Areiphotus in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. vii. 138, &c.) The tomb of Areiphotus was shown in Arcadia as late as the time of Pan- sanius. (viii. 11. § 3.) There is another mythical personage of this name in the Iliad (xx. 487.).

AREIUS (Ἀρείος), a surname of Zeus, which may mean either the warlike or the prophesying and atomizing god, as Areia in the case of Athena. Under this name, Oenomus sacrificed to him as often as he entered the same contest with the suitors of his daughter, whom he put to death as soon as they were conquered. (Paus. v. 14. § 5.)

AREIUS or ARIUS (Ἀρείος), a citizen of Alexandria, a Pythagorean or Stoic philosopher in the time of Augustus, who esteemed him so highly, that after the conquest of Alexandria, he declared that he spared the city cheaply for the sake of Areius. (Plat. Ant. 80, Apollod. p. 207; Dion Cass. vi. 16; Julian. Epist. 51; comp. Strab. iv. p. 670.) Areius as well as his two sons, Dionysius and Nicomer, are said to have instructed Augustus in philosophy. (Suid. Ant. 89.) He is frequently mentioned by Theophrastus, who says that Augustus valued him not less than Aratus. (Theophr. Eut. v. p. 68, d. viii. p. 108, b. x. p. 130, b. xii. p. 175, c. ed. Petav. 1684.) From Quintilian (ii. 15. § 36, iii. 1. § 16) it appears, that Areius also taught or wrote on rhetoric. (Comp. Sene. concil. ad Marc. 4; Adian., V. xii. 25; Suid. s. v. Ἐρείος.)

AREIUS, LECANIUS (Ἀρείανος Ἐκανίος), a Greek physician, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. v. 18, vol. xiii. p. 840), and who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He may perhaps be the same person who is several times quoted by Gelen, and who is sometimes called a follower of Asclepiades, Asclepiades (or Asclepiades) (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. v. 3, vol. xii. p. 829; ibid. viii. 5, vol. xiii. p. 192; De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. v. 15, vol. xiii. p. 857), sometimes a native of Tarsus in Cilicia (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. locos. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 636; ibid. ix. 2, vol. xii. p. 247), and sometimes mentioned without any distinguishing epithet. (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. locos. x. 2, vol. xiii. p. 347; De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. v. 11, 14, vol. xiii. pp. 827, 832, 852.) He may perhaps also be the person who is said by Somnus (Vita Hippocr. init., in Hipp. Opera, vol. iii. p. 850) to have written on the life of Hippocrates, and to whom Dioscorides addresses his work on Materia Medica (vol. i. p. 595). Whether this individual it is impossible to say for certain, but the writer is not aware of any chronological or other difficulties in the supposition.

[Minutes.]

ARELIUS, a painter who was celebrated at Rome a little before the reign of Augustus, but degraded the art by painting goddesses after the likeness of his own mistresses. (Plin. xxxv. 37.)

ARE’LIUS FUSCUS. (Ἀρελίος Φούσκος.)

ARENE.

[Minutes.]

* In this latter passage, instead of "Ἀρεῖος Ἀσκληπιάδος we should read Ἀρεῖος Ἀσκληπιάδος. [Asclepiades Areius.]"
C. A'RENNIIUS and L. A'RNENIIUS, were tribunes of the plebs in B. C. 210. L. A'rennius was praefect of the allies two years afterwards, B. C. 298, and was taken prisoner in the battle in which Marcellus was defeated by Hannibal. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 26, 27.)

A'RESAS ('Ares), the god of war and one of the great Olympian gods of the Greeks. He is represented as the son of Zeus and Hera. (Hom. H. v. 893, &c.; Hes. Theog. 321; Apollod. i. 3. § 1.) A later tradition, according to which Hera conceived Ares by touching a certain flower, appears to be an imitation of the legend about the birth of Cupid. (Plut. De Is. et Mi. v. 57; Pherec. p. 257, &c.) The character of Ares in Greek mythology will be best understood if we compare it with that of other divinities who are likewise in some way connected with war. Athena represents thoughtfulness and wisdom in the affairs of war, and protects men and their habitations during its ravages. Ares, on the other hand, is nothing but the personification of bold force and strength, and not so much the god of war as of its tumult, confusion, and horrors. His sister Eris calls forth war, Zeus directs its course, but Ares loves war for its own sake, and delights in the din and rout of battles, in the slaughter of men, and the destruction of towns. He is not painted benevolent. (party spirit, &c.) but sometimes assists the one and sometimes the other side, just as his inclination may dictate; whence Zeus calls him ἀλεχονάζονας. (H. v. 809.) The destructive hand of this god was even believed to be active in the ravages made by plagues and epidemics. (Soph. Oed. Tyr. 185.) This savage and sanguinary character of Ares makes him hated by the other gods and his own parents. (H. v. 889—902.) In the Iliad, he appears surrounded by the personifications of all the fearful phenomena and effects of war (iv. 440, &c., xv. 119, &c.); but in the Odyssey his character is somewhat softened down. It was contrary to the spirit which animated the Greeks to represent a being like Ares, with all his overwhelming physical strength and impetuous and reckless character. When he comes in contact with higher powers, he is usually conquered. He was wounded by Diomedes, who was assisted by Athena, and in his fall he roared like nine or ten thousand other warriors together. (H. v. 855, &c.) When the gods began to take an active part in the war of the mortals, Athena opposed Ares, and threw him on the ground by hurling at him a mighty stone (xx. 69, xxx. 403, &c.); and when he lay stretched on the earth, his huge body covered the space of seven pletren. The gigantic Aleana had likewise conquered and claimed him, and had kept him a prisoner for thirteen months, until he was delivered by Hera. (H. v. 365, &c.) In the contest of Typhon against Zeus, Ares was obliged, together with the other gods, to flee to Egypt, where he metamorphosed himself into a fish. (Anton. Lib. 28.) He was also conquered by Heracles, with whom he fought on account of his son Cyamus, and obliged to return to Olympus. (Hesiod. Sent. Hero. 461.) In numerous other contests, however, he was victorious. This fierce and gigantic, but withal handsome god loved and was beloved by Aphrodite; he interfered on her behalf with Zeus (v. 883), and lent her his war-chariot. (v. 883; comp. Arah. hornr.) When Aphrodite loved Ares, and in his jealous metamorphosed himself into a bear, and killed his rival. [ADONIS.] According to a late tradition, Ares slew Harmothoë, the son of Poseidon, when he was on the point of violating Alcipe, the daughter of Ares. Hereupon Poseidon accused Ares in the Areopagus, where the Olympian gods were assembled in court. Ares was acquitted, and this event is believed to have given rise to the name Areopagus. [Dict. of Ant. s. v.]

The warlike character of the tribes of Thrace led to the belief, that the god's residence was in that country, and here and in Scythia were the principal seats of his worship. (Herm. Om. viii. 591. Plut. De Is. et Mi. v. 58; A. R. Am. ii. 352; Stat. Theb. vii. 42; Herod. iv. 59, 62.) In Scythia he was worshipped in the form of a sword, to which not only horses and other cattle, but men also were sacrificed. Respecting the worship of an Egyptian divinity called Ares, see Herodotus, ii. 64. He was further worshipped in Colchis, where the golden fleece was suspended on an oak-tree in a grove sacred to him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16.) From thence the Dioscuri were believed to have brought to Laconia the ancient state of Ares which was preserved in the temple of Ares Theurais, on the road from Sparta to Thermope. (Pans. iii. 19. § 7, &c.) The island near the coast of Colchis, in which the Symplegades of Strabo were believed to have drowned, and which is called the island of Ares, Areteas, Aris, or Chalecitis, was likewise sacred to him. (Steph. Byz. s. w. Αρείος κήτος; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1047; Plin. H. N. vi. 12; Pompe. Mela, ii. 7. § 15.)

In Greece itself the worship of Ares was not very general. At Athens he had a temple containing a statue made by Alcamenes (Pans. i. 8. § 5); at Gerontium in Laconia he had a temple with a grove, where an annual festival was celebrated, during which no woman was allowed to approach the temple. (iii. 22. § 5.) He was also worshipped near Tegae, and in the town (viii. 44. § 6, 45. § 3), at Olympia (v. 14. § 4), near Thebes (Apollod. iii. 4. § 1), and at Sparta, where there was an ancient statue, representing the god in chariot, and on which is said to have been engraved: "The gods were never to leave the city of Sparta." (Pans. iii. 15. § 5.) At Sparta human sacrifices were offered to Ares. (Apollod. Pfrage. p. 1056, ed. Heyne.) The temples of this god were usually built outside the towns, probably to suggest the idea that he was to protect enemies from approaching them.

All the stories about Ares and his worship in the countries north of Greece seem to indicate that his worship was introduced in the latter country from Thrace; and the whole character of the god, as described by the most ancient poets of Greece, seems to have been thought little suited to be represented in works of art; in fact, we hear of no artistic representation of Ares previous to the time of Alcamenes, who appears to have created the ideal of Ares. There are few Greek monuments now extant with representations of the god; he appears principally on coins, reliefs, and gems. (Hirt. Mythol. Bildarb. i. p. 51.) The Romans identified their god Mars with the Greek Ares. [MARS.]

[A'RESAS ('Aresas), of Lucania, and probably of Croton, was at the head of the Pythagorean school, and the sixth in succession from Pythagoras. Some attribute to him a work "about Human Nature," of which a fragment is preserved by Stobaeus. [L. S.]
(Ed. i. p. 847, ed. Heeren); but others suppose it to have been written by Aesara. [Aesara.]

ARESTOR (Ἀρέστορ), the father of Argus Panoptes, the guardian of Io, who is therefore called Arestorides. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 3; Apollon. Rhod. i. 112; Ov. Met. i. 624.) According to Pausanias (ii. 16. § 3), Arestor was the husband of Mycene, the daughter of Inachus, from whom the town of Mycenae derived its name. [L. S.]

ARETAEUS (Ἀρέταιος), of Cnidus, of uncertain date, wrote a work on Macedonian affairs (Μακεδονικά) in three books at least, and another on the history of island (Ἱστορία Νησίων) in two books at least. (Plut. Parall. 11. 27.) It is uncertain whether the Areteas referred to by Porphry (Ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 3), as the author of a work Ἱερεῖς συνεργαταί is the same as the above or not.

ARETAEUS (Ἀρέτας), one of the most celebrated of the ancient Greek physicians, of whose life, however, no particulars are known. There is some uncertainty respecting both his age and country; but it seems probable that he practised in the first century after Christ, in the reign of Nero or Vespasian, and he is generally styled "the Cappadocian" (Καπαδοκικός). He wrote in Ionic Greek a general treatise on diseases, which is still extant, and is certainly one of the most valuable relics of antiquity, displaying great accuracy in the detail of symptoms, and in seizing the diagnostic character of diseases. In his practice he followed for the most part the method of Hippocrates, but he paid less attention to what have been styled "the national actions" of the system; and, contrary to the practice of the Father of Medicine, he did not hesitate to attempt to counteract them, when they appeared to him to be injurious. The account which he gives of his treatment of various diseases indicates a simple and sagacious system, and one of more energy than that of the professor Methodici. Thus he freely administered active purgatives; he did not object to narcotics; he was much less averse to bleeding; and upon the whole his Materia Medica was both ample and efficient. It may be asserted generally that there are few of the ancient physicians, since the time of Hippocrates, who appear to have been less biased by attachment to any peculiar set of opinions, and whose account of the phenomena and treatment of disease has better stood the test of subsequent experience. Areteus is placed by some writers among the Pneumatici (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Pneumatici), because he maintained the doctrines which are peculiar to that sect; other systematic writers, however, think that he is better entitled to be placed with the eclectic. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Eclectic.)

His work consists of eight books, of which four are entitled Περὶ Ἀρείων καὶ Συμπλεκτον Ὀμοῖα καὶ Χρόνιων Γιονάσ, De Canaliis et Signis Aetorum et Divinationum Morborum; and the other four, Περὶ Σπερματικῶν Τύπων, De Choromacan Aetorum et Divinationum Morborum. They are in a tolerably complete state of preservation, though a few chapters are lost. The work was first published in a拉丁 translation by J. P. Crassus, Venet. 1552, &c., together with Rufus Ephesius. The firstreek edition is that by J. Goupinus, Paris, 1554, &c., which is more complete than the Latin vers.

In 1723 a magnificent edition in folio was published at the Clarendon press at Oxford, edited by J. Wigan, containing an improved text, a new Latin version, learned dissertations and notes, and a copious index by Maltzair. In 1731, the celebrated Bochusav brought out a new edition, of which the text and Latin version had been printed before the appearance of Wigan's, and of less value than his; this edition, however, contains a copious and useful collection of annotations by P. Petit and D. W. Triller. The last and most useful edition is that by C. C. Kühn, Lips. 1828, 8vo, containing Wigan's text, Latin version, dissertations, &c., together with Petit's Commentary, Triller's Emendations, and Maltzair's Index. A new edition is preparing for the press at this present time by Dr. Zemeras, of Middelburg in Zeeland. (See his preface, p. xiv., to Hippocr. De Vit. Rer. in Morb. Acad. Lugd. Bat. 1841.) The work has been translated into French, Italian, and German; there are also two English translations, one by J. Mofatt, Lond. 1782, 8vo, and the other by T. F. Reynolds, Lond. 1837, 8vo, neither of which contains the whole work. Further information respecting the medical opinions of Areteus may be found in Le Clerc's Hist. de la Médec.; Haller's Bibl. Med. Prat. vol. i.; Sprengel's Hist. de la Médec.; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 703, ed. Harles; Iseens, Gesch. de der Med. See also Bostock, Hist. of Med., and Choulant's Handbook der Bücherkunde für die Ältere Medicin, from which two works the preceding article has been chiefly taken. [W. A. G.]

ARETAPHILA (Ἀρεταφίλα), of Cyrene, lived at the time of the Mithridatic war. Nicocrates, the tyrant of Cyrene, killed her husband, Phasidemus, and compelled her to live with him; but she at length delivered the city from tyranny by procuring the murder of Nicocrates, and subsequently of his brother Leander, when he acted in the same tyrannical manner. (Plut. de M. M. v. 255, &c.)

A'RETAS (Ἀρέτας), the name of several kings of Arabia Petraea.

1. The contemporary of Jason, the high-priest of the Jews, and of Antiochus Epiphanes, about b. c. 170. (2 Maccab. v. 8.)

2. A contemporary of Alexander Jannaeus, King of Judea. This Aretas is probably the same who reigned in Coele-Syria after Antiochus XII., surnamed Domyans. He was invited to the kingdom by those who had possession of Damascus. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 13. § 3, 15. § 2.) Subsequently he seems to have been compelled to relinquish Syria; and we next hear of his taking part in the contest between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus for the Jewish crown, though whether this Aretas is the same as the one who ruled over Syria may be doubted. At the advice of Antipater, Hyrcanus fled to Aretas, who invaded Judea in n. c. 65, in order to place him on the throne, and laid siege to Jerusalem. Aristobulus, however, purchased the intervention of Scimus and Goblinus, Pompey's legates, who compelled Aretas to raise the siege. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. i. § 4, 2, 5; Iul. Jeb. i. 6, 8, § 2.) After Pompey had re-occupied a Roman province, he returned his arms against Aretas, n. c. 64, who submitted to him for a time. This expedition against Aretas preceded the war against Aristobulus in Judea, which Plutarch erroneously represents as the first. (Dion Cass. xxvii. 15: Appian, Mithrid. 106; Plut. Pompe. 39, 41.) The war against Aretas was renewed after Pompey's departure from Asia; and Scimus, Pompey's legate, who remained behind in Syria, invaded Arabia Petraea, but was unable to reach Petra. He laid waste, however, the surrounding country, and withdrew his army on Aretas' paying 300 talents. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 5. § 1.) This expedition of Scaurus is commemorated on a coin, which is given under Scaurus. The successors of Scaurus in Syria also prosecuted the war with the Arabs. (Appian, Syr. 50.)

3. The father-in-law of Herod Antipas of Judaea. Herod disowned his wife, the daughter of Aretas, in consequence of having formed an incestuous connexion with Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, as we learn from the Evangelists. To revenge the wrongs of his daughter, Aretas made war upon Herod, and defeated him in a great battle. Herod applied for assistance to the Romans; and Vitellius, the governor of Syria, received an order to punish Aretas. He accordingly marched against Petra; but while he was on the road, he received intelligence of the death of Tiberius (A. D. 37), and gave up the expedition in consequence. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. §§ 1, 3.)

This Aretas seems to have been the same who had possession of Damascus at the time of the conversion of the Apostle Paul, A. D. 31. (2 Cor. xi. 32, 33; Acts ix. 10—25.) It is not improbable that Aretas obtained possession of Damascus in a war with Herod at an earlier period than Josephus has mentioned; as it seems likely that Aretas would have resented the affront soon after it was given, instead of allowing so many years to intervene, as the narrative of Josephus would imply. The Aretas into whose dominions Aelius Gallus came in the time of Augustus, is probably also the same as the father-in-law of Herod. (Samb. xvi. p. 781.)

The following is a coin of Aretas, king of Damascus, but whether it belongs to No. 2 or No. 3 is doubtful. (Eckhel, iii. p. 330.) Perhaps it is a coin of No. 2, and may have been struck when he took possession of Syria at the invitation of the inhabitants of Damascus: in that case there would have been good reason for the inscription ΦΙΛΕΛΑΜΝΟΣ upon it.

COIN OF ARETAS.

ARETE (Ἀρέτα), the wife of Alcimus, king of the Phcenicians. In the Odyssey she appears as a noble and active superintendent of the household of her husband, and when Odysseus arrived in the island, he first applied to queen Arete to obtain hospitable reception and protection. (Homer, Od. vi. 310, vii. 65, &c. 142.) Respecting her connexion with the story of Jason and Medea, see Alcimus. [L. S.]

ARETTA (Ἀρέτα), daughter of the elder Dionysius and Aristocles. She was first married to Theorbides, and upon his death to Herod, the brother of her mother Aristocles. After Dion had fled from Syria during the reign of the younger Dionysius, Arete was compelled by her brother to marry Timocrates, one of his friends; but she was again received by Dion as his wife, when he had obtained possession of Syria, and expelled the younger Dionysius. After Dion's assassination, A. D. 353, Arete was imprisoned together with her mother, and brought forth a son while in confinement. Arete and Aristocles were subsequently liberated and kindly received by Herceus, one of Dion's friends, but he was afterwards prevailed by the enemies of Dion to drown them. (Plut. Dion. 6, 21, 51, 57, 58; Aelian, V. H. xix. 47, who erroneously makes Arete the mother, and Aristocles the wife of Dion.)

ARETE (Ἀρέτα), daughter of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyenean school of philosophy. She was instructed by him in the principles of his system, which she transmitted to her son, Aristippus

ARISTUSA.

ARISTUSA (Ἀριστούσα), daughter of Aristippus, although Laertius mentions among the writings of Aristippus an ἀπόλογος ὑπακούον, ὁπλα αἰσθητάς, whether the letter to which he refers was the same as that which we possess, is uncertain; but the fact that it was extant in his time would not prove its authenticity. Aelian (Hist. Nat. iii. 40) calls Arete the sister of Aristippus, but this assertion is opposed to the statement of all other writers; and, besides, the passage which contains it is corrupt. (Diog. Laert. ii. 73, 86; Bruckner, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 2, 3.)

ARETES of Dyrachium, an ancient chronographer, some of whose calculations Censorinus (de Die Nat. 18, 21) mentions.

ARISTHAS (Ἀρίσθας). 1. Archbishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia at an uncertain time (A. D. 540, according to Cocius and Cave), appears to have succeeded ANDREAS. He wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse (συναγερτικής ἡμισυναγερτικής τῆς Τιμίας τοῦ Ἀγίου τοῦ Νανονίου καὶ ἀναγερημένον του Ιησοῦ Χριστοῦ), which, as its title implies, was compiled from many previous works, and especially from that of Andreas. It is usually printed with the works of OECUMENIUS.

2. Presbyter of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, wrote a work "on the translation of St. Eulymius, patriarch of Constantinople," who died A. D. 911. The date of Arethus is therefore fixed at 920. (Quintilian, Comment, de Script. Eccles. ii. p. 426, who, without sufficient reason, identifies the former Arethus with this writer.)

3. The author of an epigram "On his own Sister" (τῇ τῆς ἤδιος ἀδελφῇ), which is found in the Vatican MS. under the title of Ἀρέσθα τοῦ διακόνου. (Jacobs, Paralip. ex Cod. Vatic. No 211, in Anthol. Graec. xiii. p. 744.) If the words added in the margin, γεγονότος δὲ καὶ ἀρκοφυλάκων Ασκαλούς Καππαδοίας, may be taken as an authority, he was the same person as the Archbishop of Cæsarea. [P. S.]

ARETHUSA (Ἀρέθουσα), one of the Nereids (Hes. Theog. 397. p. ed. Strozzari; Virgil, Georg. 3, 441), and the nymph of the same name who lived in the island of Ortygia near Syracuse. (Alciphron. Virgil (Eclog. iv. 1, 2) reconciles her among tl ARGAEUS.

Sicilian nymph, and as the divinity who inspired pastoral poetry. The Syracusans represented on many of their coins the head of Arethusa surrounded by dolphins. (Rasche, Lex. Numism. i. 1, p. 107.) One of the Hesperides likewise bore the name of Arethusa. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 11.) [L. S.]

M. ARETHUSIUS ('Aréthuśius'), the author of a confession of faith, promulgated in the third council of Sirmium, A. d. 359, and was subsequently a martyr under Julian. (Socrat. H. E. ii. 30, with Valen's note; Nazianz. Orat. 48; Tillemont, vii. p. 726. [Argaeus ('Argaeus').] Two mythical personages of this name are mentioned in Homer. (II. xvii. 494, 517, and Od. iii. 413.) [L. S.]

A'REUS I. ('Arēus'), succeeded his grandfather, Cleomenes II, as king of Sparta, of the Eurytheidas family, B.C. 309, his father, Acrotatus, having died before him. He reigned 44 years. (Diod. xx. 29.)

In the year 280 B.C., a league of the Greek states was formed, at the instigation of Sparta, acting under the influence of its ally, Ptolemy Cenamus, to free themselves from the dominion of Antigonus Gonatas. The first blow was struck by Arces, who, having obtained a decree of the Amyphantians against the Actolians, because they had cultivated the sacred land of Cirrha, attacked Cirrha unexpectedly, and plundered and burnt the town. His proceedings were viewed by the Actolian shepherds on the mountains, who formed themselves into a body of about 500 men, and attacked the scattered troops of Arces. These, ignorant of the number of their enemies, were struck with a panic and fled, leaving 2000 of their number dead. Thus the expedition turned out fruitless, and the attempts of Sparta to renew the war met with no encouragement from the other states, which suspected that the real design of Sparta was not to liberate Greece, but to obtain the supremacy for herself. (Justin. xxiv. 1: it is scarcely credible that the numbers could be right.)

When Arces was attacked by Pyrrhus, in B.C. 272 [Acrotatus], Arces was absent on an expedition in Crete. He returned straight to Sparta, and formed an alliance with the Argives, the effect of which was, that Pyrrhus drove off his forces from Sparta to attack Argos. (Paus. iii. 6. § 2; Plut. Pyrrh. 26—29.) In the year 267, Arces united with Ptolemy Philadephus in an unsuccessful attempt to save Athens from Antigonus Gonatas. (Paus. iii. 6. § 3; Justin, xxii. 2.) He fell in a battle against the Macedonians at Corinth, in the next year but one, 265 B.C., and was succeeded by his son Acrotatus. (Plut. Agis, 3; Justin, xxvi., Proel.) He was the king of Sparta to whom the Jews sent the embassy mentioned in 1 Macc. xii. 20.

2. Arcus II, a posthumous son of Acrotatus, was born as king probably in 264 A.D., and died at the age of eighty years. He was succeeded by his great uncle, Leonidas II. (Plut. Agis, 3; Paus. iii. 6. § 3.) [P. S.]

AREUS ('Arēus'), a Spartan exile, who was restored to his country with Aelchiades, another exile [see p. 100, a.], about B.C. 184, by the Achaeans, but afterwards went as ambassador to Rome to accuse the Achaeans. (Polyb. xxiii. 11, 12, xxiv. 4; Liv. xxvii. 35; Paus. vii. 9. § 2.)

ARGAEUS ('Argaeus), king of Macedon, was the son and successor of Perdiccas I, who according to Herodotus and Thucydides, was the founder of the dynasty. Thirty-four years are given as the length of his reign by Dexippus (ap. Syncell. p. 494, Didir.), but apparently without any authority. (Herod. viii. 139; Justin, vii. 2.)

There was a pretender to the Macedonian crown of this name, who, with the assistance of the Illyrians, expelled Amyntas II. from his dominions (B.C. 393), and kept possession of the throne for two years. Amyntas then, with the aid of the Thessalians, succeeded in expelling Arcanias and recovering at least a part of his dominions. It is probably the same Arcanus who in B.C. 359 again appears as a pretender to the throne. He had induced the Athenians to support his pretensions, but Philip, who had just succeeded to the regency of the kingdom, by his intrigues and promises induced them to remain inactive. Arcanus upon this collected a body of mercenaries, and being accompanied by some Macedonian exiles and some Athenian troops, who were permitted by their general, Manlius, to join him, he made an attempt upon Aegae, but was repulsed. On his retreat to Methone, he was intercepted by Philip, and defeated. What became of him we are not informed. (Diod. iv. 92, xvi. 2, 3; Dom. c. Aristotele. p. 660; Thrasybul. vol. iv. p. 161.)

ARGAULUS ('Ar'galus), the eldest son of Amyclas, and his successor in the throne of Sparta. (Paus. iii. 1. § 3.)

ARGANTHONE ('Ar'gamtheon'), a fair maiden in Mysis, who used to hunt alone in the forests. Rhesus, attracted by the fame of her beauty, came to her during the chase; he succeeded in winning her love, and married her. After he was slain at Troy by Diomedes, she died of grief. (Parthen. Erotes 36; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Aργαυθών.) [L. S.]

ARGANTHIONUS ('Ar'gamthis'), king of Tarcteeus in Spain, in the sixth century B.C., received in the most friendly manner the Phoenicians who sailed to his city, and gave them money in order that they might fortify their city. He is said to have reigned 80 years, and to have lived 120. (Herod. i. 163; Strab. iii. p. 151; Lucian, Macrob. 10; Cic. de Senect. 19; Plin. H. N. vii. 48; Val. Max. viii. 13, ext. 4.)

ARGAS ('Ar'ga)', is described as άνυμος ποιητής και αργαλέων ποιητής. (Plut. Dem. 4; Athen. xiv. p. 638, e. d., comp. iv. p. 131, b.)

ARGELA ('Argela'). 1. A surname of Hera, derived from Argos, the principal seat of her worship. (Paus. iii. 13. § 6.)

2. Argela also occurs as the name of several mythical personages, as—A, the wife of Naiads and mother of Io. (Hygin. Fab. 145; comp. Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) A, the wife of Polymius, was mother of Argos, the builder of the ship Argo. (Hygin. Fab. 14.) A daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea, and wife of Polynoeises. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13, iii. 6. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 72.) A daughter of Autesion and wife of Aristodemus, the Hermicus, by whom she became the mother of Eurythanes and Procles. (Herod. vi. 52; Paus. iv. 3. § 8; Apollod. ii. 7. § 2.)

ARGEIPHONTES ('Ar'geipontes'), a surname of Hermes, by which he is designated as the murderer of Argos Panoptes. (Hom. II. 110, and numerous other passages in the Greek and Latin poets.) [L. S.]

ARGEUS ('Argæus'), was one of the Elean deputees sent to Pherai to co-operate with Pelopidae.
ARGONAUTAE.

(7. c. 367.) in counteracting Spartan negotiation and attacking Aetolians to the Thessalian cause. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 83.) He is associated by Xenophon (Hipp. hell. iv. 2. § 15), in his account of the war between the Arcadians and Eleans (N. c. 365), as one of the leaders of the democratic party at Elis. (Comp. Diad. xiv. 77.) [F. E.]

ARGELUS, wrote a work on the Ionic temple of Aegeus, of which he was said to have been the architect. He also wrote on the proportions of the Corinthian order (de Symmetria Corinthi). His time is unknown. (Vitruv. vii. praef. § 12.) [P. S.]

ARGENNIS (Apolleris), a surname of Aphroditis, which she derived from Argennus, a favourite of Argemnion, after whose death, in the river Cephissus, Argemnion built a sanctuary of Aphroditis Argenniatis. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Apolleris; Athen. xiii. p. 608.) [L. E.]

M. ARGENTARIUS, the author of about thirty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, most of which are erotic, and some are plays on words. We may infer from his style that he did not live before the time of the Roman empire, but nothing more is known of his age. (Jacob. Antid. Graec. xiii. pp. 860, 361.) [P. S.]

ARGES. [Cyclopae.] Argileonis (Apgylados), mother of Brasidas. When the ambassadors from Amphipolis brought the news of her death, she asked if he had behaved bravely; and on their speaking of him in reply as the best of the Spartans, answered, that the strangers were in error; Brasidas was a brave man, but there were many better in Sparta. The answer became famous, and Argileonis is said to have been rewarded for it by the einphors. (Philt. Lyc. 25. Apoll. Loc.) [A. H. C.]

ARGIOPH (Apglidas), a nymph by whom Philammon begot the celebrated bard, Thamyris. She lived at first on mount Parnassus, but when Philammon refused to take her into his house as his wife, she left Parnassus and went to the country of the Odryssians in Thrace. (Apollod. i. 3. § 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 4.) Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Dion. iv. 33; and Hygin. Fab. 170. [L. S.]

ARGIUS, a sculptor, was the disciple of Polykleitos, and therefore flourished about 300 B.C. (Plin. xxiv. 15.) Thiersch (Epoc. 275) says that Pliny, in the words "Argius, Apo- doros, mis-translated his Greek authority, which had \"Argius, Apglidos, \" Aspadoros, the Argive."

But Argius is found as a Greek proper name in both the forms, Apoglossos and Apoglossos. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Aristoph. Eccles. 201.) [P. S.]

ARGO. [ARGONAUTAE.]

ARGONAUTAE (Apgonaitai), the heroes and demigods who, according to the traditions of the Greeks, undertook the first bold maritime expedition of the Colchis, a far distant country on the coast of the Euxine, for the purpose of fetching the golden fleece. They derived their name from the ship Argo, in which the voyage was made, and which was constructed by Argus at the command of Jason, the leader of the Argonauts. The time which the Greek traditions assign to this enterprise is about one generation before the Trojan war. The story of the expedition seems to have been known to the author of the Odyssey (xii. 69, &c.), who states, that the ship Argo was the only one that ever passed between the whirling rocks (πέτραι πληαγητες). Jason is mentioned several times in the Iliad (vii. 467, &c., xx. 40, xiii. 748, &c.), but not as the leader of the Argonauts. (Jason. Heilol. Thes. 392, &c.) relates the story of Jason saying that he fetched Medea at the command of his uncle Pelias, and that she bore him a son, Medea, who was educated by Cheiron. The first trace of the common tradition that Jason was sent to fetch the golden fleece from Aea, the city of Aetes, in the eastern boundaries of the earth, occurs in Minnemus (ap. Strab. i. p. 46, &c.), a contemporary of Solon; but the most ancient detailed account of the expedition of the Argonauts which is extant, is that of Pindar. (Pyth. iv.) Pelias, who had usurped the throne of Iolcos, and expelled Jason, the father of Jason, had received an oracle that he was to be on his guard against the man who should come to him with only one sandal. When Jason had grown up, he came to Iolcos to demand the succession to the throne of his father. On his way thither, he had lost one of his sandals in crossing the river Aenurus. Pelias recognised the man indicated by the oracle, but concealed his fear, hoping to destroy him in some way; and when Jason claimed the throne of his ancestors, Pelias declared himself ready to yield; but as Jason was blooming in youthful vigour, Pelias entrusted him to propitiate the mares of Phrixos by going to Colchis and fetching the golden fleece. (Phrixos; Helle.) Jason accepted the proposal, and heralds were sent to all parts of Greece to invite the heroes to join him in the expedition. When all were assembled at Iolcos, they set out on their voyage, and a south wind carried them to the mouth of the Aerusus (subsequently Euxinus Pontus), where they built a temple to Poseidon, and implored his protection against the danger of the whirling rocks. The ship then sailed to the eastern coast of the Euxine and ran up the river Phasis, in the country of Aetes, and the Argonauts had to fight against the dark-eyed Colchians. Aphroditis inspired Medea, the daughter of Aetes, with love for Jason, and made her forget the esteem and affection she owed to her parent. She was in possession of magic powers, and taught Jason how to avert the dangers which her father might prepare for him, and gave him remedies with which he was to heal his wounds. Aetes promised to give up the fleece to Jason on condition of his doing a piece of hard work with his dauntless plough drawn by fire-breathing oxen. Jason was daily cutting the roots of the plough, following the advice of Medea, he remained unhurt by the fire of the oxen, and accomplished what had been demanded of him. The golden fleece, which Jason himself had to fetch, was hung up in a thicket, and guarded by a fearful dragon, thicker and longer than the ship of the Argonauts. Jason succeeded by a stratagem in slaying the dragon, and on his return he secretly carried away Medea with him. They sailed home by the Erythrean sea, and arrived in Lemnos. In this account of Pindar, all the Argonauts are thrown into the background, and Jason alone appears as the acting hero. The brief description of their return through the Erythrean sea is difficult to understand. Pindar, as the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 259) remarks, like some other poets, makes the Argonauts return through the ocean to Oceanus, which it must be supposed that they entered through the river Phasis; so that they sailed from the Euxine through the river Phasis into the eastern ocean, and then round Asia to the southern coast of Libya. Here the Argonauts landed, and carried their ship through Libya on their shoulders until they came to the lake of Triton, through which they sailed northward into the Mediterranean, and steered towards Lemnos and Ioleus. The Erythrean sea in this account is the eastern ocean. There is scarcely any other adventure in the ancient stories of Greece the detail of which has been so differently related by poets of all kinds. The most striking differences are those relative to the countries or seas through which the Argonauts returned home. As it was in most cases the object of the poets to make them return through some unknown country, it was necessary, in later times, to shift their road, accordingly as geographical knowledge became more and more extended. While thus Pindar makes them return through the eastern ocean, others, such as Apollonius Rhodius and Apollodorus, make them sail from the Euxine into the river Ister and Braidan into the western ocean, or the Adriatic; and others, again, such as the Pseudo-Orpheus, Timaeus, and Syennus of Chios, represent them as sailing through the river Tanis into the northern ocean, and round the northern countries of Europe. A fourth set of traditions, which was adopted by Herodotus, Callimachus, and Diodorus Siculus, made them return by the same way as they had sailed to Colchis.

All traditions, however, agree in stating, that the object of the Argonauts was to fetch the golden fleece which was kept in the country of Aetes. This fleece was regarded as golden as early as the time of Homoi and Pherecydes (Eratost. Catell. 19), but in the extant works of Homoi there is no trace of this tradition, and Mimnermus only calls it "a large fleece in the town of Aetes, where the rays of Helios rest in a golden chamber." Simonides and Aeacius described it as of purple colour. (Schol. ad Eurip. Alcd. 5, ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1147.) If, therefore, the tradition in this form had any historical foundation at all, it would seem to suggest, that a trade in furs with the countries north and east of the Euxine was carried on by the Minyans in and about Ioleus at a very early time, and that some bold mercantile enterprise to those countries gave rise to the story about the Argonauts. In later traditions, this enterprise is very much like the golden fleece, and the audacious ram who wore it is designated by the name of Chrysomallus, and called a son of Poseidon and Thea, the daughter of Brisates in the island of Cnemiuss. (Hyg. Fab. 188.) Strabo (vi. p. 499; comp. Appian, de Bell. Mithrid. 103) endeavours to explain the story about the golden fleece from the Celts' collecting by means of skins the gold sand which was carried down in their rivers from the mountains.

The ship Argo is described as a pentecontore, that is, a ship with fifty oars, and is said to have conveyed the same number of heroes. The School of Lyceon (173) is the only writer who states the number of the heroes, to have been one hundred. But the names of the fifty heroes are not the same in all the lists of the Argonauts, and it is a useless task to attempt to reconcile them. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Hyg. Fab. 14, with the commentators; compare the catalogue of the Argonauts in Burkmann's edition of Val. Flaccus.) month of the river Phasis. The Colchian king Aetes promised to give up the golden fleece, if Jason alone would yoke to a plough two fire-breathing oxen with brazen feet, and sow the teeth of the dragon which guarded the fleece, by Cadmus at Thebes, and which he received from Athena. The love of Medea furnished Jason with means to resist fire and steel, on condition of his taking her as his wife; and she taught him how he was to create feuds among and kill the warriors that were to spring up from the teeth of the dragon. While Jason was engaged upon his task, Aetes formed plans for burning the ship Argo and for killing all the Greek heroes. But Medea's magic powers sent to sleep the dragon which guarded the golden fleece; and after Jason had taken possession of the treasure, he and his Argonauts, together with Medea and her young brother Absyrtus, embarked by night and sailed away. Aetes pursued them, but before he overtook them, Medea murdered her brother, cut him into pieces, and threw his limbs overboard, that her father might be detained in his pursuit by collecting the limbs of his child. Aetes at last returned home, but sent out a great number of Colchians, threatening them with the punishment intended for Medea, if they returned without her. While the Colchians were dispersed in all directions, the Argonauts had already reached the mouth of the river Eridanus. But Zeus, in his anger at the murder of Absyrtus, raised a storm which cast the ship from its road. When driven on the Abysynthian islands, the ship began to speak, and declared that the anger of Zeus would not cease, unless they sailed towards Ausonia, and got purified by Circe. They now sailed along the coasts of the Ligurians and Celts, and through the sea of Sardinia, and continuing their course along the coast of Tyrrhenia, they arrived in the island of Aeae, where Circe purified them. When they were passing by the Sirens, Orpheus sang to prevent the Argonauts being allured by them. Butes, however, swam to them, but Aphrodite carried him to Lilybaeum. Thesis and the Nereids conducted them through Scylla and Charybdis and between the whirling rocks (πέτραι παραγωγητα); and sailing by the Triphacian island with its oxen of Helios, they came to the Phaeacian island of Coreya, where they were received by Alcinos. In the meantime, some of the Colchians, not being able to discover the Argonauts, had settled at the foot of the Colchian mountains; others occupied the Abysynthian islands near the coast of Illyricum; and a third band overtook the Argonauts in the island of the Phaeacians. But as their hopes of recovering Medea were deceived by Aetes, the queen of Alcinos, they settled in the island, and the Argonauts continued their voyage. [Alicinoi.] During the night, they were overtaken by a storm; but Apollo sent brilliant flashes of lightning which enabled them to discover a neighbouring island, which they called Anaphi. Here they erected an altar to Apollo, and solemn rites were instituted, which continued to be observed down to very late times. Their attempt to land in Crete was prevented by Calabos, who harboured the island, but was killed by the artifices of Medea. From Crete they sailed to Aegina, and from thence between Rhoda and Locri to Iolcos. Respecting the events subsequent to their arrival in Iolcos, see AESON, MEDEA, JASON, PELIAS. (Compare Schoenemann, de Geographic Argo. Argonautarum, Got- tingen, 1789; Ubert, Geog. der Griech. u. Rom. 1. 2, p. 320, &c.; Müller, Orchoom. pp. 164, &c., 297, &c.) The story of the Argonauts probably arose out of accounts of commercial enterprises which the wealthy Minyans made to the coast of the Euxine. [L. S.]

ARGUS (Ἀργός). 1. The third king of Argos, was a son of Zeus and Niobe. (Apollo, ii. 1. § 1, &c.; Schol. ad Hom. Ill. i. 115) calls him a son of Apis, whom he succeeded in the kingdom of Argos. It is from this Argus that the country afterwards called Argolis and all Peloponnesus derived the name of Argos. (Hygin. Fab. 145; Paus. ii. 16, § 1, 22, § 6, 34, § 6.) By Eue- adne, or according to others, by Peitho, he became the father of Jesus, Pelanthus or Petras, Epip- daurus, Criasus, and Tiryns. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1151, 1147; ad Eurip. Orest, 1252, 1248, 530.)

2. Surnamed Panoptes. His parentage is stated differently, and his father is called Agenor, Are- sor, Inachus, or Argus, whereas some accounts described him as an Autochthon. (Apollo, ii. 1, &c.; Ov. Met. i. 264.) He derived his surname, Panoptes, the all-seeing, from his possessing a hundred eyes, some of which were always awake. He was of superhuman strength, and after he had slain a fierce bull which ravaged Arcadia, a Satyr who robbed and violated persons, the serpent Echidna, which rendered the roads unsafe, and the murderers of Apis, who was according to some ac- counts his father, Hera appointed him guardian of the cow into which Io had been metamorphosed. (Camp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1151, 1213.) Zeus commissioned Hermes to carry off the cow, and Hera accordingly had the task, and sent some accounts, by sowing Argus to death, or according to others, by sending him to sleep by the sweetness of his play on the flute and then cutting off his head. Hera transplanted his eyes to the tail of the peacock, her favourite bird. (Aeschyl. Prom.; Apollon. Od. II. 26.)

3. The builder of the Argo, the ship of the Argo- nauts, was according to Apollodorus (ii. 9. §§ 1, 16), a son of Phrixus. Apollonius Rhodius (f. 112) calls him a son of Arestor, and others a son of Hestor or Polybus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. I. 4, ad Lyce. p. 88; Hygin. Fab. 14; Val. Flacc. i. 39, who calls him a Thebans.) Argus, the son of Phrixus, was sent by Aetes, his grandfather, after the death of Phrixus, to take possession of his independ- ence in Greece. On his voyage thither he suffered shipwreck, was found by Jason in the island of Aretas, and carried back to Colchis. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1095, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 21.) Hyginus (Fab. 8) relates that after the death of Phrixus, Argus intended to flee with his brothers to Athamas. [L. S.]

ARGYRA (Ἀργυρα), the nymph of a well in Achaea, was in love with a beautiful shepherd-boy, Selemon, and visited him frequently, but when his youthful beauty vanished, she forsaken him. The boy now pined away with grief, and Aphro- dite, moved to pity, changed him into the river Selemon. There was a popular belief in Achaea, that if an unhappy lover bathed in the waters of this river, he would forget the grief of his love. (Paus. vii. 23, § 2.)

ARGYRUS, ISAAC, a Greek monk, who lived about the year A. D. 1873. He is the author of a considerable number of works, but only one of them has yet been published, viz. a work upon the method of finding the time when Easter should be celebrated (μετέρατος μέτρον), which he dedicated to Andronicus, praetor of the town of Aenus in Thessaly. It was first edited, with a Latin translation and notes, by J. Christmann, at Heidelberg, 1611, 4to, and was afterwards insistiated by Petavius in his "Uranologium" (Paris, 1630, fol., and Antwerp, 1703, fol.), with a new Latin translation and notes; but the last chapter of the work, which is contained in Christmann's edition and had been published before by Jow. Scaliger, is wanting in the "Uranologium." Petavius inserted in his "Uranologium" also a second "canon paschalis" (iii. p. 584) which ascribes to Argyrus, but without having any authority for it. There exist in various European libraries, in MS., several works of Argyrus, which have not yet been printed. (Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. xi. p. 126, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. Appendiv. p. 63, ed. London.) [L. S.]

ARIABIGNES (Ἀριαβιγνη), the son of Dareius, and one of the commanders of the fleet of his brother Xerxes, fell in the battle of Salamis, B. C. 480. (Herod. vii. 97, viii. 89.) Plutarch calls him (Them. c. 14) Ariameses, and speaks of him as a brave man and the justest of the brothers of Xerxes. The same writer relates (de Flor. Am. p. 448; comp. Apophth. p. 175), that this Ariameses (called by Justin, ii. 10, Artumeses) laid claim to the throne on the death of Dareius, as the eldest of his sons, but was opposed by Xerxes, who maintained that he had a right to the crown as the eldest of the sons born after Dareius had become king. The Persians appointed Artabazus to the government; and upon his resigning in favour of Xerxes, Artabazus immediately submitted his brother as king, and was treated by him with great respect. According to Herodotus (vii. 2), who calls the eldest son of Dareius, Artabazus, this dispute took place in the life-time of Dareius.

ARIADNE (Ἀριάδνη), a daughter of Minos and Pasiphae or Creta. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2.) When Theseus was sent by his father to convey the tribute of the Athenians to Minotaur, Ariadne fell in love with him, and gave him the string by means of which he found his way out of the Labyrinth, and which herself had received from Theseus. Theseus in return promised to marry her (Plut. These. 19; Hygin. Fab. 42; Diod. vii. 63; Ov. Art. xii. 260), and she accordingly left Crete with him; but when they arrived in the island of Dia (Naxos), she was killed there by Artemis. (Hom. Od. x. 324.) The words added in the Odyssey, διονυσοι μάρτυρες, are difficult to understand, unless we interpret them with Pherecydes by "on the denunciation of Dionysus," because he was indignant at the profanation of his grotto by the love of Theseus and Ariadne. In this case Ariadne was probably killed by Artemis at the moment she gave birth to her twin children, for she is said to have had two sons by Theseus, Oenopion and Staphylos. The more common tradition, however, was that Theseus left Ariadne in Naxos alive; but here the statements again differ, for some relate that he was forced by Dionysus to leave her (Diod. iv. 61, v. 51; Paus. i. 20. § 2, ix. 40. § 2, x. 29. § 2), and that in his grief he forgot to take down the black sail, which occasioned the death of his father. According to others, Theseus faithlessly fosook her in the island, and different motives are given for this act of faithlessness.

(Plut. These. 20; Ov. Met. viii. 175, Herod. 10; Hygin. Fab. 42.) According to this tradition, Ariadne put an end to her own life in despair, or was saved by Dionysus, who in amazement at her beauty made her his wife, raised her among the immortals, and placed the crown which he gave her at his marriage with her, among the stars. (Herod. Theog. 949; Ov. Met. b. c.; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 5.) The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iii. 996) makes Ariadne become by Dionysus the mother of Oenopion, These, Staphylus, Latromius, Bnaunthes, and Tanropolis. There are several circumstances in the story of Ariadne which offered the happiest subjects for works of art, and some of the finest ancient works, on gems as well as paintings, are still extant, of which Ariadne is the subject. (Lippert, Dacieroth. ii. 51, l. 393, 398; Malet, Gen. Ant. iii. 33; Pliotre d'Ercolano, ii. tab. 14; Bellori, Arch. Rom. An. Vest. tab. 40; Böttiger, Archæol. Mus. part. 1.)

ARIAETHUS (Ἀριάθεος), of Tegen, the author of a work on the early history of Arcadia. (Hygin. Poët. Astr. ii. 1.; Dionys. i. 49, where 'Ἀριάθης is the right reading.)

ARIAEUS (Ἀριάες), or ARIDAEUS (Ἀρίδαιος), the friend and lieutenant of Cyrus, commanded the barbarians in that prince's army at the battle of Cunaxa, B. C. 401. (Xen. Anab. i. 8. § 5; Diod. iv. 22; comp. Plut. Ariss. c. 11.) After the death of Cyrus, the Cyrenaean Greeks offered to place Arias on the Persian throne; but he declined making the attempt, on the ground that there were many Persians superior to himself, who would never tolerate him as king. (Ariss. c. 1. § 4. 2. § 1.) He exchanged oaths of fidelity, however, with the Greeks, and, at the commencement of their retreat, marched in company with them; but soon afterwards he purchased his pardon from Xerxes by deserting them, and aiding (possibly through the help of his friend Memnon) the treachery of Tissaphernes, whereby the principal Greek generals fell into the hands of the Persians. (Anab. ii. 2. § 8, &c. 4. §§ 1, 2, 9, 5. §§ 28, 38, &c.; comp. Plut. Ariss. c. 18.) It was perhaps this same Arias who was employed by Tissaphernes to put Tissaphernes to death in accordance with the king's order, B. C. 386. (Polyen. vii. 10; Diod. xiv. 90; Wess. und Palm. ad loc.; comp. Xen. Hell. iii. 1. § 75.) In the first year, B. C. 385, we again hear of Arias as having revolted from Xerxes, and receiving Spiihtideanes and the Papilagons after their desertion of the Spartan service. (Xen. Hell. iv. 1. § 37; Plut. Ages. c. 11.) [L. E.]

ARIAMENES. [ARIABIGNES.]

ARIAMNES (Ἀριαμνήν). 1. King, or more properly strapar, of Cappadocia, the son of Damaces, and father of Ariarhanth I., reigned 50 years. (Diod. xxxi. 6. 3.)

II. King of Cappadocia, succeeded his father Ariarhanth II. He was very fond of his children, and shared his crown with his son Ariarhanth III. in his life-time. (Diod. vii. 2.)

ARIAMNES. [ARIABIGNES, No. 1.]

ARIANTAS (Ἀριαντᾶς), a king of the Scythians, who, in order to learn the population of his people, commanded every Scythian to bring him an arrow-head. With these arrow-heads he made a brazen or copper vessel, which was set up in a place called Exampus, between the rivers Borystheus and Hypanis. (Herod. iv. 81.)
ARIA RATHES.

ARIAIUS (Ἀριάτεις), a friend of Dositheus, was employed by him to betray Achæmenes to Antiochus I the Great, b. c. 214. (Polyb. viii. 18, &c.) [See p. 8, a.]

ARIAPIETES (Ἀριάπητες), a king of the Seythians, the father of Scylax, was treacherously killed by Spargapetes, the king of the Agathæri. Ariaipetes was a contemporary of Herodotus, for he tells us that he had from Timnus, the guardian of Ariaipetes, an account of the family of Anacharsis. (Herod. iv. 76, 78.)

ARIAI RATHES (Ἀριαράθεις). There are a great many Persian names beginning with Aria—, Arió—, and Ari—, which all contain the root Ar, which is seen in Ariaei, the ancient national name of the Persians (Herod. vii. 61), and of Aras or Arasoi, likewise an ancient designation of the inhabitants of the table land of Persia. (Herod. iii. 93, vii. 62.) Dr. Rosen, to whom we are indebted for these remarks, (in Quarterly Journal of Education, vol. ix. p. 336,) also observes that the name Aris is the same with the Sanscrit word Aris, by which in the writings of the Hindus the followers of the Brahmanical law are designated. He shews that Aris signifies in Sanscrit “honourable, entitled to respect,” and Aris, in all probability, “honoured, respected.” In Aria-rathes, the latter part of the word apparently is the same as the Zend rau, “great, master” (Bopp, Vergleichende Grammatik, p. 190), and the name would therefore signify “an honourable master.” (Comp. Pott, Ephylogiesa Forschungen, p. xxxvi. 1.)

Ariarathes was the name of several kings of Cappadocia, who traced their origin to Amphas, one of the seven Persian chieftain who slew the Magi. [ANAPHAS.]

I. The son of Ariamnes I., was distinguished for his love of his brother Holophernes, whom he sent to assist Ochus in the recovery of Egypt, b. c. 385. After the death of Alexander, Perdiccas appointed Eumenes governor of Cappadocia; but upon Ariarathes refusing to submit to Eumenes, Perdiccas made war upon him. Ariarathes was defeated, taken prisoner, and crucified, together with many of his relations, b. c. 322. Eumenes then obtained possession of Cappadocia. Ariarathes was 82 years of age at the time of his death: he had adopted as his son, Ariarathes, the eldest son of his brother Holophernes. (Diod. xxxi. Ec. 3, where it is stated that he fell in battle; Diod. xviii. 16; Arrian, ap. Phot. Cod. 92, p. 69, b. 26, ed. Bekker; Appian, Mithr. 8; Lucian, Macrob. 13; Plut. Eumenes. 3; Justin, xiii. 6, whose account is quite erroneous.)

II. Son of Holophernes, fled into Armenia after the death of Ariarathes I. After the death of Eumenes, b. c. 315, he recovered Cappadocia with the assistance of Ardothes, the Armenian king, and killed Amyntas, the Macedonian governor. He was succeeded by Ariamnes II., the eldest of his three sons. (Diod. xxxi. Ec. 5.)

III. Son of Ariamnes II., and grandson of the preceding, married Stratonice, a daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria, and obtained a share in the government during the lifetime of his father. (Diod. l. c.)

IV. Son of the preceding, was a child at his accession, and reigned b. c. 220—163, about 57 years. (Diod. l. c.; Justin, xxix. 1; Polyb. iv. 2.) He married Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus III., king of Syria, and, in consequence of this alliance, assisted Antiochus in his war against the Romans. After the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans, b. c. 190, Ariarathes sued for peace in 188, which he obtained on favourable terms, as his daughter was about that time betrothed to Eumenes, the ally of the Romans. In b. c. 183—179, he assisted Eumenes in his war against Pharnaces. Polybius mentions that a Roman embassy was sent to Ariarathes after the death of Antiochus IV., who died b. c. 164. Antiochis, the wife of Ariarathes, at first bore him no children, and accordingly introduced two supposititious ones, who were called Ariarathes and Holophernes. Subsequently, however, she bore her husband two daughters and a son, Mithridates, afterwards Ariamnes V., and then informed Ariarathes of the deeds she had practised upon him. The other two were in consequence sent away from Cappadocia, one to Rome, the other to Ionia. (Liv. xxxvii. 31, xxxviii. 38, 39; Polyb. xxii. 24, xxv. 2, 4, xxvi. 6, xxxii. 12, 13; Appian, Syr. 5, 32, 42; Diod. l. c.)

V. Son of the preceding, previously called Mithridates, reigned 33 years, b. c. 163—130. He was summoned Philopator, and was distinguished by the excellence of his character and his cultivation of philosophy and the liberal arts. According to Livy (xiii. 19), he was educated at Rome; but this account may perhaps refer to the other Ariarathes, one of the supposititious sons of the late king. In consequence of rejecting, at the wish of the Romans, a marriage with the sister of Demetrius Soter, the latter made war upon him, and brought forward Holophernes, one of the supposititious sons of the late king, as a claimant of the throne. Ariarathes was deprived of his kingdom, and fled to Rome about b. c. 158. He was restored by the Romans, who, however, appear to have allowed Holophernes to reign jointly with him, as is expressly stated by Appian (Syri. 47), and implied by Polybius (xxxvii. 20). The joint government, however, did not last long; for we find Ariarathes shortly afterwards named as sole king. In b. c. 154, Ariarathes assisted Attalus in his war against Prusias, and sent his son Demetrius in command of his forces. He fell in b. c. 130, in the war of the Romans against Aristonicus of Pergamus. In return for the succours which he had brought the Romans on that occasion, Lycus and Cilicia were added to the dominions of his family. By his wife Lampasis he had six children; but they were all, with the exception of the youngest, killed by their mother, that she might obtain the government of the kingdom. After she had been put to death by the people on account of her cruelty, her youngest son succeeded to the crown. (Diod. l. c., Exc. xxiv. p. 628, ed. Woss.; Polyb. iii. 8, xxvi. 20, 29, xxxii. 12; Justin, xxxvi. 1, xxxvii. 1.)

VI. The youngest son of the preceding, reigned about 34 years, B.C. 130–96. He was a child at his succession. He married Laodice, the sister of Mithridates Eupator, king of Pontus, and was put to death by Mithridates by means of Gordius. (Justin, xxxvii. 1, xxxviii. 1; Mommsen, op. Phot. Cod. 224, p. 230, a. 41, ed. Bulker.) On his death the kingdom was seized by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who married Laodice, the widow of the late king. But Nicomedes was soon expelled by Mithridates, who placed upon the throne, ARIANUS. The four coins that have been given above, have been placed under those kings to whom they are usually assigned; but it is quite uncertain to whom they really belong. The coins of these kings bear only three surnames, EYZEBOTY, EYMANNOS, and EYGMHTOPOZ. On the reverse of all, Pallas is represented. (Echhii, i. p. 198.)

ARIASPES ('Arapòs), called by Justin (x. 1) Ariasses, one of the three legitimate sons of Artesxes Maurus, was, after the death of his eldest brother Daresius, driven to commit suicide by the intrigues of his other brother, Ochus. (Plut. Artax. c. 30.)

ARIAEAUS ('Arìaës), the king of the Captodocians, was slain by the Hyrcanians, in the time of the elder Cyrus, according to Xenophon's Cyropaedia. (b. i. 8, iv. 2 § 31.)

ARIGYNNA (Arigynna), a surname of Artemis, derived from the town of Aricia in Latium, where she was worshipped. A tradition of that place related that Hippolytus, after being restored to life by Asclepius, came to Italy, ruled over Aricia, and dedicated a grove to Artemis. (Paus. ii. 27. § 4.) This goddess was believed to be the mother of Artemis, and her statue at Aricia was considered to be the same as the one which Orcestes had brought with him from Tauris. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116; Stumb. v. p. 239; Hygin. Fab. 261.) According to Strabo, the priest of the Arician Artemis was always a run-away slave, who obtained his office in the following manner:—The sacred grove of Artemis contained one tree from which it was not allowed to break off a branch; but if a slave succeeded in effecting it, the priest was obliged to fight with him, and if he was conquered and killed, the victorious slave became his successor, and might in his turn be killed by another slave, who then succeeded him. Suetonius (Cato. 39) calls the priest rex sacrae sentios. Ovid (Fast. iii. 260, 64c), Suetonius, and Pausanias, speak of contest of slaves in the grove at Aricia, which seem to refer to the frequent fights between the priest and a slave who tried to obtain his office. [L. S.]

ARICDAEUS. [ARIAEAUS; ARIRHAEUS.]

ARIDOULIS ('Arìoulòs), tyrant of Alabanda in Caria, accompanied Xerxes in his expedition against Greece, and was taken by the Greeks off Artemisium, B.C. 480, and sent to the isthmus of Corinth in chains. (Herod. vii. 195.)

ARIGNOTE ('Arignote), of Samos, a female Pythagorean philosopher, is sometimes described as a daughter, at other times merely as a disciple of Pythagoras and Theano. She wrote epigrams and several works upon the worship and mysteries of Dionysus. (Suidas, c. a. 'Arignote, Theana, Pseudo.; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 552, d., Paris, 1629; Harcourt, s. v. Aroön.)

ARIGNOTUS ('Arignoteos), a Pythagorean in the time of Lucian, was renowned for his wisdom.
and had the surname of Ipom. (Lucian, Philoep. loc. c. 29, &c.)

ARIMAZES (Ἀριμαζῆς), a chief who had possession, in b. c. 328, of a very strong fortress in Sogdiana, usually called the Rock, which Droysen identifies with a place called Kohlon, situated near the pass of Kolgo or Derbend. Arimazes at first refused to surrender the place to Alexander, but afterwards yielded when some of the Macedonians had climbed to the summit. In this fortress Alexander found Roxana, the daughter of the Bactrian chief, Oxyartes, whom he made his wife. Curtius (vii. 11) relates, that Alexander crucified Arimazes and the leading man who were taken; but this is not mentioned by Arrian (iv. 19) or Polyænus (iv. 3. 329), and is improbable. (Comp. Strab. vi. p. 517.)

ARIMNESTUS (Ἀρίμνης), the commander of the Phoenicians at the battles of Marathon and Plataea. (Paus. ix. 4. 11; 1 Herod. ix. 72; Plut. Arr. c. 11.) The Spartan who killed Mardonius is called by Plutarch Arimnestus, but by Herodotus Acimnestus. [ARIMNESTUS.]

ARIOPARZANES (Ἀριόπαρζανης). 1. The name of three kings or satraps of Pontus.

W. was betrayed by his son Mithridates to the Persian king. (Xen. Cyrop. viii. 8. 4; Aristot. Politi. vi. 8. § 15, ed. Schmied.) It is doubtful whether this Ariobarzanes is the same who conducted the Athenian ambassadors, in b. c. 405, to the sea-coast of Mysia, after they had been detained three years by order of Cyrus (Xen. Hell. i. 4. § 7), or the same who assisted Antalcidas in b. c. 386. (Id. i. 1. § 28.)

II. Succeeded his father, Mithridates I., and reigned 26 years, b. c. 358—337. (Diod. xvi. 90.) He appears to have held some high office in the Persian court five years before the death of his father, as we find him, apparently on behalf of the king, sending an embassy to Greece in b. c. 368. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. § 27.) Ariobarzanes, who is called by Diodorus (xv. 96) satrap of Phrygia, and by Nepos (Diat. c. 2) satrap of Lydia, Ionia, and Phrygia, revolted from Artaxerxes in b. c. 362, and may be regarded as the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus. Demosthenes, in b. c. 352, speaks of Ariobarzanes and his three sons having been lately made Athenian citizens. (In Aristocrat. pp. 66b, 667.) He mentions him again (pro Rhaed. p. 193) in the following year, b. c. 351, and says, that the Athenians had sent Timotheus to his assistance; but that when the Athenian general saw that Ariobarzanes was in open revolt against the king, he refused to assist him.

III. The son of Mithridates III., began to reign b. c. 269 and died about b. c. 240. He obtained possession of the city of Amasia, which was surrendered to him. (Mommsen, cc. 16, 24, ed. Orelli.) Ariobarzanes and his father, Mithridates, sought the assistance of the Gauls, who had come into Asia twelve years before the death of Mithridates, to expel the Egyptians sent by Ptolemy. (Appoll. ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀριόπαρζανης.) Ariobarzanes was succeeded by Mithridates IV.

2. The satrap of Persis, fled after the battle of Gaugamela, b. c. 331, to secure the Persian Gates, a pass which Alexander had to cross in his march to Persepolis. Alexander was at first unable to force the pass; but some prisoners, or, according to other accounts, a Lycian, having acquainted him with a way over the mountains, he was enabled to gain the heights above the Persian camp. The Persians then took to flight, and Ariobarzanes escaped with a few horsemen to the mountains. (Arr. hist. i. 18; Diod. xvii. 68; Curt. v. 3, 4.)

3. The name of three kings of Cappadocia. Clinton (P. H. iii. p. 436) makes only two of this name, but inscriptions and coins seem to prove that there were three.

I. Surnamed Philoramenes (Φιλοράμανης) on coins (b. c. 93—68), was elected king by the Cappadocians, under the direction of the Romans, about b. c. 93. (Justin, xxxviii. 2; Strab. xii. p. 540; Appian, Mithr. 10.) He was several times expelled from his kingdom by Mithridates, and as often restored by the Romans. He seems to have been driven out of his kingdom immediately after his accession, as we find that he was restored by Sulla in b. c. 92. (Plut. Sulla, 5; Liv. Epit. 70; Appian, Mithr. 57.) He was a second time expelled about b. c. 90, and fled to Rome. He was then restored by M. Aquillius, about b. c. 89 (Appian, Mithr. 10; Justin, xxxviii. 3), but was expelled a third time in b. c. 88. In this year war was declared between the Romans and Mithridates; and Ariobarzanes was deprived of his kingdom till the peace in b. c. 84, when he again obtained it from Sulla, and was established in it by Curio. (Plut. Sulla, 22, 24; Dion Cass. Freqm. 175, ed. Reim.; Appian, Mithr. 60.) Ariobarzanes appears to have retained possession of Cappadocia, though frequently harassed by Mithridates, till b. c. 66, when Mithridates seized it after the departure of Lucullus and before the arrival of Pompey. (Cic. pro Log. Man. 2, 5.) He was, however, restored by Pompey, who also increased his dominions. Soon after this, probably about b. c. 55, he resigned the kingdom to his son. (Appian, Mithr. 105, 114; B. C. 103; Val. Max. v. 7. § 2.) We learn from a Greek inscription quoted by Echel (iii. p. 159), that the name of his wife was Athenis, and that their son was Philopator. The inscription on the coin from which the annexed drawing was made, is indistinct and partly effaced: it should be ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΡΙΟΠΑΡΖΑΝΟΤ ΦΙΛΟΡΑΜΑΙΟΤ. Pallas is represented holding a small statue of Victory in her right hand.

II. Surnamed Philopator (Φιλοπάτωρ), according to coins, succeeded his father b. c. 63. The time of his death is not known; but it must have been previous to b. c. 51, in which year his son was reigning. He appears to have been assassinated, as Cicero (ad Fam. xv. 2) reminds the son of the fate of his father. Cicero also mentions this Ariobarzanes in one of his orations. (De Prov. Cons. 4.) It appears, from an inscription, that his wife, as well as his father's, was named Athenis.

III. Surnamed Eusebes and Philoramæns (Εὐσέβης καί Φιλοράμανης), according to Cicero (ad Fam. xv. 2) and coins, succeeded his father not long before b. c. 51. (Cic. l.c.) While Cicero was in Cilicia, he protected Ariobarzanes from a con-spicy which was formed against him, and established in his kingdom. (Ad Fam. ii. 17, xx. 2, 4, 5, ad Att. v. 20; Plut. Cic. 36.) It appears from Cicero that Ariobarzanes was very poor, and that he owed Pompey and M. Brutus large sums of money. (Ad Att. vi. 1—3.) In the war between Caesar and Pompey, he came to the assistance of the latter with five hundred horsemen. (Cass. B. C. iii. 4; Flor. iv. 2.) Caesar, however, forgave him, and enlarged his territories.
He also protected him against the attacks of Pharnaees, king of Pontus. (Dion Cass. xii. 66, xiii. 45; Hist. Dell. Alex. 34, &c.) He was slain in b.c. 42 by Cassius, because he was plotting against him in Asia. (Dion Cass. xiv. 33; Appian, B. C. iv. 63.)
On the annexed coin of Ariobarzanes the inscription is BAXIARES AIOBAPZANOT EYSEBOY5

KAI KOSMOIC0T. (Fechtel, iii. p. 200.)
ARIONOMARDUS (Ἀριωνομάρδος), a Persian word, the latter part of which is the same as the Persian mord (μόρδ), whence comes medri (μεδρία, virtus).
Ario-marctus would therefore signify "a man or hero honourable, or entitled to respect." (Pott, Etnologische Forschungen, p. xxxvi.) Respecting the meaning of Arion, see ARIAITHES.
1 The son of Dareius and Parmys, the daughter of Smerdis, commanded the Moschi and Titheri in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vi. 78.)
2. The brother of Artaphilus, commanded the Caspni in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 67.)
3. The ruler of Thebes in Egypt, one of the commanders of the Egyptians in the army of Xerxes. (Aesch. Pers. 38, 313.)
ARION (Ἀριων). 1. An ancient Greek bard and great master on the cithara, was a native of Methymna in Lesbos, and, according to some accounts, a son of Cycdon or of Poseidon and the tymph Oceania. He is called the inventor of the dithyrambic poetry, and of the name dithyramb.
(Herod. i. 23; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 25.) All traditions about him agree in describing him as a contemporary and friend of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, so that he must have lived about b.c.
700. He appears to have spent a great part of his life at the court of Periander, but respecting his life and his poetical or musical productions, scarcely anything is known beyond the beautiful story of his escape from the sailors with whom he sailed from Sicily to Corinth. On one occasion, thus runs the story, Arion went to Sicily to take part in some musical contest. He won the prize, and, laden with presents, he embarked in a Corinthian ship to return to his friend Periander. The rude sailors coveted his treasures, and meditated his murder. Apollo, in a dream, informed his beloved bard of the plot. After having tried in vain to save his life, he at length obtained permission once more to seek delight in his song and playing on the cithara. In festal attire he placed himself in the prow of the ship and invoked the gods in inspired strains, and then threw himself into the sea. But many song-loving dolphins had assembled round the vessel, and one of them now took the bard on its back and carried him to Taeumares, from whence he returned to Corinth in safety, and related his adventure to Periander. When the Corinthian vessel arrived likewise, Periander inquired of the sailors after Arion, and they said that he had remained behind at Tarentum; but when Arion, at the bidding of Periander, came forward, the sailors owned their guilt and were punished according to their desert. (Herod. i. 24; Gellius, xvi. 19; Hygin. Fab. 194; Paus. iii. 25, § 5.) In the time of Herodotus and Pausanias there existed on Taenarum a brass monument, or ehike, which was said to have been erected by Arion himself, and which represented him riding on a dolphin. Arion and his eunuch (lyre) were placed among the stars. (Hygin. l. c.; Serv. ad Virg. Elog. viii. 54; Aelian, H. A. xii. 45.) A fragment of a hymn to Poseidon, ascribed to Arion, is contained in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p.
566, &c.
2. A fabulous horse, which Poseidon beget by Demeter; for in order to escape from the pursuit of Poseidon, the goddess had metamorphosed herself into a mare, and Poseidon deceived her by assuming the figure of a horse. Demeter afterwards gave birth to the horse Arion, and a daughter whose name remained unknown to the horse uninitiated. (Paus. viii. 28, § 4.) According to the poet Antimachus (op. Paus. i. c.) this horse and Caerus were the offspring of Gaea; whereas, according to other traditions, Poseidon or Zephyrus beget the horse by a Harpy. (Eustath. ad Hom.
p. 1051; Quint. Smyrn. iv. 570.) Another story related, that Poseidon created Arion in his contest with Athena. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 12.)
From Poseidon the horse passed through the hands of Copreus, Oncus, and Haracles, from whom it was received by Adrastus. (Paus. i. c.; Hesiod.
Sent. Hork. 120.)

ARIOVISTUS, a German chief, who engaged in war against C. Julius Caesar in Gaul, in b.c. 58.
For some time before that year, Gaul had been disturbed by the Danuvians and several of their parties, the one headed by the Aedui (in the modern Burgundy), the other by the Arverni (Auvergne), and Sequani (to the W. of Jura). The latter called in the aid of the Germans, of whom at first about 15,000 crossed the Rhine, and their report of the wealth and fertility of Gaul soon attracted large bodies of fresh invaders. The number of the Germans in that country at length amounted to 120,000: a mixed multitude, consisting of members of the following tribes:—the Harudes, Mar-comannii, Triboci, Vangiones, Nemetes, Sednii, and Suevi, most of whom had lately occupied the country stretching from the right bank of the Rhine to the Danube, and northwards to the Risengebirge and Erzgebirge, or even beyond them. At their head was Ariovistus, whose name is supposed to have been Lutinized from Her, "a host," and Fürst, "a prince," and who was so powerful as to receive from the Roman senate the title of amicus. They entirely subdued the Aedui, and compelled them to give hostages to the Sequani, and swear never to seek help from Rome. But it fared worse with the conquerors than the conquered, for Ariovistus first seized a third part of the Sequanian territory, at the price of the triumph which he had won for them, and soon after demanded a second portion of equal extent. Divi-Arisie, the only noble Aeidian who had neither given hostages nor taken the oath, requested help from Caesar, and was accompanied by a numerous deputation of Gallic chiefs of all tribes, who had now forgotten their mutual quarrels in their terror of the common foe. They all expressed the greatest fear lest their request should be known to Ariovistus, and the Sequani regarded him with such awe, that they dared not utter a word to Caesar, but only showed their misery by their downcast looks. Caesar, who was afraid that first Gaul and then Italy would be overrun by the barbarians, sent orders to Ariovistus to prevent the irruption of any more Germans, and to restore the hostages to the Aedui. These demands were refused in the same haughty tone of defiance which Ariovistus had before used in declining an interview proposed by Caesar. Both parties then advanced with warlike intentions, and the Romans seized Vesontio (Besançon), the chief town of the Sequani. Here they were so terrified by the accounts which they heard of the gigantic bulk and fierce courage of the Germans, that they gave themselves up to despair, and the camp was filled with men making their wills. Caesar reprimanded them by a brilliant speech, at the end of which he said that, if they refused to advance, he should himself proceed with his victorious tenth legion only. Upon this they repented of their despondency, and prepared for battle. Before this could take place, an interview between Caesar and Ariovistus was at last held by the request of the latter. They could come, however, to no agreement, but the battle was still delayed for some days; Ariovistus contriving means of postponing it, on account of a prophecy that the Germans would not succeed if they engaged before the new moon. The battle ended by the total defeat of Ariovistus, who immediately fled with his army to the Rhine, a distance of 50 miles from the field. Some crossed the river by swimming, others in small boats, and among the latter Ariovistus himself. His two wives perished in the retreat; one of his daughters was taken prisoner, the other killed. The fame of Ariovistus long survived in Gaul, so that in Tacitus (Hist. iv. 73) we find Celerius telling the Treveri that the Romans had occupied the banks of the Rhine, sequi altis Ariovistus regno Gallarum postivit. This shows that the representation which Caesar gives of his power is not exaggerated.

ARIPIRON (Ἀριπηρων). 1. The father of Xanthippus, and grandfather of Pericles. (Herod. vi. 191, 196, vii. 39, viii. 131; Paus. iii. 7, § 8.)

2. The brother of Pericles. (Plat. Protag. p. 320, a.)

3. Of Sicyon, a Greek poet, the author of a beautiful poem on health (Τύησα), which has been preserved by Athenaeus; (xv. p. 702, a.) The beginning of the poem is quoted by Lucian (de Iposis inter Sali. c. 6) and Maximus Tyrius (xiii. 1.) It is printed in Bergk’s Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 841.

ARISBE (Αἱρίσβη). 1. A daughter of Mecopa and first wife of Priam, by whom she became the mother of Aeseus, but was afterwards resigned to Hyrraeus. (Apollod. i. 12, § 5.) According to some accounts, the Trojan town of Arise derived its name from her. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. A daughter of Taurus and wife of Dardanus.
ARISTAEUS. [ARISTAEUS.]

ARISTAEUS (Αρισταῖος), an ancient divinity worshipped in various parts of Greece, as in Thessaly, Ceos, and Boeotia, but especially in the islands of the Aegean, Ionian, and Adriatic seas, which had once been inhabited by Pelasgians. The different accounts of his origin show that he was a mortal, and ascended to the dignity of a god through the benefits he had conferred upon mankind, seem to have arisen in different places and independently of one another, so that they referred to several distinct beings, who were subsequently identified and united into one. He is described either as a son of Uranus and Ge, or according to a more general tradition, as the son of Apollo by Cyrene, the grand-daughter of Paus. Other, but more local traditions, call his father Cheiron or Cares. (Diod. iv. 81, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 506, &c. with the Schoi.; Pind. Pyth. ix. 43, &c.) The stories about his youth are very various, and show him at once as the favourite of the gods. His mother Cyrene had been carried off by Apollo from mount Pelion, where he found her boldly fighting with a lion, to Libya, where Cyrene was named after her, and where she gave birth to Aristaeus. After he had grown up, Aristaeus went to Thebes in Boeotia, where he learned from Cheiron and the muses the arts of healing and prophecy. According to some statements he married Autonoe, the daughter of Cadmus, who bore him several sons, Charnus, Calais, causa, Actaeon, and Polydorus. (Hesiod. Theog. 785.) After the unfortunate death of his son Actaeon, he left Thebes and went to Cees, whose inhabitants had recovered from a destructive drought, by erecting an altar to Zeus Ianus. This gave rise to an identification of Aristaeus with Zeus in Cees. From thence he returned to Libya, where his mother prepared for him a fleet, with which he sailed to Sicily, visited several islands of the Mediterranean, and for a time ruled over Sardinia. From those islands his worship spread over Magna Graecia and other Greek colonies. At last he went to Thrace, where he became initiated in the mysteries of Dionysus, and after having dwelled for some time near mount Ieicus, where he founded the town of Aristeon, he disappeared. (Comp. Paus. x. 17. § 3.) Aristaeus is one of the most beneficent divinities in ancient mythology: he was worshipped as the protector of flocks and herds, of vine and olive plantations; he taught men to hunt and keep bees, and availed the fields the burning heat of the sun and other causes of destruction; he was a Σελήνος, αθηνάς, and αλεγρίας. The benefits which he conferred upon man, differed in different places according to their especial wants: Cees, which was much exposed to heat and droughts, received through him rain and refreshing winds; in Thessaly Arcadion was the protector of the flocks and bees. (Virg. Geor. i. 14. iv. 283, 317.) Justin (xiii. 7) throws everything into confusion by describing Nemesis and Aegres, which are only sub-divisions of Aristaeus, as his brothers. Respecting the representations of this divinity on ancient coins, see Rasche, Lex. Numism. i. p. 1100, and respecting his worship in general Brundsd. Renen., &c. in Græc. i. p. 40, &c. [L. S.]

ARISTAEUS, the original name according to Justin (xiii. 7) of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. [Battus.]
Aristarchus was taken by stratagem and delivered up to his fellow-citizens, who, however, dismissed him unharmed. (Herod. iv. 138, v. 37, 38.)

2. Tyrant of Cyzicus, one of the Ionian chiefs left by Dareius to guard the bridge over the Danube. (Herod. iv. 138.)

Aristagoras, a Greek writer on Egypt. (Steph. Byz. s.v. Ἱερομυστής, Τάκταςκος, Νικοῦ κατά, Τέθω, Ἐλευθραῖος; Aelian, H. A. xi. 10.) Stephanius Byz. (s.v. Πεννανθοδόξος) says, that Aristagoras was not much younger than Plato, and from the order in which he is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 12. s. 17) with the authors, who wrote upon Pyrrhus, he would appear to have lived between, or been a contemporary of, Duris of Samos and Artemidora of Ephesus.

Aristagoras, comic poet. [Metab. 2721, 2722, 2726.]

Aristanax (Ἀριστάναξ), a Greek physician, of whose life nothing is known, and of whose date it can be positively determined only that, as he is mentioned by Saranus (De Arte Osteetr. p. 201), he must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

Aristander (Ἀρίστανδρος), the most celebrated soothsayer of Alexander the Great. He survived the king. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 2. 4, &c.; Curt. iv. 2. 6. 13, 15, vili. 7; Plut. Alex. 25; Aelian, V. H. xili. 64; Arrian. i. 31, iv. 24.) The work of Aristander on prodigies, which is referred to by Pliny (H. N. xiv. 25. s. 38; Elenchus, lib. viii. x. xiv. xviii.; and Lucian (Philoprat. c. 21), was probably written by the soothsayer of Alexander.

Aristander, of Paros, was the sculptor of one of the tripods which the Lacedaemonians made out of the spoils of the battle of Aegospotami (n. c. 405), and dedicated at Amyclae. The two tripods had statues beneath them, between the feet: that of Aristander had Sparta holding a lyre; that of Polychoelus had a figure of Aphrodite. (Paus. iii. 16. 3. P. S.)

Aristarchus (Ἀρίσταρχος), 1. is named with Peisander, Phrynichus, and Antiphanes, as a principal leader of the "Four Hundred" (n. c. 411) at Athens, and is specified as one of the strongest anti-democratic partisans. (Thuc. viii. 90.) On the first breaking out of the counter-revolution we find him leaving the council-room with Themistocles, and acting at Peiraeus at the head of the young oligarchical cavalry (ib. 92); and on the downfall of his party, he took advantage of his office as strategus, and rode off with a party of the most barbarous of the foreign archers to the border fort of Oenochoe, then besieged by the Boeotians and Corinthians. In concert with them, and under cover of his command, he defended the garrison, by a statement of terms concluded with Sparta, into surrender, and thus gained the place for the enemy. (Ib. 98.) He afterwards, it appears, came into the hands of the Athenians, and was with Alexiles brought to trial and punished with death, not later than 406. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 28; Lycurg. c. Leostr. p. 164; Thid. iv. pp. 67 and 75.) [A. H. C.]

2. There was an Athenian of the name of Aristarchus (apparently a different person from the oligarchical leader of that name), a conversation between whom and Socrates is recorded by Xenophon. (Mem. ii. 7.)

3. A Lacedaemonian, who in n. c. 400 was sent out to succeed Cleander as harpist of Byzantium. The Greeks who had accompanied Cyrus in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, who had recently returned, and the main body of them had encamped near Byzantium. Several of them, however, had sold their arms and taken up their residence in the city itself. Aristarchus, following the instructions he had received from Xenobius, the Spartan admiral, whom he had met at Cyzicus, sold all these, amounting to about 400, as slaves. Having been bribed by Pharnabazus, he prevented the troops from recrossing into Asia and ravaging that satrapy's province, and in various ways annoyed and irritated them. (Xen. Anab. vii. 2. §§ 4—7, viii. 3. 1—9, vii. 6. §§ 12, 24.)

4. One of the ambassadors sent by the Phocians to Seleucus, the son of Antiochus the Great, n. c. 190. (Polyb. xxii. 4.)

5. A prince or ruler of the Colchians, appointed by Pompey after the close of the Mithridatic war. (Appian, de Bell. Mith. c. 114.) [C. P. M.]

Aristarchus (Ἀρίσταρχος), of Alexandria, the author of a work on the interpretation of dreams. (Omphaleia, Artemid. iv. 23.)

Aristarchus (Ἀρίσταρχος), the chronographer, the author of a letter on the situation of Athens, and the events which took place there in the time of the Apostles, and especially of the life of Dionysius, the Archiopite. (Hilduin, Ep. ad Ludoviciam, quoted by Vossius, Hist. Graec. p. 400, &c. ed. Westermann.)

Aristarchus (Ἀρίσταρχος), the most celebrated grammarian and critic in all antiquity, was a native of Samothrace. He was educated at Alexandria, in the school of Aristophanes of Byzantium, and afterwards founded him a grammatical and critical school, which flourished for a long time at Alexandria, and subsequently at Rome also. Ptolemy Philopator entrusted to Aristarchus the education of his son, Ptolemy Epiphanes, and Ptolemy Philus too was one of his pupils. (Athen. ii. p. 711.) Owing, however, to the bad treatment which the head of the grammatical school of Alexandria experienced in the reign of Ptolemy, Aristarchus, then at an advanced age, left Egypt and went to Cyprus, where he is said to have died at the age of seventy-two, of voluntary starvation, because he was suffering from incurable dropsy. He left behind him two sons, Aristagons and Aristarchus, who are likewise called grammarians, but neither of them appears to have inherited anything of the spirit or talents of the father.

The numerous followers and disciples of Aristarchus were designated by the names of ἀρισταρχικός or of ἀρισταρχεύς. Aristarchus, his master Aristophon, and his opponent Crates of Mallos, who was also a grammarian, were at Pergamos, were the most eminent grammarians of that period; but Aristarchus surpassed them all in knowledge and critical skill. His whole life was devoted to grammatical and critical pursuits, with the view to explain and constitute correct texts of the ancient poets of Greece, such as Homer, Pindar, Archilochus, Anacreon, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Ion, and others. His grammatical studies embraced everything, which the term in its widest sense then comprised, and he together with his great contemporaries are regarded as the first who established fixed principles of grammar, though Aristarchus himself is often called the prince of grammarians ὁ καταφύγος τῶν γραμματικῶν, οὗ γραμματικῶν...
ARISTARCHUS.

A Scholiast on Homer (II. iv. 238) declares, that Aristarchus must be followed in preference to other critics, even if they should be right; and Panaetius (Athen. xiv. p. 634) called Aristarchus a μάρτυς, to express the skill and felicity with which he always hit the truth in his criticisms and explanations. (For further information see Mathesius, Dissertatio de Aristarcho Grammatico, Jena, 1725, 4to; Villibbon, Prolog. et ded. ad Hom. Ith. p. xxvi, &c.; and more especially F. A. Wolf, Prolog. in Hom. p. xxvii, &c., and Lehr, De Aristarchi Studiosa Homericis Regim. Pruss. 1833, 8vo.)

[LS.]

ARISTARCHUS (Ἀρίσταρχος). 1. A Greek Physician, of whom no particulars are known, except that he was attached to the court of Berenice, the wife of Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, B.C. 261–246 (Polyben. Strateg. viii. 50), and persuaded her to trust herself in the hands of her treacherous enemies.

2. Some medicinal prescriptions belonging to another Aristarchus (B.C. 162–125) were attributed by Galen and Aetius, who appears to have been a native of Tarsus in Cilicia. (Gal. De Consp. Medicum, loc. cit. vi. 11, vol. xiii. p. 824.)

W. A. G.

ARISTARCHUS (Ἀρίσταρχος), of SAMOS, one of the earliest astronomers of the Alexandrian school. We know little of his history, except that he was living between B.C. 280 and 264. The first of these dates is inferred from a passage in the megéna στήνεις of Ptolemy (iii. 2, vol. i. p. 163, ed. Halma), in which Hipparchus is said to have referred, in his treatise on the length of the year, to an observation of the summer solstices made by Aristarchus in the 50th year of the 1st Calippic period; the second from the mention of him by Plutarch (de Pisc. in Ordo Lunc.), which makes him contemporary with Cleanthus the Stoic, the successor of Zeno.

It seems that he employed himself in the determination of some of the most important elements of astronomy; but none of his works remain, except a treatise on the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon (μεγένα τῶν ἑλίων καὶ σελήνων), and a treatise on the same subject by a disciple of Plato; it is, however, very ingenious, and correct in principle. It is founded on the consideration that at the instant when the enlightened part of the moon is apparently bounded by a straight line, the plane of the circle which separates the dark and light portions passes through the eye of the spectator, and is also perpendicular to the line joining the centres of the sun and moon; so that the distances of the sun and moon from the eye are at that instant respectively the hypothenuse and side of a right-angled triangle. The angle at the eye (which is the angular distance between the sun and moon) can be observed, and then it is an easy problem to find the ratio between the sides containing it. This discovery of his, or of any other ancient, led to a true result; for it would be impossible, even with a telescope, to determine with much accuracy the instant at which the phenomenon in question takes place; and in the time of Aristarchus there were no means of measuring angular distances with sufficient exactness. In fact, he takes the angle at the eye to be 85 degrees

whereas its real value is less than a right angle by about half a minute only; and hence he infers that the distance of the sun is between eighteen and twenty times greater than that of the moon, whereas the true ratio is about twenty times as great, the distances being to one another nearly as 400 to 1.

The ratio of the true diameters of the sun and moon would follow immediately from that of their distances, if their apparent (angular) diameters were known. Aristarchus assumes that their apparent diameters are equal, which is nearly true; but estimates their common value at two degrees, which is nearly four times too great. The theory of parallax was as yet unknown, and hence, in order to compare the diameter of the earth with the magnitudes already mentioned, he compares the diameter of the moon with that of the earth's shadow in its neighbourhood, and assumes the latter to be twice as great as the former. (Its mean value is about 34') Of course all the numerical results deduced from these assumptions are, like the one first mentioned, very erroneous. The geometrical processes employed showed not that like trigonometry was known. No attempt is made to assign the absolute values of the magnitudes whose ratios are investigated; in fact, this could not be done without an actual measurement of the earth— an operation which seems to have been first attempted on scientific principles in the next generation. [ERATOSTHENES.] Aristarchus does not explain his method of determining the apparent diameters of the sun and of the earth's shadow; but the latter must have been deduced from observations of lunar eclipses, and the former may probably have been observed by means of the skopeion by a method described by Macrobios. (Somn. Scip. i. 20.) This instrument is said to have been invented by Aristarchus (Vitruv. ix. 9): it consisted of an improved gnomon [ANAXIMANDER], the shadow being received not upon a horizontal plane, but upon a concave hemispherical surface having the extremity of the style as its centre, so that angles might be measured directly by arcs instead of by their tangents. The gross error in the value attributed to the sun's apparent diameter is remarkable; it appears, however, that Aristarchus must afterwards have adopted a much more correct estimate, since Archimedes in the Ψαυματις (Wallis, Op. vol. iii. p. 515) refers to a treatise in which he made it only half a degree. Pappus, whose commentary on the book περὶ μεγέθεων, &c. is extant, does not notice this emendation, whence it has been conjectured, that the other works of Aristarchus did not exist in his time, having perhaps perished with the Alexandrian library.

It has been the common opinion, at least in modern times, that Aristarchus agreed with Philolaus and other astronomers of the Pythagorean school in considering the sun to be fixed, and attributing a motion to the earth. Plutarch (de sot. in or. lxx. p. 922) says, that Cleantius thought that Aristarchus ought to be accused of impiety for proposing (υποστηθεμενος), that the heavens were at rest, and that the earth moved in an oblique circle, and also about its own axis (the true reading is evidently ἐλατθεις γης διεν Ἀριστοτέλεως, κ. τ. λ.); and Diogenes Laertius, in his list of the works of Cleantius mentions one περὶ Ἀριστοτέλεως. (See also Sext. Empir. adv. Math. p. 410, c.; Stobaeus, i. 260.) Archimedes, in the Ψαυματις (l. c.), refers to the same theory. (ητος, κ. τ. λ.) But the treatise περὶ μεγέθεων contains not a word upon the subject, nor does Ptolemy allude to it when he maintains the immobility of the earth. It seems therefore probable, that Aristarchus adopted it rather as a hypothesis for particular purposes than as a statement of the actual system of the universe. In fact, Plutarch, in another place (Plat. Quaest. p. 1006) expressly says, that Aristarchus taught it only hypothetically. On this question, see Schaubach. (Gesch. d. Griech. Astronomie, p. 488, &c.) It appears from the passage in the Ψαυματις alluded to above, that Aristarchus had much juster views than his predecessors concerning the extent of the universe. He maintained, namely, that the sphere of the fixed stars was so large, that it bore to the orbit of the earth the relation of a sphere to its centre. What he meant by the expression, is not clear: it may be interpreted as an anticipation of modern discoveries, but in this sense it could express only a conjecture which the observations of the age were not accurate enough either to confirm or refute—a remark which is equally applicable to the theory of the earth's motion. Whatever may be the truth on these points, it is probable that even the opinion, that the sun was nearly twenty times as distant as the moon, indicates a great step in advance of the popular dogmas.

Censorinus (de Dies Natalis, c. 18) attributes to Aristarchus the invention of the magnus annus of 2484 years.

A Latin translation of the treatise περὶ μεγέθεων was published by Georg. Valla, Venet. 1498, and another by Commandine, Pisauri, 1572. The Greek text, with a Latin translation and the commentary of Pappus, was edited by Wallis, Oxon. 1688, and reprinted in vol. iii. of his works. There is also a French translation, and an edition of the text, Paris, 1810. (Delambre. Hist. de l'Astronomie Ancienne, liv. i. chap. 5 and 9; Laplace, Sys. du Monde, p. 381; Schaubach in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædia.) [W. E. D.]

ARISTARCHUS (Ἀριστοτέρας) of Tarsus, a tragic poet at Athens, was contemporary with Euripides, and flourished about 454 n. c. He lived to the age of a hundred. Out of seventy tragedies which he exhibited, only two obtained the prize. (Suidas, s. v.; Euseb. Chron. Armen.) Nothing remains of his works, except a few lines (Stoicaus, Tit. 63. § 9, tit. 120. § 2; Athen. xiii. p. 612 f., and the titles of three of his plays namely, the Ἀδάριςως, which is said to have written and named after the god in gratitude for his recovery from illness (Suidas), the Ἀκάλλης which Ennius translated into Latin (Festus, s. v. probato aure), and the Τυτανός. (Stoicaus, ii. 1, § 1.) [P. S.]

ARISTEAS (Ἀρισταῖος), of Pheraeus, a son of Catostratus or Democares, was an epic poet who flourished, according to Suidas, about the time of Croesus and Cyrus. The accounts of his life are as fabulous as those about Abarus the Flype born. According to a tradition, which Herodotus (iv. 15) heard at Metapontum, in southern Italy, he reappeared there among the living 34 years after his death, and according to this tradition Aristaeus would belong to the eighth or ninth century before the Christian era; and there a other traditions which place him before the time of Homer, or describe him as a contemporary and teacher of Homer. (Strab. xiv. p. 639.) In the account of Herodotus (iv. 13—16), Tzetzes (Chil. ii. 724, &c.) and Suidas (s. v.), Aristaeus was a magician, who rose after his death, and whose soul could leave and re-enter its body according to its pleasure. He was, like Abaris, connected with the worship of Apollo, which he was said to have introduced at Metapontum. Herodotus calls him the favourite and inspired bard of Apollo (γοητής Ἀπολλοῦ). He is said to have travelled through the countries north and east of the Euxine, and to have visited the countries of the Iseodones, Arimaspias, Cimmerii, Hyperborei, and other mythical nations, and after his return to have written an epic poem, in three books, called τὰ Ἀριστεία, in which he seems to have described all that he had seen or pretended to have seen. This work, which was unquestionably full of marvellous stories, was nevertheless looked upon as a source of historical and geographical information, and some writers reckoned Aristaeus among the logographers. But it was nevertheless a poetical production, and Strabo (i. p. 91, xii. p. 550) seems to judge too hastily of him, when he calls him an ανδρόστενος ἡμῶν. The poem "Arimaspela" is frequently mentioned by the ancients (Paus. i. 24. § 6, v. 7. § 9; Ptol. ix. 5; Gellius, iv. 8; Plin. H. N. vii. 2), and thirteen hexameter verses of it are preserved in Longinus (De Sublim., x. 4) and Tzetzes (Chil. vii. 686, &c.). The existence of the poem is thus attested beyond all doubt; but the ancient themselves denied to Aristaeus the authorship of it. (Dionys. Hal. Jud. de Tracyd. 23.) It seems to have fallen into oblivion at an early period. Suidas also mentions a theogony of Aristaeus, in prose, of which, however, nothing is known. (Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 10, &c. ed. Westermann; Böde, Gesch. der Epich. Dichter. pp. 472—476.) [L. S.]

2. Of Chios, a distinguished officer in the retinue of the Ten Thousand. (Xen. Anab. i. 1 § 28, vi. § 20.)
3. Of Stratoniace, was the victor at the Olympic games in wrestling and the pancration on the same day, Ol. 191. (Paus. v. 21. § 5; Kruse, Olympia, p. 249.)

4. An Argive, who invited Pyrrhus to Argos, b. c. 272, as his rival Aristippus was discovered by Antigonus Gonatas. (Plut. Pyrrh. 30.)
5. A grammarian, referred to by Varro. (L. L. x. 75, ed. Müller.)

ARISTAEUS, ARISTARBUS, a Cyprian by name, was the high officer at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was distinguished for his military talents. Ptolemy being anxious to add to his newly founded library at Alexandria (b. c. 273) a copy of the Jewish law, sent Aristaeus and Andreas, the commander of his body-guard, to Jerusalem. They carried presents to the temple, and obtained from the high-priest, Eleazar, a genuine copy of the Pentateuch, and a body of seventy elders, six from each tribe, who could translate it into Greek. On their arrival in Egypt, the elders were received with great distinction by Ptolemy, and were lodged in a house in the island of Pharos, where, in the space of forty-two days, they completed a Greek version of the Pentateuch, which was called, from the number of the translators, κατὰ τοὺς ἑλληνικοὺς (the Septuagint), and the same name was extended to the Greek version of the whole of the Old Testament, when it had been completed under the auspices of the Ptolemies. The above account is given in a Greek work which professes to be a letter from Aristaeus to his brother Philocrates, but which is generally admitted by the best critics to be spurious. It is probably the fabrication of an Alexandrian Jew shortly before the Christian era. The fact seems to be, that the version of the Pentateuch was made in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, between the years 298 and 285 b. c. for the Jews who had been brought into Egypt by that king in 320 b. c. It may have obtained its name from its being adopted by the Sanhedrim (or council of seventy) of the Alexandrian Jews. The other books of the Septuagint version were translated by different persons and at various times. The letter ascribed to Aristaeus was first printed in Greek and Latin, by Simon Schardt, Basile, 1561, 8vo, and reprinted at Oxford, 1692, 8vo.; the best edition is in Gallandà Dikles. Patr. ii. p. 771. (Fabricius Bib. Graec. iii. 660.)

ARISTEIDES and PAPIAS, sculptors, of Aphrodisian in Cyprus, made the two statues of centaurs in dark grey marble which were found at Hadrian’s villa at Tivoli in 1746, and are now in the Capitoline museum. They bear the inscription ARISTEIAE KAI PAPIAS APRODIAICIEIC. From the style of the statues, which is good, and from the place where they were discovered, Winckelmann supposed that they were made in the reign of Hadrian. Other statues of centaurs have been discovered, very much like those of Aristaeus and Papias, but of better workmanship, from which some writers have inferred that the latter are only copies. The two centaurs are fully described by Winckelmann (Discourses, vol. iii. p. 247), and have been figured by Cavaceppi (Racc. di Statt. i. tav. 27) and Foggini (Misc. Capit. tav. 13, 14). [P. S.]

ARISTIDE (Ἀριστίδης). 1. Son of Lysimachus, the Athenian statesman and general, makes his first certain appearance in history as archon epynomus of the year 489 b. c. (Mar. Par. 50.) From Herodotus we hear of him as the best and justest of his countrymen; as ostracised and at enmity with Themistocles; of his generosity and bravery at Salamis, in some detail (viii. 79, 82, and 95); and the fact, that he commanded the Athenians in the campaign of Plataea. (i. 28.) Thucydides names him once as co-amBassador to Sparta with Themistocles, once in the words τὸν ἐπὶ Ἀριστίδης φρον. (1. 91, v. 10.) In the Gorgias of Plato, he to Athens, Aristides seems to have acted in cheerful concert with Themistocles, as directing the restoration of the city (Herod. Pont. 1), as his colleague in the embassy to Sparta, that secured for it its walls; as proposing, in accordance with his policy, perhaps also in consequence of changes in property produced by the war, the measure which threw open the archonship and areopagus to all citizens alike. In 477, as joint-commander of the Athenian fleet, he was, by his open conduct and that of his colleague and disciple, Cimon, who had the glory of obtaining for Athens the command of the maritime confederacy; and to him was in general consent entrusted the task of drawing up its laws and fixing its assessments. This first ϕόης of 460 talents, paid into a common treasury at Delos, bore his name, and was regarded by the allies in after times, as marking their Saturnian age. It is, unless the change in the constitution followed it, his last recorded act. He lived, Theophrastus related, to see the treasury removed to Athens, and declared it for (the bearing of the weight of the words, and the idea that the transaction was a measure unjust and expedient. During most of this period he was, we may suppose, as Cimon’s emissary at home, the chief political leader of Athens. He died, according to some, in Pontus, more probably, however, at home, certainly after 471, the year of the ostracism of Themistocles, and very likely, as Nepos states, in 468. (See Clinton, P. II. in the years 469, 468.)

A tomb was shewn in Plutarch’s time at Phalereum, as erected to him at the public expense. That he did not leave enough behind him to pay for his funeral, is perhaps a piece of rhetoric. We may believe, however, that his daughters were portioned by the state, as it appears certain (Plut. comp. Dem. c. Lepta 491, 25), that his son Lysimachus received lands and money by a decree of Alkibiades; and that assistance was given to his grand-daughter, and even to remote descendants, in the time of Demetrius Phalerus. He must, so far as we know, have been in 489, as archon eponymous, among the pentacosiomedimni: the wars may have destroyed his property; we can hardly question the story from Aeschines, the disciple of Socrates, that when his poverty was made a reproach in a court of justice to Cfigures, his cousin, he bore witness that he had received and declined offers of his assistance; that he died poor is certain. This of itself would prove him possessed of an honesty rare in those times; and in the highest points of integrity, though Theophrastus said, and it may be true, that he at times sacrificed it to his country’s interest, no case whatever can be adduced in proof, and he certainly displays a sense, very unusual, of the duties of nation to nation.

2. Son of Lysimachus, grandson of the preceding, is in Plato’s Laches represented as brought by his father to Socrates as a future pupil. In the Theaetetus Socrates speaks of him as one of those who made rapid progress while in his society, but, after leaving him prematurely, lost all he had gained; an account which is unskilfully expanded and put in the mouth of the young man himself by the author of the Theaetetus. That of the Theaetetus in the main we may take to be true (Plat. Laches, p. 179, a, &c.; Theaet. p. 151, a. Thaeg. p. 131, a.)* [A. H. C.]

3. Son of Archippus, an Athenian commander of the ships sent to collect money from.
the Greek states in B. C. 425 and 424. (Thuc. iv. 50, 75.)

4. An Elean, conquered in the armed race at the Olympic, in the Diadotos at the Pythian, and in the boys' horse-race at the Nemean games. (Paus. vi. 18. 3.)

ARISTIDES, P. AELIUS (\A\i\r\i\s\t\i\o\d\o\u\d\i\s\u\o\d\o\s), summoned THIODORUS, one of the most celebrated Greek rhetoricians of the second century after Christ, was the son of Eudocmon, a priest of Zeus, and born at Adrian in Mysia, according to some in A. D. 129, and according to others in A. D. 117. He showed extraordinary talents even in his early youth, and devoted himself with an almost unparalleled zeal to the study of rhetoric, which appeared to him the worthiest occupation of a man, and along with it he cultivated poetry as an amusement. Besides the rhetorician Herodes Atticus, whom he heard at Athens, he also received instructions from Aristotle at Pergamus, from Polemon at Smyrna, and from the grammarians Alexander of Cottaeum. (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9; Suidas, s. v. \A\i\r\i\s\t\i\o\d\o\u\d\i\s\u\o\d\o\s; Aristeid. Oral. F. c. in Ales. p. 80, ed. Jebb.) After being sufficiently prepared for his profession, he travelled for some time, and visited various places in Asia, Africa, especially Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The fame of his talents and acquirements, which preceded him everywhere, was so great, that monuments were erected to his honour in several towns which he had honour with his presence. (Aristeid. Oral. Argopli. ii. p. 231, &c.; Philol. Vit. Soph. i. 9, § 1.) Shortly before his return, and while yet in Italy, he was attacked by an illness which lasted for thirteen years. He had from his childhood been of a very weak constitution, but neither this nor his protracted illness prevented his prosecuting his studies, for he was well at intervals; and in his "Sermones Sacri" (\ι\o\p\o\l\a\l\i\o\s \l\o\y\o\n\o\i, a sort of diary of his illness and his recovery), he relates that he was frequently encouraged by visions in his dreams to cultivate rhetoric to the exclusion of all other studies. During this period and afterwards, he resided at Smyrna, which he had gone on account of its baths, but he made occasional excursions into the country, to Pergamus, Phocaea, and other towns. (Serm. Sacri, ii. p. 304, iv. p. 324, &c.) He had great influence with the emperor M. Aurelius, whose acquaintance he had formed in Ionia, and when in A. D. 178, Smyrna was a great extent destroyed by an earthquake, Aristides represented the deplorable condition of the city and its inhabitants in such vivid colours to the emperor that he was moved to tears, and generous assistance was granted the Smyrneans in rebuilding their town. The Smyrneans showed their gratitude to Aristides by erecting to him a brazen statue in their agora, and by calling him the founder of their town. (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9, § 2; Aristeid. Epist. ad M. Aurel. et Coemmed. i. p. 512.) Various other honours and distinctions were offered to him at Smyrna, but he refused them, and accepted only the office of priest of Asclepius, which he held until his death, about A. D. 180, according to some, at the age of 60, and according to others of 70. The circumstance of his living for so many years at Smyrna, and enjoying such great honours there, is probably the reason that in an epigram still extant (Anthol. Plinad. p. 376) he is regarded as a native of Smyrna. The memory of Aristaides was honoured in several ancient towns by statues. (Liban. Epist. 1551.) One of these representing the rhetorician in a sitting attitude, was discovered in the 16th century, and is at present in the Vatican museum. The museum of Verona contains an inscription to his honour. (Visconti, Iconograph. Greca. i. plate xxxi. p. 373, &c.; Bartoli, Dissert. Sel. Mus. Veronae, Verona, 1745, &c.)

The works of Aristides extant are, fifty-five orations and declamations (including those which were discovered by Morelli and Masi), and two treatises on rhetorical subjects of little value, viz. ΠΕΡΙ ΠΟΛΙΤΙΚΟΥ ΛΟΓΟΥ και ΠΕΡΙ ΑΔΡΟΥ ΛΟΓΟΥ. Some of his orations are euologies on the power of some of his contemporaries, others are panegyrics on towns, such as Smyrna, Cizyces, Rome; one among them is a Panathenaeus, and an imitation of that of Isocrates. Others again treat on subjects connected with rhetoric and eloquence. The six orations called ΠΕΡΙ ΛΟΓΟΥ, which were mentioned above, have attracted considerable attention in modern times, on account of the various stories they contain respecting the cures of the sick in temples, and on account of the apparent inconsistency between these cures and the solemnity said to be effected by Mesmerism. (Thorckelin, Opuscul. ii. p. 129, &c.) A list of the orations extant as well as of the lost works of Aristides, is given in Fabricius (Bild. Gr. vi. p. 15, &c.), and more completely by Westermann. (Gesch. der Grcisch. Borettamik. p. 321, &c.) Aristides as an orator is much superior to the majority of rhetoricians in his time, whose great and only ambition was to shine and make a momentary impression by extempore speeches, and a brilliant and dazzling style. Aristides, with whom thought was of far greater importance than the form in which it appeared, expressed the difference between himself and the other rhetoricians, at his first interview with the emperor, M. Aurelius, by saying, "ο\lε\p\i\o\n \τ\e\p\i\o\k\o\l\o\s \v\a\l\d\a\a\l\o\s, \v\a\l\d\a\a\l\o\s \τ\e\p\i\o\k\o\l\o\s." (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9, § 2; Soph. Prolog. in Aristid. p. 738, ed. Dind.) He despised the silly puns, the shallow wit, and insignificant ornaments of his contemporaries, and sought nourishment for his mind in the study of the ancients. In his panegyrical orations, however, he often endeavours to display as much brilliancy of style as he can. On the whole his style is brief and concise, but too frequently deficient in ease and clearness. His sentiments are often trivial and spun out to an intolerable length, which leaves the reader nothing to think upon for himself. His orations remind us of a man who is fond of hearing himself talk. Notwithstanding these defects, however, Aristides is still unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries. His admirers compared him to Demosthenes, and even Aristides did not think himself much inferior. This vanity and self-sufficiency made him enemies and opponents, among whom are mentioned Palladius (Liban. Epist. 540), Sergius, and Porphyrius. (Suid. s. ve.) But the number of his admirers was far greater, and several learned grammarians wrote commentaries on his orations. Besides Athenaeus, Meander, and others, whose works are lost, we must mention especially Sophist of Agyae, who is probably the author of the Greek Prolegomena to the orations of Aristides, and also of some among the Scholia on Aristides, which have been published by Tremael (Scholia in Aristidis Orationes, Franklin
ARISTIDES.

1826, 3vo.), and by Dindorf (vol. iii. of his edition of Aristides), and which contain a great many things of importance for mythology, history, and antiquities. They also contain numerous fragments of works now lost. The greater part of these Scholia are probably compilations from the commentaries of Arctius, Metophernes, and other grammarians. Respecting the life of Aristides, compare J. Mason, Collectanea Historica Aristidis actu et vitam spectantia, ordinis chronologici digesta, in the edition of Jebb, and reprinted in that of Dindorf. The first edition of the orations of Aristides (53 in number) is that of Florence, 1517, fol. In 1566 W. Cantor published as Basel a Latin translation, in which many passages were skilfully corrected. This translation, together with the Greek text, was re-edited by P. Stephens, 1604, in 3 vols. 8vo. A better edition, with some of the Greek Scholia, is that of Samuel Jebb, Oxford, 1722, 2 vols. 4to. Many corrections of the text of this edition are contained in Reiske's Anecdota in Arist. Graec. vol. iii. Morelli published in 1761 the oration προς Ἀδριανὸν ὕπερ ἀρχαῖας, which he had discovered in a Venetian MS. It was afterwards edited again by F. A. Wolf, in his edition of Demosthenes' oration against Leptines (Halle, 1789), and by Graevius in his Editiones Graecae (Basle, 1797, 9vo). This edition of Graevius contains also an oration πρὸς Διονυσίου[p] προς ἀρχαῖας, which had been discovered by A. Mai, and published in his Nova Collect. Script. Vet. vol. i. p. 3. A complete edition of all the works of Aristides, which gives a correct text and all the Scholia, was published by W. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1829, 3 vols. 8vo. [L. S.]

ARISTIDES, ARTISTS. I. Of Thebes, was one of the most celebrated Greek painters. His father was Aristodemos, his teachers were Euxenius and his brother Nicomachus. (Plin. xxxv. 36. §§7, 22.) He was a somewhat older contemporary of Apelles (Plin. xxxv. 35. § 19), and flourished about 360-350 B.C. The point in which he most excelled is thus described by Pliny (c. c.): "Is omnium primus omnium pictor est senus hominum expressit, quae vivent Graecis ἑρωτήματα: "that is, he depicted the feelings, expressions, and passions which may be observed in common life. One of his finest pictures was that of a baby approaching the breast of its mother, who was mortally wounded, and whose fear could be plainly seen lest the child should suck blood instead of milk. (Anthol. Graec. ii. p. 251, Jacobs.) Fuseli (Lect. 1) has shown how admirably in this picture the artist drew the line between pity and disgust. Alexander admired the picture so much, that he removed it to Pella. Another of his pictures was a suppliant, whose voice you seemed almost to hear. Several other pictures of his are mentioned by Pliny (c. c), and among them an Iris (ib. 40. § 41), which, though unfinished, excited the greatest admiration. As examples of the high price set upon his works, Pliny (ib. 36. § 19) tells us, that he painted a picture for Mnasus, tyrant of Elatea, representing a battle with the Persians, and containing a hundred figures, for each of which Aristides received ten minae; and that long after his death, Attalus, king of Pergamus, gave a hundred talents for one of his pictures. (Ib. and vii. 39.) In another passage (xxxv. 8) Pliny tells us, that when Mummus was selling the spoils of Greece, Attalus bought a picture of Bacchus by Aristides for 600,000 stremorum, but that Mummus, having thus discovered the value of the picture, refused to sell it to Attalus, and took it to Rome, where it was placed in the temple of Ceres, and was the first foreign painting which was exposed to public view at Rome. The commentators are in doubt whether these two passages refer to the same picture. (See also Strab. viii. p. 381.) Aristides was celebrated for his pictures of courtisans, and hence he was called παραγγελος. (Athen. xiii. p. 367, b.) He was somewhat harsh in his colouring. (Plin. xxxv. 36. § 19.) According to some authorities, the invention of encaustic painting in wax (Dict. of Art. s. v. Painting, pp. 685, 686) was ascribed to Aristides, and his practice to Prazileus; but Pliny observes, that there were extant encaustic pictures of Polygnotus, Nicomachus, and Areius. (xxxv. 39.) Aristides left two sons, Nicwres and Ariston, to whom he taught his art. [Ariston; Nicwres.]

Another Aristides is mentioned as his disciple. (Plin. xxxv. 36. § 23.) The words of Pliny, which are at first sight somewhat obscure, are rightly explained in the following table by Sillig. (Catal. Art. s. v. Antwrides.)

2. A sculptor, who was celebrated for his statues of four-horsed and two-horsed chariots. Since he was the disciple of Polycleitus, he must have flourished about 338 B.C. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 12.) Perhaps he was the same person as the Aristides who made some improvements in the goals of the Olympic stadium. (Paus. vi. 20. § 7; Boeckh, Corp. Inscrip. i. p. 30.) [P. S.]

ARISTIDES, of Athens, one of the earliest Christian apologists, was at first a philosopher, and continued such after he became a Christian. He is described by Jerome as a most eloquent man. His apology for Christianity, which he presented to the Emperor Hadrian about 123 or 126 A. D., was imbued with the principles of the Greek philosophy. It is said that the apology of Justin, who was also a philosopher, was, to a great extent, an imitation of that of Aristides. The work of Aristides is entirely lost. (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 3, Chron. Armum; Hieron. de Vir. Hist. 20; Epist. ad Magn. Ovil. 84, p. 327.) [P. S.]

ARISTIDES, the author of a work entitled MILEXICA (Μηλεσιακα or Μηλεσιανος Μηλος), which was probably a romance, having Mileus for its scene. It was written in prose, and was of a licentious character. It extended to six books at the least. (Harpoen. s. v. δημησιας.) It was translated into Latin by L. Cornelius Sestine, a contemporary of Sulla, and it seems to have become popular with the Romans. (Plut. Crass. 32; Ovid. Trist. ii. 413, 414, 413, 444; Lucian, Amor. 1.) Aristides is reckoned as the inventor of the Greek romance, and the title of his work is supposed to have given rise to the term Milexica, as applied to works of fiction. Some writers think that his work was imitated by Appuleius in his Metamorphoses, and by Lucian in his Lucius.
ARISTEUS.

The age and country of Aristaeus are unknown, but the title of his work is thought to favor the conjecture that he was the native of Miletus. Vossius (do Hist. Græc. p. 401, et al. W. Wannm.) supposes, that he was the same person as the Aristaeus of Miletus, whose works on Sicilian, Italian, and Persian history (Σικυώνικα, Ιταλικά, Περσικά) are several times quoted by Plutarch (Pall.,) and that the author of the historical work Ἱστορία was also the same person. (Schol. Pind. Pyth. i. 14.) [P. S.]

ARISTIDES QUINTILLIANUS (Ἀριστείδης Κωνιτιλιανός), the author of a treatise in three books on music (Πελοπονησία). Nothing is known of his history, nor is he mentioned by any ancient writer. But he must have lived after Cicero, whom he quotes (p. 70), and before Marti- anus Capella, who has made use of this treatise in his work De Nuptiis Philologorum et Meretrici, lib. 9. It seems probable also that he must be placed before Ptolemy, since he does not mention the difference between that writer and his predecessors with respect to the number of the modes. (Aristoxenus reckoned 13, his followers 15, but Ptolemy only 7. See Aristeid, pp. 22, 23; Pol. Harr. i. 9.)

The work of Aristides is perhaps the most valuable of all the ancient musical treatises. It embraces, besides the theory of music (ἱρμονία) in the modern sense, the whole range of subjects comprehended under μουσική, which latter science contemplated not merely the regulation of sounds, but the harmonious disposition of everything in nature. The first book treats of Harmonics and Rhêgion; the former subject being considered under the usual heads of Sounds, Intervals, Systems, Genera, Modes, Transition, and Composition (μεθοδοτεία). The second, of the moral effects and educational powers of music; and the third of the numerical ratios which define musical intervals, and of their connexion with physical and moral science generally. Aristides refers (p. 87) to another work of his own, Πελοπονησία, which is lost. He makes no direct allusion to any of the ancient writers on music, except Aristoxenus.

The only edition of Aristides is that of Mebomius. It is printed, along with the latter part of the 5th book of Martianus Capella, in his collection entitled Antiquae Mestionis Anxores Septim. (1629, 4to.) In addition to several other ancient musical writers, is announced by Dr. J. Franzius of Berlin. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 269.) [W. F. D.]

ARISTIDES, of Samos, a writer mentioned by Varro in his work entitled "De Hebdomades," as an authority for the opinion, that the moon completed her circuit in twenty-eight days exactly. (Aul. Gell. N. A. iii. 10.) [P. S.]

ARISTENUS ALEXIUS. [ALEXIUS ARIS- TENUS.]

ARISTEUS (Ἀριστεύς), or ARISTEAS (Ἀριστεάς, Ηροδ.). 1. A Corinthian, son of Adamantius, commanded the troops sent by Corinth to maintain Pothinæ in its revolt, v. c. 492. With Pothinæ he was associated, and of the troops the actual number were volunteers, serving chiefly from attachment to him. Appointed on his arrival command-in-chief of the allied infantry, he encountered the Athenian Collins, but was outmanœuvred and defeated. With his own division he was successful, and with it on returning from the pursuit he found himself cut off, but by a bold course made his way with slight loss into the town. This was now blockaded, and Aristaeus, seeing no hope, bid them leave himself with garrison of 500, and the rest take their friend to town. This escape was effected, and he himself induced to join in it; after which he was occupied in petty warfare in Chalcidice, and negotiations for aid from Peloponnesus. Finally, not long before the surrender of Potidææ, in the second year of the war, n. c. 430, he set out with other ambassadors from Peloponnesus for the court of Persia; but visiting Sitalces the Odrysian in their way, they were given to Athenian ambassadors there by Sadoeus, his son, and sent to Athens; and at Athens, partly from fear of the energy and ability of Aristaeus, partly in retaliation for the cruelties practised by Sparta, he was immediately put to death. (Thuc. i. 59—63, ii. 67; Herod. vii. 127; Thirlwall's Græc. hist. lib. ii. p. 102—14, 162, 3.) [A. H. C.]

2. A Corinthian, son of Pellicus, one of the commanders of the Corinthian fleet sent against Epidamnæ, n. c. 436. (Thuc. i. 29.)

3. A Spartan commander, n. c. 423. (Thuc. iv. 182.)

4. An Argive, the son Cheimen, conquered in the Dolichos at the Olympic games. (Paus. vi. 9. § 1.)

ARISTIAS (Ἀριστιάς), a dramatic poet, the son of Pratinas, whose tomb Pausanias (ii. 15. § 5) saw at Philus, and whose Satyric dramas, with those of his father, were surpassed only by those of Aeschylus. (Paus. i. e.) ARISTIAS is mentioned in the life of Sophocles as one of the poets with whom the latter contended. Besides two dramas, which were undoubtedly Satyric, viz. the Κηρες and Cyclops, Aristias wrote three others, viz. Antaeas, Orpheus, and Atalante, which may have been tragedies. (Comp. Athen. x. p. 486 a; Pollux, vii. 31; Welcker, Die Griech. Tragödien, p. 966.)

ARISTION (Ἀριστίω), a philosopher either of the Epicurean or Peripatetic school, who made himself tyrant of Athens, and was besieged there by Sulla, n. c. 87, in the first Mithridatic war. His early history is preserved by Athenaeus (v. p. 211, &c.), on the authority of Posidonius of Apameia, the instructor of Cicero. By him he is called Athenion, whereas Pausanias, Appian, and Cassius mention him Athenus (L. c.). ARISTION is commonly called Athenus from the conjectures that his true name was Athenion, but that on enrolling himself as a citizen of Athens, he changed it to Aristion, a supposition confirmed by the case of one Sosias mentioned by Theophrastus, whose name was altered to Sosistratus under the same circumstances. Athenion or Aristion was the illegitimate son of a Peripatetic, also named Athenion, to whose property he succeeded, and so became an Athenian citizen. He married early, and began at the same time to teach philosophy, which he did with great success at Messene and Larissa. On returning to Athens with a considerable fortune, he was named ambassador to Mithridates, king of Pontus, then at war with Rome, and became one of the most influential counsellors of that monarch. His letters to Athens represented the power of his patron in such glowing colours, that his countrymen began to conceive hopes of overthrowing the Roman yoke. Mithridates then sent him to Athens, where he soon contrived, through the king's patronage, to assume the tyranny. His government seems to have been of the most cruel character, so that he is spoken of with abhorrence by Pindar (Proc. or. Reip. p. 309), and classed by him with Nabis and Callinicus. He sent Apelle- lion of Teos to plunder the sacred treasury of Delos, [APELION], though Appian (Mithr. p. 189) says, that this had already been done for him by Mithridates, and adds, that it was by means of the money resulting from this robbery that Aristion was enabled to obtain the supreme power. Meantime Sulla landed in Greece, and immediately laid siege to Athens and the Piraeus, the latter of which was occupied by Archelaus, the general of Mithridates. The sufferings within the city from famine were so dreadful, that men are said to have even devoured the dead bodies of their companions. At last Athens was taken by storm, and Sulla gave orders that no news nor age. Aristion fled to the Acropolis, having first burnt the Odeum, lest Sulla should use the wood-work of that building for battering-rams and other instruments of attack. The Acropolis, however, was soon taken, and Aristion dragged to execution from the altar of Minerva. To the divine vengeance for this iniquity Pausianias (i. 20. § 4) attributes the lep- tome disease which afterwards terminated Sulla's life.

ARYSTON (Ἀριστιῶ), a sanguine, probably belonging to the Alexandrian school, was the son of Pasistratus, who belonged to the same profession. (Orith. i. 24. 36, pp. 180, 183.) Nothing is known of the events of his life; with respect to his date, he may be conjectured to have lived in the second or first century B. C., as he lived after Nymphodorus (Orith. ubi p. 180), and before Heliodorus (p. 161). [W. A. G.]

ARISTIPPOS (Ἀριστιππός). 1. Of Larissa, in Thessaly, an Aulec, received lessons from Gorgias when he visited Thessaly. Aristippus obtained money and troops from the younger Cyrus to resist a faction opposed to him, and placed Menon, with whom he lived in a disreputable manner, over these forces. (Xen. Anab. l. i. § 10, ii. § 28; Plat. Menon, init.)

2. An Argive, who obtained the supreme power at Argos through the aid of Antigonus Gonatas, about n. c. 272. (Plut. Psych. 90.)

Aristippus, a poor person from the preceding, who also became tyrant of Argos after the murder of Aristomachus I., in the time of Amrus. He is described by Pindar as a perfect tyrant in our sense of the word. Amrus made many attempts to deprive him of the tyranny, but at first without success; but Aristippus at length fell in a battle against Amrus, and was succeeded in the tyranny by Aristomachus II. (Plut. Arol. 23, &c.)

ARISTIPUS FUSCUS. [FUSCUS.]

ARISTIPUS (Ἀριστιππός), son of Aristodes, born at Cyrene, and founder of the Cyrenic School of Philosophy, came over to Greece to be present at the Olympic games, where he fell in with Ischomachus the agriculturist (whose praises are the subjects of Xenophon's Oeconomica), and by his description was filled with so ardent a desire to see Socrates, that he went to Athens for the purpose (Plut. de Caris. 2), and remained with him almost up to the time of his execution, n. c. 399. Diodorus (xv. 70) gives b. c. 356 as the date of Aristippus, which agrees very well with the facts which we know about him, and with the statement (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plat. 179), that Lais, the courteous with whom he was intimate, was born b. c. 421.

Though a disciple of Socrates, he wandered both in principle and practice very far from the teaching and example of his great master. He was luxurious in his mode of living; he indulged in sensual gratifications, and the society of the notorious Lais; he took money for his teaching (being the first of the disciples of Socrates who did so, Diog. Laert. ii. 83), and avowed to his instructor for residence in a foreign land in order to escape the trouble of mixing in the politics of his native city. (Xen. Mem. ii. i.) He passed part of his life at the court of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, and is also said to have been taken prisoner by Arit- phernes, the satrap who drove the Spartans from Rhodes n. c. 336. (Diod. Sib. xiv. 79; see Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 2, 3.) He appears, however, at last to have returned to Cyrene, and there he spent his old age. The anecdotes which are told of him, and of which we find a most tedious number in Diogenes Laertius (ii. 85, &c.), by no means give us the notion of a person who was the mere slave of his passions, but rather of one who took a pride in extracting enjoyment from all circumstances of every kind, and in controlling adversity and pros- perity alike. They illustrate and confirm the two statements of Horace (Ep. i. 1. 18), that to observe the precepts of Aristippus is "mali res, non me rebus subjungere," and (i. 17. 23) that, "omnia Aristippum decuit color et states et res." Thus when reproached for his love of bodily indulgences, he answered, that there was no shame in enjoying them, but that it would be disgraceful if he could not at any time give them up. When Dionysius, provoked at some of his remarks, ordered him to take the lowest place at table, he said, " You wish to dignify the seat." Whether he was pris- oner to a satrap, or grossly insulted and even spit upon by a tyrant, or enjoying the pleasures of a banquet, or reviled for faithlessness to Socrates by his fellow-pupils, he maintained the same calm temper. To Xenophon and Plato he was very ob- noxious, as we see from the Memorabilia (i. c.), where he maintains an odious discussion against Socrates in defence of voluptuous enjoyment, and from the Phaedo (p. 59 c), where his absence at the death of Socrates, though he was only at Aquia, 200 stadia from Athens, is doubtless men- tioned as a reproach. (See Stahlbaum's note.) Aristotle, too, calls him a sophist (Metaph. ii. 3), and notices a story of Plato speaking to him with rather undue vehemence, and of his replying with calmness. (Ibid. ii. 25.) He imparted his doctrine to his daughter Arate, by whom it was communicated to her son, the younger Aristippus (hence called μετροβδεῖας), and by him it is said to have been reduced to a system. Laelius, on the authority of Sotion (a. c. 205) and Panae- tius (a. c. 143), gives a long list of books whose authorship is ascribed to Aristippus, though he also says that Socrates of Rhodes (a. c. 255) states, that he wrote nothing. Among these are treatises Ἀριστείας, Ἀριστοκρατία, and many others. Some epistles attributed to him are deservedly rejected as forgeries by Bentley. (Dissertation on Phalaris, § 8, p. 104.) One of these is to Arete, and its spuriously is proved, among other arguments, by the occurrence in it of the name of a city near Cyrone, Bepeiln, which must have been given by the Macedonians, in whose dialect B stands for Ph, so that the name is equivalent to Pepeiln, the victorians.

We shall now give a short view of the leading doctrines of the earlier Cyrenian school in general, though it is not to be understood that the system was wholly or even chiefly drawn up by the elder Aristippus; but, as it is impossible from the loss of contemporary documents to separate the parts which belong to each of the Cyrenian philosophers, it is better here to combine them all.
From the fact pointed out by Ritter (Geschichte der Philosophie, vii. 3), that Aristotle states Eudoxus rather than Aristippus as the representative of the docline that pleasure is the summum bonum (Eth.
Nic. x. 2), it seems probable that little of the Cyrenian system is due to the founder of the school.*

The Cyrenians despised Physics, and limited their inquiries to Ethics, though they included under that term a much wider range of science than can fairly be termed, as belonging to it. So too, Aristotle scoffs Aristippus of neglecting mathematics, as a study not concerned with good and evil, which, he said, are the objects even of the craftsmen and carpenter. (Metaphys. ii. 2.) They divided Philosophy into five parts, viz. the study of (1) Objects of Desire and Aversion, (2) Feelings and Affections, (3) Actions, (4) Causes, (5) Proofs. Of these (4) is clearly connected with physics, and (5) with logic.

1. The first of the five divisions of science is the only one in which the Cyrenian view is con-ected with the Socratic. Socrates considered happiness (i.e. the enjoyment of a well-ordered mind) to be the aim of all men, and Aristippus, taking up this position, pronounced pleasure the chief good, and pain the chief evil; in proof of which he referred to the natural feelings of men, children, and animals; but he wished the mind to preserve its authority in the midst of pleasure.
Desire he could not admit into his system, as it subjects men to hope and fear: the τέλος of human life was momentary pleasure (μορφέριν, μερινή).
For the Present only is ours, the Past is gone, and the Future uncertain; present happiness therefore is to be sought, and not εἶδοςμονική, which is only the sum of a number of happy states, just as he considered ὕπο in general the sum of particular states of the soul. In this point the Cyrenians were opposed to the Epicureans. All pleasures were held equal, though they might ad-mitt of a difference in the degree of their purity.
So that a man ought never to covet more than he possesses, and should never allow himself to be overcome by sensual enjoyment. It is plain that, even with these concessions, the Cyrenian system destroys all moral unity, by proposing to a man as many separate τέλος as his life contains moments.

2. The next point is to determine what is plea-
* Ritter believes that Aristippus is limited at (Eth. Nio. x. 0), where Aristotle refutes the opinion, that happiness consists in amusement, and speaks of persons holding such a dogma in order to recommend themselves to the favour of tyrants.

sure and what pain. Both are positive, i.e. pleasure is not the gratification of a want, nor does the absence of pleasure equal pain. The absence of either is a mere negative inactive state, and both pleasure and pain are motions of the soul (ἐν κινεστώ). Pain was defined to be a violent, pleasure a moderate motion,—the first being compared to the sea in a storm, the second to the sea under a light breeze, the intermediate state of no-pleasure and no-pain to a calm—a calm not quite opposite, since a calm is not the middle state between a storm and a gentle breeze. In this doctrine of pleasure as a state of rest, we find Aristippus again opposed to Epicurus.

3. Actions are in themselves morally indifferent, the only question for us to consider being their result; and law and custom are the only authorities which make an action good or bad. This monstrous dogma was a little qualified by the statement, that the advantages of injustice are slight; but we cannot agree with Brucker (Hist.
Crit. ii. 2), that it is not clear whether the Cyre-nians meant the law of nature or of men. For Laertius says expressly, δ οὐσίως υπάρχει ἀπόθεμα πράξεως διὰ τὸ ἐνεχθέντεις ἡμῖν καλόν, καὶ to suppose a law of nature would be to destroy the whole Cyrenian system. Whatever conduces to pleasure, is virtue—a definition which of course includes bodily exercise; but they seem to have conceded to Socrates, that the mind has the greatest share in virtue. We are told that they preferred bodily to mental pleasure; but this statement must be qualified, as they did not even confine their pleasures to selfish gratification, but admitted the welfare of the state as a legitimate source of happiness, and bodily pleasure itself they valued for the sake of the mental state resulting from it.

4. There is no universality in human conceptions; the senses are the only avenues of knowlledge, and even these admit a very limited range of information. For the Cyrenians said, that men could agree neither in judgments nor notions, in nothing, in fact, but names. We have all certain sensations, which we call white or sweet;
but whether the sensation which A calls white is similar to that which B calls by that name, we cannot tell; for by the common term white every man denotes a distinct object. Of the causes which produce these sensations we are quite ignorant; and from all this we come to the doctrine of modern philosophical metaphysics, that truth is what each man wroueth. All states of mind are notions; nothing exists but states of mind, and they are not the same to all men. True wisdom consists therefore in transforming disagreeable into agreeable sensations.

5. As to the Cyrenian doctrine of proofs, no evidence remains.

In many of these opinions we recognize the happy, careless, selfish disposition which characterized their author; and the system resembles in most points those of Heracleitus and Protagoras, as given in Plato's Theaetetus. The doctrines that a subject only knows objects through the prism of the impression which he receives, and that man is the measure of all things, are stated or implied in the Cyrenian system, and lead at once to the consequence, that what we call reality is appearance; so that the whole fabric of human knowledge becomes a fantastic picture. The principle on which all this rests, viz. that knowledge is sensation, is the foundation of Locke's modern ideology, though he did not perceive its connection with the consequences to which it led the Cyreniacs. To revive these was regarded for Hume.

The ancient authorities on this subject are Dios- genes Laërtius, ii. 65, &c.; Sextus Empiricus, ad. Math. vi. 11; the places in Xenophon and Aris- topolus already referred to; Cic. Tusc. iii. 13, 22, Acad. iv. 7, 46; Euseb. Præp. Evang. xiv. 18, &c.

ARISTOTLE (Ἀριστοτέλης), the best, a surname of Artemis at Athens. (Paus. l. 29, § 2.) [L. S.]

T. ARISTO, a distinguished Roman jurist, who lived under the emperor Trajan, and was a friend of the Younger Pliny. He is spoken of by Pliny (Epist. 22) in terms of the highest praise, as not only an excellent man and profound scholar, but a lawyer thoroughly acquainted with private and public law, and perfectly skilled in the practice of his profession—in short, living Thesaurus Juris. Of his merits as an author, Pliny does not speak; and though his works are occasionally mentioned in the Digest, there is no direct extract from any of them in that compilation. He wrote notes on the Libri Posteriorum of Laber, on Cassius, whose pupil he had been, and on Sabinus. "Aristo in decretis Frontoii," or Prontoii, is once cited in the Digest (29. tit. 2. s. ult.); but what those decrees were has never been satisfactorily explained.

He corresponded with his contemporary jurists, Celsus and Nepos, and Pliny. (Cels. 17. 9; Nepos. 20. 3. 3. 40. 7. 29. § 1); and it appears to us to be probable that many of the responsa and epistolae of the Roman jurists were not opinions upon cases occurring in actual practice, but answers to the hypothetical questions of pupils and legal friends. Other works, besides those which we have mentioned, have been attributed to him without sufficient cause. Some, for example, have been passed as being the work of Gellius (xi. 18), that he wrote de juria; and, from passages in the Digest (21. tit. 8. s. 44. pr.; 8. tit. 5. s. 8. § 5; 28. tit. 2. s. 40), that he published books under the name Digiesia and Respexia. In philosophy, this model of a virtuous lawyer is described by Pliny as a genuine disciple of the Porch. He has been usually supposed to belong to the legal sect of ARISTOCLEUS, prince of Judea. 1. The eldest son of Joachim. Hyrcanus, in b.c. 110 we find him, together with his younger brother Antigonus, successfully prosecuting for his father the siege of Samaria, which was destroyed in the following year. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 10, §§ 2, 3; Bell. Jud. i. 2. § 7.) Hyrcanus dying in 107, Aristobulus took the title of king, this being the first instance of the assumption of that name among the Jews since the Babylonian captivity (but comp. Strab. xvi. p. 762), and secured his power by the imprisonment of all his brothers except his favourite Antigonus, and by the murder of his mother, to whom Hyrcanus had left the government by will. The life of Antigonus himself was soon sacrificed to his brother's suspicions through the intrigues of the queen and her party, and the remorse felt by Aristobulus for this deed increased the ill fortune under which he was suffering at the time, and hastened his death. (b. c. 106.) In his reign the Iumaeans were subdued and compelled to adopt the observance of the Jewish law. He also received the name of Αὐτοκράτωρ from the favour which he showed the Greeks. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 11; Bell. Jud. i. 8.)

2. The younger son of Alexander Janneaus and Alexandra. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16. § 1; Bell. Jud. 1. 5. § 1.) During the nine years of his mother's reign he acted himself against the party of the Pharisees, whose influence she had restored; and after her death, n. c. 70, he made war against his eldest brother Hyrcanus, and obtained from him the renunciation of the crown and the high-priesthood, chiefly through the aid of his father's friends, whom Alexander had placed in the several fortresses of the kingdom to save them from the vengeance of the Pharisees. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16, xiv. 1 § 2; Bell. Jud. i. 5, 6, § 1.) In n. c. 65 Judaea was invaded by Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, with whom, at the instigation of Antipater the Idumaean, Hyrcanus had taken refuge. By him Aristobulus was defeated in a battle and besieged in Jerusalem; but Aretas was obliged to raise the siege by Scaurus and Gabinius, Pompey's lieutenants, whose intervention Aristobulus had purchased. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 2, 3 § 2; Bell. Jud. i. 6, §§ 2, 3.) In n. c. 63, he pleaded his cause before Pompey at Damascus, and, finding him disposed to favour Hyrcanus, he returned to Judea and prepared for war. On Pompey's approach, Aristobulus, who had fled to the fortress of Alexander, was persuaded to obey his summons and appear before him; and, being compelled to sign an order for the surrender of his garrisons, withdrew in impotent discontent to Jerusalem. Pompey still advanced, and Aristobulus again met him and made submission; but, his friends in the city refusing to perform the terms, Pompey besieged and took Jerusalem, and carried away Aristobulus and his children as prisoners. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3, 4; Bell. Jud. i. 6, 7; Plut. Pompey. cc. 39, 43; Strab. vi. p. 763; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 15, 16.) Appian (Anab. i. 17) erroneously reports that Aristobulus had been put to death immediately after Pompey's triumph. In n. c. 57, he escaped from his confinement at Rome with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judea, was joined by large numbers of his countrymen and renewed the war; but he was besieged and taken at Machaeus, the fortifications of which he was attempting to restore, and was sent back to Rome by Gabinius. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 6. § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 8, § 6; Plut. Ant. c. 3; Dion Cass. xxxix. 56.) In n. c. 49, he was again released by Julius Caesar, who sent him into Judea to forward his interests there; he was, however, poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7. § 4; Bell. Jud. i. 9. § 1; Dion Cass. xii. 13.)

3. Grandson of No. 2, was the son of Alexander and brother of Herod's wife Mariamne. His mother, Mariamne, inimical to Herod's having conferred the high-priesthood on the obscure Annæus, endeavoured to obtain that office for her son from Antony through the influence of Cleopatra. Herod, fearing the consequences of this application, and urged by Mariamne's entreaties, deposed Annæus and made Aristobulus high-priest, the latter being only 17 years old at the time. The king, however, still suspecting Alexander, and keeping a strict and annoying watch upon her movements, she renewed her complaints and de- signs against him with Cleopatra, and at length made an attempt to escape into Egypt with her son. Herod discovered this, and arrested to par- don it; but soon after he caused Aristobulus to be treacherously drowned at Jericho, n. c. 55. (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 2, 3; Bell. Jud. ii. 22. § 2.)

4. One of the sons of Herod the Great by Mariamne, was sent with his brother Alexander to Rome, and educated in the house of Flóvio. (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10. § 1.) On their return to Judea, the suspicions of Herod were excited against them by their brother Antipater (Antipater), aided by Pharonas and their aunt Salome, though Bernice, the daughter of the latter, was married to Aristobulus; the young men themselves supplying their enemies with a handle against them by the indirect expression of their indignation at their mother's death. In n. c. 11, they were ac- cepted by Herod at Aqueleia before Augustus, through whose mediation, however, he was recon- ciled to them. Three years after, Aristobulus was again involved with his brother in a charge of plotting against their father, but a second reconcilia- tion was effected by Archelaus, king of Cappa- docia, the father-in-law of Alexander. A third accusation, through the arts of Burydes, the Lacedæmonian adventurer, proved fatal: by permis- sion of Augustus, the two young men were ar- maigned by Herod before a council convened at Berytus (at which they were not even allowed to be permitted to defend themselves), and, being con- demned, were soon after strangled at Sebaste, n. c. 6. (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 1—4, 8, 10, 11; Bell. Jud. i. 23—27; comp. Strab. vi. p. 765.)

5. Surnamed the Younger (ὁ μικρότερος, Joseph. Ant. xx. 1. § 2) was son of Aristobulus and Bere- nice, and grandson of Herod the Great. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4; Bell. Jud. i. 28. § 1.) Himself and his two brothers—Agrippa I., and Herod the future king of Chalcis,—were educated at Rome together with Claudius, who was afterwards em- ployed as their secretary. They were always regarded Aristobulus with great favour. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. § 4, 6. § 1, xx. 1. § 2.) He lived at enmity with his brother Agrippa, and drove him from the protection of Flaccus, proconsul of Syria, by the charge of having been bribed by the Damascenes to support their cause with the proconsul against the Sidonians. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. § 3.) When Caligula sent Petronius to Jerusalem to set up his statues in the temple, we find Aristobulus joining in the remonstrance against the measure. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8; Bell. Jud. ii. 10; Tac. Ann. v. 9.) He died as he had lived, in a private station (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 11 § 6), having, as appears from the letter of Claudius to the Jews (Joseph. Ant. xx. 1. § 2), survived his brother Agrippa, whose death took place in a. d. 44. He was married to Iotapa, a princess of Emessus, by whom he left a daughter of the same name. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. § 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 11. § 6.)

6. Son of Herod king of Chalcis, grandson of the Aristobulus who was strangled at Sebaste, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In a. d. 55, Nero made Aristobulus king of Armenia Minor, in order to secure that province from the Parthians, and in a. d. 61 added to his dominions some portion of the Greater Armenia which had been given to Tiganes. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 8. § 4; Tac. Ann. xiii. 7, xxv. 29.) Aristobulus have always been regarded (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 7. § 1) to have obtained from the Romans his father's kingdom of Chalcis, which had been taken from his cousin Agrippa II., in a. d. 52; and he is mentioned as joining Caesennius Paetus, proconsul of Syria, in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in the 4th year of Vespasian, a. d. 73. (Joseph. l. c.) He was mar- ried to Salome, daughter of the infamous Herodias, by whom he had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς), a priestess in Delphi, from whom Pythagoras said that he had received many of his precepts. (Porphyry. Phys. 41.
p. 41, ed. Köster.) She is called Themistoclea in Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 21), and Theoclea in Suidas. (s. v. Πυθαγώρας.) Pythagoras is said to have written a letter to her. See Fabric. Bibl.
Græca. i. p. 881.

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς) of Agina, son of Aristocles of Argos, won the victory in the Panathenaeum in the Nemean Games, but it is not known in what Olympiad. Diessen conjectures that it was gained before the battle of Salamis.
The third Nemean of Pindar is in his honour.

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς), a celebrated player on the cithara, who traced his descent from Terpander, lived in the time of the Persian War. He was the master of Phrynis of Mytilene. (Schol. ad. Aristoph. Nub. 985; Suidas,
s. v. Φρύνης.) [P. H.]

ARISTOCLETUS (Ἀριστόκλετος), as he is called by Plutarch (Lycurg. c. 2), or Aristocrates (Ἀριστόκρατος) or Aristocrates (Ἀριστοκράτης), as he is called by Pausanias, (iii. 6. § 4, 4. §§ 3, 5, vi. 3. § 6, 6.,) the father of Lycurgus, the Spartan lawgiver.

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς). 1. Of Rhodes, a Greek grammarian and rhetorician, who was a contemporary of Strabo, (v. 6. p. 655.) He is probably the writer of whom Ammianus (de Dif.
Voc. sub epičeks) mentions a work πείρα ποιημάτων. There are several other works: viz.
πείρα διάλεκτος (Etymol. M. s. v. εἰδέα; comp.
Cramer’s Anecdol. i. 231, iii. p. 293), Διάκων ποιημάτων (Athen. iv. p. 140), and a work on the history of Italy, of which Plutarch (Pavl.Minor, 25. 41) mentions the third book,—which are ascribed to Aristocles; but whether all or only some of them belong to Aristocles the Rhodian, is uncertain. (Compare Clem. Alex. Strorn. vi. p. 267; Varr. de Ling. Lat. x. 10, 75, ed. Müller; Dionys.
Hal. Diardol. 6.)

2. Of Pergamus, a sophist and rhetorician, who lived at the time of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian. He spent the early part of his life upon the study of the Peripatetic philosophy, and during this period he completely neglected his outward appearance. But afterwards he was seized by the desire of becoming a rhetorician, and went to Rome, where he enrolled himself among the pupils of Herodes Atticus. After his return to Pergamus, he made a complete change in his mode of life, and appears to have enjoyed a great reputation as a teacher of rhetoric. His declarations are praised for their perspicuity and for the purity of the Attic Greek; but they were wanting in passion and animation, and resembled philosophic discussions.
Seneca gives himself as having written a work on rhetoric (de ἐρμηνείας), letters, declarations, &c. (Philosc. V. Soph. ii. 3; Suidas, s. v. Ἀριστοκλῆς; Eudoci. p. 66.)

3. Of Messene, a Peripatetic philosopher, whose age is uncertain, some placing him three centuries before and others two centuries after Christ.
But if the statement is correct, that he was the teacher of Alexander Aphrodisias (Cyll. c. Jul. ii. p. 61), he must have lived about the beginning of the third century after Christ. According to Suidas (s. v.)
and Eudoci. (p. 71,) he wrote several works:—
1. Πείρας ποιημάτων Ομηρός ἣν Ἡδέων. 2.
Πείρας ἐρμηνείας. 3. A work on the god Serapis.
4. A work on Ethics, in ten books; and 5. A work on Philosophy, likewise in ten books. The last of these works appears to have been written by him in the time of the philosophers, in which he practiced of their teachers, their schools, and doctrines.
Several fragments of it are preserved in Eusebius.
(Procop. Evang. xiv. 17-21, xvi. 2, 14; Comp. Theodoret. Théop. Serm. 8, and Suidas, who also mentions some other works of his.)

4. A Stoic philosopher, who wrote a commentary in four books on a work of Chrysippus. (Suid. s. v.
Ἀριστοκλῆς.)

5. A musician, to whom Athenaeus (iv. p. 174) attributes a work πείρας ἐρμηνείας.

6. The author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Append. Epigr. n. 7, ed. Tauchnitz.)

7. The author of a work called Παρθεσαίος, which consisted of several books. Jacobs (ad Antiloh. Gr. xiii. p. 862) is of opinion, that he is the same as the Messenian. Some fragments of his are preserved in Stobaeus (Florileg. 64, 37) and the Scholiast on Pindar. (Olymp. vii. 66.) [L. S.]

ARISTOCLETUS (Ἀριστόκλετος), a physician, whose medicines are several times quoted by 7, vol. xiiii. p. 277.) He is also mentioned in the first volume of Cramer’s Anecdota Graeca Parvi-nessnes, p. 323. Nothing is known of the events of his life, but he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς), sculptors. From different passages in Pausanias we learn the following particulars:—

(1.) Aristocles of Cydonia was one of the most ancient sculptors; and though his age could not be then fixed, it was certain that he flourished before Zanale was called Messone (Paus. v. 25. § 6), that is, before 494 B.C.

(2.) The starting-pillar of the Hippodrome at Olympia was made by Clecetas, the same sculptor by whom there was a statue at Athens bearing this inscription:

Αἰτήτωσι Οἰμαίης εἴρητο πρώτος Τίτιξ ἐν Κλέεται δίδο Ἀριστοκλῆς.

(vi. 20. § 7.)

(3.) There was an Aristocles, the pupil and son of Clecetas. (v. 24. § 1.)

(4.) Aristocles of Sicyon was the brother of Canachus, and not much inferior to him in reputation. This Aristocles had a pupil, Symnoe, who was the father and teacher of Ptolemaeus of Aegina. (vi. 9. § 1.) We are also told, in an epigram by Antipater Silonius (Greech Antiloh. ii. p. 15, no. 35, Jacobs), that Aristocles made one of three statues of the Muses, the other two of which were made by Aegladis and Canachus. [AEGLADAS.]

(5.) Socrates of Chios, the disciple and son of Sostratus, was the seventh disciple reckoned in order from Aristocles of Sicyon (Paus. vi. 3. § 4), that is, according to a mode of reckoning which was common with the Greeks, counting both the first and the last of the series.

From these passages we infer, that there were two sculptors of this name: Aristocles the elder, who is called both a Cydathene and a Sicyonian, ARISTOCRATES.

probably because he was born at Cydima and practiced and taught his art in Sicyon; and Aristocles the younger, of Sicyon, who was the grandson of the former, son of Cleocles, and brother of Canachus; and that these artists founded a school of sculpture at Sicyon, which secured an hereditary reputation, and of which we have the heads for seven generations, namely, Aristocles, Cleocles, Aristocles, Canachus, Symmoên, Polichus, Sostratus, and Pantias.

There is some difficulty in determining the age of these artists; but, supposing the date of Canachus to be fixed at about 540—508 b. c. [Canachus], we have the date of his brother, the younger Aristocles, and allowing 30 years to a generation, the elder Aristocles must have lived about 600—568 b. c. Böckh (Corp. Inscription. i. p. 39) places him immediately before the period when Zande was first called Messene, but there is nothing in the words of Pausanias to require such a restriction. By extending the calculation to the other artists mentioned above, we get the following table of dates:

1. Aristocles flourished 600 to 568 b. c.
2. Cleocles 570—533
3. Aristocles 540—508
4. Canachus 510—478
5. Polichus 480—448
6. Sostratus 450—418
7. Pantias 420—383

These dates are found to agree very well with all that we know of the artists. (See the respective articles of Cleocles, Aristocles, Canachus, and Polichus, Art. a c.)

ARISTOCRATIDES, a painter mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 11. s. 40) as one of those who deserved to be ranked next to the masters in their art. His age and country are unknown. He painted the temple of Apollo at Delphi. [C. P. M.]

ARISTOCRATES (Ἀριστοκράτης). 1. King of Orchomenus in Arcadia, son of Aegeus, was stoned to death by his people for violating the mistletoe in the temple of Artemis Hynamia. (Paus. viii. 5. § 8, 13. § 4.)

2. King of Orchomenus in Arcadia, son of Hero-tas, and grandson of the preceding, was the leader of the Arcadians in the second Messenian war, when they espoused with other nations in the Peloponnesian side of the Messenians. He was bribed by the Lacedaemonians, and was guilty of treachery at the battle of the Trench; and when this was discovered some years afterwards, he was stored to death by the Arcadians. His family was deprived of the sovereignty according to Pausanias, or completely destroyed according to Polybius; but the latter statement at all events cannot be correct, as we find that his son Aristodamus ruled over Orchomenus and a great part of Arcadia. The date of Aristocrates appears to have been about b. c. 680—640. (Strab. viii. p. 362; Paus. iv. 17. § 4, 22. § 2, cc. viii. 5. § 8; Polyb. iii. 33; Plut. de sera Num. Vind. c. 2; Müller, Apog. Inscription. p. 65, Dor. i. 7. § 11.)

3. The son of Scelias. See below.

4. A person against whom Demosthenes wrote an oration. He wrote it for Euthycles, who accused Aristocrates of proposing an illegal decree in relation to Chaeremon. [CHARIDEMUS.]

5. General of the Rhodians, about b. c. 154, apparently in the war against the Creteans. (Polyb. xxxiii. 9, with Schweighäuser's note.)

6. An historian, the son of Hipparchus, and a Spartan, wrote a work on Lacedaemonian affairs (Ἀκακευράματι), of which Athenaeus (iii. p. 82, e) quotes the fourth book, and which is also referred to by Pindar (Lyric. 4, 31, Philop. 16), and other writers. (Steph. a e. Αδέαπτος; Schol. ad Soph. Thoc. 270.)

ARISTOCRATES (Ἀριστοκράτης), an Athenian of wealth and influence (Plat. Garg. p. 472, a, xix.), son of Scelias, attached himself to the oligarchical party, and was a member of the government of the Four Hundred, which, however, he was, together with Theramenes, a main instrument in overthrowing. (Thuc. vii. 89, 90; Lyc. c. Ctes. p. 126; Democrit. Thoc. 1343.) Aristophanes (Ajax 126) refers to him with a punning allusion to his name and politics. In 407, when Alcibiades, on his return to Athens, was made commander-in-chief, Aristocrates and Adaeimauts were elected generals of the land forces under him. (Xen. Hell. i. 4. § 21; comp. Diod. xiii. 69; Nep. Alex. c. 7.)

In the same year, Aristocrates was appointed one of the ten commanders who superseded Alcibiades, and he was among the six who were brought to trial and executed after the battle of Arginusae, b. c. 406. (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 16, 6. § 29, 7. §§ 2, 34; Diod. xiii. 74, 101.) [B. E.]

ARISTOCRATES (Ἀριστοκράτης), a grammarian, whose remedy for the tooth-ache was sponsored by Andromachus (sp. Gal. De Compson Medicum. soc. Loc. v. 5, vol. xii. pp. 878, 879), and who must therefore have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. He is also mentioned in the first volume of Crater. Anacoloota Graece Parisionia, p. 395. [W. A. G.]

ARISTOCRATES (Ἀριστοκράτης), a son of the sister of Chrysippus, and a pupil of the latter. (Diog. LÆt. vii. 135; Plut. de Stoic. Repugn. p. 1035.) Whether this is the same Aristocrates, as the one who wrote a description of the world or at least of Egypt, is uncertain. (Plin. H. N. iv. 9. § 16, vi. 29. s. 35, 50. s. 35; Asiam, H. A. vii. 481.)

ARISTOCRITES (Ἀριστοκρίτης). 1. Father of Lysander. [ARISTOCRITUS.]

2. A Greek writer upon Miletus (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 186), who is quoted by Parthenius (i. 11), and Pliny. (II. N. vi. 31. s. 37.)

ARISTOCRATUS (Ἀριστοκράτωρ), a son of Philoclymenus, whom Solon visited, the king of Soli in Cyprus, fell in the battle against the Persians, b. c. 498. (Herod. vi. 113.)
ARISTODEMUS.

ARISTODEME (Ἀριστοδέμη), a Sicilian woman, who, according to a local tradition of Sicily, became the mother of Aristeides Aspasia, in the form of a dragon (serpent). A banquet of her and the dragon existed at Sicyn in the temple of Asclepius. (Paus. ii. 10. § 3. iv. 14. § 5.) A daughter of Priam of this name occurs in Apollod. iii. 12. § 5. [L. S.]

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), a son of Aristocles, and a descendant of Hercules, was married to Argeia, by whom he became the father of Eurythymes and Procles. According to some traditions Aristodemus was killed at Naupetia by a flash of lightning, just as he was settling out on his expedition to Peloponnesus (Apollod. ii. 8. § 2, &c.), or by an arrow of Apollo at Delphi because he had consulted Hercules about the return of the Heracles instead of the Delphic oracle (Paus. iii. 1. § 5.) According to this tradition, Eurythymes and Procles were the first Heracleid kings of Laedamedon; but a Lacedaemonian tradition stated, that Aristodemus himself came to Sparta, was the first king of his race, and died a natural death. (Herod. vi. 52; Xenoph. Agesil. 8. § 7.) Another Heracleid of this name, the grandfather of the former, is mentioned by Euripides. (Ap. Schol. ad Pind. Isth. iv. 164.) [L. S.]

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), the Spartan, when the last battle at Thermopylae was expected, was lying with Eurytus sick at Alpen; or as others related, he was in bed together, on an empty bed at the camp. Eurytus returned and fell among the Three Hundred. Aristodemus went home to Sparta. The Spartans made him dignus; "no man gave him light for his fire, no man spoke with him; he was called Aristodemus the coward" (ος τρεπσας seems to have been the legal title; comp. Diod. xix. 70). Stung with his treatment, next year at Phthoe, B. c. 479, he fell in doing away with his disgrace by the wildest feats of valor. The Spartans, however, though they removed his dignus, refused him a share in the honours they paid to his fellows, Poseidonius, Philetocles, and Ammononeutes, though he had outdone them. (Herod. vii. 229—231; see Vahlen. and Bihler, ad loc., ix. 71; Suidas, s. v. Αριστόδημος.)

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), a Sicilian, who appears as one of the chief heroes in the first Messenian war. In the sixth year of that war the Messenians sent to Delphi to consult the oracle, and the ambassador Tisrors brought back the answer, that the preservation of the Messenian state demanded that a maiden of the house of the Aegyptis should be sacrificed to the gods of the lower world. When the daughter of Lycias was drawn by lot, the seer Epeolus declared that she was a suppositional child, and not a daughter of Lycias. Hereupon Lycias left his country and went over to the Lacedaemonians. As, however, the oracle had added, that if, for some reason, the maiden chosen by lot could not be sacrificed, another might be chosen in her stead, Aristodemus, a gallant warrior, who likewise belonged to the house of the Aegyptis, came forward and offered to sacrifice his own daughter for the deliverance of his country. A young Messenian, however, who loved the maiden, opposed the intention of her father, and declared that as he her betrothed had more power over her than her father. When this reason was not listened to, his love for the maiden drove him to despair, and in order to save her life, he declared that she was with child by him. Aristodemus, the father of her daughter, having heard these, opened her body to refute the calumny. The seer Epeolus, who was present, now demanded the sacrifice of another maiden, as the daughter of Aristodemus had not been sacrificed to the gods, but murdered by her father. But king Eurycles persuaded the Messenians, who, in their indignation, wanted to kill the lover, who had been the cause of the death of Aristodemus' daughter, that the command of the oracle was fulfilled, and as he was supported by the Aegyptis, the people accepted his counsel. (Paus. iv. 9. §§ 2—6; Diodor. Perigr. Vol. p. 7, ed. Dindorf; Euseb. Præp. Evg. v. 27.) When the news of the oracle and the manner of its fulfillment became known at Sparta, the Lacedaemonians were desponding, and for five years they abstained from attacking the Messenians, until at last some favourable signs in the sacrifices encouraged them to undertake a fresh campaign against Ithome. A battle was fought, in which king Eurycles lost his life, and as he left no heir to the throne, Aristodemus was elected king by the Messenians, notwithstanding the opposition of some, who declared him unworthy on account of the murder of his daughter. This happened about B. c. 729. Aristodemus showed himself worthy of the confidence placed in him: he continued the war against Sparta, which was always successful; and in 724 he gained a great victory over them. The Lacedaemonians now endeavored to effect by fraud what they had been unable to accomplish by force, and their success convinced Aristodemus that his country was devoted to destruction. In his despair he put an end to his life on the tomb of his daughter, and a short time after, B. c. 722, the Messenians were obliged to recognize the supremacy of the Lacedaemonians. (Paus. iv. 10—13.)

2. Tyrant of Cumae in Campania, a contemporary of Tarquinius Superbus. His history is related at great length by Dionysius. He was of a distinguished family, and surmounted Mahaed—respecting the meaning of which the ancients themselves are not agreed. By his bravery and popular arts, he gained the favour of the people; and having caused many of his enemies to be put to death, or sent into exile, he made himself tyrant of Cumae, B. c. 502. He secured his usurped power by surrounding himself with a strong body-guard, by disarming the people, removing the male descendants of the exiled nobles from the town, and compelling them to perform servile labour in the country. In addition to this, the whole of the young generation of Cumae were educated in an effeminate and enervating manner. In this way he maintained himself for several years, until at last the exiled nobles and their sons, supported by Campanians and mercenaries, recovered the possession of Cumae, and took cruel vengeance on Aristodemus and his family. (Dionys. Hal. v. 410, &c., ed. Sylb.; Diod. Perigr. vii, viii, in the 'Excerpta de Vita et Vit.’; Suidas, s. v. Αριστόδημος.) According to Plutarch (de Vita Mutila, p. 361), he assisted the Romans against the Etruscans, who endeavoured to restore the Tarquins. According to Livy (ii. 21), Tarquinius Superbus took refuge at the court of this tyrant, and died there. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 555, &c.)

3. Surnamed the Small (ὁ μικρός), a disciple of Socrates, who is reported to have had a conversation with him respecting sacrifices and divination, which Aristodemus despised. (Xen. Memor. Scis. i. 4 § 2, &c.) He was a great admirer of Socrates, whose society he sought as much as possible. He always walked barefoot, which he seems to have done in imitation of Socrates. (Plut. Sympos. p. 173, Phaed. p. 299.)

4. A tragic actor in Athens in the time of Philip of Macedon and Demosthenes. He took a prominent part in the political affairs of his time, and belonged to the party who saw no safety except in peace with Macedon. (Dem. de Corum. c. 232, de Falso Legg. pp. 344, 371.) Demosthenes (c. Philip. iii. p. 150) therefore treats him as a traitor to his country. He was an admirer of the Athenians in their negotiations with Philip, who was fond of him on account of his great talent for acting, and made use of him for his own purposes. (Dem. de Falso Legg. p. 442; comp. Cic. de Re Publ. iv. 11; Plut. Vit. X. Oraet.; Schol. ad Lucian, vol. ii. p. 7.) There was a tragic actor of the same name at Syracuse in the time of the first Punic war. (Liv. xxiv. 24.)

5. Of Miletus, a friend and flatterer of Antigonus, king of Asia, who sent him, in B.C. 315, to Peloponnesus with 1000 talents, and ordered him to maintain friendly relations with Polyperchon and his son Alexander, to collect as large a body of mercenaries as possible, and to conduct the war against Cassander. On his arrival in Laconia, he obtained permission from the Spartans to engage mercenaries in their country, and thus raised in Peloponnesus an army of 8000 men. The friendship with Polyperchon and his son Alexander was confirmed, and the former was made governor of the peninsula. Ptolemy, who was allied with Cassander, sent a fleet against the general and the allies of Antigonus, and Cassander made considerable conquests in Peloponnesus. After his departure, Aristodemus and Alexander at first endeavoured in common to persuade the towns to expel the garrisons of Cassander, and recover their independence. But Alexander soon allowed him to be made a traitor to the cause he had hitherto espoused, and was rewarded by Cassander with the chief command of his forces in the Peloponnesus. In B.C. 314, Aristodemus invited the Aetolians to impeach the king of Macedonia of Antigonus; and having raised a great number of mercenaries among them, he attacked Alexander, who was besieging Cylene, and compelled him to raise the siege. He then restored several other places, such as Patrae in Achaea and Dymae in Aetolia, to what was then called freedom. After this, B.C. 306, Aristodemus occurs once more in history. (Diod. xix. 57–66; Plut. Demetr. 16, 17.)

6. Tyrant of Megalopolis in the reign of Antigonus Gonatas, and shortly before the formation of the Achaean league. He was a native of Phigalea and a son of Artyle. He was one of those tyrants who were set up at that time in various parts of Greece through Macedonian influence. He was honoured by the surname Xepulos. In his reign, Cleomenes of Sparta and his eldest son Acrotatus invaded the territory of Megalopolis. A battle was fought, in which Aristodemus defeated the enemy and Acrotatus was slain. (Paus. viii. 27, § 8.) Aristodemus was assassinated afterwards by the emissaries of Ecdemus and Demophanes, two patriotic citizens of Megalopolis, and friends of young Philopomen. (Plut. Philop. 1.)

His sepulchral mound in the neighbourhood of Megalopolis was seen as late as the time of Pausanias. (viii. 36, § 3.)

[1. S.]

ARISTODEMUS (Αριστοδέμος), literary.

1. Of Nyssa in Caria, was a son of Menecrates, and a pupil of the celebrated grammarian, Aristarchus. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 1; Strab. xiv. p. 650.) He himself was a celebrated grammarian, and Strabo in his youth was a pupil of Aristodemus at Nyssa, who was then an old man. It is not improbable that the Aristodemus whom the Scholiast on Pindar (fr. 11) calls an Alexandrian, is the same as the Nyssan, who must have resided for some time at Alexandria.

2. Of Nyssa, a relation (διήρφυς) of the former. He was younger than the former, distinguished himself as a grammarian and rhetorician, and is mentioned among the instructors of Pompey the Great. During the earlier period of his life he taught rhetoric at Nyssa and Rhodes; in his latter years he resided at Rome and instructed the sons of Pompey in grammar. (Strab. xiv. p. 650.) One of these two grammarians wrote an historical work (ιστορίαι), the first book of which is quoted by Pausanias (Erol. 8), but whether it was the work of the elder or the younger Aristodemus, and what was the subject of it, cannot be decided. (Comp. Paus. xii. 25, 76, ed. Müller; Schol. ad Hom. ii. 354, xiii. 1.)

3. Of Elis, a Greek writer, who is referred to by Pausanias (σ. τ. Ελλαδικαῖς) as an author respecting the number of the Hellanodiceae. He is probably the same as the one mentioned by Tertullian (de An. 46) and Eusebius. (Chron. i. p. 37; comp. Synecellus, p. 370, ed. Dindorf.)

An Aristodemus is mentioned by Athenaeus (xi. p. 495) as the author of a commentary on Pindar, and is often referred to in the Scholia on Pindar, but whether he is the Elean or Nyssan, cannot be decided.

4. Of Thbes (Schol. ad Theoret. vii. 103), wrote a work on his native city (Θηβαίων τῆς), which is often referred to by ancient authors, and appears to have treated principally of the antiquities of Thbes. Sidius (σ. Ἀριστομένων, Αριστοδέμους, Αριστοτέμους, Αριστοδέμους, Αριστοδέμους) quotes the second book of this work. (Compare Schol. ad Esop. Phoenix. 162, 1120, 1126, 1163; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 906; Valckenaer, ad Schol. ad Esop. Phoenix. 1120, p. 732.)

There are many passages in ancient authors in which Aristodemus occurs as the name of a writer, but as no distinguishing epithet is added to the name in those passages, it is impossible to say whether in any case the Aristodemus is identical with any of those mentioned above, or distinct from them. Phtarch (Parallel. Min. 35) speaks of an Aristodemus as the author of a collection of fables, one of which he relates. A second, as the author of γνώμης δραματικά, is mentioned by Athenaeus (vi. p. 244, viii. pp. 338, 344, vii. p. 585). A third occurs in Clemens Alexander (Strom. i. p. 133) as the author of a work τοίς σοφίματος, and a fourth is mentioned as the epitome of a work of Herodian, which he dedicated to one Dianus. (Suited., σ. τ. Αριστοδέμους.) A Platonic philosopher of the same name is mentioned by Plutarch. (adv. Colot. init.) as his contemporary. [1. S.]

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), artista.
ARISTOGITON.

1. A painter, the father and instructor of Nico-machus [Nicomachus], flourished probably in the early part of the fourth century B.C. (Plin. xxxv.
10. s. 36.)

2. A statuary, who lived after the time of Alexander the Great. Among other works of his Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) mentions a statue of king Seleucus. To what country he belonged is uncertain.

3. A painter, a native of Caria, contemporary with Philoxenus the elder, with whom he was connected by the ties of hospitality. He wrote a work giving an account of distinguished painters, of the cities in which painting had flourished most,
and of the kings who had encouraged the art.

ARISTODICUS (Ἀριστοδίκος).

1. Of Cyme in Asia Minor, and son of Heracleides.
When his fellow-citizens were advised, by an oracle, to deliver up Pactyes to the Persians, Aristodicus dissuaded them from it, saying, that the oracle might be a fabrication, as Pactyes had come to them as a suppliant. He was accordingly sent himself to consult the oracle; but the answer of Apollo was the same as before; and when Aristodicus, in order to avert the criminal act of surrendering a suppliant, endeavoured in a very ingenious way, to demonstrate to the god, that he was giving an unjust command, the god still persisted in it, and added, that it was intended to bring ruin upon Cyme. (Herod. i. 158, 159.)

2. The author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, in one of which he is called a Rhod-ian, but nothing further is known about him.
(Brunck, Anecd. p. 250, comp. p. 191; Anthol.
Gr. vii. 109, 473.) [L. S.]

ARISTOGITON. [HARMODIUS.]

ARISTOGITON (Ἀριστογίτων), an Athenian orator and advocate of Demosthenes and Deinarchus. His father, Seydymus, died in prison, as he was a debtor of the state and unable to pay:

his son, Aristogiton, though himself not in debt, likewise imprisoned for some time. He is called a demagogue and a sycophant, and his eloquence is described as of a coarse and vehement character.
(Hermog. de Form. Orat. i. p. 296, and the Scholast. passim; Phot. Cod. p. 496; Plin. Hist. 10; Quintil. xii. 10. § 22.) His impudence drew upon him the surname of "the dog." He was often accused by Demosthenes and others, and defended himself in a number of orations which are lost.
Among the extant speeches of Demosthenes there are two against Aristogiton, and among those of Deinarchus there is one. Suidas and Endoechus
(p. 65) mention seven orations of Aristogiton (comp. Phot. Cod. pp. 491, 495; Tzetzes Chol. vi. 94, &c., 105, &c.; Harpocrat. s. v. Alkmeoës and Öfjës, fl. 479) and an eighth against Phrynë men-itioned by Athenaeus. (xiii. p. 591.) Aristogiton died in prison. (Plut. Apophth. Rop. p. 188, b.; compare Taylor, Praecl. ad Demost. Orat. c.
Aristog. in Schaeller's Apparat. Crit. iv. p. 297, &c.; and Aeschin. c. Timarch. p. 22; S. Thucydides, Opuscul. ii. pp. 201—240.) [L. S.]

ARISTOGITON (Ἀριστογίτων), a statuary,

a native of Thebes. In conjunction with Hyapat-dorus, he was the maker of some statues of the heroes of Argive and Theban tradition, which the Argives had made to commemorate a victory gained by themselves and the Athenians over the Lacedaemonians at Oenoe in Argolis, and dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. (Paus. x. 10, § 3.)

The names of these two artists occur together likewise on the pedestal of a statute found at Delphi, which had been erected in honour of a citizen of Orchoemenus, who had been a victor probably in the Pythian games. [Böckh, Corp. Inscr. 25.]

We learn from this inscription that the works of both Aristogiton and Hyapatodorus were destroyed after Ol. 109, that Hyapatodorus lived about Ol.
104, when Orchoemenos was destroyed by the Thebans.

The battle mentioned by Pausanias was probably some skirmish in the war which followed the treaty between the Athenians and Argives, which was brught about by Alcibiades, b.c. 420. It appears therefore that Aristogiton and Hyapatodorus lived in the latter part of the fifth and the early part of the fourth centuries B.C. Böckh attempts to show that Aristogiton was the son of Hyapatodorus, but his arguments are not very convincing. [C. P. M.]

ARISTOGITON (Ἀριστογίτων), was one of the ten commanders appointed to subdue Alcibi-deus after the battle of Notium, b.c. 407. (Xen.
Hell. i. 5. § 16; Dion. xiii. 74; Plut. Arr. c. 36.)

He was one of the eight who conquered Callimachis at Arginusae, b.c. 406; and Proctomachus and himself, by not returning to Athens after the battle, escaped the fate of their six colleagues, though sentence of condemnation was passed against them in their absence. (Xen. Hell. i. 7, §§ 1, 34; Dion. xiii. 101.)

ARISTOGITON (Ἀριστογίτων), the name of two Greek physicians mentioned by Suidas, of whom one was a native of Thasos, and wrote several medical works, of which some of the titles are preserved. The other was a native of Chios, and was servant to Chrysippus, the philosopher, according to Suidas; or rather, as Gielens says (de R. vet. Sec. c. 2, vol. xii. pp. 197, 222), he was a pupil of the physician of that name, and afterwards became physician to Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedon, b.c. 293—239. A physician of this name is quoted by Celsius, and Pliny.

Hardouin (in his Index of authors quoted by Pliny) thinks that the two physicians mentioned by Suidas were in fact one and the same person, and that he was called "Chioës" from the place of his birth, and "Thasius" from his residence;
this, however, is quite uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl.
Gr. vol. xiii. p. 83, ed. vet.; Kühn, Addit. ad Elen-cium Med. 7. 7. 11. 1. 9. 10.) [W. A.]

ARISTOLAUS, a painter, the son and scholar of Phalaris. (Paus. xxi. 11. § 1.) He flourished about Ol. 118, b.c. 309. Pliny (xxxv. 11. s. 40) mentions several of his works, and characterizes his style as in the highest degree severe. [C. P. M.]

ARISTOLOCHUS (Ἀριστολόχος), a tragic poet, who is not mentioned anywhere except in the collection of the Epitomes formerly attributed to Phalaris (Epist. 18, ed. Lennep.), where the tyrant is made to speak of him with indignation for venturing to compete with him in writing tragedies. But with the genuineness of those epitomes the existence of Aristolochus must fall to the ground, and Bentley (Phalaris, p. 260) has shown, that if Aristolochus were a real personage, this tragic writer must have lived before tragedy was known. [L. S.]
ARISTOMACHUS. 307

ARISTOMACHUS (Ἀριστομάχος).
1. The daughter of Hippodamus of Syracuse, and the sister of Dion, was married to the elderly Dionysius on the same day that he married Doris of Locri. She bore two sons, one of whom, namely Ariste, she afterwards perished. (Plut. Dion, 3, 6; Diod. xiv. 44, xvi. 6; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 10, who erroneously calls her Aristaene; Cic. Tusc. v. 29; Val. Max. ix. 13, ext. 4.) Respecting her death, see Ariste.

2. Of Erythræae, a poetess, who conquered at the Isthmian games, and dedicated in the treasury of Sisygmon a golden book, that is, probably one written with golden letters. (Plut. Symp. v. 2, § 10.)

ARISTOMACHUS (Ἀριστομάχος).
1. A son of Talaus and Ilysmachæ, and brother of Adræus. (Apollod. i. 9, § 13.) He was the father of Hippomedon, one of the seven heroes against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 6, § 5.) Hyginus (Fab. 70) makes Hippomedon a son of a sister of Adræus. (Comp. Paus. x. 10, § 2.)

2. A son of Cleomæus or Cleodæus, and great-grandson of Hercules, was the father of Theomedus, Cresphecés, and Aristodemus. He marched into Peloponæa at the time when Tisamenæus, the son of Orestes, ruled over the Peloponæan; but his expedition failed as he had misunderstood the oracle, and he fell in battle. (Apollod. ii. 8, § 2; Paus. ii. 7, § 6; Herod. vi. 52.) Another Aristomachus occurs in Paus. vi. 21, § 7. [L. S.]

ARISTOMACHUS (Ἀριστομάχος).
1. Tyrant of Argos, in the reign and under the patronage of Antigonus Gonatas. He kept the citizens of Argos in a defenceless condition, but a conspiracy was formed against him, and arms were secretly introduced into the town by a resistance of Aratus, who wished to gain Argos for the Achaean league. The plot was discovered, and the persons concerned in it took flight. But Aristomachus was soon after assassinated by slaves, and was succeeded by Aristippus II. (Plut. Arat. 25.)

2. Succeeded Aristippus II. in the tyranny of Argos, apparently towards the end of the reign of Demetrius. (b. c. 240—230.) He seems to have been related to some of his predecessors in the tyranny of Argos. (Polyb. ii. 59.) After the death of Demetrius, b. c. 229, he resigned his power, as Lydiades had done before, and several others did now, for the influence of Macedon in Peloponæa had nearly ceased, and the Achæans were allied with the Achaæans. Aristomachus had been persuaded to this step by Aratus, who gave him fifty talents that he might be able to pay off and dismiss his mercenaries. Argos now joined the Achaean league, and Aristomachus was chosen strategus of the Achaæans for the year b. c. 227. (Plut. Arat. 55; Polyb. ii. 44; Paus. ii. 8, § 5; Plut. Cleom. 4.) In this capacity he undertook the command in the war against Cleomenes of Sparta, but he seems to have been checked by the jealousy of Aratus, in consequence of which he afterwards deserted the cause of the Achaæans and went over to Cleomenes, who with his assistance took possession of Argos. Aristomachus now again assumed the tyranny at Argos. Aratus tried in vain to receive him on his return from the Achaean league, and the consequence only was, that the tyrant ordered 80 distinguished Argives to be put to death, as they were suspected of being favourable towards the Achaæans. Not long afterwards, however, Aratus was taken by Antigonus Dosos, whose assistance Aratus had called in. Aristomachus fell into the hands of the Achaæans, who wrung him and threw him into the sea at Cenchreae. (Polyb. vi. 56, 60; Paus. Arat. 44; Schorn, Gesch. der Griech. 111, 51, 1.)

3. The leader of the popular party at Croton, in the Hannibal war, about b. c. 215. At that time nearly all the towns of southern Italy were divided into two parties, the people being in favour of the Carthaginians, and the nobles or senators in favour of the Romans. The Bruttians, who were in alliance with the Carthaginians, had hoped to gain possession of Croton with their assistance. As this had not been done, they determined to make the conquest by themselves. A deserter from Croton informed them of the state of political parties there, and that Aristomachus was ready to surrender the town to them. The Bruttians marched with an army against Croton, and as the lower parts, which were inhabited by the people, were open and easy of access, they soon gained possession of them. Aristomachus, however, as if he had nothing to do with the Bruttians, withdrew to the arx, where the nobles were assembled and defended themselves. The Bruttians in conjunction with the people of Croton besieged the nobles in the arx, and when they found that they made no impression, they applied to Hanno the Carthaginian for assistance. He proposed to the Crotonians to receive the Bruttians as colonists within the extensive but deserted walls of their city; but all the Crotonians, with the exception of Aristomachus, declared that they would rather die than submit to this. As Aristomachus, who had betrayed the town, was unable to betray the arx also, he saw nothing left for him but to take to flight, and he accordingly went over to Hanno. The Crotonians soon after quitted their town altogether and migrated to Locri. (Liv. xxiv. 2, 3.)

4. A Greek writer on agriculture or domestic economy, who is quoted several times by Pliny. (H. N. xiii. 47, xiv. 24, xix. 26, § 4.) [L. S.]

ARISTOMACHUS (Ἀριστομάχος), a statuary, born on the banks of the Styron, made statues of courtezans. His age is not known. (Anthol. Palat. vi. 266.)

[ C. F. M. ]

ARISTOMEDON (Ἀριστομέδων), an Argive statuary, a native of Thebes, and a contemporary of Pinder. In conjunction with his fellow-townsmen Scenæs, he made a statue of Cybele, which was dedicated by Pinder in the temple of that goddess, near Thebes. (Paus. ix. 22, § 3.) [ C. P. M. ]

ARISTOMENES (Ἀριστομήνης, the Messenian, the hero of the second war with Sparta, has been connected by some writers with the first war (Myronym. ap. Paus. iv. 6; Diod. Sic. xxv. 68, Purg. xxx.), but in defiance apparently of all tradition. (Tyr. ap. Paus. i. c. Müller, Dor. i. 7, § 9.) For the events of his life our main authority is Pausanias, and he appears to have principally followed Rhinus the Crotonian, the author of a lost epic poem, of which Aristomenes was the hero. (Paus. iv. 6.) The life of Aristomenes, therefore, belongs more to legend than to history, though the truth of its general outline may be depended on. (Paus. iv. 22; Polyb. iv. 33.)

Thirty-nine years had elapsed since the capture of Ithome and the end of the first Messenian war, when the spirit of Messenia, chafing under a degrading yoke (Polyb. iv. 32; Justin. iii. 5; Tyr. ap. Paus. iv. 14), and eager for revolt, found a leader in Aristomenes of Andania, sprung from the royal line of Aesypus, and even referred by legendary tradition to a miraculous and superhuman origin. (Paus. iv. 14.) Having gained promises of assistance from Argos, Arcadia, Sicyon, Syracuse, and Pisa (Paus. iv. on the third day, 362), the hero began the war, a.c. 695. The first battle at Derae, before the arrival of the allies on either side, was indecisive; but Aristomenes so distinguished himself there by his valor, that he was offered the throne, but refused it, and received the office of supreme commander. This was followed by a remarkable exploit. Entering Sparta by night, he affixed a shield to the temple of Athena of the Brazen House (Χαλκοστοί), with the inscription, "Dedicated by Aristomenes to the goddess from the Spartan spoils." The next year, he utterly defeated the enemy at the battle of the Bear's Pillar (αἴγες ηλίφα), a place in the region of Stonyceus, at which the allies on both sides were present, and the hosts were animated respectively by the exhortations of Tytaeus and the Messenian Hierophants. (Paus. iv. 16; Müller, Dor. i. 5, § 16, i. 7, § 9, note, ii. 10, § 3.) His next exploit was the attack and plunder of Pharai (Pharis, Τ. ii. 582); and it was only the warning voice of Helen and the Twin Brothers, visiting him in a dream, that saved Sparta itself from his assault. But he surprised by an ambush the Leonian maidens who were celebrating at Caryae with dances the worship of Artemis, and carried them to Messenia, and himself protected them from the violence of his followers, and restored them, for ransom, unharmed. Next came, in the third year of the war, at which point the poem of Rhamnus began, the battle of the Trench (μεγάλη τεχνα), where, through the treachery of Aristocrates, the Arcadian leader of Messenia, Aristomenes suffered his first defeat, and the Messenian army was cut almost to pieces. (Paus. iv. 17.) But the hero gathered the remnant to the mountain fortress of Eira, and there maintained the war for eleven years (Rham. op. Paus. iv. 17), and so ravaged the land of Leonia, that the Spartans decreed that the border should be left unclept. In one of his incursions, however, they met and overpowered him with superior numbers, and carrying him with fifty of his comrades to Sparta, cast them into the pit (παλαιάς) where condemned criminals were thrown. The rest perished; not so Aristomenes, the favourite of the gods; for legends told how an eagle bore him up on its wings as he fell, and a fox guided him to the third day from the cavern. The enemy could not believe that he had returned to Eira, till the destruction of an army of Corinthians, who were coming to the Spartans' aid, convinced them that Aristomenes was indeed once more amongst them. And now it was that he offered for a second time to Zeus of Ithome the sacrifice for the slaughter of a hundred enemies (ιενομομένα, comp. Plut. Rom. c. 25). The Hycanthian festival coming on at Sparta, a truce was made, and Aristomenes, wandering on the fifth of it too far from Eira, was seized by some Cretan bowmen (mercenaries of Sparta) and placed in bonds, but again burst them, and slew his foes through the aid of a maiden who dwelt in the house where they lodged him, and whom he betrayed in gratitude to his son Gorgias. But the anger of the Twins was roused against him, for he was said to have counterfeited them, and polluted with blood a Spartan festival in their honours. (Thirrill, Gr. Hist. vol. i. p. 364.) Polyzen. xi. 31.) So the favour of heaven was turned from his country, and the hour of her fall came. A wild fig-tree, called in the Messenian dialect by the same name that also means a goat (τράγος), which overhung the Neda, touched at length the water with its leaves, and Theocles the seer privately warned Aristomenes that the Delphic oracle was accomplished, which after the battle of the Trench had thus declared (Paus. iv. 20):

οὔτε τράγος πισάς Νεόδος ἀυλπόλων ἄγιοι
οὐ&ν εἰς Μεσσηνίαν βόμβης, σχέδωθεν γὰρ ἀλέθος.

Sparta, therefore, was to triumph; but the future revival of Messenia had been declared in the prophecy that when the enemy should be driven from Arcadia, messenian maidens would dance with the worship of Artemis and the eastening of the Messenian Hierophants. (Paus. iv. 16; Müller, Dor. i. 5, § 16, i. 7, § 9, note, ii. 10, § 3.) His next exploit was the attack and plunder of Pharai (Pharis, Τ. ii. 582); and it was only the warning voice of Helen and the Twin Brothers, visiting him in a dream, that saved Sparta itself from his assault. But he surprised by an ambush the Leonian maidens who were celebrating at Caryae with dances the worship of Artemis, and carried them to Messenia, and himself protected them from the violence of his followers, and restored them, for ransom, unharmed. (Paus. iv. 17.) But the hero gathered the remnant to the mountain fortress of Eira, and there maintained the war for eleven years (Rham. op. Paus. iv. 17), and so ravaged the land of Leonia, that the Spartans decreed that the border should be left unclept. told, when Messenia had once more regained her place among the nations (b.c. 370), how at Lene- tra the appearance of Aristomenes had been seen, aiding the Theban host and scattering the bands of Sparta. (Paus. iv. 32.)

ARISTOMENES (Ἀριστομένης). 1. A comic poet of Athens. He belonged to the ancient Attic comedy, or more correctly to the second class of the poets constituting the old Attic comedy. For the ancients seem to distinguish the comic poets who flourished before the Peloponnesian war from those who lived during that war, and Aristomenes belonged to the latter. (Suidas, s. v. Ἀριστο- μένης; Didocia, p. 65; Argum. ad Aristoph. Equil.) He was sometimes ridiculed by the surname διωνύσιος, which may have been derived from the circumstance that either he himself or his father, at one time, was an artisan, perhaps a carpenter. As early as the year b.c. 423, he brought out a piece called διωνύσιος, on the same occasion that the Equites of Aristophanes and the Satyri of Cratinus were performed; and if it is true that another piece entitled Admetus was performed at the same time with the Plutus of Aristophanes, in b.c. 389, the dramatic career of Aristomenes was very long. (Argum. ad Aristoph. Plut.) But we know of only a few comedies of Aristomenes; Meineke conjectures that the Admetus was brought out together with the first edition of Aristophanes' Plutus, an hypothesis based upon very weak grounds. Of the two plays mentioned no fragments are extant; besides these we know the titles and possess a few fragments of three others, viz. 1. Βοσι, which is sometimes attributed to Aristophanes, the names of Aristomenes and Aristophanes being often confounded in the MSS. 2. Διώνυσις and 3. Νεάνων ναυβαρκ. There are also three fragments of which it is uncertain whether they belong to any of the plays here mentioned, or to others, the titles of which are unknown. (Athen. i. p. 111; Pollux, vii. 167; Harpocrat. s. v. μετολογόμ. Comp. Meineke, Quest. Scen. Spec. ii. p. 48, &c.; Hist. Crit. Com. Gr. p. 210, &c.)

2. An actor of the old Attic comedy, who lived in the reign and was a freed-man of the emperor Hadrian, who used to call him Ἀριστομένης. He was a native of Athens, and is also mentioned as the author of a work ἀρίστη τις ἱσπουργιας, the third book of which is quoted by Athenaeus. (iii. p. 115.) He is perhaps the same as the one mentioned by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius. (i. 164.)

3. A Greek writer on agriculture, who is mentioned by Varro (de Rer. Rust. i. 1; Columella, i. 1) among those whose native place was unknown.

4. An Acarnanian, a friend and flatterer of the contemptible Agathocles, who for a time had the government of Egypt in the name of the young king Ptolemy V. (Euergetes.) During the administration of Agathocles Aristomenes was all-powerful, and when the insurrection against Agathocles broke out in b.c. 203, Aristomenes was the only one among his friends who ventured to go and try to pacify the rebellious Macedonians. But this attempt was useless, and Aristomenes himself narrowly escaped being murdered by the insurgents. After Agathocles was put to death, Theopompos, who had headed the insurrection, was appointed regent. But about b.c. 202, Aristomenes ventured to get the regency and distinguish himself now by the energy and wisdom of his administration no less than previously by his faithfulness to Agathocles. Scopas and Dinarchus, two powerful men, who ventured to oppose his government, were put to death by his command. Towards the young king, Aristomenes was a frank, open, and sincere counsellor; but as the king grew up to manhood, he became less and less able to bear the sincerity of Aristomenes, who was at last condemned to death, in b.c. 192. (Polyb. xv. 31, xviii. 36, &c.; Diod. Excerp. lib. xxiii., de Vitr. et Vit. p. 573; Plat. de Discr. Adulat. 33.)

ARISTOMENES, a painter, born at Thasos, is mentioned by Vitruvius (iii. Proem. § 2), but did not attain to any distinction. [ C. F. M.]

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), king of Sparta, 14th of the Eurypontids, son of Agesicles, contemporary of Anaxandrides, ascended the Spartan throne before b.c. 500, and died somewhat before (Paus. iii. 7), or at any rate not long after, 510. He thus reigned about 50 years, and was of high reputation, of which the public prayer for a son for him, when the house of Procles had other representatives, is a testimony. Demaratus, hence named, was borne him, after two barren marriages, by a third wife, whom he obtained, it is said, by a fraud from her husband, his friend, Agetus. (Herod. i. 65, vi. 61—66; Paus.iii. 7. § 7; Plat. Apollath. Loci.) [ A. H. C.]

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), son of Pyrrichius, a Corinthian, one of those apparently who made their way into Syracuse in the second year of the Sicilian expedition, 414 b.c., is named once by Thucydides, in his account of the sea-fight preceding the arrival of the second armament (413 b.c.), and styled the most skilful steersman on the side of the Syracuseans. He suggested to them the stratagem of retiring early, giving the men their meal on the shore, and then renewing the combat unexpectedly, which in that battle gave them their first naval victory. (vii. 38; comp. Polyb. v. 13.) Plutarch (Nicoc. 20, 25) and Diodorus (xiv. 10) ascribe to him further the invention or introduction at Syracuse of the important alterations in the build of their galleys' bows, mentioned by Thucydides (vii. 34), and said by him to have been previously used by the Corinthians in the action off Eriineus. Plutarch adds, that he fell when the victory was just won, in the last and decisive sea-fight. [ A. H. C.]

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), historical. 1. Was sent out by one of the Polemics of Egypt to explore the western coast of Asia, which derived its name of Poseidonia from an altar which Ariston had erected there to Poseidon. (Diod. iii. 41.)

2. A strategus of the Achaeans in b.c. 221, who, labouring under some bodily defect, left the command of the troops to Scopus and Dorimachus, while he himself remained at home. Notwithstanding the declarations of the Achaeans to regard every one as an enemy who should trespass upon the territories of Messenia or Achaea, the Aetolian commanders invaded Peloponnesus, and Ariston was stupid enough, in the face of this fact, to assert that the Aetolians and Achaeans were at peace with each other. (Polyb. iv. 5, 9, 17.)

3. The leader of an insurrection at Cyrene in b.c. 405, who obtained possession of the town and put to death or expelled all the nobles. This latter however afterwards became reconciled to the popular party, and the powers of the government were divided between the two parties. (Diod. xiv. 34; comp. Paus. iv. 26, § 2.)
4. Of Mgnaenopolis, who, at the outbreak of the war of the Romans against Perses in B.C. 170, advised the Achaeneans to join the Romans, and not to remain neutral between the two belligerent parties. In the year following, he was one of the Achaean ambassadors, who were sent to bring about a peace between Antiochus III. and Ptolemy Philopator. (Polyb. xxxii. 6, xxi. 10.)

5. A Rhodian, who was sent, in the spring of B.C. 170, with several others as ambassador to the Roman consuls, Q. Marcius Philippus, in Macedonia, to renew the friendship with the Romans, and clear his country from the charges which had been brought against them by some persons. (Polyb. xxviii. 14.)

6. Of Tyre, who appears to have been a friend of Hannibal. When the latter was staying at the court of Antiochus and meditated a fresh war against the Romans, he despatched Ariston to Carthage to rouse his friends there. Hannibal, however, lest the messenger should be intercepted, gave him nothing in writing. On Ariston's arrival at Carthage, the enemies of Hannibal soon conjectured the object of his presence from his frequent interviews with the men of the other party. The suspicions were at last loudly expressed, and Ariston was summoned to explain the objects of his visit. The explanations given were not very satisfactory, and the trial was deferred till the next day. But in the night Ariston embarked and fled, leaving behind a letter which he put up in a public place, and in which he declared that the communications he had brought were not for any private individual, but for the senate. Respecting the consequences of this stratagem, see Liv. xxxiv. 61, 62. Compare Appian, Syr. 8; Justin, xxxi. 4. [L. S.]

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), literary. 1. A son of Sophocles by Theoria. (Suidas, s. v. Ὁριστοκρ.) He had a son of the name of Sophocles, who is said to have brought out, in B.C. 401, the Oedipus in Colonus of his grandfather Sophocles. (Aristot. Soph. Cat. ed. Wunder.) Whether he is the same as the Ariston who is called a writer of tragedies (Diog. Laërt. vii. 164), and one of whose tragedies was directed against Mnesthemus, cannot be said with any certainty, though Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ii. 287) takes it for granted.

2. A friend of Aristotle, the philosopher, to whom he is said to have addressed some letters. (Diog. Laërt. v. 27.)

3. A Peripatetic philosopher and a native of the island of Ceos, where his birthplace was the town of Julisce, where he is sometimes called Kario and sometimes Καὶςάν. He was a pupil of Lycon (Diog. Laërt. vii. 274), who was the successor of Ariston as the head of the Peripatetic school, about B.C. 270. After the death of Lycon, about B.C. 230, Ariston succeeded him in the management of the school. Ariston, who was, according to Cicero (de Fin. v. 5), a man of taste and elegance, was yet deficient in gravity and energy, which prevented his writings acquiring that popularity which they otherwise deserved, and may have been one of the causes of their neglect and loss to us. In his philosophical views, if we may judge from the scanty fragments still extant, he seems to have followed his master pretty closely. Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 163), after enumerating the works of Ariston of Chios, says, that Panetius and Socrates attributed all those works, except the letters, to the Peripatetic Ariston of Ceos. How far this opinion is correct, we cannot, of course, say; at any rate, however, one of those works, Ερωτικαὶ διατριβαὶ, is repeatedly ascribed to the Cean by Athenaeus (x. p. 419, xiii. p. 563, xv. p. 674), who calls it Ερωτικὰ διάσως. One work of the Cean not mentioned by Diogenes, was entitled Αἰσχροὶ (Plut. de Nat. poet. 1), in gratitude to his master. There are also two epigrams in the Greek Anthology (vi. 505, and vii. 537), which are commonly attributed to Ariston of Ceos, though there is no evidence for it. (Compare J. G. Hübmann, Ariston von Keos, der Peripatetsiker, in Jahn's Jahrb. Für Philol. 3d supplementary vol. Leipzig. 1835: Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. iii. p. 467, etc.; Jacob, ad Ath. xiii. p. 861.)

4. Of Alexandria, likewise a Peripatetic philosopher, was a contemporary of Sambus, and wrote a work on the Nile. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 164; Strab. xvii. p. 790.) Eudorus, a contemporary of his, wrote a book on the same subject, and the two works were so much alike, that the authors charged each other with plagiarism. Who was right is not said, though Strabo seems to be inclined to think that Eudorus was the guilty party. (Hübmann, l. c. 164.)

5. Of Pella in Palesine, lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian or shortly after, as is inferred from his writing a work on the inscription of the Jews, which broke out in the reign of this emperor. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 6; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Eccl. iii. 24.) He also wrote a work entitled Παραεργὰ Πολυασώματος, that is, a dialogue between Papiscus, a Jew, and Jason, a Jewish Christian, in which the former became convinced of the truth of the Christian religion. (Origen. c. Cels. iv. p. 159; Hieronym. Epist. ad Gaium, iii. 13.) It was translated at an early time into Latin by one Celsus, but, with the exception of a few fragments, it is now lost. The introduction written to it by the translator is still extant, and is printed in the Oxford edition of the "Opuscula" of Cyprian (p. 30) and elsewhere. (Hübmann, l. c. p. 105.)

6. Of Alaea (Αὐαίας), a Greek rhetorician who wrote, according to Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 164) scientific treatises on rhetoric. Another rhetorician of the same name, a native of Gerasa, is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium. (s. v. Παραστατος.) The name of Ariston occurs very frequently in ancient writers, and it has been calculated that about thirty persons of this name may be distinguished; but of most of them we know nothing but the name. They have often been confounded with one another, and even with ancient and modern writers, particularly Ariston of Chios and Ariston of Ceos. (Sinentius, ad Plut. Thras. 3, and especially the treatise of Hübmann referred to above.) [L. S.]

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), son of Militades, born in the island of Chios, a Stoic and disciple of Zenos, flourished about B.C. 260, and was therefore contemporary with Epinerus, Aratus, Antigonus Gonatas, and with the first Punic war. Though he professed himself a Stoic, yet he differed from Zenos in several points; and indeed Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 160, etc.) tells us, that he quitted the school of Zenos for that of Polono the Platonist. He is said to have displeased the former by his loquacity,—a quality which others prized so highly, that he acquired the surname of Sren, as a master of persuasive eloquence. He was also called Phalanus, from his and Sosicrates (c. c. 200-128) to another Ariston, a Peripatetic of Ceos, with whom he is often confounded. Nevertheless, we find in Stobaeus (Sess. iv. 110, 86c) fragments of a work of his called Προγνωσις.

[G. E. L. C.]

ARISTON (Αριστός), a physician, of whose life no particulars are known, but who probably lived in the fifth century B.C., as Galen mentions him (Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Vit. in Morb. Aen.” i. 17, vol. xiv. p. 465) with three other physicians, who all (he says) lived in old times, some as contemporaries of Hippocrates, and others before him. Galen also says that he was by some persons supposed to be the author of the work in the Hippocratic Collection entitled Πεπελαίνων Τείγεων, de Solitudine Petrus Raticae. (I. e.: De Aliment. Facult. 1. 1, vol. vii. p. 473; Comment. in Hippocr. “Aplor.” i. vol. xvii. pt. 1, p. 9.) A medical precept in a person of the same name is quoted by Celsus (De Med. vi. 18, p. 88) and Galen. (De Comps. Medic. sect. Locae, i. 4, vol. xiii. p. 281.) The Ariston of Chios, mentioned by Galen (De Hippocr. et Plat. Decret. v. 5, vii. 1, 2, vol. vi. pp. 460, 589, 596), is a different person.

ARISTON. 1. A celebrated silver-chaser and sculptor in bronze, born at Mytilene. His time is unknown. (Plin. xxxiii. 55, xxxiv. 19. § 25.)

2. A painter, the son and pupil of Aristides of Thebes (ARISTIDES), painted a satyr holding a goblet and crowned with a garland. Authorities and Epitomizers were his disciples. (Plin. xxxv. 36. § 25.) [P. S.]

ARISTONICUS (Αριστονίκος). 1. A tyrant of Methymnae in Lesbos. In b.c. 332, when the monarchs of Alexander the Great had already taken possession of the harbour of Chios, Aristonicus arrived during the night with some privateers, and entered it under the belief that it was still in the hands of the Persians. He was taken prisoner and delivered up to the Methymnaeans, who put him to death in a cruel manner. (Arrim. Anab. ii. 2; Curtius, i. 4.)

2. A natural son of Eumenius II. of Pergamus, who was succeeded by Attalus III. When the latter died in B.C. 133, and made over his kingdom to the Romans, Aristonicus claimed his father's kingdom as his lawful inheritance. The towns, for fear of the Romans, refused to recognize him, but compelled him by force of arms; and at last there seemed no doubt of his ultimate success. In b.c. 131, the consul P. Licinius Crassus, who received Asia as his province, marched against him; but he was more intent upon making booty than on combating his enemy, and in an ill-organized battle which was fought about the end of the year, his army was defeated, and he himself made prisoner by Aristonicus. In the year following, b.c. 130, in the name of M. Perpernus, who succeeded Crassus, acted with more energy, and in the very first engagement conquered Aristonicus and took him prisoner. After the death of Perpernus, M. Aquilius completed the conquest of the kingdom of Pergamus, b.c. 129. Aristonicus was carried ARISTONOUS.

ARISTONYMUS (Ἀριστονῦμος), a comic poet and contemporary of Aristophanes and Ameipias. (Anon. in Plt. Aristoph.; Schol. ad Plat. p. 331, Bekker.) We know the titles of only two of his comedies, viz. Theseus (Athen. iii. p. 67), and Ἡλιος ἄγρα (Athen. vii. pp. 284, 287), of which only a few fragments are extant. Schweighäuser and Fabriicus place this poet in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, an error into which both were led by Suidas (s. v. Αριστονῦμος), who, if the reading is correct, evidently confounds the poet with some grammarian. If there had ever existed a grammarian of this name, and if he had written the works attributed to him by Suidas, he would assuredly have been mentioned by other writers also. This is not the case; and as we know that Aristophanes of Byzantium was the successor of Apollonius as chief librarian at Alexandria (which Suidas says of Aristotleus), Meineke conjectures with great probability, that the name of Aristophanes has dropped out in our text of Suidas. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Gr. p. 196, &c.)

An Athenian, of the name of Aristotleus, who was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, but not a grammarian, is mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 452, xii. p. 538). There were also two writers of this name, but neither of them appears to have been a grammarian. (Plut. de Plun. p. 1165; Stobaeus, passim.)

[LS.]

ARISTOPHILUS ('Αριστοφίλος), a druggist, of Platoea in Boetia, who lived probably in the fourth century B.C. He is mentioned by Theophratus (Hist. Plant. ix. 18, § 4) as possessing the knowledge of certain antiprussic medicines, which he made use of for the punishment or reformation of his slaves. [W. A. G.]

ARISTOPHINES ('Αριστοφάνης), the only writer of the old comedy of whom any entire works are left. His later extant plays approximate rather to the middle comedy, and in the Oaculus, his last production, he so nearly approached the new, that Philemon brought it out a second time with very little alteration.

Aristophanes was the son of Philippus, as is stated by all the authorities for his life, and proved by the fact of his son also having that name, although a bust exists with the inscription 'Αριστοφάνης Φιλιππίδου, which is, however, now generally allowed to be spurious. He was an Athenian of the tribe Pandionis, and the Cydathenean Demus, and is said to have been the pupil of Prodicus, though this is improbable, since he speaks of him rather with contempt. (Nub. 809, Ap. 692, Topon. Fragm. xviii. Bekk.) We are told (Schol. ad Rham. 592), that he first engaged in the comic contest at Athens, and he now was killed by a vase. We know that the date of his first comedy was b. c. 427: we are therefore warranted in assigning about b. c. 444 as the date of his birth, and his death was probably not later than b. c. 380. His three sons, Philippus, Aratos, and Nicostratus, were all poets of the middle comedy. Of his private history we know nothing but that he was a lover of pleasure (Plut. Synp. particularly p. 225), and one who spent whole nights in drinking and witty conversation. Accusations (his anonymous biographer says, more than one) were brought against him by Coon, with a view to deprive him of his civic rights (δικαια γραπτών), but without success, as indeed they were merely the fruit of revenge for his attacks on that demagogue. They to Rome to adorn the triumph of Aquillius, and was then beheaded. (Justin, xxxvi. 4; Liv. Epit. 59; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Flor. ii. 20; Ors. v. 10; Sall. Hist. 4; Appian, Mithrid. 12, 62, de Bell. 3. A eunuch of Ptolemy Epiphanes, who had been brought up with the king from his early youth. Polibius speaks of him in terms of high praise, as a man of a generous and warlike disposition, and skilled in political transactions. In b.c. 183, when the king had to fight against some discontented Egyptians, Aristocles went to Greece and engaged a body of mercenaries there. (Polyb. xxii. 16, 17.)

4. Of Alexandria, a contemporary of Strabo (i. p. 38), distinguished himself as a grammarian, and is mentioned as the author of several works, most of which related to the Homeric poems.—

1. On the wanderings of Menelaus (περί της Μενελαος περιοδος; Strab. l. c.). 2. On the critical signs by which the Alexandrine critics used to mark the supposed or interpolated verses in the Homeric poems and in Homer's Theogony. (Περί των σημειων των της Ιδαυος και Οιχασωτας, Eutyn. M. s. v. Ἀθέναιος, ΄ήσαει και ἕπει; Suidas, s. v. Άρστονος; Endec. p. 64; Schol. Venet. ad Hom. ii. ix. 397.)

3. On irregular grammatical constructions in Homer, consisting of six books (διαφημυκτων διαμενων βεβελα; Suidas, l. c.). These and some other works are now lost, with the exception of a few fragments preserved in the passages above referred to. (Villiosis, Proleg. ad Hom. p. 18.)

5. Of Tarentum, the author of a mythological work which is often referred to. (Phot. Cod. 190; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 353; Curs. Germ. in Aen. Phaen. 327; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34.) He is perhaps the same as the one mentioned by Athenaeus (i. p. 20), but nothing is known about him. (Roulois, de Plut. Hist. p. 148.)

[LS.]

ARISTONIDES, a satyr, one of whose productions is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 14. s. 40) as extant at Thebes in his time. It was a statue of Athamas, in which bronze and iron had been mixed together, that the rest of the latter, showing through the brightness of the bronze, might leave the appearance of a blush, and so might indicate the remorse of Athamas. [C. P. M.]

ARISTONIDES, a painter of some distinction, mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 11. s. 40), was the father and instructor of Mnaestimus. [C. P. M.]

ARISTONOVUS (Ἀριστόνοος). 1. Of Gela in Syracuse, one of the founders of the colony of Agrigentum in Sicily, c. 582. (Thuc. iv. 4.)

2. Of Pelia, son of Peuceas, one of the body-guard of Alexander the Great, distinguished himself greatly on one occasion in India. On the death of Alexander, he was one of the first to propose that the supreme power should be entrusted to Pericles. He was subsequently the general of Olympia in the war with Cassander; and when she was taken prisoner in b. c. 316, he was put to death by order of Cassander. (Arrian, Anab. vi. 28, ap. Phot. Cod. 92, p. 69, a. 14, ed. Bekker; Curt. ix. 5, x. 6; Diod. xiii. 55, 50, 51.)

ARISTOVUS (Ἀριστόαοος), a satyr, a native of Aegina, made a statue of Zeus, which was dedicated by the Metonpothei at Olympia. (Paus. v. 22, § 5; Müller, Aegina, p. 107.) [C. P. M.]
have, however, given rise to a number of traditions of his being a Rhodian, an Egyptian, an Aeginetan, a native of Camirus or of Naukratis. The comedies of Aristophanes are of the highest historical interest, containing as they do an admirable series of caricatures on the leading men of the day, and a contemporary commentary on the evils existing at Athens. Indeed, the caricature is the only feature in modern social life which at all resembles them. Aristophanes was a bold and often a wise satirist. He had the strongest affection for Athens, and longed to see her restored to the state in which she was flourishing in the previous generation. In his childhood, before Pericles became the head of the government, and when the age of Miltiades and Aristides had but just passed away. The first great evil of his own time against which he inveighs, is the Peloponnesian war, which he regards as the work of Pericles, and even attributes it (I. 350) to his fear of punishment for having connived at a robbery said to have been committed by Phidias on the statue of Athens in the Parthenon, and to the influence of Aspasia. (Ach. 500.) To this fatal war, among a host of evils, he ascribes the influence of vulgar demagogues like Cleon at Athens, of which the example was set by the more refined demagoguery of Pericles. Another great object of his indignation was the recently adopted system of education which had been introduced by the Sophists, acting on the speculative and inquiring turn given to the Athenian mind by the Ionian and Eleatic philosophers, and the extraordinary intellectual development of the age following the Persian war. The new theories introduced by the Sophists threatened to overthrow the foundations of morality, by making persuasion and not truth the object of man in his intercourse with his fellows, and to substitute a universal scepticism for the religious creed of the people. The worst effects of such a system were seen in Alcibiades, who, caring for nothing but his own ambition, valuing eloquence only for its worldly advantages, and possessed of great talents which he utterly misapplied, combined all the elements which Aristophanes most disliked, heading the war party in politics, and protecting the sophistical school in philosophy and also in literature. Of this latter school—the literary and poetical Sophists—Euripides was the chief, whose works are full of that μεταφοροφοφία which contrasts so offensively with the moral dignity of Aeschylus and Sophocles, and for which Aristophanes introduces him as soaring in the air to write his tragedies (Ach. 374), caricaturing thereby his own account of himself. (Ach. 971.) Another feature of the times was the excessive love for litigation at Athens, the consequent importance of the dictats, and disgraceful abuse of their power; all of which enormities are made by Aristophanes objects of continual attack. But though he saw what were the evils of his time, he had not wisdom to find a remedy for them, except the hopeless and undesirable one of a movement backwards; and therefore, though we allow him to have been honest and bold, we must deny him the epithet of great. We subjoin a catalogue of the comedies of Aristophanes on which we possess information, and a short account of the most remarkable. Those marked + are extant.

Πρακτικός (εὐ δρέα), according to the probable conjecture of St. Quintin. Essay on the Πρακτικός, translated by Mr. Hamilton. Clouds (second edition), failed in obtaining a prize. But Ranke places this n. c. 411, and the whole subject is very uncertain. 419. † Peace (εὐ δρέα). Second prize; Eu- polis first. 414. Amphimenes. (Lenea.) Second prize. † Birds (εὐ δρέα), second prize; Ameipsias first; Phrynichus third. Second campaign in Sicily. Τεσσαρυλί (εὐ δρέα), Exhibited in the time of Nicias. (Plut. Nic. c. 8.) 411. † Lysistrata. 392. † Ecclesiazusa, Corinthian war. 388. Second edition of the Plutus. The last two comedies of Aristophanes were the Aesopion, and Cocalus, produced about n. c. 387 (date of the peace of Antalcidas) by Araros, one of his sons. The first was a parody on the Aesopus of Euripides, the name being compounded of Aesopus and Sicon, a famous cook. (Museum, 1828, p. 50.) The second was probably a similar parody of a poem on the death of Minos, said to have been killed by Cocalus, king of Sicily. Of the Aesopion there were two editions.

In the Αμφιρρίας the object of Aristophanes was to censure generally the abandonment of those ancient manners and feelings which it was the labour of life to preserve. He attacked the modern schemes of education by introducing a father with two sons, one of whom had been educated according to the old system, the other in the sophistries of later days. The chorus consisted of a party who had been feasting in the temple of Hercules; and Bp. Thirlwall supposes, that as the play was written when the plague was at its height (Schol. at Ran. 502), the poet recommended a return to the gymnastic exercises of which that god was the patron (comp. Eq. 1379), and to the old system of education, as the means most likely to prevent its continuance.

In the Βαβυλωνιανα we are told, that he "attacked the system of appointing to offices by lot." (Vit. Aristoph. Belk. p. xlix.) The chorus consisted of barbarian slaves employed in a mill, which Ranke has conjectured was represented as belonging to the demagogue Lucretius (Eq. 129, &c.), who united the trade of a miller with that of a vender of tow. Cleon also must have been a main object of the poet's satire, and probably the public functionaries of the day in general, since an action was brought by Cleon against Callistratus, in whose name it was produced, accusing him of ridiculing the government in the presence of the allies. But the attack appears to have failed.
ARISTOPHANES.

In the Acharnians, Aristophanes exults his countrymen to peace. An Athenian named Diceropolas makes a separate treaty with Sparta for himself and his family, in the full enjoyment of its blessings, whilst Lamachus, as the representative of the war party, is introduced in the want of common necessities, and suffering from cold, and snow, and wounds. The Knights was directed against Cleon, whose power at this time was so great, that no one was bold enough to make a mask to represent his features; so that Aristophanes performed the character himself, with his face smeared with wine-lees. Cleon is the confidential steward of Demus, the impersonation of the Athenian people, who is represented as almost in his domain, but at the same time cunning, suspicious, unguernerable, and tyrannical. His slaves, Nicias and Demosthenes, determine to rid themselves of the insolence of Cleon by raising up a rival in the person of a sausage-seller, by which the poet ridicules the mean occupation of the demagogues. This man completely triumphs over Cleon in his own acts of lying, stealing, faming, and blistering. Having thus gained the day, he suddenly becomes a model of ancient Athenian excellence, and by boiling Demus in a magic cauldron, restores him to a condition worthy of the companionship of Alcibiades and Miltiades. (Ec. 1322.)

In the Clouds, Aristophanes attacks the sophistical principles at their source, and selects as their representative Socrates, whom he depicts in the most odious light. The selection of Socrates for this purpose is doubtless to be accounted for by the supposition, that Aristophanes observed the great philosopher from a distance only, while his own unphilosophical turn of mind prevented him from entering into Socrates’ merits both as a teacher and a practical man of sense; and by the fact, that Socrates was an innovator, the friend of Euripides, the tutor of Alcibiades, and pupil of Archelaus; and that there was much in his appearance and habits in the highest degree ludicrous. The philosopher, who wore no under garments, and the same upper robe in winter and summer,—who generally went barefoot, and appears to have possessed one pair of dress-shoes which lasted him for life (Böckh, Economy of Athens, i. p. 150), who used to stand for hours in a public place in a fit of abstraction—to say nothing of his stub nose, and extraordinary face and figure,—could hardly expect to escape the license of the old comedy. The invariably speculative turn which he gave to the conversation, his bare acquaintance in the stories of Greek mythology, which Aristophanes would think it dangerous even to subject to inquiry (see Plut. Plau. 299), had certainly produced an unfavourable opinion of Socrates in the minds of many, and explain his being set down by Aristophanes as an archsophist, and represented even as a thief. In the Clouds, he is described as corrupting a young man named Philidippides, who is wasting his father’s money by an insane passion for horses, and is sent to the sublety-shop (πραγματικόν) of Socrates and Chneusaphon to be still further set free from moral and physical restraints, in order to acquire the needful accomplishment of cheating his creditors. This spendthrift youth it is scarcely possible not to recognize Alcibiades, not only from his general character and connexion with the Sophists, but also from more particular traits, as allusions to his τρυφευσις, or inability to articulate certain letters (Nisb. 1301; Plat. Alc. p. 1093); and to his family for his horse-keeping. (Suidas s.v. Αλκιβιάδης, p. 534.) Aristophanes would be prevented from introducing him by name either here or in the Birds, from fear of the violent measures which Alcibiades took against the comic poets. The instructions of Socrates teach Philidippides not only to defend his creditors, but also to beat his father, and disdain the authority of the gods; and the play ends by the father’s preparations to burn the philosopher and his whole establishment. The hint given towards the end, of the propriety of prosecuting him, was acted on twenty years afterwards, and Aristophanes was believed to have contributed to the death of Socrates, as the charges brought against him before the court of justice express the substance of those contained in the Clouds. (Plat. Apol. Sec. p. 10, &c.) The Clouds, though perhaps its author’s masterpiece, met with a complete failure in the contest for prizes, probably owing to the intrigues of Alcibiades; nor was it more successful when altered for a second representation, if indeed the alterations were ever completed, which Sivenon denies. The play, as we have it, contains the parabasis of the second edition.

The Wasps is the pendant to the Knights. As in the one the poet had attacked the sovereign assembly, so here he aims his battery at the courts of justice, the other stronghold of party violence and the power of demagogues. This play furnished Racine with the idea of Les Pléiades. The Peace is a return to the subject of the Acharnians, and points out forcibly the miseries of the Peloponnesian war, in order to stop which Trygaeus, the hero of the play, ascends to heaven on a dung-beetle’s back, where he finds the god of war punishing the Greek states in a mortar. With the assistance of a large party of friends equally desirous to check this proceeding, he succeeds in dragging up Peace herself from a well in which she is imprisoned, and finally marries one of her attendant nymphs. The play is full of humour, but neither it nor the Wasps is among the poet’s greater works.

Six years now elapsed during which no plays are preserved to us. The object of the Amphictyons and the Birds, which appeared after this interval, was to disprove the disastrous Sicilian expedition. The former was called after one of the seven chiefs against Thibaces, remarkable for prophesying ill-luck to the expedition, and therein corresponding to Nichas. The object of the Birds has been a matter of much dispute; many persons, as for instance Schlegel, consider it a mere fanciful piece of buffoonery—a supposition hardly credible, when we remember that every one of the plays of Aristophanes has a distinct purpose connected with the history of the time. The question seems to have been set at rest by Sivenon, whose theory, to say the least, is supported by the very strongest circumstantial evidence. The Birds—the Athenian people—are persuaded to build a city in the chains by Pelasgius (a chamlet combining units of Alcibiades and Gorgias, mixed perhaps with some from other Sophocles and other writers) by means of Sancho Pansa, one Enelpides, designed to represent the credulous young Athenians (ευιλανοι, Thuc. vi. 24). The city, to be called Νεφελοκοσμος (Clouded-worldtown), is to occupy the whole horizon, and to cut off the gods from all connexion with mankind, and even from the power of receiving sacrifices, so as to force them ultimately to surrender at discretion to the birds. All this scheme, and the details which fill it up, coincide admirably with the Sicilian expedition, which was designed not only to take possession of Sicily, but afterwards to conquer Carthage and Algeria, and so to threaten the Mediterranean, to acquire that of the Peloponnesians, and reduce the Spartans, the gods of the play. (Thuc. vi. 15, &c.; Plut. Nic. 12, &c. 17.) The plan succeeds; the gods send ambassadors to demand terms, and finally Peisistratus espouses Basilia, the daughter of Zeus. In no play does Aristophanes more indulge in the exuberance of wit and fancy than in this; and though we believe Siven's account to be in the main correct, yet we must not suppose that the poet limits himself to this object: he keeps only generally to his allegory, often touching on other points, and sometimes indulging in pure humour; so that the play is not unlike the scheme of Gulliver's Travels.

The Lysistrata returns to the old subject of the Peloponnesian war, and here we find miseries described as existing which in the Acharnians and Peace had only been predicted. A treaty is finally represented as brought about in consequence of a civil war between the sexes. The Thesmophoriazousae is the first of the two great attacks on Euripides, and contains some inimitable parodies on his plays, especially the Andromeda, which had just appeared. It is almost wholly free from political allusions; the few which are found in it shew the attachment of the poet to the old democracy, and that, though a strong conservative, he was not an oligarchist. Both the Plutus and the Ecclesiazousae are designed to divert the prevailing mania for Doric manners, the latter ridiculing the political theories of Plato, which were based on Spartan institutions. Between these two plays appeared the Frogs, in which Bacchus descends to Hades in search of a tragic poet,—these then alive being worthless,—and Aeschylus and Euripides contend for the prize of resurrection. Euripides is at last dismissed by a parody on his own famous line πῇ γάλασσα ὤμωντας, ἢ ἐς φθορὰν αἰμώρος (Hipp. 608), and Aeschylus accompanies Bacchus to Earth, the tragic throne in Hades being given to Sophocles during his absence. Among the lost plays, the Νέας and Πυροφοί were apparently on the subject of the much desired Peace, the former setting forth the evils which the islands and subject states, the latter those which the freemen of Attica, enfeebled from the war. The Vespies seems to have been an attack on Alkibiades, in reference probably to his mutilation of the Hermes Busts (Siven, On the Clouds, p. 85, transl.); and in the P窿αρδόνις certain poets, pale, haggard votaries of the Sophists,—Sannyrion as the representative of comedy, Molinus of tragedy, and Clinias of the lyric writers, visit their brethren in Hades. The Vípso appears from the analysis of its fragments by Siven, to have been named from a chorus of old men, who are supposed to have cast off their old age as serpents do their skin, and therefore probably to have been a representation of vicious dotage similar to that in the Knights. From a fragment in Beker's Anecdotes (p. 430) it is probable that it was the 9th of the Aristophanic comedies.

Suidas tells us that Aristophanes was the author, in all, of 54 plays. We have hitherto considered him only in his historical and political character, nor can his merits as a poet and humorist be understood without an actual study of his works. We have no means of comparing him with his rivals Eupolis and Cratinus (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 1), though he is said to have tempered his social criticism with something of comedy additional grace, but to have been surpassed by Eupolis in the conduct of his plots. (Plutarch, τοῖς ἱστορικοῖς, cited in Bekker's Aristoph. Plato called the soul of Aristophanes a temple for the Graces, and has introduced him into his Symposium. His works contain flashes of lyric poetry which are quite noble, and some of his choruses, particularly one in the Knights, in which the horses are represented as rowing trirmens in an expedition against Corinth, are written with a spirit and humour unrivalled in Greek, and are not very dissimilar to English ballads. He was a complete master of the Attic dialect, and in his hands the perfection of that glorious instrument of thought is wonderfully shown. No flight, no too bold hold, no flight of his fancy; animals of every kind are pressed into his service; frogs chant choruses, a dog is tried for stealing a cheese, and an ibis verse is composed of the grunts of a pig. Words are invented of a length which must have made the speaker breathless,—the Ecclesiazousae closes with one of 170 letters. The gods are introduced in the most ludicrous positions, and it is certainly incomprehensible how a writer who represents them in such a light, could feel so great indignation against those who were suspected of a design to shake the popular faith in them. To say that his plays are defiled by coarseness and indecency, is only to state that they were comedies, and written by a Greek who was not inferior to the universal feeling of his age.

The first edition of Aristophanes was that of Aldus, Venice, 1498, which was published without the Lysistrata and Thesmophoriazousae. That of Bekker, 5 vols. 8vo., London, 1829, contains a text founded on the collation of two MSS. from Ravenna and Venice, unknown to former editors. It also has the valuable Scholia, a Latin version, and a large collection of notes. There are editions by Bothe, Kuster, and Dindorf: of the Acharnians, Knights, Wasps, Clouds, and Frogs, by Mitchell, with English notes (who has also translated the first three into English verse), and of the Birds and Plutus by Cooksey, also with English notes. There are many translations of single plays into English, and of all into German by Voss (Brunswick, 1831), and Drayton (Berlin, 1835—1838). Wieland also translated the Acharnians, Knights, Clouds, and Birds; and Wecker the Clouds and Frogs.

ARISTOPHANES (Ἀριστοφάνης). 1. Of Byzantium, a son of Apelles, and one of the most eminent Greek grammarians at Alexandria. He was a pupil of Zenodotus and Eustathenes, and teacher of the celebrated Aristarchus. He lived about a. c. 264, in the reign of Ptolemy II. and Ptolemy III., and had the supreme management of the library at Alexandria. All the ancients agree in placing him among the most distinguished critics and grammarians. He founded a school of his own at Alexandria, and acquired great wealth from his labours for the Greek language and literature. He and Aristarchus were the principal men who made out the canon of the classical writers of Greece, in the selection of whom they shewed, with a few exceptions, a correct taste and appreciation of what was really good. (Ruhmkorff, Hist. Crit. Orai. Gr. Vii. 9, in Aristophanes was the first who introduced the use of accents in the Greek language. (J. Kreuser, Griech. Accentslehre, p. 167, &c.) The subjects with which he chiefly occupied himself were the criticism and interpretation of the ancient Greek poets, and more especially Homer, of whose works he made a new and critical edition (Häders- sen). But he too, like his disciple Aristarchus, was not occupied with the criticism or the explanation of words and phrases only, but his attention was also directed towards the higher subjects of criticism; he discussed the aesthetic construction and the design of the Homeric poems. In the same spirit he studied and commented upon other Greek poets, such as Hesiod, Pindar, Alcaeus, Sophocles, Euripides, Anacreon, Aristophanes, and others. The philosophers Plato and Aristotle likewise engaged his attention, and of the former, as of several among the poets, he made new and critical editions. (Schol. ad Hesiod. Theog. 68; Diog. Laer. iii. 61; Thom. Mag. Vita Pindar.) All we possess of his numerous and learned works consists of fragments scattered through the Scholia on the above-mentioned poets; some arguments to the tragic poets and some plays of Aristophanes, and a part of his Acharnæ, which is printed in Bois- sonade's edition of Herodian's "Partitions." (London, 1819, pp. 283-289.) His Гραμματικα, which are mentioned among his works, refers probably to the Homeric poems. Among his other works we may mention: 1. Notes upon the Metre of the Iliad, (Schol. ad Iliad. v. 409), and upon the poems of Anacreon. (Arnaut, H. A. v. 39, 47.) 2. An abridgment of Arist- ophane's work Πελαγος Ζων, which is perhaps the same as the work which is called Ῥωμαϊκα εἰς Ἀριστοτέλην. 3. A work on the Attic courtesans, consisting of several books. (Athen. xiii. pp. 567-583.) 4. A number of grammatical works, such as Αναλυτικα λεξικα, Λεκανωτα Διαλογια, and a work Πελαγος Αρακλαδας, which was much used by M. Tarentinus Varro. 5. Some works of an histori- cal character, as Ονθαλακ (perhaps the same as the Ονθαλω λος), and Βουκουνια, which are frequently mentioned by ancient writers. (Suid. s. v. Ορολογία άρεις; Apostol. Proser. liv. 40; Plat. de Mal. Herod. 31, 33; Schol. ad Theocr. v. 163; Steph. Byz. s. v. Αριστοτέλην, &c.) Some modern writers have proposed in all these passages to substitute the name Aristodemus for Aristophanes, apparently for no other reason but because Aristodemus is known to have written works under the same titles. (Compare Villonos, Proleg. ad Hom. II. pp. xxii. and xxii.; F. A. Wolf, Proleg. Hom. in Hom. p. cxxvii., &c.; Wellauer, in Erck. und Greber's Encyclop. v. p. 371, &c.) 2. Of Maurus in Cilicia, is mentioned as a writer on agriculture. (Varro, de Re Rust. L. 1.) 3. A Boeotian (Plut. de Mulieb. Herod. p. 674.), of whom Suidas (s. v. Ορολογία, Ονθαλω λος) comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Αριστοτέλην) mentions the second book of a work on Sebes (σεβής). Another work bears the name of Bocour, and the second book of it is quoted by Suidas. (s. v. Χα- ρανες.) 4. A Corinthian, a friend of Libanius, who addressed to him some letters and mentions him in others. (Lilian. Epist. 76, 1186, 1228.) There is also an oration of Libanius in praise of Aristophanes. (Opera, vol. ii. p. 210; comp. Wolf, ad Lib. Epist. 176.) 5. ARISTOPHON ('Aριστοφανος). There are three Athenians who are called orators, and have frequently been confounded with one another (as by Cassabon, ad Theophrast. Charact. 8, and Buttmann, ad Quintil. v. 12, p. 452). Ruhmkorff (Hist. Crit. Orai. Gr. p. xiv., &c.) first established the distinction between them. 1. A native of the demos of Asea in Attica. (Aeschin. c. Tim. p. 159, c. Ces. pp. 552, 563, ed. Reiske.) He lived about and after the end of the Peloponnesian war. In b. c. 412, Aristophon, Lacedaemon and Melosians were sent to Sparta as ambassadors by the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred. (Thuc. viii. 86.) In the archonship of Electides, b. c. 404, after Athens was delivered of the thirty tyrants, Aristophon proposed a law which, though beneficial to the republic, yet caused great uneasiness and troubles in many families at Athens; for it ordained, that no one should be regarded as a citizen of Athens whose mother was not a freeborn woman. (Caryst. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 577; Taylor, Vith. Lyc. p. 149, ed. Reiske.) He also proposed various other laws, by which he acquired great popularity and the full confidence of the people (Dem. c. Eudol. p. 1308), and their great number may be inferred from his own statement (ap. Aeschin. c. Ces. p. 593), that he was accused 75 times of having made illegal proposals, but that he had always come off victorious. His influence with the people is most manifest from his accusation of Iphicrates and Timaios, b. c. 361, to whom he was much indebted. (b. c. 354.) He charged them with having accepted bribes from the Chians and Rhodians, and the people condemned Timotheus on the mere assertion of Aristophon. (C. Nepos, Timoth. 5; Aristot. Rhet. 11, 23; Deimarch. c. Deas- moth. 11, 1; Philod. p. 100.) After this event, but still in b. c. 354, the last time that we hear of him in history, he came forward in the assembly to de- fend the law of Leptines against Demosthenes, and the latter, who often mentions him, treats the aged Aristophon with great respect, and reckon him among the most eloquent orators. (Lept. p. 501, &c.) He seems to have died soon after. None of his orations have come down to us. (Comp. Clinton, Fast. Hell. ad Ann. 324.) 2. A native of the demos of Colytus, a great orator and politician, whose carecc is for the greater part contemporaneous with that of Demosthenes. It was this Aristophon whom Aschines served as a clerk, and in whose service he was trained for his public career. (Aschines.) Clinton (R. II. ad ann. 340) has pointed out that he is not the same as the one whom Plutarch (Vit. X. Orat. p. 841) mentions, but that there the Ascanian must be understood. Upian (ad Domest. De Cora. p. 74, a.) confounds him with Aristophon the Ascanian, as is clear from Aschines (c. Ctes. p. 585). This orator is often mentioned by Demosthenes, though he gives him the distinguishing epithet of ᾿Ορθοκόροσ, which Demosthenes (De Cora. p. 250, c. pp. 248, 249; c. Ilid. p. 584, Schol. ad Domest. p. 201, a.), and he is always spoken of as a man of considerable influence and authority. As an orator he is ranked with Diopeithes and Chares, the most popular men of the time at Athens. There are some passages in Demosthenes (c. Timoc. p.

ARISTOTLES. 317

703. De Coron. Trier. p. 1230) where it is un-ceertain whether he is speaking of Aristophon the Athenian or the Cypriot.

3. Archon Epitomys of the year b. c. 330,

(Diod. xvii. 62; Plut. Demosth. 24.) Theophrastus (Charact. 8) calls this Aristophon an orator. That this man, who was archon in the same year in which Demosthenes delivered his oration on the crown, was not the same as the Cyprian, 's clear from that oration itself, in which

(p. 281) the Cyprian is spoken of as deceased.

Whether he was actually an orator, as Theophrastus states, is very doubtful, since it is not mentioned anywhere else, and it is a probable conjecture of Ruhnken's that the word θρασυ was inserted by some one who believed that either the Cyprian or Cyprian was meant in that passage. (Clinton,

F. H. ed ann. 330.) [L. S.]

ARISTOPHON (Ἀριστοφάνης), a comic poet respecting whose life or age nothing is known,

but from the titles of whose comedies we must infer, that they belonged to the middle comedy. We know the titles of nine of his plays, viz. 1. Πλά-τεαρ (Athen. xii. p. 559), 2. Φιλία (Athen. xi.

p. 472), 3. Πεθαγοράς (Diod. Laer. viii. 38;

Athen. xvi. p. 238, iv. 161, xiii. p. 563), 4. Βάθως (Stob. Serm. 86. 19), 5. Δἐλτιον ἢ Τηρεών

(Pollux, ix. 70), 6. Ἰππός (Athen. vi. p. 238;

Stob. Serm. vii. 27), 7. Κάλλαδρα (Athen. xiii.

p. 559), 8. Παρακαταθής (Stob. Serm. 96. 21), and 9. Περίποιος. (Athen. vii. p. 303.) We possess only a few fragments of these comedies, and two or three others of which it is uncertain to which they played belonged. (Meineke, Hist. Crit.

Com. Gr. p. 410, etc.) [L. S.]

ARISTOPHON (Ἀριστόφανης), a painter of some distinction, the son and pupil of Aglaophon, and the brother of Polygnotus. He was also probably the father of the younger Aglaophon, and born at Thasos. Some of his productions are mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 11, s. 49), and Plutarch

(de audiend. Post. 3). It is probably through a mistake that Plutarch (Alcib. 16) makes him the author of a picture representing Alcibiades in the arms of Nemea. [See AGALOHN.] [C. P. M.]

ARISTOTELES (Ἀριστοτέλης), was one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in b. c.

404. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2.) From an allusion in the speech of Themistes before his condemnation

(Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 46), Aristoteles appears to have been also one of the Four Hundred, and to have taken an active part in the scheme of fortifying

Eetionia and admitting the Spartans into the Peinaceus, n. c. 411. (Thuc. vii. 90.) In n. c.

405 he was living in banishment, and is mentioned by Xenophon as being with Lycurgus

during the siege of Athens. (Hell. ii. 2. § 18.) Plato introduces him as one of the persons in the "Parmenides," and as a very young man at the time of the dialogue. [E. E.]

ARISTOTELES (Ἀριστοτέλης). I. BIOGRA-

PHY.—Aristotle was born at Stageira, a sea-port town of some little importance in the district of Chalidice, in the first year of the 99th Olympiad.

(s. c. 384). His father, Nicomachus, on Asclepiad, was physician in ordinary to Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and the author of several treatises on subjects connected with natural science. (Suidas,

s. v. Ἀριστοτέλης.) His mother, Phaestis (or Phaestis), was descended from a Chalidian family

(Dionys. de Demosth. et Arist. 5); and we find mention of his brother Arimnestus, and his sister

Arimnesta. (Diog. Laer. v. 15; Suid. l. c.) His father, who was a man of scientific culture, soon introduced his son at the court of the king of Macedonia in Pella, where at an early age he became acquainted with the son of Amyntas II. Afterwards the celebrated Philip of Macedonia, who was only three years younger than Aristotle himself. The studies and occupation of his father account for the early inclination manifested by Aristotle for the investigation of nature, an inclination which is perceived throughout his whole life. * He lost his father before he had attained his seventeenth year

(his mother appears to have died earlier), and he was entrusted to the guardianship of one Proxenus of Ateneus in Mycon, who, however, without doubt, was settled in Stageira. This friend of his father provided conveniently for the education of the young orphan, and secured for himself a lasting remembrance in the heart of his grateful pupil.

Afterwards, when his foster-parents died, leaving a son, Nicamor, Aristotle adopted him, and gave him his only daughter, Pythias, in marriage. (Ammon. p. 44, ed. Bude.)

After the completion of his seventeenth year, his ardent yearning after knowledge led him to Athens,

the mother-city of Hellenic culture. (H. c. 367.)

Various curious reports respecting Aristotle's youthful days, which the hatred and envy of the schools invented, and gossiping aedemone-monks spread abroad (Athen. viii. p. 854; Aelian. V. H. v. 9;

Euseb. Praep. Evang. xxv. 2; comp. Appuleius,

Apol. pp. 510, 811, ed. Oudendorp) to the effect that he squandered his hereditary property in a course of dissipation, and was compelled to seek a subsistence first as a soldier, then as a drug-seller

(φαρμακοσφάλης), have been already amply refuted

by the ancients themselves. (Comp. Aristocles, ap.

Euseb. l. c.) When Aristotle arrived at Athens,

Plato had just set out upon his Sicilian journey, from which he did not return for three years. This intervening time was employed by Aristotle in preparing himself to be a worthy disciple of the great teacher. His hereditary fortune, which, according to all appearance, was considerable, not merely relieved him from anxiety about the means of subsistence, but enabled him also to support the expense which the purchase of books at that time rendered necessary. He studied the works of the earlier as well as of the contemporary philosophers with indefatigable zeal, and at the same time sought for information and instruction in intercourse with such followers of Socrates and Plato as were living at Athens, among whom we may mention Heracleides Ponticus.

So aspiring a mind could not long remain concealed from the observation of Plato, who soon distinguished him above all his other disciples.

He named him, on account of his restless industry and his untiring investigations after truth and knowledge, the "intellect of his school" (νοῦς τῆς διαφορᾶς, Phil. de Aetern. Mundi advers. Próceans, vii. 27, ed. Venet. 1535, fol.); his house, the house of the "reader" (διαϕωνητής, Ammon. l. c.; Celsius Rhud. vii. xvii. 17), who needed a curb,

* It is interesting to observe, that Aristotle is fond of noticing physicians and their operations in his explanatory comparisons. (Comp. c. c. Polit. iii. 6, § 8, 10, § 4, 11, §§ 5, 6, vii. 2, § 8, 12, § 1, ed. Stahr.)
whereas Xenocrates needed the spur. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 6.) And while he recommended the latter "to sacrifice to the Graces," he appears rather to have warned Aristotle against the "too much." Aristotle lived at Athens for twenty years, till b.c. 347. (Apoll. ap. Diog. Laërt. v. 9.) During the whole of this period the good understanding which subsisted between teacher and scholar continued, with some trifling exceptions, undisturbed. For the stories of the disrespect and ingratitude of the latter towards the former are nothing but calumnies invented by his enemies, of whom, according to the expression of Themistius (Orat. iv.), Aristotle had missed a whole host. (Ael. P. H. III. 19, ix. 91; Euseb. His. Eccl. ii. 3; Dion. Hal. pseud. ii. 109, v. 2; Ammian. Vitr. Arist. p. 45.) Nevertheless, we can easily believe, that between two men who were engaged in the same pursuits, and were at the same time in some respects of opposite characters, collisions might now and then occur, and that the youthful Aristotle, possessed as he was of a vigorous and aspiring mind, and having possibly a presentiment that he was called to be the founder of a new epoch in thought and knowledge, may have appeared to many to have sometimes entered the lists against his grey-headed teacher with too much impetuosity. But with all that, the position in which they stood toward each other was, and continued to be, worthy of both. This is not only proved by the character of each, which we know from other sources, but is also confirmed by the truly amiable manner and affectionate reverence with which Aristotle conducts his controversies with his teacher. In particular, we may notice a passage in the Nicornheian Ethics (i. 6), with which others (as Ethic. Nic. ix. 7, Polit. ii. 3 § 3) may be compared. According to a notice by Olympiodorus (in his commentary on Plato's Gorgias), Aristotle even wrote a biographical ληγός γενεαμαντικής on his teacher. (See Cousin, Journ. d. Savans, Dec. 1852, p. 744.)

During the last ten years of his first residence at Athens, Aristotle himself had already assembled around him a circle of scholars, among whom we may notice his friend Hermias, the dynast of the cities of Atarneas and Assos in Mycaen. (Strabo, xix. p. 614.) The subjects of his lectures were not so much of a philosophical* as of a rhetorical and perhaps also of a political kind. (Quintil. xi. 2 § 25.) At least it is proved that Aristotle entered the lists of controversy against Isocrates, at that time the most distinguished teacher of rhetoric. Indeed, he appears to have opposed most decidedly all the earlier and contemporary theories of rhetoric. (Arist. Rh. i. 1, 2.) His opposition to Isocrates, however, led to most important consequences, as it accounts for the bitter hatred which was afterwards manifested towards Aristotle and his school by all the followers of Isocretes. It was the conflict of profound philosophical investigation with the superficiality of stylistic and rhetorical accomplishment; of systematic observation with shallow empiricism and proune insipidity; of which Isocrates might be looked upon as the principal representative, since he not only despised poetry, but held physics and mathematics to be illiberal studies, eager not to know anything about philosophy, and looked upon the accomplished man of the world and the clever rhetorician as the true philosophers. On this occasion Aristotle published his first rhetorical writings. That during this time he continued to maintain his connexion with the Macedonian court, is intimated by his going on an embassy to Philip of Macedonia on some business of the Athenians. (Diog. Laërt. v. 2.) Moreover, we have still the letter in which his royal friend announces to him the birth of his son Alexander. (b.c. 356; Gell. ix. 4; Dion Chrysost. Orat. xii.)

After the death of Plato, which occurred during the above-mentioned embassy of Aristotle (b.c. 347), the latter left Athens, though we do not exactly know for what reason. Perhaps he was offended by Plato's having appointed Spenusippus as his successor in the Academy. (Diog. Laërt. v. 2, iv. 1.) At the same time, it is more probable that, after the notions of the ancient philosophers, he esteemed travels in foreign parts as a necessary completion of his education. Since the death of Plato, there had been no longer any ties to detain him at Athens. Besides, the political horizon there had assumed a very different aspect. The undertakings of Philip against Olynthus and most of the above-mentioned embassy of Aristotle to Macedonia in consequence filled the mind of Aristotle with hatred and anxiety. The native city of Aristotle met with the fate of many others, and was destroyed by Philip at the very time that Aristotle received an invitation from his former pupil, Hermias, who from being the confidential friend of a Bithynian dynasty, Eubulus (comp. Ptol. ix. 6; Arist. Polit. ii. 4 §§ 9, 10), had, as already stated, mixed himself to be the ruler of the cities of Atarneas and Assos. On his journey thither he was accompanied by his friend Xenocrates, the disciple of Plato. Hermias, like his predecessor Eubulus, had taken part in the attempts made at that time by the Greeks in Asia to free themselves from the Persian dominion. Perhaps, therefore, the journey of Aristotle had even a political object, as it appears not unlikely that Hermias wished to avail himself not merely of his counsel, but of his gallant spirit with Philip in order to further his plans. A few years, however, after the arrival of Aristotle, Hermias, through the treachery of Mentor, a Grecian general in the Persian service, fell into the hands of the Persians, and, like his predecessor, lost his life. Aristotle himself escaped to Mytilene, whither his wife, Pythias, the adoptive daughter of the assassinated prince, accompanied him. A poem on his unfortunate friend, which is still preserved, testifies the warm affection which he had felt for him. He afterwards caused a statue to be erected to his memory at Delphi. (Diog. Laërt. v. 6, 7.) He transferred to his adoptive daughter, Pythias, the almost enthusiastic attachment which he had entertained for his friend; and long after her death he directed in his will that her ashes should be placed beside his own. (Diog. v. 16.)

Two years after his flight from Atarneas (b.c. 345)

* On the other hand, Augustin (de Civit. Dei, viii. 12) says, "Quam Aristotelis, vir excellentissim ingenii, sectam Peripateticam condidisset, et plurimos discipulos, praeclara fama excellentissim, eum adhaerere procul from sam haeresin congregassent."
ARISTOTELES.

342) we find the philosopher accepting an invitation from Philip of Macedonia, who summoned him to his court to undertake the instruction and education of his son Alexander, then thirteen years of age. (Plut. Alex. 5; Quintil. i. 1.) Here Aristotle was treated with the most marked respect. His native city, Stagira, was rebuilt at his request, and Philip caused a gymnasium (called Nymphæum) to be built there in a pleasant grove expressly for Aristotle and his pupils. In the time of Plutarch, the shady walks (nepūrato) and stone seats of Aristotle were still shewn to the traveller. (Plut. L. c. 5.) Here, in quiet retirement from the intrigues of the court at Pella, the future conqueror of the world reigned in manhood. Plutarch informs us that several other noble youths enjoyed the instruction of Aristotle with him. (Aesopit. Reg. vol. v. p. 663, ed. Reiske.) Among this number we may mention Cassander, the son of Antipater (Plut. Alex. 74), Marsyas of Pella (brother of Antigonus, afterwards king), who subsequently wrote a work on the education of Alexander; Callisthenes, a relation of Aristotle, and afterwards the historian of Alexander, and Theophrastus of Eresus (in Lesbos). Neurcharus, Ptolemy, and Harpalus also, the three most intimate friends of Alexander's youth, were probably his fellow pupils. (Plut. Alex. 10.) Alexander attached himself with such ardent affection to the philosopher, that the youth, whom no one yet had been able to manage, soon valued his instructor above his own father. Aristotle spent seven years in Macedonia; but Alexander enjoyed his instruction without interruption for only four. But with such a pupil even this short period was sufficient for a teacher like Aristotle to fulfill the highest purposes of education, to aid the development of his pupil's faculties in every direction, to awaken susceptibility and lively inclination for every art and science, and to create in him that sense of the noble and great, which distinguishes Alexander from all those conquerors who have only swept like a hurricane through the world. According to the usual mode of Greek education, a knowledge of the poets, eloquence, and philosophy, were the principal subjects into which Aristotle initiated his royal pupil. Thus we are even informed that he prepared a new recension of the Iliad for him (cf. Iliad. W. 9, p. 211). He instructed him in ethics also (Plut. Alex. 7), and dismissed to him the abstractions of his own speculations, of the publication of which by his writing his Alexander afterwards complained. (Gell. xx. 5.) Alexander's love of the science of medicine and every branch of physics, as well as the lively interest which he took in literature and philosophy generally (Plut. Alex. 8), were awakened and fostered by this instruction. Nor can the views communicated by Aristotle to his pupil on politics have failed to exercise the most important influence on his subsequent plans; although the aim of Alexander, to unite all the nations under his sway into one kingdom, without due regard to their individual peculiarities (Plut. De Vitr. Alex. i. 6, vol. i. pp. 39, 42, ed. Houssaye) was not (as Job. v. 18, Universals maintain) founded on the advice of Aristotle, but, on the contrary, was opposed to the views of the philosopher, as Plutarch (l. c. p. 88) expressly remarks, and as a closer consideration of the politics of Aristotle is of itself sufficient to prove. (Comp. Politi. iii. 9, vi. 8, i. 1.) On the other hand, this connexion had likewise important consequences as regards Aristotle himself. Living in what was then the centre and source of political activity, his survey of the relations of life and of states, as well as his knowledge of men, was extended. The position in which he stood to Alexander occasioned and favoured several studies and literary works. In his extended researches into natural science, and particularly in his zoological investigations, he received not only from Philip, but in still larger measure from Alexander, the most liberal support, a support which stands unrivalled in the history of civilisation. (Aelian, V. H. 19; Athen. lx. p. 308, c.; Plin. H. N. vii. 17.) In the year b. c. 340, Alexander, then scarcely seventeen years of age, was appointed regent by his father, who was about to make an expedition against Byzantium. From that time Aristotle's instruction of the young prince was chiefly restricted to advice and suggestion, which may very possibly have been carried on by means of epistolary correspondence. In the year b. c. 335, soon after Alexander ascended the throne, Aristotle quitted Macedonia for ever, and returned to Athens, after an absence of twelve years, whither, as it appears, he had already been invited. Here he found his friend Xenocrates, president of the Academy. He himself had the Lyceum, a gymnasium in the neighbourhood of the temple of Apollo Lykeios, assigned to him by the state. He soon assembled round him a large number of distinguished scholars out of all the Hellenic cities of Europe and Asia, to whom, in the shady walks (nepūrato) which surrounded the Lyceum, while walking up and down, he delivered lectures on philosophy. From one or other of these circumstances the name Peripatetic is derived, which was afterwards given to his school. It appears, however, most correct to derive the name (with Jonius, Dissert. de Hist. Perip. i. 1, pp. 419—425, ed. Elschen) from the place where Aristotle taught, which was called at Athens per excellence, the nepūratos, as is proved also by the wills of Theophrastus and Lycon. His lectures, which, according to Aristotle, and Plutarch (v. 5), he delivered in the morning (nēpūratos nepūratos) to a narrower circle of chosen and confidential (esoterik) hearers, and which were called aerostatic or aerostatic, embowed subjects connected with the more abstruse philosophy (theology), physics, and dialectics. Those which he delivered in the afternoon (bēbētov nepūratos) and intended for a more promiscuous circle (which accordingly he called exoterik), extended to rhetoric, sophistices, and politics. Such a separation of his more intimate disciples and more profound lectures, from the main body of his other hearers and the popular discourses intended for them, is also found among other Greek philosophers. (Plut. Theoct. p. 152, c.; Plutarch, p. 63, b.) As regards the exact time of delivery, he appears to have taught not so much in the way of conversation, as in regular lectures. Some notices have been preserved to us of certain external regulations of his school, e. g., that, after the example of Xenocrates, he created an archon every ten days among his scholars, and laid down certain laws of good breeding for their social meetings (φαίνεται συμπαθής, Diog. Laërt. ii. 130; Athen. p. 186, a. e.). Neither of the two schools of philosophers which flourished at the same time in Athens approached, in extent and celebrity, that of Aristotle, from which proceeded a large number of distinguished philosophers, historians, statesmen, and orators. We mention here, beside Callisthenes of Olynthus, who has been already spoken of, only the names of Theophrastus, and his countryman Phanias, of Eresus, the former of whom succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum as president of the school; Aristotle the Tarentine, summoned μαθητής; the brothers Budemos and Pasiprates of Rhodes; Budemos of Cyprus; Clearchus of Soli; Theodectes of Phaselis; the historians Dioclesius and Satyrus; the celebrated statesman, orator, and writer, Demetrius Phalereus; the philosopher Aristo of Cos; Philon; Nearchus of Scopas, and many others, of whom an account was given by the Alexandrine grammarian Nicander in his lost work Περὶ τῶν ἀριστοτέλεων μαθητῶν.

During the thirteen years which Aristotle spent at Athens in active exertions amongst such a circle of disciples, he was at the same time occupied with the composition of the greater part of his works. In these labours, as has already been observed, he was assisted by the truly kingly liberality of his former pupil, who not only presented him with 800 talents, an immense sum even for our times, but also, through his viegecements in the conquered provinces, caused large collections of natural curiosities to be made for him, to which posterity is indebted for one of his most excellent works, the "History of Animals." (Plin. H. N. viii. 17.)

Meanwhile various causes contributed to throw a cloud over the latter years of the philosopher's life. In the first place, he felt deeply the death of his wife Pythias, who left behind her a daughter of the same name, and was very closely attached to a friend of his wife's, the slave Herpyllis, who bore him a son, Nicomachus, and of whose faithfulness and attachment he makes a grateful and substantial acknowledgement in his will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 1; v. 13.) But a source of still greater grief was an interruption of the friendly relation in which he had hitherto stood to his royal pupil. The occasion of this originated in the opposition raised by the philosopher Callisthenes against the changes in the conduct and policy of Alexander. Aristotle, who had in vain advised Callisthenes not to lose sight of prudence in his behaviour towards the king, disapproved of his conduct altogether, and foresaw its unhappy issue. (Callisthenes.) Still Alexander refrained from any expression of hostility towards his former instructor (a story of this kind in Diog. Laërt. v. 10, has been corrected by Stahr, Aristotellea, p. 133); and although, as Plutarch expressly informs us, their former cordial connexion no longer subsisted undisturbed, yet, as is proved by a remarkable expression (Topoi, iii. 1, 7, ed. Bühle; comp. Albert Heydemann's German translation and explanation of the categories of Aristotle, p. 32, Berlin, 1835), Aristotle never lost his trust in his royal friend. The story, that Aristotle, irritated by the above-mentioned occurrence, took part in poisoning the king, is altogether un found. Alexander, according to all historical testimony, died a natural death, and no writer mentions the name of Aristotle in connexion with the rumour of the poisoning except Pliny. (H. N. xxx. 53.) Nay, even the passage of Pliny has been wrongly understood by the biographers of Aristotle (by Stahr as well, i. p. 139); for, far from regarding Aristotle as guilty of such a crime, the Roman naturalist, who everywhere shows that he cherished the deepest respect for Aristotle, says, on the contrary, just the reverse,—that the rumour had been " magna cum infima Aristotelis execratione."

The movements which commenced in Greece against Macedonia after Alexander's death, b. c. 323, endangered also the peace and security of Aristotle, who was regarded as a friend of Macedonia. To bring a political accusation against him was not easy, for Aristotle was so spotless in this respect, that not even his name is mentioned by Demosthenes, or any other contemporary orator, as implicated in those relations. He was accordingly accused of impiety (doréelas) by the hierophant Eurymedon, whose accusation was supported by an Athenian of some note, named Demophilus. Such accusations, as the rabbiul Euthyphron in Plato remarks, seldom missed their object with the multitude. (Plato, Euthyphr. p. 3, νῦν ἑκάστος τό τιγύρα πρός τοῦτο πολλοὺς.) The charge was grounded on his having addressed a hymn to his friend Hermes as a god, and paid him divine honours in other respects. (Diog. Laërt. v. 5; Igen, Diog. ex. Soc. Poet, p. 69; and the Αρκουπτονικές attributed to Aristotle, but the authenticity of which was doubted even by the ancients, in Athen. xv. 16, p. 696.) Certain dogmas of the philosopher were also used for the same object. (Oriigen. c. Cels. l. p. 51, ed. Hoesschel.) Aristotle, however, knew his danger sufficiently well to withdraw from Athens before his trial. He escaped in the beginning of b. c. 322 to Chaleis in Euboea, where he is said to have met with his mother's side, and where the Macedonian influence, which was there predominant, afforded him protection and security. In his will also mention is made of some property which he had in Chaleis, (Diog. Laërt. v. 14.) Certain accounts (Stumbo, x. p. 448; Diog. Laërt. x. 1) even render it exceedingly probable that Aristotle had left Athens and removed to Chaleis before the death of Alexander. A fragment of a letter written by the philosopher to his friend Antipater has been preserved to us, in which he states his reasons for the above-mentioned change of residence, and at the same time, with reference to the unjust execution of Socrates, adds, that he wished to deprive the Athenians of the opportunity of winning a second time against philosophy. (Comp. Kustath. ad Hm. Od. vii. 120. p. 1573, 12. ed. Rom. 275, 20, Bas.; Aelian, V. H. iii. 36.) From Chaleis he may have sent forth a defence against the accusation of his enemies. At least antiquity possessed a defence of that kind under his name, the authenticity of which, however, was already doubted by Athenaeus. (Comp. Phavorin. ap. Diog. Laërt. l. c., who calls it a λόγος διανυσματι. However, on his refusing to answer the summons of the Areopagus, he was deprived of all the rights and honours which had been previously bestowed upon him (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 1), and condemned to death in his absence. Meantime adapted to produce conviction in his hearers, a gift which Antipater praises highly in a letter written after Aristotle's death. (Plut. Cat. Meg. p. 554, Corn. p. 248.) He exhibited remarkable attention to external appearance, and bestowed much care on his dress and person. (Timonius, op. Diag. l. v. 1; Aelian, V. H. iii. 19.) He is described as having been of weak health, which, considering the astonishing extent of his studies, shows all the more the energy of his mind. (Censor, de Die Nat. 14.) He was short and of slender make, with small eyes and a lip in his pronunciation, using L for R (γραυδός, Diag. l. v. 1), and with a sort of sarcastic expression in his countenance (μυελά, Aelian, iii. 19), all which characteristics are introduced in a maliciously caricatured description of him in an ancient epigram. (Anth. p. 552, vol. ii. p. 176, ed. Jacob. E.) The plastic works of antiquity, which pass as portraits of Aristotle, are treated by Visconti. (Iconographia Gregyana, i. p. 280.)

II. ARISTOTELES'S WRITINGS.

Before we proceed to enumerate, classify, and characterise the works of the philosopher, it is necessary to take a review of the history of their transmission to our times. A short account of this kind has at the same time the advantage of indicating the progress of the development and influence of the Aristotelian philosophy itself.

According to ancient accounts, even the large number of the works of Aristotle which are still preserved, comprises only the smallest part of the writings he is said to have composed. According to the Greek commentator David (ad Catay. Prooc. p. 24, l. 40, Brand.), Andromica the Rhodian stated their number at 1000 ἀργυροπαπυρακοντα. The Anonym. Menagii (p. 61, ed. Duhle in Arist. Opp. vol. 1) sets down their number at 400 διδάσκαλις. Diogenes Laërtius (v. 27) gives 44 myriads as the number of lines. If we reckon about 10,000 lines to a quire, this gives us 44 quires, while the writings extent amount to about the fourth part of this. (Hegel, Vorlesungen über die Gesch. der Philosophie, vol. ii. pp. 307, 308.) Still these statements are very indefinite. Nor do we get on much better with the three ancient catalogues of his writings which are still extant, those namely of Diogenes Laërtius, the Anonym. Menag., and the Arabic writers in Cursi (Bul. Arch. Hist. vol. i. p. 306), which may be found entire in the first volume of Bulle's edition of Aristotle. They all three give a mere enumeration, without the least trace of arrangement, and without any critical remarks. They differ not only from each other, but from the quotations of other writers and from the titles of the extant works to such a degree, that all idea of reconciling them must be given up. The difficulty of doing so is further increased by the fact, that one and the same work is frequently quoted under different titles (Brundis, de petitalis. Arist. lib. de Ideis et de Bono, p. 7; Ravaiss., Méthaphysique d'Aristote, vol. i. p. 48, Paris, 1837), and that sections and books appear as independent writings under distinct titles. From Aristotle's own quotations of his works, we derive but little assistance, as the references for the most part are quite general, or have merely been supplied by later writers. (Ritter, Gesch. der Phil. vol. iii. p. 21, not. 1.) The most complete enumeration of the writings of Aristotle from those catalogues, as well as

* He praised the wines of both islands, but said he thought that of Lesbos the more agreeable.
of the extant as of the lost works, is to be found in Fabrius. (Bib. Gr. ii. pp. 267—268, and pp. 386—407.) The lost works alone have been enumerated by Bulle (Commentatio de desper. Arist. lib. in Comment. Gomar. xv. p. 7, etc.). But the labours of both of these scholars, no longer satisfy the demands of modern critical science. To make use of, and form a judgment upon those ancient catalogues, is still further attended with uncertainty from the circumstances, that much that was spurious was introduced among the writings of Aristotles at an early period in antiquity. The causes of this are correctly assigned by Ammonius. (Ad Arist. Categ. fol. 3. a.) In the first place, several of the writings of the immediate disciples of Aristotles, which treated of like subjects under like names, as those of Theophrastus, Eudemus Rhodius, Flanius, and others, got accidentally inserted amongst the works of the Stagirite. Then we must add mistakes arising διὰ τῶν διακομητέων, as in the ancient philosophical, rhetorical, and histrionic schools, the works of several writers of the same name. Lastly, the endeavours of the Ptolemies and Attali to enrich their libraries as much as possible with works of Aristotle, set in motion a number of people, whose love of gain rendered them not over scrupulously honest. (Comp. David, ad Categ. p. 28, a., 15, who assigns additional causes of falsification; Ammon. L. c.; Simplicius, fol. 4, 6; Galon, Comment. 2 in libr. de Nat. hom. pp. 16, 17; Brandis, Rhem. Mus. p. 200, 1827.) It is very possible that the Greek lists, in particular that in Diogenes Laëetis, are nothing else than catalogues of these libraries. (Trendelenburg, ad Arist. de Ana. i. p. 133.) As regards the division of Aristotles's writings, the ancient Greek commentators, as Ammonius (ad Categ. p. 6, b. Ald.) and Simplicius (ad Cat. pp. 1, 6, ed. Bas.) distinguish—1. Προηγματικά, i.e. collections of notions and materials, drawn up for his own use. 2. Συντεχνικά, elaborate works. Those which were composed in a strictly scientific manner, and contained the doctrinal lectures (ἐποικία) of the philosopher, they called δικαματικά (Gell. xx. 5, has δικοματικά, which form, however, Schauer, ad Plut. vol. v. p. 245, rejects), or else εὐσετεχνά, εὐσπορτα. Those, on the other hand, in which the method and style were of a more popular kind, and which were calculated for a circle of readers beyond the limits of the school, were termed εὐστετεχνά. The latter were composed chiefly in the form of dialogues, particularly such as treated upon points of practical philosophy. Of these dialogues, which were still extant in Cicero's time, nothing has been preserved. (The whole of the authorities relating to this subject, amongst whom Strab. xiii. pp. 608, 609; Cic. de Fin. v. 5, ad Att. iv. 16; Gell. i. c.; Plut. Alex. 5, Advers. Co. col. I. 115, b. are the most important, are given at full length in Staehr's Aristotelica, vol. ii. p. 244, &c.; to which must be added Sopater atque Syrnan. ad Heron. p. 120, in Lounard Spengel, Σωφρόνιου διδασκαλίας, s. de Arist. Script. &c. 157.) The object which Aristotles had in view in the composition of his Axis, or a treatise which he had written on one of the following kind. He wished by means of them to come to an understanding with the public. The Platonic philosophy was so widely diffused through all classes, that it was at that time almost a duty for every educated man to be a follower of Plato. Aristotles therefore was obliged to break ground for his newer philosophy by enlightening the public generally on certain practical points. In this way originated writings like the Eudemus, a refutation, as it appears, of Plato's Phaedrus. His book τὸ κριτικόν, a critical extract from Plato's "I am," further writings such as the πείραμαται, &c. These were the λογισμοὶ καὶ κριτικά λεγομένα, and Stobaeus quotes from them quite correctly in his Περιλογία, καὶ τῶν Ἀριστοτέλεων ΚΟΙΝΩΝ Διαλόγου. (Comp. Philop. ad Arist. de Ana. i. 138, c. 2.) In Aristotle himself (and this has not always been duly considered) there occurs no express declaration of this distinction. The designations esoteric, aecromatic, or coptic writings, would alike be looked for in vain in all the genuine works of the philosopher. It is only in his answer to the complaint of Alexander, that by publishing his lectures he had made the secrets of philosophy the common property of all, that he says, that "the aecromatic (aecomiatric, or esoteric) books had been published and yet not published, for they were intelligible only to one who had been initiated into philosophy." The expression esoteric, on the other hand, we find in Aristotle himself, and that in nine passages. (Eth. Nic. i. 13, v. 4, Eth. Eudem. ii. 1, ii. 8, v. 4, Polit. iii. 4, vii. i, Phys. iv. 14, Metaph. xiii. 1.) These very passages prove incontestably, that Aristotle himself had not in view a division of this kind in the sense in which it was subsequently understood. In one instance he applies the name esoteric to writings which, in accordance with the above-mentioned division, must necessarily be set down as esoteric; and, secondly, in several of those passages the term is merely employed to denote disquisitions which were foreign to the matter in hand; the expression is used to denote the writings of other authors. The whole subject concerns us more as a point of literary history than as having any scientific interest. "One sees at once for one's self," says Hegel (Gesch. der Philos. iii. p. 310, comp. 220, 230), "what works are philosophic and speculative, and what are more of a mere empirical nature. The esoteric is the speculative, which, even though written and printed, yet remains concealed from those who do not take sufficient interest in the matter to apply themselves vigorously. It is no secret, and yet is hidden." But the same author is wrong in maintaining, that among the ancients there existed no difference at all between the writings of the philosophers which they published, and the lectures which they delivered to a select circle of hearers. The contrary is established by positive testimony. Thus Aristotle was the first to publish what with Plato were, strictly speaking, lectures (Σφακία ἡγγανή, Brandis, de perd. Ar. libr. de Ideis, p. 25; Trendelenb. Platonis de Ideis doctrina ex Platonie illustrata, p. 2, &c., Berlin, 1827). Hegel himself took good care not to allow all the conclusions to which his system conducted to appear in print, and Kant also found it unadvisable for a philosopher "to give utterance in his works to all that he thought, although he would certainly say nothing that he did not think." The genuine Aristotelian writings which are extant would have to be reckoned amongst the aecromatic books. The Problems alone belong to the class designated by the ancients hypomonematika. Of the dialogues only small fragments are extant. All that we know of them place them, as well as those of Theophratus, far below the dramatic and as lively and characteristic dialogues of Plato. The introductions, according to a notice in Cicero (ad Att. iv. 10), had no internal connexion with the remainder of the treatises.

Fate of Aristotle's writings. 1. In antiquity.—If we bear in mind the above division, adopted by the Greek commentators, it is obvious that the so-called hypothemmatic writings were not published by Aristotle himself, but made their appearance only at a later time with the whole body of his literary remains. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that the extant works, particularly the dialogues, were published by the philosopher himself. But respecting the aoracmatic writings, that is, respecting the principal works of Aristotle, an opinion became prevalent, through misunderstanding an ancient tradition, which maintained its ground for centuries in the history of literature, and which, though at variance with all reason and history, has been refuted and corrected only within the last ten years by the investigations of German scholars.

According to a story which we find in Strabo (xiii. p. 608)—the main authority in this matter—for the accounts given by Athenaeus, Plutarch, and Suidas, present only unimportant variations), Aristotle bequeathed his library and original manuscripts to his successor, Theophratus. After the death of the latter, these literary treasures together with Theophratus' own library came into the hands of his relation and disciple, Neleus of Scepsis. This Neleus sold both collections at a high price to Ptolemy II., king of Egypt, for the Alexandria library; but he retained for himself as an added to the original MSS. of these two philosophers' works. The descendants of Neleus, who were subjects of the king of Pergamus, knew of no other way of securing them from the search of the Attalians, who wished to rival the Ptolemies in forming a large library, than concealing them in a collar (κατὰ γῆς ἐν διαφυρῳ τινι), where for a couple of centuries they were exposed to the ravages of damp and worms. It was not till the beginning of the century before the birth of Christ that a wealthy book-collector, the Athenian Apellion of Teos, traced out these valuable relics, bought them from the ignorant heirs, and prepared from them a new edition of Aristotle's works, causing the manuscript to be copied, and filling up the gaps and making emendations, but without sufficient knowledge of what he was about. After the capture of Athens, Sulla in B.C. 84 confiscated Apellion's collection of books, and had them conveyed to Rome. [APELLION.]

Through this ancient and in itself not incredible story, an error has arisen, which has been handed down from the time of Strabo to the present day. People thought (as did Strabo himself) that they must necessarily conclude from this account, that neither Aristotle nor Theophratus had published their writings, with the exception of some extant works, which had no important bearing on their system; and that it was not until 200 years later that these were brought to light by the above-mentioned Apellion and published to the philosophical world. That, however, was by no means the case. Aristotle indeed did not prepare a complete edition, as we call it, of his writings. Nay, it is certain that death overtook him before he could finish some of them, revise others, and put the finishing touch to several. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that Aristotle destined all his works for publication, and himself, with the assistance of his disciples, particularly Theophratus, published those which he completed in his lifetime. This is incontestably certain with regard to the extant writings. Of the rest, those which had not been published by Aristotle himself, were made known by Theophratus in a more enlarged and complete form; as may be proved, for instance, of the physical and historic-political writings. Other scholars of the Stagirite, as for example, the Rhodian Eudemus, Plinius, Pasistrates, and others, illustrated and completed in works of their own, which frequently bore the same title, certain works of their teacher embracing a distinct branch of learning; while others, less independently, published lectures of their master which they had reduced to writing. The exertions of these scholars were, indeed, chiefly directed to the logical writings of the philosopher; but, considering the well-known multiplicity of studies which characterised the school of the Peripatetics, we may assume, that the remaining writings of their great master did not pass unnoticed. But the writings of Aristotle were read and studied, in the first two centuries after his death, beyond the limits of the school itself. The first Pтоломæi, who were friends and personal patrons of Aristotle, Theophratus, Stratton, and Demetrius Phaleeus, spared no expense in order to incorporate in the library which they had founded at Alexandria the works of the founder of the Peripatetic school, in as complete a form as possible. For this end, they caused numerous copies of the same work to be purchased; thus, for example, there were forty MSS. of the Analytics at Alexandria. (Ammon. ad Cop. fol. 2,a.) And although much that was spurious found its way in, yet the acuteness and learning of the great Alexandrine critics and grammarians are a sufficient security for us that writings of that kind were subsequently discovered and separated. It cannot be determined, indeed, how far the studies of these men were directed to the strictly logical and metaphysical works; but that they studied the historical, political, and rhetorical writings of Aristotle, the fragments of their own writings being ample testimony. Moreover, as is well known, Aristotle and Theophratus were both admitted to the famous "Canons," the tradition of which is at any rate very ancient, and which included besides only the philosophers, Plato, Xenophon, and Aeschines. There can therefore be little doubt, that it is quite false that the philosophical writings of Aristotle, for the first two centuries after his death, remained rotting in the cellar at Scepsis; and that it was only certain copies which met with this fate: this view of the case accords also with the direct testimony of the ancients. (Gell. xx. 5; Plut. Alex. 7; Simplicius, Proem. ad Ar. Phys. extr., Ar. Post. 5, extr.; Brandis, Athen. der Berlin. Acad. xvi. p. 268.) And in this way is it to be explained why neither Cicero, who had the advantage of the advice of the ancient and one of the numerous Greek commentators, mentions a syllable of this tradition about the fate and long concealment of all the more important works of Aristotle. In saying this, however, we by no means intend to deny—1. That the story in Strabo has some truth in it, only that the conclusions which he and others drew from it must be regarded as erroneous: or
2. That the fate which befell the literary remains of Aristotle and Theophrastus was prejudicial to individual writings, e.g. to the Metaphysics (see Glaser, die Arist.-Metaph. p. 8, &c.); or 3. That through the discovery of Apollonius several writings, as e.g. the Problems, and other hypomnematic works, as the Poetics, which we now possess, may have come to light for the first time.

Meantime, after the first two successors of Aristotle, the Peripatetic school gradually declined. The heads of the school, who followed Theophrastus and Stobaeus, viz. Lycon, Ariston of Ceos, Critonius, &c., were of less importance, and seem to have occupied themselves only in carrying out some separate dogmas, and commenting on the works of Aristotle. Attention was especially directed to a popular, rhetorical system of Ethics. The school declined in splendour and influence; the more abstruse writings of Aristotle were neglected, because their form was not sufficiently pleasing, and the easy superficiality of the school was deterred by the difficulty of unfolding them. Thus the expression of the master himself respecting his writings might have been repeated, "that they had been published and yet not published." Extracts and anthologies arose, and satisfied the superficial wants of the school, while the works of Aristotle himself were thrust into the background.

In Rome, before the time of Cicero, we find only slender traces of an acquaintance with the writings and philosophical system of Aristotle. They only came there with the library of Apollonius, which Sulla had carried off from Greece. Here Tyrrannius, a learned freedman, and still more the philosopher and literary antiquary, Andronicus of Rhodes, gained great credit by the pains they bestowed on them. Indeed, the labours of Andronicus form an epoch in the history of the Aristotelian writings. [Andronicus, p. 176, b.]

With Andronicus of Rhodes the age of commentators begins, who no longer, like the first Peripatetics, treated of separate branches of philosophy in works of their own, but growing by the master, but united in regular commentaries explanations of the meaning with critical observations on the text of individual passages. The popular and often profic style of these commentaries probably arises from their having been originally lectures. Here must be mentioned, in the first century after Christ, Bortius, a scholar of Andronicus; Nicolas damascenus; Alexander argaeus, Nero's instructor; in the second century, Aspasius (Eeb. Nic. ii. and iv.); Aristatus, a author of a work περὶ τῆς τέκνης τῶν Ἀριστοτέλους βιβλίων; Galenus; Alexander of Aphrodisias in Caria. [See p. 112.] In the third and fourth centuries a numerous school of commentators, in the task of explaining Aristotle: among these we must mention Porphyry, the author of the introduction to the Categories, and his pupil, Iamblichus; Dextris: and Themistius. In the fifth century, Proclus; Ammonius; Damascius; David the Armenian. In the sixth century, Asclepius; bishop of Tralles; Olympiodorus, a pupil of Ammonius. Simplicius was one of the teachers of philosophy who, in the reign of Justinian, emigrated to the emperor Coæsars of Persia. (Jourdain, Recherches critiques sur l'âge et l'origin des Traductions latines d'Arist., Paris, 1819.) His commentaries are of incalculable value for the history of the Ionian, Pythagorean, and Eleatic philosophy. In-deed, in every point of view, they are, together with those of Johannes Philoponus, the most distinguished of all the works of Greek commentators which have been preserved to us. Almost contemporaneously with them the Roman consul Bortius, the last support of philosophical literature in Italy (A.D. 521), translated some of the writings of Aristotle.

The series of the more profound commentators ends with these writers; and after a long interval, the works of Aristotle became a subject of study and explanation among the Arabsians and in the West, while among the Greeks scarcely any one else is to be mentioned than Jom, Damascenus and Photius in the eighth and ninth centuries; Michael Psellus, Michael Ephraemius in the eleventh century; Geo. Pachymeres and Eustratus in the twelfth; Leo Magentius in the fourteenth; and Georgius Gymistus Plityro and Georgius of Tripesi in the fifteenth. These borrow all that they have of any value from the older commentators. (Comp. Labbeus, Graeco-Aristotelic Commentator. Conspectus, Par. 1758.) The older editions of these commentators were published in the most complete form at Göttingen, in 30 vols. The best edition is by Chr. Aug. Brandis, Soluta in Arist. collegii, &c., Berl. 1836, &to., in two volumes, of which as yet only the first has appeared.

2. History of the writings of Aristotle in the East and among the schools of the West in the middle ages.—While the study of the writings and philosophy of Aristotle was promoted in the West by Boethius, the emperor Justinian abolished the philosophical schools at Athens and in all the cities of his empire, where they had hitherto enjoyed the protection and support of the state. At that time also the two Peripatetics, Damascius and Simplicius, left Athens and emigrated to Persia, where they met with a kind reception at the court of Coæsars Nushirvan, and by means of translations diffused the knowledge of Greek literature. Soon after, afterwards the Arabians appeared as a conquering people, under the Omansidæ; and though at first they had no taste for art and science, they were soon led to appreciate them under the Abbassides, who ascended the throne of the khilif in the middle of the eighth century. The khilif Al-Mansur, Harun-al-Rashid, Mummm, Motosm (763—842), favoured the Greco-Christian sect of the Nestorian, who were intimately acquainted with the Aristotelian philosophy; invited Greek scholars to the court at Bagdad, and caused the philosophical works of Greek literature, as well as the medical and astronomical ones, to be rendered into Arabic, chiefly from Greek originals, by translators appointed expressly for the task.

Through the last of the Omansidæ, Abd-ábrám, who escaped to Spain on the downfall of his house in the East, this taste for Greek literature and philosophy was introduced into the West also. Schools and academies, like those at Bagdad, arose in the Spanish cities subject to the Arabs, which continued in constant connexion with the East. Abd-ábrám III. (about A.D. 912) and Hakem established and supported schools and founded libraries; and Cordova became for Europe what

* From the fifth century onwards the first Latin translations of Aristotle begin with that by St. Augustin.
Bagdad was for Asia. In Bagdad the celebrated physician and philosopher, Avicenna (1037), and in the West Avicenna’s (1193), and his disciple, Mees Maimonides, did most to promote the study of the Aristotelian philosophy by means of translations, or rather free paraphrases, of the philosopher’s writings. Through the Spanish Christians and Jews, the knowledge of Aristotle was propagated to the other nations of the West, and translations of the writings of Avicenna, who was looked upon as the representative of Aristotelian, spread over France, Italy, England, and Germany. The logical writings of Aristotle were known to the schoolmen in western Christendom before the twelfth century, through the translations of Boethius; but it was not till after the crusades (about 1270), that they possessed translations of all the writings of Aristotle, which were made either from Arabic copies from Spain, or from Greek originals which they had brought with them from Constantinople and other Greek cities. The first western writer who translated any of the works of Aristotle into Latin, was Hermannus Alemannus, at Toledo in Spain, who translated the Ethics. Other translators, whose works are in part still preserved, were Robert, bishop of Lincoln (1253), John of Basingstoke (1252), Wilhelm of Moerbecke (1281), Gerard of Germania (1187), Michael Scotus (1217), and Albertus Magnus. In the years 1260—1270 Thomas Aquinas, the most celebrated commentator on Aristotle in the middle ages, prepared, through the instrumentality of the monk Wilhelm of Moerbecke, a new Latin translation of the writings of Aristotle after Greek originals. He wrote commentaries on almost all the works of the Stagirite, and, together with his teacher, the celebrated Albertus Magnus, rendered the same services to the Aristotelian philosophy in the West which Avicenna and Averroes had done for the East and the Africans in Spain. For the West, Paris was the seat of science and of the Aristotelian philosophy in particular. Next to it stood Oxford and Cologne. Almost all the celebrated schoolmen of the middle ages owed their education to one or other of these cities.

3. History of the writings of Aristotle since the revival of classical studies.—After Thomas Aquinas, distinguished schoolmen, it is true, occupied themselves with the writings of Aristotle; but the old barbaric translation was read almost exclusively. With the revival of classical studies in Italy, at the end of the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth century, the writings of Aristotle and the mode of treating them experienced a revolution. The struggle between liberal studies and the rigidity and empty quibbling of the scholastic Aristotelian, ended in the victory of the former. Among the first and most distinguished promoters of the study of Aristotle was the excellent Greek scholar, Joh. Argropolus of Byzantium (A.D. 1489), from whom Lorenzo de Medici took lessons. With him should be mentioned Theodor. Gaza (1478), Franciscus Philoponus (1490), Georgius of Trachelus. Giovanni Leonardo of Arezzo (1548). The exerctions of the last-named scholars were warmly seconded by the learned and accomplished pope Nicholas V. (1447—1455), who was himself attached to the Aristotelian philosophy. His scholars, Angelus Polidianus, Hermogenius Barbarus, Donatus Aciacius, Bessarion, Augustinus Niphus, Jacob Faber Stapulensis, Laurentius Valla, Joh. Reuchlin, and others, in like manner contributed a good deal, by means of translations and commentaries, towards stripping the writings of Aristotle of the barbarous garb of scholasticism. The spread of Aristotle’s writings by means of printing, first in the Aldine edition of five volumes by Ald. Fius Manetti, in Venice, 1495—1498, was mainly instrumental in bringing this about. In Germany, Rudolph Agricola, as well as Reuchlin and Melanchthon, taught publicly the Aristotelian philosophy. In Spain, Genevius Sepulveda, by means of new translations of Aristotle and his Greek commentators made immediately from Greek originals, laboured with distinguished success against the scholastic barbarism and the Aristotelian of Averroes. He was supported by the Jesuits at Coimbra, whose college composed commentaries on almost all the writings of the philosopher. In like manner, in France, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, Jacob Faber, Ludwig Vives, Erasmus of Rotterdam, and Konrad Gesner, took an active part in promoting the study of the Aristotelian philosophy; and in spite of the counter-efforts of Franciscus Patrizius and Petrus Ramus, who employed all the weapons of ingenuity against the writings, philosophy, and personal character of Aristotle, the study of his philosophy continued predominant in almost all the schools of Europe. Among the learned scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, we find the most distinguished busied with Aristotle. Their lectures, however, which gave rise to numerous commentaries and editions of Aristotle, are confined principally to his rhetorical, ethical, political, and aesthetic works. The works on logic and natural history were seldom regarded, the metaphysical treatises remained wholly unnoticed. In Italy we must here mention Petrus Victorinus (1582), and his imitator M. Antonius Morarigus (Conti, 1555), Franc. Robertelli (1667), J. C. Scaliger (1588). Julius Paccius a Beriga (1635), Bapt. Camotius, Vincent Madius, and Barthol. Lombardus, Riccoboni, Accarmoni, Montecorona, &c.; among the French, Muretus, Is. Casaubon, Ph. J. Mansv. Bac. Dions. Lambinus (1674); among the English, Swiss, and Germans, Obert. Giphanius (van Giffen, 1604), the physician Theod. Zwinger (a friend of and fellow-labourer with Lambinus, and a scholar of Konrad Gesner). Camerarius of Bamberg (1574), Wilh. Hildern of Berlin (1587), Joh. Sturm (1589), Fred. Syllburg (1590), &c.

Within a period of eighty years in the sixteenth century, besides innumerable editions of single writings of Aristotle, there appeared, beginning with the Basle edition, which Erasmus of Rotterdam superintended, no fewer than seven Greek editions of the entire works of the philosopher, some of which were repeatedly reprinted. There was also published a large number of Latin translations. From the beginning of the sixteenth century, as to the interest felt by the learned public in that age in the writings of the philosopher. In England we see no signs of such studies; and it is only in Casaubon (in the preface to his edition of the works of Aristotle) that we meet with the notice, that at the beginning of the sixteenth century, under the guidance of the learned physician, Tho-was Linacre (1534), and with the co-operation of his friends Latomus and Grocinus, a society was formed there ad illustriam Aristotelis philosophiam et vertandas demo ejus libros. But the undertaking does not appear to have come into execution.

With Casaubon, who intended to promote the study of Aristotle in various ways (as e.g. by a collection of the fragments of the poletiaia, see Casaub. ad Dlg. Legit. v. 27), the series of philologists ends, who paid attention to the writings of Aristotle; and from the beginning of the seventeenth to the end of the eighteenth century the history of Aristotelian literature is a perfect blank. For among the large number of eminent scholars which the Dutch school has to boast of, with the exception of Daniel Heinsius, whose desultory labours bestowed on the Poetics and Ethics hardly deserve mentioning, not one can be named who made Aristotle the subject of his labours; and a complaint made by Valkemenius, respecting the neglect of the philosopher among the ancients, applied at the same time to the philologists of his own age. (Valk. ad Schol. Eurip. Iph. p. 696.) Nor has England, with the exception of some editions of the Poetics by Burgess and Tyrwhitt, Goulston and Winstanley, any monument of such studies worthy of notice. In Germany lectures on the Aristotelian philosophy were still delivered at the universities, but with the exception of Rachelius, Piccaert, Schrader, and Corning, who are of little importance, scarcely any one can be mentioned but the learned Joh. Jonsenius (or Jonas, 1624—1650) of Holstein, and Melchior Zeidler of Königsberg, of whom the first rendered some valuable service to the history of Aristotelian literature (Historia Periplateia, attached to the edition of Lannoi's work de varia Aristotelis fortuna, &c., Wittemberg, 1720, ed. Elswich.), while the other was actively employed on the criticism and exegesis of the philosopher's writings.

In Germany, Lessing was the first, who, in his Dramaturgie, again directed attention to Aristotle, particularly to his Poetics, Rhetoric, and Ethics. Of the philologists, Reitz, and the school of E. A. Wolf, e.g. Spalding, Fullborn, Delbrück, and Vatke, again applied themselves to the editing of Aristotle's works. But the greatest service was rendered by J. G. Schneider of Saxony (1782—1822) by his edition of the Politics and the History of Animals. Several attempts at translations in German were made, and J. G. Buhle, at the instigation of Heyne and Wolf, even applied himself to an edition of the entire works of Aristotle (1791—1800), which was never completed. At the commencement of the nineteenth century, their ranks were joined by Gottfried Hermann and Goethe. Mean time a new era for the philosophical and philosophical study of the Stagirite began with Hegel, the founder of the prevailing philosophy of this century, who properly, so to say, was the first to disclose to the world the deep import of the Greek philosopher, and strenuously advocated the study of his works as the noblest problem connected with classical philology. At the same time the Berlin academy, through Beckler and Brandis, undertook an entirely new recension of the text; and the French Institute, by means of prize essays, happily designed and admirably executed, promoted the understanding of the several works of Aristotle, and the means of forming a judgment respecting them.

The works of Ravanisson, Michelet, and Barthélémy-St. Hilaire are valuable in this respect. Several French translations also made their appearance. In England, in like manner, where the Ethics and Rhetoric of Aristotle still maintained their place in the course of classical instruction, some works of merit connected with the study of Aristotle have appeared of late, among which Taylor's translation may be particularly mentioned.

The most important editions of the entire works of Aristotle are: 1. Aldina, editio princeps, by Aldus Pius Manutius, Venice, 1485—98, 5 vols. fol. (called also Aldina major). For the criticism of the text, this is still the most important of all the old editions. 2. Varia, editio III, Basel, 1550, fol. 2 vols., with several variations from, and some essential improvements upon, the editio princeps. It has been especially prized for the criticism of the Politics. 3. Basilioi, or Aldina minor, edited by Joh. Bapt. Camotius, Venice, 1551—53, 6 vols. 8vo. 4. Syllaburgiana, Francof. 11 vols. 4to. 1584—87. This edition of Syllburg's surpassed all the previous ones, and even the crisis of the present day cannot dispense with it. 5. Casaburiae, Linlgd. Italv. 1590, by Isaac Casaubon, 2 vols. fol. reprinted in 1597, 1603, 1646. This is the first Greek and Latin edition of the entire works of Aristotle, but prepared hastily, and now worthless. The same may be said of the 6. Du Vallicana, Paris, 1616 and 1629, 2 vols. fol.; 1639, 4 vols. fol. by Guili. Du Val. Much more important is the 7. Bippontina (not completed), edited by Joh. Gottl. Buhle 1791—1800, 5 vols. 8vo. It contains only the Organon and the rhetorical and poetical writings. The continuation was prevented by the conflagration of Moscow, in which Buhle lost the materials which he had collected. The first volume, which contains, amongst other things, a most copious enumeration of all the earlier editions, translations, and commentaries, is of great literary value. The critical remarks contain chiefly the variations of older editions. Littic is done in it for criticism itself and exegesis. 8. Beckeriensis, Perpendicular, 1831—1840, ex recensione Immanuelli Beker, edid. Acad. Reg. Borussa, 2 vols. text, 1 vol. Latin translations by various authors, which are not always good and well chosen, and not always in accordance with the text of the new recension. Besides these, there are to be 2 vols. of scholia edited by Brandis, of which only the first volume has yet appeared. This is the first edition founded on a diligent though not always complete comparison of ancient MSS. It forms the commencement of a new era for the criticism of the text of Aristotle. Unfortunately, there is still no notice given of the MSS. made use of, and the course in consequence pursued by the editor, which occasions great difficulty in making a critical use of this edition. Becker's edition has been reprinted at Oxford, in 11 vols. 8vo., with the Indices of Syllburg. Besides these, there is a stereotype edition published by Tauchnitz, Lips. 1832, 16mo. in 16 vols., and another edition of the text, by Weise, in one volume, Lips. 1843.

III. Enumeration and Review of the Writings of Aristotle.

We possess no safe materials for a chronological arrangement of the several writings, such as was attempted by Samuel Petrus. (Miscell. iv. 9.) The citations in the separate writings are of no use for this purpose, as they are often additions made by a later hand; and, not infrequently, two writings refer reciprocally to each other. (Ritter, Gesch. der Philosophie, iii. p. 29, not. 1, p. 33, not. 2.) Moreover, such an arrangement is of small importance for the works of a philosopher like Aristotle.

A systematic arrangement was first given to the writings of Aristotle by Andronicus of Rhodes. He placed together in grammaticis (prooemia) the works which treated of the same subjects, the logical, physical, &c. (Porphyry, Vita Plut. 24; Casiri, Bibl. Archivio-Escurialense, p. 308.) His arrangement, in which the logical præmata came first, agreed, as it appears, in many other respects with the present arrangement in the editions. (Ravaison, Essai sur la Métaphys. i. pp. 22-27.) He seems to have been followed by Adrastus, as it is in part testified by the express evidence of Greek interpreters. The arrangement of Andronicus appears to have been preserved in the division peculiar to the Latin (æstætæ Leviæ), i.e. to the Latin translators and expositors from the fourth to the sixth century, which is spoken of by the two or three notes in the MSS. of Aristotle collated by Bekker. (Arist. Opusc. ed. Bekker, Rhet. i. 8, p. 1388, b. ii. init. p. 1377, b. iii. init. p. 1403, b.) The divisions of the Greek commentators may be found in Stahl (Aristot. ii. p. 251), with which David ad Categ. p. 24; Philop. ad Categ. p. 36, ed. Berolin. may be compared. They separate the writings of Aristotle into three principal divisions. 1. Theoretic. 2. Practical. 3. Logical or organical, which again have their subdivisions. The arrangement in the oldest printed edition of the entire works rests probably upon a tradition, which in its essential features may reach back as far as Andronicus. In the Aldine the Organon (the logical writings) comes first; then follow the works on physical science, including the Problems; then the mathematical and metaphysical writings; at the end the writings which belong to practical philosophy, to which in the following editions the Rhetoric and Poetics are added. This arrangement has continued to be the prevailing one down to the present day. In the following survey we adhere to the arrangement adopted by Zell, who divides the works into:

A. Doctrinal. 1. Historical, c. Miscellaneous, d. Letters, x. Poems and Speeches. Every systematic division of course has reference principally to the first class. The principle to be kept in view in the division of these works must be determined from what Aristotle says himself. According to him, every kind of knowledge has for its object either the possession of truth, or the attainment of truth, or both. Besides this, an operative activity. The latter has for its result either the production of a work (ποιημα), or the result is the act itself, and its process (πρακτικα). Accordingly every kind of knowledge is either I. Productive, poetic (ἐπιστήμη ποιητική); or II. Practical (ἐπιστήμη πρακτική); or III. Theoretical (ἐπιστήμη δειρητική). The theoretical knowledge has three main divisions (philosophia, prægnatima), namely: 1. Physical sciences: (ἐπιστήμη φυσική); 2. Mathematics (ἐπιστήμη μαθηματική); 3. The doctrine of absolute existence (in Aristotle ἡ πρώτη φιλοσοφία, or ἐπιστήμη σειων).
The origin of these categories, according to Trendelenburg's investigation, is of linguistic-grammatical nature. (Trend. de Arist. Catég. Berol. 1833, 8vo.)

2. Περὶ εὐρημακίας (de Elocutione oratoria), i.e., concerning the expression of thoughts by means of speech. By ἐφημανία Aristotel, understands the import of all the component parts of judgments and conclusions. As the Categories are of a grammatical origin, so also this small treatise, which was probably not quite completed, was, as it were, the first attempt at a philosophical system of grammar. (See Classen, de Grammatica Graecae Prioritii, Bonae, 1829, p. 52; K. E. Gepbert, Darstellung der Grammatischen Kategorien, Berlin, 1838, p. 11.)

After these propedeutical treatises, in which definitions (διά) and propositions (προτάσεις) are treated of, there follow, as the first part of Logic, properly so called, 3. The two books Ἀναλυτικὴ πρῶτη (Analytica prima), the theory of conclusions. The title is derived from the resolution of the conclusion into its fundamental component parts (διαλέκτης). The work πρῶτη, appended to the title, is from a later hand. 4. The two books, Ἀναλυτικὴ τρίτη (also δεύτερα, μέγαλα), treat, the first, of demonstrable (apodeictic) knowledge, the second of the application of conclusions to proof. 5. The eight books Τότεςκεμβρίζεια, i.e., the logic of the probable according to Aristotle. It is the method of arriving at further conclusions on every problem according to probable propositions and general points of view. From these last, (τότες, sedes et fontes argumentorum, loci, Cia. Top. c. 2, Ort. c. 14,) the work takes its name. We must regard as an appendix to the Topica the treatise, 6. Περὶ συμφατικῶν ἐπικρατείας, concerning the fallacies which only apparently prove something to us. Published separately by Winckelmann, Leipzig, 1833, as an appendix to his edition of Plato's Euthydemus.

2. Theoretical Philosophy.

Its three parts are Physics, Mathematics, and Metaphysics. In Physics, theoretical philosophy considers material substances, which have the source of motion in themselves (τὰ ὄστα τῶν κινοῦντων). In mathematics the subject is the attributes of quantity and extension (τὸ πόσον καὶ τὸ συνεχὲς), which are external to motion indeed, but not separate from things (χωριστά), though they are still independent, καὶ αὐτὰ μεταστ. Metaphysics (in Arist. πρώτα φιλοσοφία, σοφία, θεωρία, θεολογική ἐπιστήμη, οὐ φιλοσοφία simply) have to do with existence in itself and as such (τὰ ὄντα τῆς ὄντος, Met. Γ. I. 1, E. 1), which in like manner is external to motion; but at the same time exists by itself separately from individual things (τὰ χωριστά ὀντά καὶ τὰ διάλεγμα). Their subject therefore is the universal, the ultimate causes of things, the best, the first (τὰ καθόλου, τὰ ἀτίη, τὰ ἐρωτά, τὰ πρῶτα, περὶ ἀρχῶν ἐπίστημα), absolute existence, and the one. To this last branch belong

The Metaphysics in 14 books (τὰ ἐνετά τῆς φιλοσοφίας, A. N.), which probably originated after Aristotle's death in the collection of originally independent treatises. The title also is of late origin. It occurs first in Plutarch (Alex. c. 7), and must probably be traced back to Andronicus of Rhodes. Out of this pragmaty there have been lost the writings Περὶ φιλοσοφίας, in three books, containing the first sketch of metaphysics, and a description of the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy; and Περὶ Ἰδεάς, in at least four books, a polemic representation of the Platonic doctrine of ideas. (See Brandis, Diction. dei pont. Arist. lib. 21, 4.)

Mathematics, the second science in the sphere of Theoretical Philosophy, is treated of in the following writings of Aristotle:

1. Περὶ ὁρισμὸν γραμμάτων, i.e., concerning indivisible lines, intended as a proof of the doctrine of the infinite divisibility of magnitudes. This work was attributed by several ancient critics to Theophrastus. Ed. princeps by Stephanus, 1537.

2. Μηχανική προβλήματα, Mechanical Problems, critically and exegetically edited by Van Capelle, Amsterdam, 1812. The Roman writer Vitruvius made diligent use of this treatise.

We now come to the third main division of Theoretical Philosophy, viz. Physics or Natural science (πραγματεία τῶν μέθοδος φυσική, ἐπιστήμη περὶ φύσεως, ιστορία περὶ φύσεως, Phys. i. 1, de Caelo, iii. 1,) According to the way in which it is treated of by Aristotle, it exhibits the following division and arrangement: The science of Physics considers as well the universal causes and relations of entire nature, as the individual natural bodies. The latter are either simple and therefore eternal and imperishable, as the heaven, the heavenly bodies, and the fundamental powers of the elements (warm, cold, moist, dry); or they are compound, earthly, and perishable. The compound physical substances are:

1. such as are formed immediately by the above-mentioned fundamental forces, as the elements—fire, air, water, earth; 2. collections of homogeneous matter (διάβουσι, similaria), which are compounded of the elements, e.g., stones, blood, bones, flesh; 3. heterogeneous component parts (διάμομοψι, dissimilaria), as e.g., head, hand, &c.; 4. organized objects compounded of such heterogeneous constituent parts: animals, plants.

The course of observation and investigation proceeds from the whole and universal to the particular and individual, but in the case of each individual portion of the representation, from the cogenuous observation of the external appearance to the investigation of the causes. (Phys. i. 1, iii. 1; de Part. Animal, i. 5; Hist. Anim. i. 6, § 4; Schnei-
ARISTOTELES.

In the latter the most important thing is the investigation of the purpose (τὸ ἐν ἁρμανίᾳ, causa finalis), by means of which one arrives at the idea of the thing (λόγος, or τὸ τῆς ἐκτικῆς). Aristotle reproaches the older investigators with having neglected to penetrate into the purpose and idea (τῆς καὶ λόγος) of the individual sides and parts of nature, and with having always sought merely for the material cause of things. (De Generatione, v. 1, b. 6.) In this investigation of the purpose, the leading idea is always to show, that the natural object, which forms the subject of investigation, corresponds most completely in the way in which it exists to the idea intended to be realized, and accordingly best fulfills its purpose. (De Partih. Anim. i. 5; Phys. i. 8; De Incessu Anim. 2.)

According to this mode of considering the writings of this pragmaty, they will be arranged in the following manner:—

1. The eight books of Physics (φυσικὴ ἀφάνεια), called also by others περὶ ἀφάνειας; the last three books are likewise entitled περὶ ἀφάνειας by Simplicius. Proem., ad Phys. and ad vi. pp. 404-5, ed. Berol.) In these Aristotle develops the general principles of natural science. (Cosmology.)

The investigation of the principles of the universe is naturally succeeded by the consideration of the principal parts of it, the heaven, the heavenly bodies, and the elements. There follows accordingly,

2. The work concerning the Heaven (περὶ οὐρανοῦ), in four books, which is entitled περὶ κύκλων by Alexander of Aphrodisias. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. iii. p. 230, Harl.) According to an astronomical notice in i. 12, the work was composed after the year b. c. 337. See Kepler, Astron. opt. p. 357; Bailly, Histoire de l'Astronomie, p. 244.

3. The two books on Production and Destruction (περὶ γενεσεως καὶ φιλουργίας, de Generatione et Corruptione), develop the general laws of production and destruction, which are indicated more definitely in the process of formation which goes on in inorganic nature, or in meteorological phenomena. The consideration of this forms the contents of the

4. Four books on Meteorology (μετεωρολογία, de Meteoris). This work, which is distinguished by the clearness and case of its style, was composed after b. c. 341, and before the time when an acquaintance with India was obtained by Alexander's expedition. (St. Croix, Examen critique des Hist. d'Alex. p. 708; Idler, Meteorologia vet. Graecor. et Rom., Berol. 1832.) It contains the groundwork of a physical geography. It has been edited by Idler, Lips. 1854, 2 vols., with a profound commentary. This work is commonly followed in the editions by the treatise

5. On the Universe (περὶ κοσμοῦ, de Mundo), a letter to Alexander, which treats the subject of the last two works in a popular tone and a rhetorical style altogether foreign to Aristotle. The whole is probably a translation of a work with the same title by Appuleius, as Stahr (Arist. bei den Römern, p. 165, &c.) has endeavoured to prove. Osann ascribes it to the Stoic Chrysippus (Beiträge zur Græch. u. Röm. Litt. Gesch., Darmstadt, 1838, vol. i. pp. 141-283.) The latest editor of Appuleius (Hildebrand, Proleg., ad Appal. vol. i. p. xii., &c.), on the contrary, looks upon the Latin work as the translation.

To the same division of this pragmaty belongs the small fragment on the local names of several winds (ἀνέμων ἰδίων καὶ προωρογιαν, out of the larger work περὶ σμολων χειμάων, Diog. L. v. 26; printed in Arist. Opp., ed. Du Val. vol. ii. p. 348,) and a fragment extent only in a Latin form, De Nili Incremento.

The close of the fourth book of the Meteorologies conducts us to the consideration of earthly natural bodies composed of homogeneous parts (φυσιωμερή). Separate treatises on the inorganic bodies of the same class, e. g., περὶ μεταλλων (Olympiod., ad Arist. Meteorol. i. 5, vol. i. p. 133, Idler,) and περὶ τῆς ἄμμου (Diog. L. v. 26), have perished. Among the works on organic natural bodies, Aristotle himself (Meteor, i. 1) places first those on the animal kingdom, to the scientific consideration of which he devoted, according to Pliny (H. N. viii. 17), fifty, according to Antigonus Carystus (c. 66), seventy treatises. Respecting the scientific arrangement of the extant works of this pragmaty see Trendelenburg, ad Arist. de Anima Proem., p. 114, &c. The work which we must place first is

6. The History of Animals (περὶ ζωᾶν ζωτορία, called perì zwon zowotria by Aristotle himself at περὶ τῶν τῆς ζωτορίας καὶ τῶν ζωτοριῶν, De Par., iii. 14. § 5) in nine books. In this work Aristotle treats, chiefly in the way of description, of all the peculiarities of this division of the natural kingdom, according to genera, classess, and species; making it his chief endeavours to give all the characteristics of each animal according to its external and internal vital functions; according to the manner of its copulation, its mode of life, and its character. This enormous work, partly the fruit of the kindly liberality of Alexander, has not reached us quite complete. On the other hand, respecting a tenth book appended in the MSS., which treats of the conditions of the productive power, scholars are not agreed. Scaliger wants to introduce it between the 7th and 8th books; Camus regards it as the treatise spoken of by Diogenes Laertius: ἑξήκοντα τῶν μέτωπων; Schneider doubts its authenticity. According to a notice in several MSS. (p. 628, ed. Berolin.), it originates in the Latin recession of the writings of Aristotle. Respecting the plan, contents, history, and editions of the work, Schneider treats at length in the Epitome in the first vol. of his edition. The best edition is by Schneider, in four vols. 8vo., Lips. 1811.

This work, the observations in which are the triumph of ancient sagacity, and have been confirmed by the results of the most recent investigations (Curier), is followed by

7. Four books on the Parts of Animals (περὶ ζωῶν μορφῶν), in which Aristotle, after describing the phenomena in each species develops the causes of these phenomena by means of the idea to be formed of the purpose which is manifested in the formation of the animal. According to Tittec (de Arist. Opp. Ser., pp. 55-58), the first book of this work forms the introduction to the entire preceding work on animals, and was edited by him under the title ἄνεμων περὶ φίλους μᾶλλον μαθηματικῶς, Prag. 1819, and Leipzig, 1823, 8vo., with a German translation and remarks. This work, too, as regards its form, belongs to the most complete and attractive of the works of Aristotle. There is a separate work of five books.

8. On the Generation of Animals (περὶ ζωῶν γενέσεως), which treats of the generation of ani-ARISTOTLES.

The organization of plants had been treated of by Aristotle in a separate work (περὶ φυτῶν).† The extant
15. Two books Περὶ φυτῶν (de Plantis), according to a remark in the preface, are a translation from a Latin translation, which again was founded on an Arabic version of the original. In spite of all the doubts which have been raised against their authenticity, there are many expressions found in them which bear an undoubtedly Aristotelian stamp. (Compare Hensehel, de Arist. Bot. Philos. Vratalsianve, 1823.)

Several anatomičal works of Aristotle have been lost. He was the first person who in any especial manner advocated anatomical investigations, and shewed the necessity of them for the study of the natural sciences. He frequently refers to investigations of his own on the subject. (Hist. Anim. i. 17, extr., iii. 2, vi. 10.) Diog. Laërct. (v. 25) mentions eight books θαυματικῶν, and one book ἑρωτών, by Aristotle. According to Aristotle's own intimations (de Gen. An. ii. 7, de Part. An. iv. 5), these writings were illustrated by drawings. The treatise Εὐθύμες ἢ περὶ φυτῶν, a dialogue called after Budemus of Cyprus, the friend of the philosopher, has also been lost. In this work, of which a considerable fragment has been preserved (de Genet. et Splicat. i. 11, p. 155, b.), Aristotle refuted the proposition, that the soul is no independent essence, but only the harmony of the body. Whether the treatise quoted by Diog. Laërct., Εὐθύμες περὶ φυτῶν, belongs to this class of works, is doubtful. Respecting the lost medical works, see Buhle, l. c. p. 102.

3. Practical Philosophy, or Politics.

All that falls within the sphere of practical philosophy is comprehended in three principal works: the Ethica, the Politica, and the Oeconomica. In them Aristotle treats of the sciences which have reference to the operation of the reason manifesting itself in particular spheres. Their subject, therefore, is action, morality with reference to the individual, to the family, and to the state. Next to these we place the sciences which have for their object the exercise of the creative faculty (τεχνές), έ. c. Αρτ.

Ethica.—The principal work on this subject is 1. Θεωρία Νομοδοξίας, in 10 books. Aristotle here begins with the highest and most universal end of life, for the individual as well as for the community in the state. This is happiness (εὐτυχία); and its conditions are, on the one hand, perfect virtue exhibiting itself in the act, and on the other hand, corresponding bodily advantages and favourable external circumstances. Virtue is the readiness to act constantly and consciously according to the laws of the rational nature of man (μόρος λόγος). The nature of virtue shows itself in its preserved by Pintarch (de Genet. ad Apollon.). In accordance with this, the several virtues are enumerated and characterized. The authenticity of the work, which an ancient tradition ascribes to Nicomachus, the son of Aristotle, is indubitable, though there is some dispute as to the proper arrangement of the several books. The title Νομοδοξία μακρο, under which David (Proleg. ad Catoj. p. 25, a. 40. Schol. ed. Burolin.) quotes the work, has not yet been explained. The best editions are by Zell, Heidelberg, 1820, 2 vols. Βο; Corolis, Paris, 1622, 3 vo.; Cardwell, Oxford.
ARISTOTELES.

1623, 2 vols.; Michele, Berlin, 1823, 2 vols. Beside the Nicomachean Ethics, we find amongst the works of Aristotle

2. Ημερίδες Ευδίμονε in seven books, of which only books i. ii. iii. and vii. are independent, while the remaining books iv. v. and vi. agree word for word with books vi. and vii. of the Nicomachean Ethics. This ethical work is perhaps a recension of Aristotle's lectures, edited by Eudemus.

3. Ηταλική Μεγαλα (in David, L. c. 'Ητ. μεγαλ. Νυκτρικωτεχνε' in two books, which Pansh (de Arist. magno morali, subedito libro, 1841), has lately endeavored to show not to be a work of Aristotle, but an abstract, and one too not made by a very skilful hand; whilst another critic, Glaessner (de M. epl. d. Arist. pp. 53, 54), looks upon it as the authentic first sketch of the larger work.

4. The treatise Πεπλατών καὶ καλοῦσι, a collection of definitions, is of very doubtful origin, though probably belonging to the later age of extinct.

The Ethics conduct us to the Politic. (See Eth. Nic. c. ext.). The connexion between the two works is so close, that in the Ethics by the word άναγκαίος reference is made to Aristotle the Politic, and in the latter by πράξεων to the Ethics. The Aristotelian Politic (πολιτικά) in Diogenes Laërtius, v. 24, πολίτικα διερμος in eight books, have for their object to show how happiness is to be attained for the human community in the state; for the object of the state is not merely the external preservation of life, but "happy life, as it is attained by means of virtue" (πράξεων, perfect development of the whole man). Hence also ethics form the first and most general foundation of political life, because the state cannot attain its highest object, if morality does not prevail among its citizens. The house, the family, is the element of the state. Accordingly Aristotle begins with the doctrine of domestic economy, then proceeds to a description of the different forms of government, after which he gives an historico-critical delineation of the most important Hellenic constitutions, and then investigates which of the constitutions is the best (the ideal of a state). The doctrine concerning education, as the most important condition of this best state, forms the conclusion. Doubts have been raised by scholars respecting the arrangement of the several books; and lately St. Janssen, in the introduction to his edition (p. xxvi.), has urged the adoption of a transposition, in accordance with which the following would be the original order of the books: i. ii. iii. vii. vi. iv. v. On the other hand, Bise (Phil. des Arist. ii. p. 400) has acutely defended the old order.

The best editions of the Politic are by Schneider, Francof. ad Vind. 1803, 2 vols.; Corais, Paris 1821; Gotting, Jenae, 1824; Stahl, with a German translation, Lips. 1837; Barthélémy St. Hilaire, with a French translation, and a very good introduction, Paris, 1857.

Of the work extant under Aristotle's name, the Oeconomia (unpublished), in two books, only the first book is genuine; the second is spurious. (Niebuhr, Kleine Schr. i. p. 412.) The first book is ascribed to Theophrastus in a fragment of Philodemus. (Herculanens. vol. iii. pp. vii. xxvii.) The best editions are by Schneider, Lips. 1815; and Guthling, Jenae, 1850.

Among the lost writings of this pragmaty we have to mention,

1. Προφετησία, an exhortation to the study of philosophy.

2. Πεπλατών καὶ καλοῦσι, on Nobility, which, however, ancient critics (as Plut. Arist. 27) already looked upon as spurious; in which opinion most modern scholars agree with them. (See Lasa, Locut. Athet. 82—85; Welcker, ad Theogn. p. 68.)

B. HISTORICAL WORKS.

Of the large number of writings, partly political-historical, partly connected with the history of literature, and partly antiquarian, belonging to this class, only scanty fragments and solitary notices have been preserved. The extant treatise, de Xenophana, Zeno, et Gorgias, which is important for an acquaintance with the Eleatic philosophy, is only a fragment of a more comprehensive work on the history of philosophy. (Spalding, Comment. in prim. part. libelli de Xen. Zeno, et Gorg. Berol. 1793.)

The lost writings belonging to this pragmaty are

1. The Politic (πολιτικά), a description and history of the constitutions, manners, and usages of 156 (Diog. Laërt. v. 27; according to others, 250 or more) states, the historical foundation of the Politic. The numerous fragments of this invaluable work have not yet been collected with sufficient care. The collection by Neumayr (Heidel. 1827) is quite unsatisfactory.

2. Νόμιμα Βασιλεία, the Manners and Customs of the Barbarians.

3. Κυρίας, Legends of the foundations of Cities.

4. Πεπλατών καὶ καλοῦσι, for poetical literature and chronology the following treatises were important:

5. Αχαϊκακια (Περιοδικοταγον, Νίκαι Διωνυσιακα, Diog. Laërt. v. 26).

6. Τι ἐκ τοῦ Τιμαύον καὶ τῶν Ἀρχιτέκτων, a work the first part of which is preserved in Timaeus Lorem (de Anima Mundii), just as the second part, on Aréty, is in the fragments preserved in Stoic under the name of Archytas. (O.P. Gruppe, Ueber die Fragmente des Arétyges, Berlin, 1840.)

7. Diadochous, a cito-chronological specification of the repertory of the Athenian stage. (Diog. Laërt., x. 30.)

8. Κυλια καὶ πεπλατών. (Comp. Welcker, über die Cyclopische Dichter, p. 49.)

9. 'Αρχαιωτά Ομωρήκα. (See Nitzsch, de Arist. ad. Woflhaun, Köln, 1831.)

10. Πεπλατών καὶ καλοῦσι, a work of doubtful authenticity.

We now turn to those writings of Aristotle which, as belonging to the Προφετήσια πολιτικά, have for their subject the exercise of the creative faculty, or Art. To these belong the Poetic and Rhetoric.

1. The Poetic (Πεπλατών καὶ καλοῦσι). Aristotle penetrated deeper than any of the ancients, either before or after him, into the essence of Hellenic art, and in the most comprehensive mind traversed the region in which the intellectual life of the Hellenes unfolded itself, and brought it under the dominion of science. He is the father of the aesthetics of poetry, as he is the complete of Greek rhetoric as a science. The treatise itself is undoubtedly genuine; but the explanation of its present form is still a problem of criticism. Some (as Gottf. Hermann and Bernhardy) look upon it as the first sketch of an uncompleted work; others, as an extract from a larger work; others again, as the notes, taken by some hearer, of lectures delivered by Aristotle. Thus much, however, is clear, that the treatise, as we have it at present, is an independent whole, and, with the exception of a few interpolations, the work of one author. Further, that the lost work προς οὖν τοις, a history of the life and work of Aristotle himself, must be confounded with the Poetics, to which it stands in the same relation as the Politics do to the Poetics. As regards the contents of the Poetics, Aristotle, like Plato, starts from the principle of the imitation, or imitative representation (μίμησις), either of a real object existing in the external world, or of one produced by the internal power of imagination. It is in accordance with this view that the different species of art generally, and of poetry in particular, assume their definite forms. The activity of art is distinguished from practical activity in this respect: that in the case of the former the exercise of the creative faculty, the production of a work, is the main thing; and that the internal condition, the disposition, of the person who exercises an creative faculty, is a matter of indifference. The greatest part of the treatise (ch. 6—22) contains a theory of tragedy; nothing else is treated of, with the exception of the epos; comedy is merely alluded to. The best editions of the work are by Gottf. Hermann, Lips. 1802, with philological and philosophical (Kantian) explanations; Graefenhan, Lips. 1821, an ill-arranged compilation; Becket, Berol. 1832, 8vo; and Ritter, Colon. 1839, 8vo. Ritter considers two-thirds of the Poetics to consist of the interpolations of a later and extremely silly editor; but his opinion has been almost universally rejected in Germany. As explanatory writings, besides Lessing's Hamburghische Dramenstil, we need mention only Muller, Gesch. der Theorie der Kunst bei den Alten, pt. ii. pp. 1—181, and the German translation by Knebel, Stuttgart, 1840.

2. The Rhetoric (τάχυν ρητορική), in three books. Aristotle, in accordance with his method, as we have already observed in the case of the Physics, Politics, and Poetics, before proceeding to lay down a theory of rhetoric, prepared a safe foundation by means of extensive studies. These studies gave rise to a separate historical work (entitled τάχυν συναργυρών), in which he collected all the earlier theories of the rhetoricians from Thras and Comus onwards. From the latter work the Aristotelian rhetoric developed itself, a work of which, as regards its leading features, the first sketch was drawn at an early period;—it has been already mentioned that the first lectures and written works of Aristotle treated of rhetoric;—it was then carefully enlarged from time to time, and enriched with remarks drawn from the observation of human life and knowledge, for many years. The period of its composition is treated of by Max. Schmidt, De temporis quo ab Arist. libri de Arte Rhetor. conservatis et editis sint, Halle, 1837.

Rhetoric, as a science, according to Aristotle, stands side by side (αντίστασις) with Diatribe. That which alone makes a scientific treatment of rhetoric possible is the argumentation which awakens conviction (αἳ τινα ἑυκονικήν ἐνότητα μίμησις). He therefore directs his chief attention to the theory of oratical argumentation; and the more, inasmuch as earlier rhetoricians, as he says, had treated this most important subject in an exceedingly superficial manner. The second main division of the work treats of the production of that favourable disposition in the hearer, in consequence of which the orator appears to him to be worthy of credit. Yet it is not sufficient merely to know what must be said,—one must also say this in a proper manner; if the speech is to produce the intended effect. Therefore in the third part he treats of oratical expression and arrangement. The best edition with a commentary is the one published at Oxford, 1820, 8vo; but a good critical and explanatory edition is still a desideratum.

Among the writings of Aristotle we also find

3. A work on Rhetoric addressed to Alexander (Προς Ἀλέξανδρον); but it is spurious, and should probably be ascribed to Anaximenes of Lampacus. Others consider its author to have been Theodectes or Corn.

C. MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

Among the writings which Aristotle left behind him, there was undoubtedly a large number of Collectanea, which had grown up under the hand of the philosopher in the course of his extended studies. To these writings, which were not originally destined for publication, belong

1. The Problems (πρόβληματα), in 36 sections, questions on individual points in all the departments of knowledge, a treasure of the deepest and most acute remarks, which has been far from being properly used and sifted. A good edition is a desideratum. (Compare Chabannon, Trois Mémoires sur les Problèmes d'Ariste, in the Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscrips. vol. xvi. p. 295, &c., &c. p. 326, &c.

2. Σωδόδος Ακοδόμως, short notices and accounts of various phenomena, chiefly connected with natural history, of very unequal value, and in part manifestly not of Aristotelian origin. The best edition is by Westermann, in his Rerum Mirabil. script. Graec. Buns. 1839.

D. LETTERS.

All those which are extant are spurious: the genuine and copious collection of Aristotle's letters, which antiquity possessed, is lost. Those which were arranged by Andronicus of Rhodes filled 20 books. (Pseudo-Demetrius, de Elocut. § 231.) A later collection by Artemon, a learned Christian of the third century, consisted of 8 books. (See David, Cat. p. 24, a. 1. 27, ed. Berol.) David (p. 22, a. 21, Berol.) praises the clear, simple, noble style of Aristotle's letters, a description which is quite at variance with the character of those that are extant. Respecting Aristotle's will, which Diog. Laert. (v. 11—16) has preserved, we have spoken before. [p. 321, a.]

E. POEMS AND SPEECHES.

There are preserved—

1. The Scolion addressed to Hermias, which we have already mentioned. (In Igen, Scotis, Jan. 1798, p. 187; Graefenhan, Aristot. poetar., Mulh. 1831, 4to; Berg, Poetae Lyrici Graeci.)

2. Two epigrams, the one on a statue erected to his friend Hermias, and one on an altar dedicated to Plato.

The speeches of Aristotle which are lost, were Προς οὖν τοις, Προς Αλέξανδρον, of which we have already spoken; an Συναργον, πλαστον.
which had been formed of Aristotle's philosophy up to the time of Hegel, was, that Aristotle had made what is called experience the principle of knowledge and cognition. Accordingly the Aristotelian philosophy, as realism in the most ordinary sense of the word, was placed in direct opposition to the Platonic idealism. This complete misapprehension of the Aristotelian philosophy proceeded from various causes. Firstly and chiefly, from want of acquaintance with the writings of Aristotle. Little more than twenty years ago Aristotle was still very little read. We have seen how even the philological study of his writings was disregarded; and the philosophical study of them fixed no better. The properly speculative writings, the logical and metaphysical works, were scarcely read by any one. Nay, even on certain aesthetic propositions (e.g. on the three unities of the drama) false traditions prevailed, which were utterly unsubstantiated by the Poetics. And yet the Poetics was one of the most read and most easily accessible of his writings. To this were added other causes. Very many derived their acquaintance with Aristotelian philosophy from Cicero, in whose works Aristotle appears only as a moral philosopher and natural historian. Others confounded the so-called scholastic Aristotelianism with the genuine Aristotelian philosophy, which, however, in the schoolmen appears as mere empty formalism. Others, lastly, overlooked in the consideration of the method in which Aristotle philosophized the essential character of the philosophy itself. This last circumstance in particular introduced that false conception, according to which common empiricism, experience, was looked upon as the principle of Aristotelian philosophy. We must therefore first endeavour to make clear Aristotle's method.

The peculiar method of Aristotle stands in close connexion with the universal direction which he gave to his intellectual exertions, striving to penetrate into the whole compass of knowledge. In this endeavour he certainly sought from experience, in order first to arrive at the consciousness of that which really exists, and so to grasp in thought the multiplicity and breadth of the sensible and spiritual world. Thus he always first lays hold of his subject externally, separates that in it which is merely accidental, renders prominent the contradictions which result, seeks to solve them and to refer them to a higher idea, and so at last arrives at the cognition of the ideal intrinsic nature, which manifests itself in every separate object of reality. In this manner he successively develops the objects as well of the natural as of the spiritual world, proceeding genetico from the lower to the higher, from the more known to the less known, and translates the world of experience into the Idea. Accordingly he usually first points out how, when an object is produced, it first presents itself to our cognition generally, and then how this general object branches out into separate species, and first really manifests itself in these. In this way he also develops the origin of science itself genetico-in the vigorous self-development of the idea into one whole, the several members of which are mutually connected and dependent. This, the demonstration of the unity of idea in the entire universe of natural and spiritual life, was a problem which was reserved for after ages.

The composition of Aristotle's writings stands in close connexion with the method of his philosophizing. Here the object of investigation is always first laid down and distinctly defined, in order to obviate any misunderstanding. Thereupon he gives an historical review of the way in which the subject has been hitherto treated by earlier philosophers (Phys. i. 2, &c., de Anima, i. 2, Metaph. i. 3, &c., Eth. Nic. i. 3, Magn. Mor. i. 1, Polit. ii.); and indeed it may be remarked generally, that Aristotle is the father of the history of philosophy. The investigation itself then begins with the exhibition of the difficulties, doubts, and contradictions which present themselves (ἀποκαΐ, ἀποφαίνα). These are sifted, and discussed and explained on all sides (ὑποτεθέντα), and the solution and reconciliation of them (λέγει, ἀπορρέεται, in opposition to ἀπαρέεται) is given in the progress of the investigation. is that which is eternal, fundamental, whilst the single object, fashioned so as to assume an individual existence is produced, and perishes. The material in which the negation is inherent, is the potentiality (δύναμις), out of which the formative principle, as an entelechial, fashions itself into existence. This, as the full reality (ευφρένεια), is the higher step in opposition to the mere potentiality. According to these definitions, the Aristotelian philosophy progresses genetically from the lower to the higher, from the δύναμις to the εντελεχεία, of that, of which the potential, according to its peculiarly, is capable. Thus by means of the εἰδή the universe becomes a whole consisting of mutually connected members, in which these εἰδή attain to their existence. In inorganic nature the purpose is still identical with the necessity of the matter; but in organic nature it comes into existence as the soul of the enlivened object (ψυχή). The energy (ευφρένεια) of the soul is, as an entelechial, thought, both νοῦς ποιητικός, since, as the temporary activity of the mind, it is necessarily dependent on the cooperation of the senses, and νοῦς ποιητικός, i.e. cognoscent, self-acting reason, in so far as, in the pure element of thought freed from what is sensuous, it elevates the finite world into cognoscellable truth. From this existed point of view Aristotle regarded and subjected to inquiry, this the (stypy of  emin.'s and art, as it had developed itself up to his time in science, arts, and politics.

VI. Aristotelian Logic.

Aristotle is the creator of the science of logic. The two deepest thinkers of Germany, Kant and Hegel, acknowledge that from the time of Aristotle to their own age logic had made no progress. Aristotle has described the pure forms and operations of abstract reason, of finite thought, with the accuracy of an investigator of nature, and his logic is, as it were, a natural history of this "finite thought."

Aristotle obtains the categories, the fundamental conceptions of thought, from language, in which these universal forms of thought appear as parts of speech. These categories (κατηγορία, also κατηγορία, τὰ κατηγορίων) give all the possible definitions for the different modes in which everything that exists may be viewed, and also the mutual relations for the relations which constantly recur in things; fundamental definitions, which cannot be comprehended under any higher generic conception, and are, therefore, called γένη. Yet they are not themselves generic conceptions, which give what is essential in an object, but the universal modes of expressing it. An independent existence belongs to ὄντα, substance, alone of all the categories; the rest denote only the different modes of what is inherent. The categories themselves, therefore, are not an ultimate, by means of which the true cognition of an object can be attained. The most important proposition in Aristotle's doctrine of substances† is, that "the second attains to reality only in the individual." (μοῶν ὁμοὶ ὅν τών πρώτων ὁμοῖων ἀνθίλην τ也希望 μεν).

* εἶδος is the internal formative principle; μόρφη is the external form itself.
† The πρώτα ὁμολογεῖ expresses the essential qualities only, the διεξεγερόμενοι are substances, including both essential and accidental qualities.
considered apart from its particular contents; it is treated quite as a form, and the remark is at the same time made, that for that very reason it is as yet supplies us with no knowledge (συνίστημι). But this abstract universe possesses in itself adequate premises for subsequent investigation, Aristotle makes the doctrine of the syllogism precedent to that of proof, for according to him, proof is a particular kind of conclusion. (Anal. pr. i. 4.) Accordingly, together with the mode of its formation, he treats of the figures of the syllogism, and the different forms of conclusion in them. (cc. 1–27.) Then he gives directions for finding with ease the syllogistic figures for each problem that is proposed (συνιστήμεν), and lastly shows how to refer given conclusions to their principles, and to arrange them according to premises. Thereupon, in the second book of the Analytics, he treats of the complete conclusion according to its peculiar determining principles (Anal. ii. i. 1–12); points out errors and deficiencies in concluding (cc. 16–21), and teaches how to refer to the syllogistic figures incomplete arguments, which have for their object subjective conviction only. (cc. 22–27.)

We do not arrive at that conclusion which is the foundation of knowledge till we arrive at proof, i.e. a conclusion conveying a distinct meaning (συνιστήμενα επίστημον, τῆς ειδίκευσις), which proceeds from the essential definitions of the matter in question. Proof, in order to lead to objective truth, necessarily presupposes principles. Without an acquaintance with principles, we cannot attain to knowledge by means of proof. Aristotle, therefore, treats first of the nature of principles. They are the Universal, which serves as a medium through which alone we can attain to knowledge; they have their certainty in themselves, and are not susceptible of any additional separate proof. In this point of view Aristotle compares them with the immediate certainty of sensible perceptions. The reason (φόρος) and the exaction of the reason (φόρος), which is itself the Universal, develops these principles (δικτάς) out of itself.

In proof we may distinguish three things: 1. That which is proved (Anal. post. i. 7), i.e. that which is to be inferred to some definite object (γένει τιν) considered in itself. 2. The principles from which this is deduced. 3. The object, the attributes of which are to be exhibited. According to their subject-matter, proofs come into closer relation to the particular sciences. Here the important point is, to know what science is more accurate, and may be presupposed as the groundwork of another (προτέρα εστί). The knowledge to which proof conducts by means of principles (συνιστήμεν) has for its object necessary existence; conception (δόξα), on the other hand, has for its object that which may be otherwise constituted. After Aristotle, in the first book of the second Analytics, has shewn how by means of proof we may receive a knowledge that something is, and why it is so, he considers that which we cannot get at by means of proof, but which is necessary for the complete development of our ideas, viz. the definition of that which is (φορέων), of which we have stated what an object is. This is effected by definition (φορέων). The definition states what the essence of a thing is, and is therefore always universal and affirmative. It cannot be proved by any conclusion, nor even be demonstrated by means of induction. (Anal. post. ii. 7.) We find out the essence of a thing only when we know the essential attributes of the thing, and its existence itself. Aristotle analyses the different kinds of definition (Anal. post. i. 10), then treats of the individual causes (for the definition declares the why of a thing with reference to its essence), and lastly lays down the method of finding a correct definition. (Anal. post. ii. 11, &c. ii. 13.) The object of definition is, to comprehend the whole according to its essential differences, and to refer these again to the genus, in order by these means to bring under contemplation the whole as a unity consisting of mutually connected and dependent members. One aid in definition is subdivision (διαλέξεως). The definition must be clear and distinct. This distinctness is attained by endeavouring first to define the particular, in order to become acquainted with the import of it in every species. The use of definition is especially important in proposing problems. (Anal. post. ii. 14.)

Aristotle, however, does not, either in his Metaphysics, or in the particular sciences, proceed according to the abstract forms of conclusion, as he develops them in the Organon; but the definition (φορέων) forms the central point in the further prosecution of his philosophical investigations. He forms his conception of the idea of a thing (τὸ ἕν ἐν καὶ) in the identity of its existence and essence, and so continually points out the universal in the particular.

VII. METAPHYSICS.

The first philosophy (for such is the name Aristotel to gives to what we call Metaphysics) is the science of the first principles and causes of things. (Met. i. 8, 4.) It is theoreic science, and the most excellent, but at the same time the most difficult of all sciences, because its object, the universal, is removed as far as possible from the perceptions of the senses. (Met. i. 2.) It is, however, at the same time the most accurate science, because its subject-matter is most knowable; and the most free, because it is sought solely for the sake of knowledge.

There are four first causes or principles of things: a. The substance and the idea (ἡ οὐσία καὶ τὸ τιν εἶναι); b. The subject and the matter (ἡ θάν καὶ τὸ ὑποκείμενον); c. The principle of motion (ἡ κίνησις ἢ διά τίν). d. The purpose and the good (τὰ οὖς ἐνεχα καὶ τὰ ἀγαθά). The earlier philosophers (this Aristotle shows in the first book of the Metaphysics) recognized indeed all these classes singly, but neither distinctly nor in connexion. With full consciousness he declares, after having developed the history of metaphysics from the Ionian philosophers to Plato in bold and masterly outlines, that this science of the first philosophy had up to his time resembled a limping child (φανδραμένη, Met. i. 10, p. 993, Bekk.).

The consciousness of the opposition between truth existing in and for itself, and the cognition of it, must necessarily be presupposed in all philosophizing. This consciousness, which has come out in all its distinctness only in the philosophy of the most recent times, Aristotle also possesses. But he has in the form of doubt (ἀντίπαθές), which rise against science itself and its definitions. These doubts and questions, then, Aristotle considers on all sides, and therefrom arrives at the following result:—
1. There is a science which considers existence as such, and the definitions pertaining to it as such. 2. It is not the same with any of the particular sciences, for all these consider only a part of what exists and its attributes. 3. The principles and highest causes of things must have a nature appropriate only to them.

Existence is indeed defined in various ways, and denotes at one time the what and the idea, at another time the condition or constitution, magnitude, &c., of a thing; of all the definitions, however, the what, which denotes the substance, is the first. (Met. vii. 1. p. 1026, Bekk.) All other definitions only state attributes or qualities of this first definition, and are not in their nature independent, or capable of being separated from the substance. On the other hand, the idea of substance (ousia) lies at the foundation of our ideas of everything, and we do not arrive at the cognition of anything when we know how great, or where, &c., it is, but when we know what it is. The question, therefore, is, What is the substance? (τις ἡ οὐσία;) which has ever been the object of philosophical investigation. (Met. vii. 1. p. 1028.) Aristotle distinguishes three kinds of substances: 1. Substance perceptible by the senses (Met. xii. 1, 2, vii. 7), which is finite and perishable, like single sensible objects. The moment of this sensible substance are, - a. the matter, that which is fundamental, constant; b. particular things, the negative in relation to each other; c. the motive principle, the pure form or idea. 2. The second higher kind of substance is that which may be perceived by the senses, but is imperishable, such as the heavenly bodies. Here the active principle (ἐνέργεια, actus) steps in, which, in so far as it contains that which is to be produced, is understanding (νοῦς). That which it contains is the purpose, which is realized by means of the ἐνέργεια. The two extremes are here potentiality and agency (matter and thought), the passive universal and the active universal. These two are not subject to change. That which is changed is the particular thing, and passes from one to the other by means of something else by which it is moved. The purpose, in so far as it is the motive principle, is called the ἔργον, but, in so far as it is the purpose, it is the reason, αἰτία. (Met. v. 1, 2.) The active principle gives reality to that which it contains in itself: this remains the same; it is still, however, matter, which is different from the active principle, though both are combined. That which combines them is the form, the union of both. The relation of the newly coined idea of ἐνεργεία, or the purpose realized by the formative principle, to the idea of ἐνέργεια, is this: ἐνεργεία signifies in the different grades of existence the completion which is in conformity with each single existing thing; and ἐνέργεια denotes the actuality which is in conformity with this completion. (Metapoli. xx. 3, p. 179. 8, Brand.) Thus the soul is essentially ἐνεργεία.*

3. The third kind of substance is that in which ὀνειρεία, ἐνέργεια, and ἐνεργεία are united; the absolute substance; the eternal, unmoved but which is at the same time mover, is pure activity (actus pars, Met. xii. 6, ix. 8, xii. 7), is God himself. This substance is without matter, and so also is not a magnitude.

The chief momentum in the Aristotelian philosophy is, that thought and the subject of thought are one; that what is objective and thought (the ἐνέργεια) are one and the same. God himself is eternal thought, and his thought is operation, life, action,—it is the thought of thought. * Objects exist in their truth only in so far as they are the subjects of thought, are thoughts. That is their essence (οὐσία). In nature, indeed, the idea exists not as a thought, but as a body; it has, however, a soul, and it is its idea. In saying this, Aristotle stands upon the highest point of speculation: God, as a living God, is the universe.

In the course of the investigation, Aristotle, with careful regard to, and examination of, the views of earlier philosophers, points out that neither abstractly universal, nor particular, sensuously perceptible essences can be looked upon as principles of existence. Neither the universal apart from the particular, nor the particular by itself, can be a principle of the natural and spiritual world; but the absolute principle is God,—the highest reason, the object of whose thought is himself. Thus the dominion of the Anaxagorean νοῦς was declared in a profounder manner by Aristotle. In the divine thought, existence is at the same time included. Thought is the sum and substance of the universe, and realizes itself in the eternal immutable formative principles which, as the essences indwelling (immanent) in the material, fashion themselves so as to assume an individual existence. In man, however, the thought of the divine reason completes itself so as to become the self-conscious activity of thinking reason. By it he recognizes in the objective world his own nature again, and so attains to the cognition of truth. With these slight intimations, we must here leave the subject.

VIII. THE PARTICULAR SCIENCES.

Respecting the Essence of the Particular Sciences, and the division of them into Theoretical and Practical Sciences.—The science of the particular can only lead to reality, the potentiality must pass into actuality. The principle of the transition from the potential to the actual in a thing Aristotle calls entelecheia (τὸ ἑντελέχεια), because it unites both the potentiality and the actuality. Every union of potentiality and actuality is a motion, and accordingly the entelecheia is the principle of motion (ἡ τοῦ δύναμεως ὅταν ἑντελέχεια, ἡ τοιοῦτον, κινητὰ ἐστὶ). The potentiality (ὄνομα) can never become actuality (ἐνεργεία) without entelecheia; but the entelecheia also cannot dispense with the potentiality. If the entelecheia does not manifest itself in a thing, it is merely a thing κατὰ ὄνομα; if it does manifest itself, it becomes a thing κατὰ ἐνεργεία. The same thing is often both together, the former in reference to qualities which it has not yet, but can obtain; the latter in reference to attributes already actually present in it. (Buhle, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædia.)

* Met. xii. p. 1074, Bekk., αὐτὸς ἑρμος ὡς ἐγέρσει τὸ κράτεστον καλ ἐστὶν ἡ νοῦς, νοεσεῖς νοεῖσα.
Aristotle says that the essence of the particular, the \( νομοτήτος \), in the context of the intelligible, the sensible, is identified with the perceivable, the reasonable, as perceived. (Met. vii. 6.) It presupposes the principles of the intellectual and real, and has reference to that which is demonstrable from them. The individual sciences deduce from principles the truth of the particular by means of proofs, which is the foundation of knowing the scientific limit consists in this: that the individual science sets out from something presupposed, which is recognized, and deduces the rest from this by means of analysis (syllagmos). That operation of the mind which relates the particular to the universal, is the reflecting understanding (διάνοια), which is opposed as well to sensuous perception as to the higher operation of the reason. With it the difference between existence and thought, between truth and falsehood, becomes a matter of consciousness.

Every single science has reference to a definite object (\( γένος \), Met. post. i. 38, Met. xi. 7), and seeks certain principles and causes of it. The particular object therefore determines the scientific principles and every science deduces the scientific limit of out of the principles peculiar to it, i.e., out of the essential definitions of the particular object. Three things are presupposed for every particular science: a. That its object, and the essential definitions of that object (i.e., the principles peculiar to it), exist. b. The common principles (axioms), and c. The signification of the essential attributes of the object. According to their common principles, all sciences are mutually connected. Such common principles are, for example, the law of contradiction.

The accuracy (δεσπόζεα) of the single sciences depends on the nature of their objects. The less this is an object of sense, the more accurate is the science of it. (Met. xiii. 3; Met. post. i. 37; Met. iv. i. 1, 2.) Therefore metaphysics is the most accurate, but also the most difficult science. A knowledge of the kind of scientific treatment which the subject in hand requires must be acquired by intellectual cultivation. To wish to apply in all cases the method and schematism of a philosophy, which in constructing its theories begins from the fundamental idea (διάνοια), is pedantic (ἀνεκλειθηρον, Met. i. 1, p. 29, Brand.). Natural science, for example, does not admit of the application of a mere abstract definition of the idea, for it has to take into consideration as well the manifold, as also the accidental. The same may be said of the province of practical science, where, in ethics and politics, universal, thorough definitions are not always possible, but the true can often be exhibited only in outline (ἐν τίποτε, Eth. Nic. i. 1, ii. 2, ix. 2). For the practical has also to do with the individual, and therefore accidental. For that reason, experience and what is matter of fact, have a high value as the proper basis of cognition. For the individual existence (τὸ ἐν ἴδι) with its formative principle, is the really substantial; and the sensually perceptible essences and those which are universal are almost the same natures (Met. xiii. 9, p. 1096, Bock.) It is only in the individual that the universal attains reality.

The particular sciences have for their object the cognition of the world of appearances in its essential characteristics. For this purpose the co-operation of the senses is necessary. Therefore here the proposition, \( νικήλ εἰστιν ἐν ἱννετέλειαν καὶ χωρεῖν ἐστιν \), holds good. (De Anim. iii. 8.)

The science of Physics (ἡ φύσις, ἡ τοποφέρον εἰκοστή) considers that existence which is susceptible of motion. Its object is not the idea in its spiritual existence (τὸ τί ἐν ἔσω), but the idea in its real existence in the material (τὸ τί ἐστί). Natural existence has the origin of motion in itself originally. Motion is change from what exists to what exists. Nature, therefore, is no lifeless substratum, but an organization pos-
ASSISTED life, a process of becoming and being produced, in which the moving power, consisting in the formative principle, is that which gives it its shape. In natural existence matter (δύνα), deprivation (στύπωσις), and the formative principle, are in inseparable union. Matter is the foundation of the manifold, for everything, according to the formative principle, which in itself is perfect, strives to advance from it to that which is more perfect, till it attains to actuality. The internal formative principle, on the other hand, is the basis of what is unchangeable in that which is manifold. For the formative principle is in itself eternal and im- perfectible, and from it the principle of activity engeisters itself in the material. Natural science considers the formative principles which in motion and change continually reengender themselves. The formative principle and the purpose are the same, only conceived of in a different relation:—the formative principle in relation to that which actually exists; purpose, in relation to the effect of it. The identity of the two is the operative cause. The relation of purpose is the highest cause, in which all physical causes concentrate themselves. (Phys. ii. 7—9.) Wherever there is purpose there is activity (πρακτική, Phys. ii. 6) in relation to this purpose, and according to the activity of each thing, so is its natural constitution. Nature now has a purpose, but it is independent of all reflection and consideration. (Phys. 1.e.) It creates according to an unconscious impulse, and its activity is a διακοόνισμα, but not a divine activity (δην κωνίσμα δυνατόν αλλ' αυτή, de Gen. de Div. por Summ. c. 2). Sometimes it does not attain its object, because in its formative process it cannot overpower the material; and then, through this partial frustration of the purpose, abortions are produced. (Phys. 1.e., de Gener. Anim. iv. 4.) Nature therefore has the foundation of its development and existence in itself,—is its own purpose; it is an organic whole, in which everything is in a state of vigorous reciprocal action, and exhibits a series of gradations from visible object, but not apart from the process of becoming; accordingly motion is a condition in all nature, and he who has not arrived at the cognition of motion does not understand nature. (Phys. iii. 1.) Motion is the means by which everything strives to advance from potentiality (matter) to that actuality, of which, according to its nature, it is capable, so to the form appropriate to it, which is its purpose. The eidos is thus what is true of the actual state of things, and the material in which this particular is contained is the ousia, and in contrast with which the material, as the merely potential, is the lower principle. The connecting link between the two is motion, the process of becoming; accordingly motion is a condition in all nature, and he who has not arrived at the cognition of motion does not understand nature. (Phys. iii. 1.) Motion is the means by which everything strives to advance from potentiality (matter) to that actuality, of which, according to its nature, it is capable, so to the form appropriate to it, which is its purpose. The eidos is thus what is true of the actual state of things, and the material in which this particular is contained is the ousia, and in contrast with which the material, as the merely potential, is the lower principle. The connecting link between the two is motion, the process of becoming; accordingly motion is a condition in all nature, and he who has not arrived at the cognition of motion does not understand nature. (Phys. iii. 1.) Through this striving of all natural existences after the imperishable, everything is in some sort filled with soul. (De Gener. Anim. iii. 11.) The elementary bodies, considered in themselves, have motion in themselves, reciprocally produce each other, and so in time the imperishable (as e.g. earth and fire, Met. ix. 8). Things possessed of life produce in the process of generation an object of like kind with themselves (de Anim. ii. 4), and so participate in eternity as far as they can, since in their individual existence, as one according to number (ἐν ἰδίωθεν), they are not eternal. A constant dynamical connexion exhibits itself in the process of development of natural life, it aims at more and more perfect formations, and makes the lower and less perfect forms a preliminary condition of the higher, so that the higher sphere comprehends also the lower. (De Caelo, de Gen. Anim. iii. 11.) The separations of the elements between earth and heaven, the several elements are separated by no definite limit, but pass insensibly from one to the other (Phys. iv. 5; De Caelo, iv. 1, 4), and also in organisms possessed of life the same gradation, from the lower to the more and more perfect forms, shows itself. (De Anima, ii. 3.) Natural science must follow this process of development, for it is only in this way that it attains to a lively apprehension of nature.

To develop how Aristotle, according to these leading outlines, treats the particular natural sciences, how he first develops the gradations of the elements, the motion of the heavenly bodies, and the unmoved moving principle, and then points out the processes of formation in inorganic and organic nature, and lastly arrives at man, as the end and centre of the entire creation, of which he is the most complete organization (Politt. i. 8; Hist. Anim. ix. 1; De Part. Anim. iv. 10), would lead us farther than our present limits allow. We can only again direct attention to the excellent delineation, a perfect model of its kind, in the work of Biæ above referred to, vol. ii. pp. 59—216.

Mathematics and Physics have the same objects in common, but not in the same manner; for mathematics abstract from the concrete attributes of sensible things, and consider, only the quantities. (Met. xiii. 3.) This is the only side of that which is material on which the understanding (διάνοια) dwells, where it considers the universal in the way in which it is presented by the abstractive power of the understanding. This mode of procedure, however, does not admit of being applied in all cases (Phys. ii. 2); and mathematics, from their very nature, cannot rise above the material and reach real existence as such. The investigations of this science are restricted to one part of material existence (ζητείν ὑπὸ τῶν άληθεν δόγματα τῆς διάνοιας, Met. xi. 8). The three theoretical sciences, therefore, in this: the science of physics bases itself indeed with the internal formative principle, with that which has an absolute existence, but only in so far as this has passed into the material, and is accordingly not immovable. (Met. vi. 1, xii. 7.)

The science of mathematics, on the other hand, occupies itself indeed with that which is immovable and at rest, as its definitions are fixed and unalterable; but not with that which is absolutely immovable, but immovable in so far as it is connected with matter.

The science of metaphysics, lastly, occupies itself with that which exists really and absolutely, with that which is eternal and immovable.
ARISTOTLES.

Mathematics, therefore, stand half-way between physics and metaphysics. (Met. i. 6, p. 20, 23, b. 9, p. 33, 23, x. 1, p. 212, 22.) Mathematical existence only Knows a shape: (according to potentiality) in the abstractive operation of the understanding, and is therefore no independent exist- ence, nothing substantial. We arrive at the cognition of its peculiar definitions not from the idea, but only by means of separation (e.g. auxiliary lines in figures for proof). On that account, neither motion nor the idea of purpose occurs in mathematics. (Met. iv. 2, Phys. ii. 9.) In this science, that which is simple, as an abstractum, forms the starting-point, and its necessity depends on our advancing from the simple to the composite, or from the basis to that which is based upon it. (Phys. ii. 9.) Respecting the axioms from which the mathematical sciences proceed, mathematics can therefore say nothing (Met. iv. 8), because these belong to every existing thing as such.*

B.

THE PRACTICAL SCIENCES.

Mathematics, restricted as the science is to the quantitative, can exhibit the good and the beautiful only as they manifest themselves in that immutabili- ty which consists in the fixed order and harmony of the quantitative. But the way in which these two, the good and the beautiful, acquire existence in the department of the mind, is considered and pointed out by the practical sciences, Ethics, Politi- cks (with Oeconomics as an appendix), and Poetics (Aesthetics, Philosophy of Art).

1. Ethics.

1. General Definitions.†—The highest and last purpose of all action, according to Aristotle, is happiness (εὐθανασία, Eth. Nic. i. 2-7, x. 6-8, and elsewhere). This he defines to be the energy (ἔνεργεια) of life existing for its own sake (perfect life), according to virtue existing by and for itself (perfect virtue). As the highest good, it must be pursued for its own sake; as the highest human good, its essence must be derived from the peculiar destination of man. Accordingly, happiness is the activity of the soul in accordance with virtue during a separate independent period of existence. (Eth. Nic. i. 7.) The two principal component parts of this definition are virtue, and external good circumstances as means of virtue. Virtues are of two kinds, either intellectual virtues (σοφία), or moral virtues (δέον), according to the distinction between the reasoning faculty, and that in the soul which obeys the reason. According to this distinction, the origin of the virtues, which Aristotle points out in the second book of the Ethics, is also different. The intellectual virtues may be learnt and taught, the ethical virtues are acquired by practice. In the case of these, therefore, we must have regard to the practice of them in particular cases; therefore, only quite general directions admit of being given respecting them. Youth must be accustomed and trained to rejoice and be sorry in the proper way,* for grief and joy are the criteria of virtue, because as it is the proper medium between excess and deficieny. (Eth. Nic. ii. 2.) To be able to refrain from sensual desires with pleasure is to be temperate. The intemperate man experiences pain at such abstinence, when he is compelled to prac- tise it. By the practice of virtue the man becomes good himself; and virtue is therefore a habit, and that too accompanied by fore-choice (λέγειν προαιρε- τικός), which keeps the medium in our subjective inclinations and impulses (Eth. Nic. ii. 6), and keeps the medium in that way in which the rational man (σοφός) determines. This me- dium assumes different forms according to the several impulses, under the influence of which the actor has reference either solely to himself, or to others also. The medium is opposed to the ex- treme; they contradict each other, and the proper measure or degree depends on the particular incli- nations of the individual.

* The only mathematical work of Aristotle (μαθηματικά, Dog. Laert. v. 24) quoted by an- cient writers is lost. The method which was fol- lowed at a later time for mathematics, rests alto- gether on the doctrine of proof* given in the Ana- lytics. Aristotle probably composed no separate tænons on arithmetic and geometry. In his Organon he frequently borrows examples from geometry. Aristotle, as an opponent of the Pythago- reans, laid great stress on the separation of arithmetic and geometry. (Aquot. post. i. 27, Met. v. 6.)

† In this review of the ethical system of Aris- totle we follow of course the progress of the Nicomachean Ethics, as being the principal work. The first two books contain the general part of ethics, the remaining eight books carry out the definitions of this portion more closely.

2. Special parts. — Virtue is based upon free, self-conscious action. Aristotle, therefore, before developing the several virtues specially, defines the idea of responsibility (iii. 1-7), and then and not before gives the development of the ethical (iii. 8, v. ext.) and logical (vi.) virtues. As now, in the definition of happiness, virtues and the means of virtue formed the chief parts, so the second section of the special part of ethics is de- voted to the internal and external circumstances of life, which become the means of virtue through the good manifesting itself in them as the purpose. Continuance in a course of virtue is connected chiefly with firmness of character, which exhibits itself as well in abstinence (ἐγκατάστασις) which resis- tants pleasure, as in endurance (καρποπραξία, a Platonic idea: see Plat. Laches), which remains unshaken, even by the attacks of pain. (Eth. Nic. vili. 1-12.) This firmness therefore manifests itself especially in the manner in which a man demeans himself towards pleasure and pain. This leads to the investigation of the essential nature of pleasure and pain. (Eth. Nic. vili. 12, etc.) Further, in the social life of men, friendship, which is itself a virtue (vili. 1), and indeed the crown of all vir- tues, is a principal means for a steady continuance in virtue. Aristotle, therefore, in the 8th and 9th books, treats of friendship with the most careful explicitness. He shows that it forms the foundation for all kinds of unions, and contributes to the realization of the good in the smaller and larger circles of social life. Lastly, the unrestricted exer- cise of each species of activity directed towards the good is accompanied by the feeling of an undis- turbed energy, and this harmony, in which the external and the internal are in accordance, produces a pleasure, which exercises a powerful influence in urging the man on to virtuous activity, besides being the constant attendant of the latter. In this point of view Aristotle, in the 10th book (Eth. Nic. x. 1-6), treats of pleasure as a powerful means of virtue.

After the principal elements of the definition of virtue have been thus gone through, the happiness of the theoretical life of reason, i.e. of the life devoted to philosophical contemplation, is brought prominently into view; which, as a divine kind of life, is accorded to but few men. (Eth. Nic. x. 8.) In contrast with this stands the happiness of active, practical life, which has its firm basis in the ethical virtues, and in external good circumstances the means of carrying out and accomplishing the higher ends of life. This, however, can only take place in the state; and so Ethics of themselves conduct us to the doctrine of the state, to politics.

The ethics of Aristotle preserved the most complete development of the doctrine of virtue, regarded from the point of view chosen by the ancients. The problem which he here proposed to himself was no other than this: to exhibit the good in the process of becoming, in that way in which it is a thing attainable by man, and individualizes itself most immediately in the bents or inclinations of men (the existence of which as such in their natural condition, according to the view taken by the ancients, cannot be denied). Then, secondly, by means of practical wisdom, to determine the proper medium for these manifold bents, and so to lay down the rule for action. Farther, to show that the oblation to live according to this rule, is founded in the essential nature of the higher rationality, and that in those sentiments which are firm and immovable form the immutably basis of action.

2. Politics. The ethics of Aristotle contain the fundamental elements (στοιχεῖα, Polit. iv. 11, ed. Stahr) of politics, of which the former science is itself a particular part (πολιτικὴ τις, Eth. Nic. i. 1, Magn. Mor. i. 1.) Both have the same end—happiness, only that it is far more noble and more divine to conduct whole peoples and states to this end. (Polit. iii. 12.) Practical wisdom and politics are one and the same species of habit (Eth. Nic. vi. 3); all they differ in is this: that the object of the one is to promote the happiness of an individual, the object of the other to promote that of a community. In the latter point of view, practical wisdom is:

a. The management of the family—oeconomies.
b. In the management of the state. — a. Legislative power (γοναθετεία), which regulates the general relations (ἀρχηγετεία), which in the government of the state, where action, or the special application of the laws under particular circumstances, is concerned. The administrative power realizes itself first in that part of the state which deliberates on the public concerns (σοφερνία), and which possesses the power of applying the laws to public relations; secondly, in the judicial power (δικαστεία), with the application of the laws to private concerns.

As the highest good is something absolutely perfect, i.e. a thing of such a nature that it is striven after purely for its own sake, happiness, as it is a good of this kind, cannot be imperfect, but the quality of self-sufficiency (αὐτόκειος) must pertain to it. This, however, is to be obtained not in isolated or family life, but only in the state, which is the union of all other circles of social life. Man therefore, as a being created with a nature for the state and for life in the state (καὶ μαθητεύοντες, Polit. i. 2, iii. 6, and elsewhere), strives after it. The state, moreover, as a totality consisting of organically connected members, is by nature prior to the individual and the family; it is the absolute prior. As the hand of a corpse is no more a hand, so the annihilation of the state is at the same time the annihilation of the individual; for only a wild beast or a god can live out of the bounds of the state, or without it. (Polit. i. 2, ext.) It is only through the state that ἀνάτροπη, self-sufficiency, not merely for the preservation of bare life, but also for happy life, is rendered possible. Happiness, however, is only the consequence of an activity of the soul consisting in complex virtue (ἀρετή); consequently, in the state, and in nothing short of it, does virtue itself attain complete reality. And the object of the political art is the most honourable, in as far as the statesman directs all his care to the training of such citizens as are morally good and actively promote everything honourable and noble. (Eth. i. 10, 13, init.) The science of politics therefore is the necessary completion of ethics, and it is only in reference to the state that the latter can attain its full development. The two sciences, therefore, in Aristotle's view, stand in such close connexion, that in the Politics by πολιτικόν he refers to the Ethics, and in the latter by λατρεία to the Politics.

According to the method of genetic development (οὐσία τῆς φυσικῆς μέθοδος, Polit. i. 1), Aristotle begins in the politics with the consideration of the first and most simple human association, the family (οἰκία). A marriage of free men and women is known only by the Hellenes, not by the barbarians, among whom not free men and women, but male and female slaves unite themselves together. The distinction between Hellenes and barbarians, free men and slaves, in Aristotle's view is still a primary distinction, because the natural determining circumstances of birth (as Hellen or barbarian) is still an essential element in the idea of freedom. Christianity first laid down the principle, that freedom is founded on the spiritual nature of man, without regard to the natural determining circumstances of birth.

Out of the component parts of the family (slaves and free persons, master and slaves, man and wife, father and children) arise three relations: the δοστίον (δοστοικία), yπηθία (γαμοί), and χρονοποιητική, with which is associated besides the πολιτική. These three terms treat of in the first book of the Politics. The arrangement of the whole domestic system resembles monarchy (Polit. i. 7), but at the same time the family is the image of political life generally, for in it lie the germs of friendship, constitution, and all that is just. (Eth. Eudem. vii. 10, p. 1242. 6, Bckk.) After this, in the second book, he considers the purpose of the state, which consists of mutually dependent and connected members, with reference as well to imaginary (Plato), as to actually existing constitutions. He calls attention to their points of superiority and inferiority, and so indicates the essential conditions, which are necessary for the foundation and realization of the idea of a state. Thereupon in the
